following should crave leave of her mother to go to confession, and to repair to the Church of St. Francis, where in a certain chapel secretly they should be married, praying her in any wise not to fail to be there. Which thing she brought to pass with such discretion, as her mother agreed to her request: and accompanied only with her governess and a young maiden, she repaired thither at the determined day and time. And so soon as she was entered the church, she called for the good Doctor Friar Lawrence, unto whom answer was made that he was in the shriving chapel, and forthwith advertisement was given him of her coming. So soon as Friar Lawrence was certified of Julietta, he went into the body of the church, and willed the old woman and young maiden to go hear service, and that, when he had heard the confession of Julietta, he would send for them again. Julietta being entered a little cell with Friar Lawrence, he shut fast the door as he was wont to do, where Romeo and he had been together shut fast in, the space of one whole hour before. Then Friar Lawrence, after that he had shrived them, said to Julietta: "Daughter, as Romeo here present has certified me, you be agreed and contented to take him to husband, and he likewise you for his espouse and wife. Do you now still persist and continue in that mind?" The lovers answered that they desired none other thing. The friar seeing their conformed and agreeable wills, after he had discoursed somewhat upon the commendation of marriage dignity, pronounced the usual words of the Church, and, she having received the ring from Romeo, they rose up before the friar, who said unto them: "If you have any other thing to confer together, do the same with speed: for I purpose that Romeo shall go from hence so secretly as he can." Romeo sorry to go from Julietta said secretly unto her, that she should send unto him after dinner the old woman, and that he would cause to be made a corded ladder the same evening, thereby to climb up to her chamber window, where at more leisure they would devise of their affairs. Things determined between them, either of them retired to their house with incredible contentation, attending the happy hour for consummation of their marriage. When Romeo was come home to his house, he declared wholly what had passed between him and Julietta unto a servant of his called Pietro, whose fidelity he had so greatly tried, as he durst have trusted him with his life, and commanded him with expedition to provide a ladder of cords with two strong hooks of iron fastened to both ends, which he easily did, because they were much used in Italy. Julietta did not forget in the evening about five of the clock to send the old woman to Romeo, who, having prepared all things necessary, caused the ladder to be delivered unto her, and prayed her to require Julietta the same evening not to fail to be at the accustomed place. But if this journey seemed long to these two passionate lovers, let others judge, that have at other times assayed the like: for every minute of an hour seemed to them a thousand years, so that if they had power to command the heavens (as Joshua did the sun) the earth had incontinently been shadowed with darkest clouds. The appointed hour come, Romeo put on the most sumptuous apparel he had, and conducted by good fortune near to the place where his heart took life, was so fully determined of his purpose, as easily he climbed up the garden wall. Being arrived hard to the window, he perceived Julietta, who had already so well fastened the ladder to draw him up, as without any danger at all he entered her chamber, which was so clear as the day, by reason of the tapers of virgin wax, which Julietta had caused to be lighted, that she might the better behold her Romeo. Julietta for her part was but in her night kerchief: who so soon as she perceived him colled him about the neck, and after she had kissed and rekindled him a million of times began to embrace him between her arms, having no power to speak unto him but by sighs only, holding her mouth close against his, and being in this trance beheld him with pitiful eye, which made him to live and die together. And afterwards, somewhat come to herself, she said with sighs deeply fetched from the bottom of her heart: "Ah, Romeo, the exemplar of all virtue and gentleness, most heartily welcome to this place, wherein for your lack, and absence, and for fear of your person, I have gushed forth so many tears as the spring is almost dry: but now that I hold you between my arms, let death and fortune do what they list. For I count myself more than satisfied of all my sorrows past, by the favour alone of your presence." Whom 10 Romeo with weeping eye, giving over silence, answered: "Madam, forasmuch as I never received so much of fortune's grace, as to make you feel by lively experience what power you had over me, and the torment every minute of the day sustained for your occasion, I do assure you the least grief that vexeth me for your absence is a thousand times more painful than death, which long time ere 20 this had cut off the thread of my life, if the hope of this happy journey had not been, which, paying me now the just tribute of my weepings past, maketh me better content, and more glad, than if the whole 25 world were at my commandment, beseeching you (without further memory of ancient grief) to take advice in time to come how we may content our passionate hearts, and to sort our affairs with such 30 wisdom and discretion, as our enemies without advantage may let us continue the remnant of our days in rest and quiet." And as Julietta was about to make answer, the old woman came in the meantime, 35 and said unto them: "He that wasteth time in talk recovereth the same too late. But forasmuch as either of you hath endured such mutual pains, behold (quoth she) a camp which I have made ready": 40 (showing them the field bed which she had prepared and furnished), whereunto they easily agreed. Their marriage thus consummated, Romeo, perceiving the morning making hasty approach, took 45 his leave, making promise that he would not fail within a day or two to resort again to the place by like means and at the same time, until Fortune had provided sure occasion unfearfully to manifest their 50 marriage to the whole world. And thus, a month or twain, they continued their joyful minds to their incredible satisfaction, until Lady Fortune, envious of their prosperity, turned her wheel to tumble them into such a bottomless pit, as they paid her usury for their pleasures past, by 5 a certain most cruel and pitiful death, as you shall understand hereafter by the discourse that followeth. Now as we have before declared, the Capellets and the Montesches were not so well reconciled by the Lord of Verona, but that there rested in them such sparks of ancient displeasures, as either parties waited but for some light occasion to draw together, which they did in the Easter holy days (as 15 bloody men commonly be most willingly disposed after a good time to commit some nefarious deed). Beside the Gate of Boursarie leading to the old castle of Verona, a troop of Capellets rencountered with certain of the Montesches, and without other words began to set upon them. And the Capellets had for chief of their glorious enterprise one called Thibault, 20 cousin-german to Julietta, a young man strongly made and of good experience of arms, who exhorted his companions with stout stomachs to repress the boldness of the Montesches, that there might from that time forth no memory of them be 25 left at all. The rumour of this fray was dispersed throughout all the corners of Verona, that succour might come from all parts of the city to depart the same. Whereof Romeo advertised, who walked 35 along the city with certain of his companions, hasted him speedily to the place where the slaughter of his parents and allies were committed: and after he had well advised and beholden many wounded and hurt on both sides, he said to his 40 companions: "My friends, let us part them, for they be so fleshed one upon another, as will all be hewed to pieces before the game be done." And saying 45 so, he thrust himself amidst the troop, and did no more but part the blows on either side, crying upon them aloud: "My friends, no more, it is time henceforth that our quarrel cease. For besides the 50 provocation of God's just wrath, our two families be slanderous to the whole world, and are the cause that this commonwealth doth grow unto disorder." But they were so eager and furious one against the other, as they gave no heed to Romeo's counsel, and bent themselves to kill, dismember, and tear each other in pieces. And the fight was so cruel and outrageous between them, as they which looked on were amazed to see them endure those blows, for the ground was all covered with arms, legs, thighs and blood, wherein no sign of cowardness appeared, and maintained 10 their fight so long, that none was able to judge who had the better, until that Thibault, cousin to Julietta, inflamed with ire and rage, turned towards Romeo thinking with a prick to run him through. But he was so well armed and defended with a privy coat which he wore ordinarily for the doubt he had of the Capellets, as the prick rebounded: unto whom Romeo made answer: "Thibault, thou mayest 20 know by the patience which I have had until this present time, that I came not hither to fight with thee or thine, but to seek peace and atonement between us, and if thou thinkest that for lack of courage I have failed mine endeavour, thou doest great wrong to my reputation. And impute this my sufferance to some other particular respect, rather than to want of stomach. Wherefore abuse me not, 30 but be content with this great effusion of blood and murders already committed. And provoke me not, I beseech thee, to pass the bounds of my good will and mind." "Ah, traitor," said Thibault, 35 "thou thinkest to save thyself by the plot of thy pleasant tongue, but see that thou defend thyself, else presently I will make thee feel that thy tongue shall not guard thy corpse, nor yet be the buckler to defend the same from present death." And saying so, he gave him a blow with such fury, as had not other warded the same, he had cut off his head from his shoulders, and the one was no readier to lend, but the 45 other incontinently was able to pay again, for he being not only wroth with the blow that he had received, but offended with the injury which the other had done, began to pursue his enemy with such courage 50 and vivacity, as at the third blow with his sword he caused him to fall backward stark dead upon the ground with a prick vehemently thrust into his throat, which he followed till his sword appeared through the hinder part of the same, by reason whereof the conflict ceased. For besides 5 that Thibault was the chief of his company he was also born of one of the noblest houses within the city, which caused the potestate to assemble his soldiers with diligence for the apprehension and imprisonment of Romeo, who, seeing ill fortune at hand, in secretwise conveyed himself to Friar Lawrence at the Friars Franciscans. And the friar, understanding of his fact, kept him in a certain secret 15 place of his convent until fortune did otherwise provide for his safe going abroad. The bruit spread throughout the city, of this chance done upon the Lord Thibault, the Capellets in mourning weeds caused the dead body to be carried before the seignior of Verona, so well to move them to pity as to demand justice for the murder: before whom came also the Monteschies declaring the innocency of Romeo 25 and the wilful assault of the other. The council assembled and witnesses heard on both parts, a strait commandment was given by the lord of the city to give over their weapons, and touching the offence of Romeo, because he had killed the other in his own defence, he was banished Verona for ever. This common misfortune published throughout the city was generally sorrowed and lamented. Some complaineth the death of the Lord Thibault, 35 so well for his dexterity in arms as for the hope of his great good service in time to come, if he had not been prevented by such cruel death. Others bewailed (especially the ladies and gentlewomen) the overthrow of young Romeo, who, besides his beauty and good grace wherewith he was enriched, had a certain natural allure- ment, by virtue whereof he drew unto him 45 the hearts of each man, like as the stony adamant doth the cankered iron, in such wise as the whole nation and people of Verona lamented his mischance: but above all unfortunate Julietta, who advertised both of the death of her cousin Thibault, and of the banishment of her husband, made the air sound with infinite number of mournful complaints and miserable lamentations. Then feeling herself too much outraged with extreme passion, she went into her chamber, and overcome with sorrow threw herself upon her bed, where she began to reinforce her dolour after so strange fashion, as the most constant would have been moved to pity. Then, like one out of her wits, she gazed here and there and, by fortune beholding the window whereat Romeo was wont to enter into her chamber, cried out: "Oh, unhappy window, oh, entry most unlucky, wherein were woven the bitter toil of my former mishaps, if by thy means I have received at other times some light pleasure or transitory contentation, thou now makest me pay a tribute so rigorous and painful, as my tender body not able any longer to support the same shall henceforth open the gate to that life, where the ghost discharged from this mortal burden shall seek in some place else more assured rest. Ah, Romeo, Romeo, when acquaintance first began between us, and reclined mine ears unto thy suborned promises, confirmed with so many oaths, I would never have believed that in place of our continued amity, and in appeasing of the hatred of our houses, thou wouldest have sought occasion to break the same by an act so shameful, whereby thy fame shall be spotted for ever, and I, miserable wretch, desolate of spouse and companion. But if thou hadst been so greedy after the Capellets' blood, wherefore didst thou spare the dear blood of mine own heart, when so many times and in such secret place the same was at the mercy of thy cruel hands? The victory which thou shouldest have gotten over me, had it not been glorious enough for thine ambitious mind, but for more triumphant solemnity to be crowned with the blood of my dearest kinsman? Now get thee hence therefore into some other place to deceive some other, so unhappy as myself. Never come again in place where I am, for no excuse shall hereafter take hold to assuage mine offended mind: in the meantime I shall lament the rest of my heavy life, with such store of tears, as my body dried up from all humidity shall shortly search relief in earth." And having made an end of those her words, her heart was so grievously strained as she could neither weep nor speak, and stood so immovable as if she had been in a trance. Then being somewhat come again unto herself, with feeble voice she said: "Ah, murderous tongue of other men's honour, how darest thou so infamously to speak of him whom his very enemies do commend and praise? How presumest thou to impute the blame upon Romeo, whose unguiltiness and innocent deed every man alloweth? Where from henceforth shall be his refuge, sith she which ought to be the only bulwark and assured rampire of his distress doth pursue and defame him? Receive, receive then Romeo the satisfaction of mine ingratitude by the sacrifice which I shall make of my proper life, and so the fault which I have committed against thy loyalty shall be made open to the world, thou being revenged and myself punished." And thinking to use some further talk, all the powers of her body failed her with signs of present death. But the good old woman, which could not imagine the cause of Julietta her long absence, doubted very much that she suffered some passion, and sought her up and down in every place within her father's palace until at length she found her lying along upon her bed, all the outward parts of her body so cold as marble. But the good old woman which thought her to be dead began to cry like one out of her wits, saying: "Ah, dear daughter and nurse-child, how much doth thy death now grieve me at the very heart!" And, as she was feeling all the parts of her body, she perceived some spark of life to be yet within the same, which caused her to call her many times by her name, till at length she brought her out of her swoon, then said unto her: "Why, Julietta, mine own dear darling, what mean you by this turmoiling of yourself? I cannot tell from whence this your behaviour and that immoderate heaviness do proceed, but well I wot that within this hour I thought to have accompanied you to the grave." "Alas, good mother," (answered woeful Julietta), "do you not most plainly perceive and see what just cause I have to sorrow and complain, losing at one instant two persons of the world which were unto me most dear?" "Methinks," answered the good woman, "that it is not seemly for a gentlewoman of your degree to fall into such extremity: for in time of tribulation wisdom should most prevail. And if the Lord Thibault be dead do you think to get him again by tears? What is he that doth not accuse his overmuch presumption? Would you that Romeo had done that wrong to him and his house, to suffer himself outraged and assailed by one to whom in manhood and prowess he is not inferior? Sufficeth you that Romeo is alive, and his affairs in such estate who in time may be called home again from banishment, for he is a great lord, and, as you know, well allied and favoured of all men, wherefore arm yourself from henceforth with patience: for albeit Fortune doth estrange him from you for a time, yet sure I am that hereafter she will restore him unto you again with greater joy and contentation than before. And to the end that we be better assured in what state he is, if you will promise me to give over your heaviness, I will to-day know of Friar Lawrence whither he is gone." To which request Julietta agreed, and then the good woman repaired to St. Francis', where she found Friar Lawrence who told her that the same night Romeo would not fail at his accustomed hour to visit Julietta, and there to do her to understand what he purposed to do in time to come. This journey then fared like the voyages of mariners, who after they had been tossed by great and troublous tempests, seeing some sunbeam pierce the heavens to lighten the land, assure themselves again, and thinking to have avoided shipwreck, and suddenly the seas begin to swell, the waves do roar with such vehemence and noise, as if they were fallen again into greater danger than before. The assigned hour come, Romeo failed not according to his promise to be in his garden, where he found his furniture prest¹ to mount the chamber of Julietta, who with displayed arms began so straitly to embrace him, as it seemed that the soul would have abandoned her body. And they two more than a large quarter of an hour were in such agony as they were not able to pronounce one word, and wetting each other's faces fast closed together, the tears trickled down in such abundance as they seemed to be thoroughly bathed therein, which Romeo perceiving, thinking to stay those immoderate tears, said unto her: "Mine own dearest friend Julietta, I am not now determined to recite the particulars of the strange haps of frail and inconstant Fortune, who in a moment hoisteth a man up to the highest degree of her wheel, and by and by, in less space than the twinkling of an eye, she throweth him down again so low, as more misery is prepared for him in one day, than favour in one hundred years: which I now prove and have experience in myself, which have been nourished delicately amongst my friends, and maintained in such prosperous state, as you do little know, hoping for the full perfection of my felicity by means of our marriage to have reconciled our parents and friends, and to conduct the residue of my life according to the scope and lot determined by Almighty God: and nevertheless all mine enterprises be put back, and my purposes turned clean contrary, in such wise that from henceforth I must wander like a vagabond through divers provinces, and sequestrate myself from my friends, without assured place of mine abode, which I desire to let you weet, to the intent you may be exhorted in time to come, patiently to bear so well mine absence, as that which it shall please God to appoint." But Julietta, all affrighted with tears and mortal agonies, would not suffer him to pass any further, but interrupting his purpose said unto him: "Romeo, how canst thou be so hard-hearted and void of all pity to leave me here alone, besieged with so many deadly miseries? There is neither hour nor minute wherein death doth not appear a thousand times before me, and yet my mishap is such as I cannot die, and therefore do manifestly perceive that the same death preserveth my life, of purpose to delight in my griefs and triumph over my evils. And thou, like the minister and tyrant of her cruelty, dost make no conscience (for aught that I can see) having achieved the sum of thy desires and pleasures on me, to abandon and forsake me: whereby I well perceive that all the laws of amity are dead and utterly extinguished, forasmuch as he in whom I had greatest hope and confidence, and for whose sake I am become an enemy to myself, doth disdain and contemn me. No, no, Romeo, thou must fully resolve thyself upon one of these two points, either to see me incontinently thrown down headlong from this high window after thee: or else to suffer me to accompany thee into that country or place whither fortune shall guide thee: for my heart is so much transformed into thine, that so soon as I hear of thy departure, presently my life will depart this woeful body: the continuance whereof I do not desire for any other purpose, but only to delight myself in thy presence, to be partaker of thy misfortunes: and therefore, if ever there lodged any pity in the heart of gentleman, I beseech thee Romeo with all humility, that it may now find place in thee, and that thou wilt vouchsafe to receive me for thy servant and the faithful companion of thy mishaps: and if thou think that thou canst not conveniently receive me in the estate and habit of a wife, who shall let me to change mine apparel? Shall I be the first that have used like shifts to escape the tyranny of parents? Dost thou doubt that my service will not be so good unto thee as that of Pietro thy servant? Will my loyalty and fidelity be less than his? My beauty which at other times thou hast so greatly commended, it is not esteemed of thee? My tears, my love and the ancient pleasures and delights that you have taken in me shall they be in oblivion?" Romeo, seeing her in these alterations, fearing that worse inconvenience would chance, took her again between his arms, and kissing her amorously, said: "Julietta, the only mistress of my heart, I pray thee in the name of God, and for the fervent love which thou bearest me, to do away those vain cogitations, except thou mean to seek and hazard the destruction of us both: for if thou persevere in this purpose, there is no remedy but we must both perish: for so soon as thine absence shall be known, thy father will make such earnest pursuit after us, that we cannot choose but be descried and taken, and in the end cruelly punished, I as a thief and stealer of thee, and thou as a disobedient daughter to thy father: and so instead of pleasant and quiet life our days shall be abridged by most shameful death. But if thou wilt recline thyself to reason (the right rule of human life), and for the time abandon our mutual delights, I will take such order in the time of my banishment, as within three or four months without any delay I shall be revoked home again: but if it fall out otherwise (as I trust not) howsoever it happen, I will come again unto thee, and with the help of my friends will fetch thee from Verona by strong hand, not in counterfeit apparel as a stranger, but like my spouse and perpetual companion: in the meantime quiet yourself and be sure that nothing else but death shall divide and put us asunder." The reasons of Romeo so much prevailed with Julietta, as she made him this answer: "My dear friend, I will do nothing contrary to your will and pleasure: and to what place so ever you repair, my heart shall be your own, in like sort as you have given yours to be mine: in the meanwhile I pray you not to fail oftentimes to advertise me by Friar Lawrence, in what state your affairs be, and specially of the place of your abode." Thus these two poor lovers passed the night together, until the day began to appear which did divide them, to their extreme sorrow and grief. Romeo, having taken leave of Julietta, went to St. Francis', and after he had advertised Friar Lawrence of his affairs departed from Verona in the habit of a merchant stranger, and used such expedition as without hurt he arrived at Mantuona (accompanied only with Pietro his servant, whom he hastily sent back again to Verona to serve his father) where he took a house: and living in honourable company, assayed certain months to put away the grief which so tormented him. But during the time of his absence, miserable Julietta could not so cloak her sorrow, but that through the evil colour of her face her inward passion was descried: by reason whereof her mother, who heard her oftentimes sighing and incessantly complaining, could not forbear to say unto her: "Daughter, if you continue long after this sort, you will hasten the death of your good father and me, who love you so dearly as our own lives: wherefore henceforth moderate your heaviness, and endeavour yourself to be merry: think no more upon the death of your cousin Thibault, whom (sith it pleased God to call away) do you think to revoke with tears, and so withstand His almighty will?" But the poor gentlewoman not able to dissemble her grief said unto her: "Madam, long time it is sithence the last tears for Thibault were poured forth, and I believe that the fountain is so well sucked and dried up, as no more will spring in that place." The mother, which could not tell to what effect those words were spoken, held her peace, for fear she should trouble her daughter: and certain days after, seeing her to continue heaviness and continual griefs, assayed by all means possible to know, as well of her, as of other the household servants, the occasion of their sorrow, but all in vain: wherewith the poor mother, vexed beyond measure, purposed to let the Lord Antonio her husband to understand the case of her daughter: and upon a day seeing him at convenient leisure she said unto him: "My lord, if you have marked the countenance of our daughter, and her kind of behaviour sithence the death of the Lord Thibault her cousin, you shall perceive so strange mutation in her, as it will make you to marvel, for she is not only contented to forgo meat, drink and sleep, but she spendeth her time in nothing else than in weeping and lamentation, delighting to keep herself solitary within her chamber, where she tormenteth herself so outrageously as, if we take not heed, her life is to be doubted, and not able to know the origin of her pain, the more difficult shall be the remedy: for albeit that I have sought means by all extremity, yet cannot I learn the cause of her sickness: and where I thought in the beginning that it proceeded upon the death of her cousin, now I do manifestly perceive the contrary, specially when she herself did assure me that she had already wept and shed the last tears for him that she was minded to do: and uncertain whereupon to resolve, I do think verily that she mourneth for some despite, to see the most part of her companions married, and she yet unprovided, persuading with herself (it may be) that we her parents do not care for her: wherefore dear husband, I heartily beseech you for our rest and her quiet, that hereafter ye be careful to provide for her some marriage worthy of our state." Whereunto the Lord Antonio willingly agreed, saying unto her: "Wife, I have many times thought upon that whereof you speak, notwithstanding sith as yet she is not attained to the age of eighteen years, I thought to provide a husband at leisure: nevertheless things being come to these terms, and knowing the virgin's chastity is a dangerous treasure, I will be mindful of the same to your contentation, and she matched in such wise, as she shall think the time hitherto well delayed. In the meanwhile mark diligently whether she be in love with any, to the end that we have not so great regard to goods or the nobility of the house wherein we mean to bestow her, as to the life and health of our daughter, who is to me so dear as I had rather die a beggar without lands or goods, than to bestow her upon one which shall use and treat her ill." Certain days after that the Lord Antonio had bruited the marriage of his daughter, many gentlemen were suitors, so well for the excellency of her beauty, as for her great riches and revenue. But above all others, the alliance of a young earl named Paris, the Count of Lodronne, liked the Lord Antonio: unto whom liberally he gave his consent, and told his wife the party upon whom he did mean to bestow his daughter. The mother, very joyful that they had found so honest a gentleman for their daughter, caused her secretly to be called before her, doing her to understand what things had passed between her father and the Count Paris, discoursing unto her the beauty and good grace of the young count, the virtues for which he was commended of all men, joining thereunto for conclusion the great riches and favour which he had in the goods of fortune, by means whereof she and her friends should live in eternal honour: but Julietta, which had rather to have been torn in pieces than to agree to that marriage, answered her mother with a more than accustomed stoutness: "Madam, I much marvel, and therewithal am astonied that you, being a lady discreet and honourable, will be so liberal over your daughter as to commit her to the pleasure and will of another, before you do know how her mind is bent: you may do as it pleaseth you, but of one thing I do well assure you, that if you bring it to pass, it shall be against my will: and touching the regard and estimation of Count Paris, I shall first lose my life before he shall have power to touch any part of my body: which being done, it is you that shall be counted the murderer by delivering me into the hands of him, whom I neither can, will, or know which way to love: wherefore I pray you to suffer me henceforth thus to live, without taking any further care of me, for as much as my cruel fortune hath otherwise disposed of me." The dolorous mother which knew not what judgment to fix upon her daughter's answer, like a woman confused and besides herself, went to seek the Lord Antonio, unto whom without concealing any part of her daughter's answer, she did him understand the whole. The good old man, offended beyond measure, commanded her incontinently by force to be brought before him, if of her own good will she would not come: so soon as she came before her father, her eyes full of tears, fell down at his feet, which she bathed with the lukewarm drops that distilled from her eyes in great abundance, and thinking to open her mouth to cry him mercy, the sobs and sighs many times stopped her speech, that she remained dumb, not able to frame a word. But the old man, nothing moved with his daughter's tears, said unto her in great rage: "Come hither, thou unkind and disobedient daughter, hast thou forgotten how many times thou hast heard spoken at the table, of the puissance and authority our ancient Roman fathers had over their children? unto whom it was not only lawful to sell, gage and otherwise dispose them (in their necessity) at their pleasure, but also, which is more, they had absolute power over their death and life? With what irons, with what torments, with what racks would those good fathers chasten and correct thee if they were alive again, to see that ingratitude, misbehaviour and disobedience which thou usest towards thy father, who with many prayers and requests hath provided one of the greatest lords of this province to be thy husband, a gentleman of best renown, and endued with all kind of virtues, of whom thou and I be unworthy, both for the notable mass of goods and substance wherewith he is enriched, as also for the honour and generosity of the house whereof he is descended, and yet thou playest the part of an obstinate and rebellious child against thy father's will. I take the omnipotency of that Almighty God to witness, which hath vouchsafed to bring thee forth into this world, that if upon Tuesday next thou failest to prepare thyself to be at my Castle of Villafranco, where the Count Paris purposeth to meet us, and there give thy consent to that which thy mother and I have agreed upon, I will not only deprive thee of my worldly goods, but also will make thee espouse and marry a prison so strait and sharp, as a thousand times thou shalt curse the day and time wherein thou wast born: wherefore from henceforth take advisement what thou doest for except the promise be kept which I have made to the Count Paris, I will make thee feel how great the just choler of an offended father is against a child unkind." And without staying for other answer of his daughter, the old man departed the chamber, and left her upon her knees. Julietta, knowing the fury of her father, fearing to incur his indignation or to provoke his further wrath retired for the day into her chamber, and contrived that whole night more in weeping than sleeping. And the next morning, feigning to go hear service, she went forth with the woman of her chamber to the

Friar's, where she caused Father Lawrence to be called unto her, and prayed him to hear her confession: and when she was upon her knees before him, she began her confession with tears, telling him the great mischief that was prepared for her, by the marriage accorded between her father and the Count Paris: and for conclusion said unto him: "Sir, forasmuch as you know I cannot by God's law be married twice, and that I have but one God, one husband and one faith, I am determined when I am from hence, with these two hands which you see joined before you, this day to end my sorrowful life, that my soul may bear witness in the heavens, and my blood upon the earth of my faith and loyalty preserved." Then, having ended her talk, she looked about her, and seemed by her wild countenance as though she had devised some sinister purpose: wherefore Friar Lawrence, astonished beyond measure, fearing lest she would have executed that which she was determined, said unto her: "Mistress Julietta, I pray you in the name of God by little and little to moderate your conceived grief, and to content yourself whilst you be here, until I have provided what is best for you to do, for before you part from hence, I will give you such consolation and remedy for your afflictions, as you shall remain satisfied and contented." And, resolved upon this good mind, he speedily went out of the church unto his chamber, where he began to consider of many things, his conscience being moved to hinder the marriage between the Count Paris and her, knowing by his means she had espoused another, and calling to remembrance what a dangerous enterprise he had begun by committing himself to the mercy of a simple damsel, and that, if she failed to be wise and secret, all their doings should be descried, he defamed, and Romeo her spouse punished. He then, after he had well debated upon infinite number of devices, was in the end overcome with pity, and determined rather to hazard his honour, than to suffer the adultery of the Count Paris with Julietta: and being determined hereupon, opened his closet and taking a vial in his hand, returned again to Julietta, whom he found like one that was in a trance, waiting for news either of life or death: of whom the good old father demanded upon what day her marriage was appointed. "The first day of that appointment (quoth she) is upon Wednesday, which is the day ordained for my consent of marriage accorded between my father and Count Paris, but the nuptial solemnity is not before the tenth day of September." "Well then" (quoth the religious father) "be of good cheer, daughter, for our Lord God hath opened a way unto me both to deliver you and Romeo from the prepared thralldom. I have known your husband from his cradle, and he hath daily committed unto me the greatest secrets of his conscience, and I have so dearly loved him in turn, as if he had been my own son: wherefore my heart cannot abide that any man should do him wrong in that specially wherein my counsel may stand him in stead. And forasmuch as you are his wife, I ought likewise to love you, and seek means to deliver you from the martyrdom and anguish wherewith I see your heart besieged: understand then, good daughter, of a secret which I purpose to manifest unto you, and take heed above all things that you declare it to no living creature, for therein consisteth your life and death. Ye be not ignorant by the common report of the citizens of this city, and by the same published of me, that I have travelled through all the provinces of the habitable earth, whereby during the continual time of twenty years I have sought no rest for my wearied body, but rather have many times protruded the same to the mercy of brute beasts in the wilderness, and many times also to the merciless waves of the seas, and to the pity of common pirates together with a thousand other dangers and shipwrecks upon sea and land. So it is, good daughter, that all my wandering voyages have not been altogether unprofitable. For besides the incredible contentation received ordinarily in mind, I have gathered some particular fruit, whereof by the grace of God you shall shortly feel some experience. I have proved the secret properties of stones, of plants, metals, and other things hidden within the bowels of the earth, wherewith I am able to help myself against the common law of men, when necessity doth serve: specially in things wherein I know mine eternal God to be least offended. For as thou knowest, I being approached as it were, even to the brim of my grave, and that the time draweth near for yielding of mine account before the Auditor of all Auditors, I ought therefore to have some deep knowledge and apprehension of God's judgment more than I had when the heat of inconsiderate youth did boil within my lusty body. Know you, therefore, good daughter, that with those graces and favours which the heavens prodigally have bestowed upon me, I have learned and proved of long time the composition of a certain paste, which I make of divers soporiferous simples, which beaten afterwards to powder and drunk with a quantity of water, within a quarter of an hour after, bringeth the receiver into such a sleep, and burieth so deeply the senses and other spirits of life, that the cunningest physician will judge the party dead: and besides that, it hath a more marvellous effect, for the person which useth the same feelth no kind of grief, and according to the quantity of the dough, the patient remaineth in a sweet sleep, but when the operation is wrought and done, he returneth into his first estate. Now then, Julietta, receive mine instruction, put off all feminine affection by taking upon you a manly stomach for by the only courage of your mind consisteth the hap or mishap of your affairs. Behold, here I give you a vial which you shall keep as your own proper heart, and the night before your marriage, or in the morning before day, you shall fill the same up with water, and drink so much as is contained therein. And then you shall feel a certain kind of pleasant sleep which, encroaching by little and little all the parts of your body, will constrain them in such wise, as immovable they shall remain: and by not doing their accustomed duties, shall lose their natural feelings, and you abide in such ecstasy the space of forty hours at the least, without any beating of pulse or other perceptible motion, which shall so astonie them that come to see you, as they will judge you to be dead, and according to the custom of our city, you shall be carried to the churchyard hard by our church, where you shall be entombed in the common monument of the Capellets, your ancestors, and in the meantime we will send word to Lord Romeo by a special messenger of the effect of our device, who now abideth at Mantua. And the night following I am sure he will not fail to be here, then he and I together will open the grave, and lift up your body, and after the operation of the powder is past, he shall convey you secretly to Mantua, unknown to all your parents and friends. Afterwards (it may be), Time, the mother of Truth, shall cause concord between the offended city of Verona and Romeo. At which time your common cause may be made open to the general contentation of all your friends." The words of the good father ended, new joy surprised the heart of Julietta, who was so attentive to his talk as she forgot no one point of her lesson. Then she said unto him: "Father, doubt not at all that my heart shall fail in performance of your commandment: for were it the strongest poison or most pestiferous venom, rather would I thrust it into my body than to consent to fall in the hands of him whom I utterly dislike: with a right strong reason then may I fortify myself, and offer my body to any kind of mortal danger to approach and draw near to him, upon whom wholly dependeth my life and all the solace I have in this world." "Go your ways then, my daughter" (quoth the Friar) "the mighty hand of God keep you, and His surpassing power defend you and confirm that will and good mind of yours, for the accomplishment of this work." Julietta departed from Friar Lawrence and returned home to her father's palace about two of the clock, where she found her mother at the gate attending for her, and in good devotion demanded if she continued still in those former follies. But Julietta with more gladsome cheer than she was wont to use, not suffering her mother to ask again, said unto her: "Madam, I come from St. Francis' Church, where I have tarried longer peradventure than my duty requireth: howbeit not without fruit and great rest to my afflicted conscience, by reason of the godly persuasions of our ghostly father Friar Lawrence, unto whom I have made a large declaration of my life. And chiefly have communicated unto him in confession, that which hath passed between my lord my father and you, upon the marriage of Count Paris and me. But the good man hath reconciled me by his holy words and commendable exhortations, that where I had mind never to marry, now I am well disposed to obey your pleasure and commandment. Wherefore, madam, I beseech you, to recover the favour and good will of my father, ask pardon in my behalf, and say unto him (if it please you) that by obeying his fatherly request, I am ready to meet the Count Paris at Villafranco, and there in your presence to accept him for my lord and husband: in assurance whereof, by your patience, I mean to repair into my closet, to make choice of my most precious jewels, that I, being richly adorned and decked, may appear before him more agreeable to his mind and pleasure." The good mother rapt with exceeding much joy was not able to answer a word, but rather made speed to seek out her husband the Lord Antonio, unto whom she reported the good will of her daughter, and how by means of Friar Lawrence her mind was changed. Whereof the good old man marvellous joyful praised God in heart, saying: "Wife, this is not the first good turn which we have received of that holy man, unto whom every citizen of this commonwealth is dearly bound. I would to God that I had redeemed twenty of his years with the third part of my goods, so grievous is to me his extreme old age." The self same hour the Lord Antonio went to seek the Count Paris, whom he thought to persuade to go to Villafranco. But the Count told him again that the charge would be too great, and that better it were to reserve that cost to the marriage day, for the better celebration of the same. Notwithstanding, if it were his pleasure, he would himself go visit Julietta: and so they went together.

The mother, advertised of his coming, caused her daughter to make herself ready, and to spare no costly jewels for adorning of her beauty against the Count's coming, which she bestowed so well for garnishing of her personage, that before the Count parted from the house, she had so stolen away his heart, as he lived not from that time forth but upon meditation of her beauty, and slacked no time for acceleration of the marriage day, ceasing not to be importunate upon father and mother, for the end and consummation thereof. And thus with joy enough passed forth this day and many others until the day before the marriage, against which time the mother of Julietta did so well provide that there wanted nothing to set forth the magnificence and nobility of their house. Villafranco whereof we have made mention was a place of pleasure, where the Lord Antonio was wont many times to recreate himself a mile or two from Verona, there the dinner was prepared, forasmuch as the ordinary solemnity of necessity must be done at Verona. Julietta perceiving her time to approach dissembled the matter so well as she could: and when time forced her to retire to her chamber, her woman would have waited upon her, and have lain in her chamber, as her custom was: but Julietta said unto her: "Good and faithful mother, you know that tomorrow is my marriage day, and for that I would spend the most part of the night in prayer, I pray you for this time to let me alone, and tomorrow in the morning about six of the clock come to me again to help make me ready." The good old woman, willing to follow her mind, suffered her alone, and doubted nothing of that which she did mean to do. Julietta being within her chamber, having an ewer full of water standing upon the table, filled the vial which the friar gave her: and after she had made the mixture, she set it by her bedside, and went to bed. And being laid, new thoughts began to assail her, with a conceit of grievous death, which brought her into such case as she could not tell what to do, but plaining incessantly said: "Am not I the most unhappy and desperate creature that ever was born of woman? For me there is nothing left in this wretched world but mishap, misery and mortal woe, my distress hath brought me to such extremity as, to save mine honour and conscience, I am forced to devour the drink whereof I know not the virtue: but what know I (said she) whether the operation of this powder will be too soon or too late, or not correspondent to the due time, and that, my fault being discovered, I shall remain a fable to the people? What know I moreover, if the serpents and other venomous and crawling worms which commonly frequent the graves and pits of the earth will hurt me, thinking that I am dead? But how shall I endure the stench of so many carrions and bones of my ancestors which rest in the grave, if by fortune I do awake before Romeo and Friar Lawrence do come to help me?" And as she was thus plunged in the deep contemplation of things, she thought that she saw a certain vision or fancy of her cousin Thibault, in the very same sort as she saw him wounded and imbrued with blood, and musing how that she must be buried quick amongst so many dead carcasses and deadly naked bones, her tender and delicate body began to shake and tremble, and her yellow locks to stare for fear, in such wise as frightened with terror a cold sweat began to pierce her heart and bedew the rest of all her members, in such wise as she thought an hundred thousand deaths did stand about her, haling her about on every side, and plucking her in pieces, and feeling that her forces diminished by little and little, fearing that through too great debility she was not able to do her enterprise, like a furious and insensate woman, without further care gulped up the water within the vial, then crossing her arms upon her stomach, she lost at that instant all the powers of her body, resting in a trance. And when the morning light began to thrust his head out of his orient, her chamber woman which had locked her in with the key did open the door, and thinking to awake her called her many times, and said unto her: "Mistress, you sleep too long, the Count Paris will come to raise you." The poor old woman spake unto the wall and sang a song unto the deaf. For if all the horrible and tempestuous sounds of the world had been cannoned forth out of the greatest bombardards and sounded through her delicate ears, her spirits of life were so fast bound and stopped as she by no means could awake, wherewith the poor old woman amazed began to shake her by the arms and hands, which she found so cold as marble stone. Then putting hand unto her mouth, suddenly perceived that she was dead, for she perceived no breath in her. Wherefore like a woman out of her wits, she ran to tell her mother, who, so mad as a tiger bereft of her fawns, hied herself into her daughter's chamber, and in that pitiful state beholding her daughter, thinking her to be dead, cried out: "Ah, cruel death, which hast ended all my joy and bliss, use the last scourge of thy wrathful ire against me, lest, by suffering me to live the rest of my woeful days, my torment do increase." Then she began to fetch such straining sighs, as her heart did seem to cleave in pieces. And as her cries began to increase, behold the father, the Count Paris, and a great troop of gentlemen and ladies which were come to honour the feast, hearing no sooner tell of that which chanced, were struck into such sorrowful dumps, as he which had beheld their faces would easily have judged that the same had been a day of ire and pity, specially the Lord Antonio's, whose heart was frapped¹ with such surpassing woe as neither tear nor word could issue forth, and, knowing not what to do, straightway sent to seek the most expert physicians of the town, who, after they had enquired of the life passed of Julietta, deemed by common report that melancholy was the cause of that sudden death, and then their sorrows began to renew afresh. And if ever day was lamentable, piteous, unhappy and fatal, truly it was that wherein Julietta her death was published in Verona: for she was so bewailed of great and small, that by the common plaints the commonwealth seemed to be in danger, and not without cause: for besides her natural beauty (accompanied with many virtues wherewith nature had enriched her) she was else so humble, wise and debonair, as for that humility and courtesy she had stolen away the hearts of every wight, and there was none but did lament her misfortune. And whilst these things were in this lamented state, Friar Lawrence with diligence dispatched a friar of his convent, named Friar Anselm, whom he trusted as himself, and delivered him a letter written with his own hand, commanding him expressly not to give the same to any other but to Romeo, wherein was contained the chance which had passed between him and Julietta, specially the virtue of the powder, and commanded him the next ensuing night to speed himself to Verona, for that the operation of the powder that time would take end, and that he should carry with him back again to Mantua his beloved Julietta in dissembled apparel, until Fortune had otherwise provided for them. The friar made such haste as too late he arrived at Mantua, within a while after. And because the manner of Italy is, that the friar travelling abroad ought to take a companion of his convent to do his affairs within the city, the friar went into his convent, and for that he was within, it was not lawful for him to come out again that day, because that certain days before, one religious of that convent as it was said did die of the plague: wherefore the magistrates appointed for the health and visitation of the sick commanded the warden of the house that no friars should wander abroad the city, or talk with any citizen, until they were licensed by the officers in that behalf appointed, which was the cause of the great mishap which you shall hear hereafter. The friar being in this perplexity, not able to go forth and not knowing what was contained in the letter, deferred his journey for that day. Whilst things were in this plight, preparation was made at Verona to do the obsequies of Julietta. There is a custom also (which is common in Italy) to lay all the best of one lineage and family in one tomb, whereupon Julietta was entombed in the ordinary grave of the Capellets, in a churchyard hard by the church of the friars, where also the Lord Thibault was interred, whose obsequies honourably done, every man returned: whereunto Pietro, the servant of Romeo, gave his assistance: for, as we have before declared, his master sent him back again from Mantua to Verona, to do his father service, and to advertise him of that which should happen in his absence there: who seeing the body of Julietta enclosed in tomb, thinking with the rest that she had been dead indeed, incontinently took post-horse, and with diligence rode to Mantua, where he found his master in his wonted house, to whom he said with his eyes full of tears: "Sir, there is chanced unto you so strange a matter, as if so be you do not arm yourself with constancy, I am afraid that I shall be the cruel minister of your death: be it known unto you, sir, that yesterday morning my mistress Julietta left her life in this world to seek rest in another: and with these eyes I saw her buried in the churchyard of St. Francis'." At the sound of which heavy message, Romeo began woefully to lament, as though his spirits, grieved with the torment of his passion, at that instant would have abandoned his body. But strong love, which would not permit him to faint until the extremity, framed a thought in his fantasy, that if it were possible for him to die beside her, his death should be more glorious, and she (as he thought) better contented: by reason whereof, after he had washed his face for fear to discover his sorrow, he went out of his chamber, and commanded his man to tarry behind him, that he might walk throughout all the corners of the city, to find proper remedy (if it were possible) for his grief. And amongst others, beholding an apothecary's shop of little furniture and less store of boxes and other things requisite for that science, thought that the very poverty of the master apothecary would make him willingly yield to that which he pretended to demand: and after he had taken him aside, secretly said unto him: "Sir, if you be the master of the house, as I think you be, behold here fifty ducats, which I give you to the intent you deliver me some strong and violent poison, that within a quarter of an hour is able to procure death unto him that shall use it." The covetous apothecary enticed by gain agreed to his request, and feigning to give him some other medicine before the people's face, he speedily made ready a strong and cruel poison: afterwards he said unto him softly: "Sir, I give you more than is needful, for the one half is able to destroy the strongest man of the world": who, after he had received the poison, returned home, where he commanded his man to depart with diligence to Verona, and that he should make provision of candles, a tinder box and other instruments meet for the opening of the grave of Julietta, and that above all things, he should not fail to await his coming besides the churchyard of St. Francis', and upon pain of life to keep his intent in silence. Which Pietro obeyed in order as his master had required, and made therein such expedition as he arrived in good time to Verona, taking order for all things that were commanded of him. Romeo in the meanwhile being solicited with mortal thoughts caused ink and paper to be brought unto him, and in few words put in writing all the discourse of his love, the marriage of him and Julietta, the mean observed for consummation of the same, the help that he had of Friar Lawrence, the buying of his poison, and last of all his death. Afterwards, having finished his heavy tragedy, he closed the letters and sealed the same with his seal, and directed the superscription thereof to his father: and putting the letters into his purse, he mounted on horseback, and used such diligence as he arrived upon dark night at the city of Verona, before the gates were shut, where he found his servant tarrying for him with a lantern and instruments, as is before said, meet for the opening of the grave, unto whom he said: "Pietro, help me to open this tomb, and so soon as it is open, I command thee upon pain of thy life not to come near me, nor to stay me from the thing I purpose to do. Behold, there is a letter which thou shalt present tomorrow in the morning to my father at his uprising, which peradventure shall please him better than thou thinkest." Pietro, not able to imagine what was his master's intent, stood somewhat aloof to behold his master's gestures and countenance. And when they had opened the vault, Romeo descended down two steps, holding the candle in his hand, and began to behold with pitiful eye the body of her, which was the organ of his eyes, and kissed it tenderly, holding it hard between his arms, and not able to satisfy himself with her sight, put his fearful hands upon the cold stomach of Julietta. And after he had touched her in many places, and not able to feel any certain judgment of life, he drew the poison out of his box and, swallowing down a great quantity of the same, cried out: "O Julietta, of whom the world was unworthy, what death is it possible my heart could choose out more agreeable than that which it suffereth hard by thee? What grave more glorious than to be buried in thy tomb? What more worthy or excellent epitaph can be vowed for memory than the mutual and pitiful sacrifice of our lives?" And thinking to renew his sorrow, his heart began to fret through the violence of the poison, which by little and little assailed the same, and looking about him, espied the body of the Lord Thibault lying next unto Julietta, which as yet was not altogether putrified, and speaking to the body as though it had been alive, said: "In what place so ever thou art, O cousin Thibault, I most heartily do cry thee mercy for the offence which I have done by depriving of thy life: and if thy ghost do wish and cry out for vengeance upon me, what greater or more cruel satisfaction canst thou desire to have, or henceforth hope for, than to see him which murdered thee to be empoisoned with his own hands and buried by thy side?" Then ending his talk, feeling by little and little that his life began to fail, falling prostrate upon his knees, with feeble voice he softly said: "O my Lord God, which to redeem me didst descend from the bosom of Thy Father, and tookest human flesh in the womb of the Virgin, I acknowledge and confess that this body of mine is nothing else but earth and dust." Then, seized upon with desperate sorrow, he fell down upon the body of Julietta with such vehemence as the heart, faint and attenuated with too great torments, not able to bear so hard a violence, was abandoned of all his sense and natural powers, in such sort as the siege of his soul failed him at that instant, and his members stretched forth remained stiff and cold. Friar Lawrence, which knew the certain time of the powder's operation, marvelled that he had no answer of the letter which he sent to Romeo by his fellow Friar Anselm, departed from St. Francis' and with instruments for the purpose determined to open the grave to let in air to Julietta which was ready to wake: and, approaching the place, he espied a light within, which made him afraid until that Pietro which was hard by had certified him that Romeo was within, and had not ceased there to lament and complain the space of half an hour: and when they two were entered into the grave and finding Romeo without life made such sorrow as they can well conceive which love their dear friend with like perfection. And as they were making their complaints, Julietta rising out of her trance and beholding light within the tomb, uncertain whether it were a dream or fantasy that appeared before her eyes, coming again to herself, knew Friar Lawrence, unto whom she said: "Father, I pray thee in the name of God to perform thy promise, for I am almost dead." And then Friar Lawrence, concealing nothing from her (because he feared to be taken through his too long abode in that place), faithfully rehearsed unto her how he had sent Friar Anselm to Romeo at Mantua, from whom as yet he had received no answer. Notwithstanding, he found Romeo dead in the grave, whose body he pointed unto, lying hard by her, praying her sith it was so patiently to bear that sudden misfortune, and that, if it pleased her, he would convey her into some monastery of women where she might in time moderate her sorrow and give rest unto her mind. Julietta had no sooner cast eye upon the dead corpse of Romeo, but began to break the fountain pipes of gushing tears, which ran forth in such abundance, as, not able to support the furor of her grief, she breathed without ceasing upon his mouth, and then, throwing herself upon his body and embracing it very hard, seemed that by force of sighs and sobs she would have revived and brought him again to life, and after she had kissed and rekindled him a million of times, she cried out: "Ah, sweet rest of my cares and the only port of all my pleasures and pastimes, hadst thou so sure a heart to choose thy churchyard in this place between the arms of thy perfect lover, and to end the course of thy life for my sake in the flower of thy youth when life to thee should have been most dear and delectable? How had this tender body power to resist the furious combat of death, very death itself here present? How could thy tender and delicate youth willingly permit that thou shouldst approach into this filthy and infected place, where from henceforth thou shalt be the pasture of worms unworthy of thee? Alas, alas, by what means shall I now renew my complaints, which time and long patience ought to have buried and clearly quenched? Ah, I, miserable and caitiff wretch, thinking to find remedy for my griefs, have sharpened the knife that hath given me this cruel blow, whereof I receive the cause of mortal wound. Ah, happy and fortunate grave which shalt serve in world to come for witness of the most perfect alliance that ever was between two most unfortunate lovers, receive now the last sobbing sighs and entertainment of the most cruel of all the cruel subjects of ire and death." And as she thought to continue her complaints, Pietro advertised Friar Lawrence that he heard a noise beside the citadel, wherewith being afraid they speedily departed, fearing to be taken: and then Julietta, seeing herself alone and in full liberty, took again Romeo between her arms, kissing him with such affection as she seemed to be more attainted with love than death, and drawing out the dagger which Romeo wore by his side, she pricked herself with many blows against the heart, saying with feeble and pitiful voice: "Ah death, the end of sorrow and beginning of felicity, thou art most heartily welcome: fear not at this time to sharpen thy dart:

give no longer delay of life, for fear that my spirit travail not to find Romeo's ghost amongst such number of carrion corpses: and thou, my dear lord and loyal husband Romeo, if there rest in thee any knowledge, receive her whom thou hast so faithfully loved, the only cause of thy violent death, which frankly offereth up her soul that none but thou shalt joy the love whereof thou hast made so lawful conquest, and that our souls, passing from this light, may eternally live together in the place of everlasting joy." And when she had ended those words she yielded up her ghost. While these things thus were done, the guard and watch of the city by chance passed by, and seeing light within the grave, suspected straight that there were some necromancers which had opened the tomb to abuse the dead bodies for aid of their art: and desirous to know what it meant, went down into the vault where they found Romeo and Julietta, with their arms embracing each other's neck, as though there had been some token of life. And, after they had well viewed them at leisure, they perceived in what case they were: and then all amazed they sought for the thieves which (as they thought) had done the murder, and in the end found the good father Friar Lawrence, and Pietro the servant of dead Romeo (which had hid themselves under a stall) whom they carried to prison, and advertised the Lord of Escala and the magistrates of Verona of the horrible murder, which by and by was published throughout the city. Then flocked together all the citizens, women and children, leaving their houses to look upon that pitiful sight, and to the end that in presence of the whole city the murder should be known, the magistrates ordained that the two dead bodies should be erected upon a stage to the view and sight of the whole world, in such sort and manner as they were found within the grave, and that Pietro and Friar Lawrence should publicly be examined, that afterwards there might be no murmur or other pretended cause of ignorance. And this good old friar, being upon the scaffold, having a white beard all wet and bathed with tears, the judges commanded him to declare unto them who were the authors of that murder, sith at an untimely hour he was apprehended with certain irons beside the grave. Friar Lawrence, a round and frank man of talk, nothing moved with that accusation, answered them with stout and bold voice: "My masters, there is none of you all (if you have respect unto my forepassed life and to my aged years, and therewithal have consideration of this heavy spectacle, whereunto unhappy fortune hath presently brought me) but doth greatly marvel of so sudden mutation and change unlooked for so much as these three score and ten or twelve years sithence I came into this world and began to prove the vanities thereof, I was never suspected, touched or found guilty of any crime which was able to make me blush, or hide my face, although (before God) I do confess myself to be the greatest and most abominable sinner of all the redeemed flock of Christ. So it is notwithstanding, that sith I am prest and ready to render mine account, and that death, the grave and worms do daily summon this wretched corpse of mine to appear before the justice seat of God, still waiting and attending to be carried to my hoped grave, this is the hour I say, as you likewise may think wherein I am fallen to the greatest damage and prejudice of my life and honest port, and that which hath engendered this sinister opinion of me may peradventure be these great tears which in abundance trickle down my face, as though the Holy Scriptures do not witness that Jesus Christ moved with human pity and compassion did weep and pour forth tears, and that many times tears be the faithful messengers of a man's innocency. Or else the most likely evidence and presumption is the suspected hour which (as the magistrate doth say) doth make me culpable of the murder, as though all hours were not indifferently made equal by God their Creator, who in his own person declareth unto us that there be twelve hours in the day, showing thereby that there is no exception of hours nor of minutes, but that one may do either good or ill at all times indifferently, as the party is guided or forsaken by the spirit of God: touching the irons which were found about me, needful it is not now to let you understand for what use iron was first made, and that of itself it is not able to increase in man either good or evil, if not by the mischievous mind of him which doth abuse it. Thus much I have thought good to tell you, to the intent that neither tears nor iron, ne yet suspected hour are able to make me guilty of the murder or make me otherwise than I am, but only the witness of mine own conscience, which alone if I were guilty should be the accuser, the witness and the hangman, which, by reason of mine age and the reputation I have had amongst you, and the little time that I have to live in this world should more torment me within, than all the mortal pains that could be devised: but (thanks be to mine eternal God) I feel no worm that gnaweth nor any remorse, that pricketh me touching that fact, for which I see you all troubled and amazed: and to set your hearts at rest, and to remove the doubts which hereafter may torment your consciences, I swear unto you by all the heavenly parts wherein I hope to be, that forthwith I will disclose from first to last the entire discourse of this pitiful tragedy, which peradventure shall drive you into no less wonder and amaze, than those two poor passionate lovers were strong and patient to expone themselves to the mercy of death for the fervent and indissoluble love between them." Then the fatherly Friar began to repeat the beginning of the love between Julietta and Romeo which, by certain space of time confirmed, was prosecuted by words at the first, then by mutual promise of marriage, unknown to the world. And as within few days after, the two lovers feeling themselves sharpened and incited with stronger onset, repaired unto him under colour of confession, protesting by oath that they were both married, and that, if he would not solemnise that marriage in the face of the Church, they should be constrained to offend God to live in disordered lust: in consideration whereof, and specially seeing their alliance to be good and comfortable in dignity, riches, and nobility on both sides, hoping by that means perchance to reconcile the Montesches and Capellets, and that by doing such an acceptable work to God, he gave them the Church's blessing in a certain chapel of the Friar's Church whereof the night following they did consummate the marriage fruits in the palace of the Capellets. For testimony of which copulation, the woman of Julietta's chamber was able to depose: adding moreover the murder of Thibault which was cousin to Julietta: by reason whereof the banishment of Romeo did follow, and how in the absence of the said Romeo, the marriage being kept secret between them, a new matrimony was entreated with the Count Paris, which misliked by Julietta, she fell prostrate at his feet in a chapel of St. Francis' Church, with full determination to have killed herself with her own hands, if he gave her not counsel how she should avoid the marriage agreed between her father and the Count Paris. For conclusion he said that although he was resolved by reason of his age and nearness of death to abhor all secret sciences wherein in his younger years he had delight, notwithstanding, pressed with importunity and moved with pity, fearing lest Julietta should do some cruelty against herself, he strained his conscience and chose rather with some little fault to grieve his mind, than to suffer the young gentlewoman to destroy her body and hazard the danger of her soul: and therefore he opened some part of his ancient cunning and gave her a certain powder to make her sleep, by means whereof she was thought to be dead. Then he told them how he had sent Friar Anselm to carry letters to Romeo of their enterprise, whereof hitherto he had no answer. Then briefly he concluded how he found Romeo dead within the grave who as it is most likely did empoison himself, or was otherwise smothered or suffocated with sorrow by finding Julietta in that state, thinking she had been dead. Then he told them how Julietta did kill herself with the dagger of Romeo to bear him company after his death, and how it was impossible for them to save her for the noise of the watch which forced them to flee from thence,

And for more ample approbation of his saying he humbly besought the Lord of Verona and the magistrates to send to Mantua for Friar Anselm to know the cause of his slack return, that the content of the letter sent to Romeo might be seen: to examine the woman of the chamber of Julietta, and Pietro the servant of Romeo, who, not attending for a further request, said unto them: "My lords, when Romeo entered the grave, he gave me this packet written as I suppose with his own hand, who gave me express commandment to deliver it to his father." The packet opened, they found the whole effect of this story, specially the apothecary's name which sold him the poison, the price, and the cause wherefore he used it, and all appeared to be so clear and evident, as there rested nothing for the further verification of the same, but their presence at the doing of the particulars thereof, for the whole was so well declared in order, as they were out of doubt that the same was true: and then the Lord Bartholomew of Escala, after he had debated with the magistrates of these events, decreed that the woman of Julietta her chamber should be banished, because she did conceal that privy marriage from the father of Romeo, which, if it had been known in time, had bred to the whole city an universal benefit. Pietro, because he obeyed his master's commandment, and kept close his lawful secrets according to the well-conditioned nature of a trusty servant, was set at liberty. The apothecary taken, racked, and found guilty, was hanged. The good old man Friar Lawrence, as well for respect of his ancient service which he had done to the commonwealth of Verona, as also for his virtuous life (for the which he was specially recommended) was let go in peace without any note of infamy. Notwithstanding, by reason of his age he voluntarily gave over the world and closed himself in an hermitage two miles from Verona, where he lived five or six years, and spent his time in continual prayer until he was called out of this transitory world into the blissful state of everlasting joy. And for the compassion of so strange a misfortune, the Montesches and the Capellets poured forth such abundance of tears, as with the same they did evacuate their ancient grudge and choler, whereby they were then reconciled: and they which could not be brought to atonement by any wisdom or human counsel were in the end vanquished and made friends by pity: and to immortalise the memory of so entire and perfect amity, the Lord of Verona ordained that the two bodies of those miraculous lovers should be fast entombed in the grave where they ended their lives, in which place was erected a high marble pillar honoured with an infinite number of excellent epitaphs which to this day be apparent, with such noble memory, as, amongst all the rare excellencies wherewith that city is furnished, there is none more famous than the monument of Romeo and Julietta.

SPANISH

CERVANTES

(1547-1616)

Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra was born at Alcalá de Henares in a family of the lesser gentry. He served in Italy in the wars against the Saracens and was wounded severely in the famous battle of Lepanto, but continued service under the banner of Don John of Austria until 1575. At this time, in spite of his distinction, his bravery, and his brilliant service, he returned to Spain a common soldier. The same year, he and his brother were captured by the Moors and made slaves. Repeated attempts to effect his ransom were made in vain, but finally in 1580 he was released and returned to Spain. In 1584 he married the lady in whose honor it is supposed that he wrote the romance Galathea. In spite of the wounds and hardships suffered for the sake of his country, Cervantes was continually subjected to persecution and harassed by poverty. At last the publication of Don Quixote (1605) brought him fame and recognition, not only at home but abroad, particularly in France. From this time until his death in 1616 he wrote prolifically.

In the pastoral romance Galathea Cervantes simply followed the literary vogue of his own time. (See the introduction to Theocritus.) He represented under pastoral names actual acquaintances, just as Boccaccio had done in his Amelo and Vergil in his Bucolics. Although Cervantes composed about thirty plays of moderate quality, he is best known for his novels, particularly Novelas Exemplares, The Voyage to Parnassus (written in verse), Persiles and Sigismunda (which Cervantes mistakenly considered his best work), and the immortal Don Quixote.

Don Quixote was published in two parts, the first in 1605 and the second in 1615. This book not only represents a serious and powerful reaction against the false grandeur and exaggerated heroism of the romances that were invading Europe, but reveals also a desire to rescue the language from a disintegration which had been imposed upon it by the conventional rhetorical devices of romance. Cervantes's two main characters are drawn with the fine vigor and vision and the penetrating pathos of a large and rare humanity; they may be said to represent the two sides of man's nature. Don Quixote he shows us as serious, profound, generous, exalted, idealistic, and Sancho Panza as simple, naive, vulgar, sensual, and practical. The kindly vein of satire and burlesque is no more an attack upon heroism than is Molière's Misanthrope an attack upon honor and virtue. Cervantes himself exists in the actions of Don Quixote just as Molière exists in the character of Alceste. Perhaps there is, in the impassioned oratorical outbursts of the simple hidalgo, a little sad and gentle burlesque on the illusions of the young Cervantes before he became acquainted with the ingratitude of princes.

At the beginning of Don Quixote, Don Quixada or "Quisada," a kind and worthy country gentleman a little past middle age, is found to be living comfortably in the village of La Mancha with his niece, who acted as housekeeper. The gentle don was a great lover and prodigious reader of chivalric romances, and at length became so obsessed by these glowing accounts of bravery and enchantment that he conceived a desire to go out to live a life of knight-errantry, punishing the wicked and succoring the distressed. Dressing himself in an ancient suit of family armor, the deficiencies of which he eked out with string and kitchenware, enshrining as his lady, in his imagination, a peasant girl of his neighborhood, he mounted his lean and scraggy horse, which bore the high-sounding name of Rozinante, grasped a stout lance and a rickety shield and set out in search of adventure. Because of his romantically fevered imagination, he blundered continually; for he thought to recognize in everyone he met characters or types familiar to him in his reading, and his behavior toward these strangers was in strict accordance with the dictates of the old chivalric code. His reception in the world was not sympathetic; and a neighbor, finding him half beaten to death, took him home. Upon recognizing his sorry mental plight, his friends the curate and the barber decided to burn the offending books. The selection in this volume begins with their discussion as they go through his library. This discussion describes the kind of books that drove the good man insane; and it contains, incidentally, a fair amount of indirect literary criticism.

DON QUIXOTE

CHAPTER VI

Of the pleasant and curious scrutiny which the curate and the barber made of the library of our ingenious gentleman.

The knight was yet asleep, when the curate came, attended by the barber, and desired his niece to let him have the key of the room where her uncle kept his books, the authors of his woes; she readily consented; and so in they went, and the housekeeper with them. There they found above a hundred large volumes neatly bound, and a good number of small ones. As soon as the housekeeper had spied them out, she ran out of the study, and returned immediately with a holy-water pot and a sprinkler.

"Here, doctor," cried she, "pray sprinkle every cranny and corner in the room, lest there should lurk in it some one of the many sorcerers these books swarm with, who might chance to bewitch us, for the ill-will we bear them, in going about to send them out of the world."

The curate could not forbear smiling at the good woman's simplicity; and desired the barber to reach him the books one by one, that he might peruse the title-pages, for perhaps he might find some among them that might not deserve this fate.

"Oh, by no means," cried the niece; "spare none of them; they all help, somehow or other, to crack my uncle's brain. I fancy we had best throw them all out at the window in the yard, and lay them together in a heap, and then set them on fire, or else carry them into the back-yard, and there make a pile of them, and burn them, and so the smoke will offend nobody."

The housekeeper joined with her, so eagerly bent were both upon the destruction of those poor innocents; but the curate would not condescend to those irregular proceedings, and resolved first to read at least the title-page of every book.

The first that Mr. Nicholas put into his hands was Amadis de Gaul, in four volumes.

"There seems to be some mystery in this book's being the first taken down," cried the curate, as soon as he had looked upon it; "for I have heard it is the first book of knight-errantry that was ever printed in Spain, and the model of all the rest; and therefore I am of opinion, that, as the first teacher and author of so pernicious a sect, it ought to be condemned to the fire without mercy."

"I beg a reprieve for him," cried the barber; "for I have been told 'tis the best book that has been written in that kind; and therefore, as the only good thing of that sort, it may deserve a pardon."

"Well, then," replied the curate, "for this time let him have it. Let's see that other, which lies next to him."

"These," said the barber, "are the exploits of Esplandian, the son of Amadis de Gaul."

"Verily," said the curate, "the father's goodness shall not excuse the want of it in the son. Here, good mistress housekeeper, open that window, and throw it into the yard, and let it serve as a foundation to that pile we are to set a-blazing presently."

She was not slack in her obedience; and thus poor Don Esplandian was sent headlong into the yard, there patiently to wait the time of punishment.

5 "To the next," cried the curate.

"This," said the barber, "is Amadis of Greece; and I'm of opinion that all those that stand on this side are of the same family."

10 "Then let them all be sent packing into the yard," replied the curate.

They were delivered to the housekeeper accordingly, and many they were; and to save herself the labour of carrying them 15 downstairs, she fairly sent them flying out at the window.

"What overgrown piece of lumber have we here?" cried the curate.

"Olivante de Laura," returned the 20 barber.

"The same author wrote the Garden of Flowers; and, to deal ingenuously with you, I cannot tell which of the two books has most truth in it, or, to speak more 25 properly, less lies: but this I know for certain, that he shall march into the back-yard, like a nonsensical arrogant block-head as he is."

"The next," cried the barber, "is Florismart of Hyrcania."

"How! my Lord Florismart, is he here?" replied the curate; "nay, then truly, he shall e'en follow the rest to the yard, in spite of his wonderful birth and incredible 35 adventures; for his rough, dull, and insipid style deserves no better usage. Come, toss him into the yard, and this other too, good mistress."

"Here's the noble Don Platir," cried the 40 barber.

"'Tis an old book," replied the curate, "and I can think of nothing in him that deserves a grain of pity; away with him, without any more words"; and down he 45 went accordingly.

Another book was opened, and it proved to be the Knight of the Cross.

"The holy title," cried the curate, "might in some measure atone for the badness of the book; but then, as the saying is, The devil lurks behind the cross! To the flames with him."

Then opening another volume, he found it to be Palmerin de Oliva, and the next to that Palmerin of England.

"Ha, have I found you!" cried the curate. "Here, take that Oliva, let him be torn to pieces, then burnt, and his ashes scattered in the air; but let Palmerin of England be preserved as a singular relic of antiquity; and let such a costly box be made for him as Alexander found among the spoils of Darius,¹ which he devoted to enclose Homer's works: for I must tell you, neighbour, that book deserves particular respect for two things; first, for its own excellences; and secondly, for the sake of its author, who is said to have been a learned King of Portugal: then all the adventures of the Castle of Miraguarda are well and artfully managed, the dialogue very courtly and clear, and the decorum strictly observed in equal character, with equal propriety and judgment. Therefore, Master Nicholas," continued he, "with submission to your better advice, this and Amadis de Gaul shall be exempted from the fire; and let all the rest be condemned, without any further inquiry or examination."

"By no means, I beseech you," returned the barber, "for this which I have in my hands is the famous Don Bellianis."

"Truly," cried the curate, "he, with his second, third, and fourth parts, had need of a dose of rhubarb to purge his excessive choler: besides, his Castle of Fame should be demolished, and a heap of other rubbish removed; in order to which I give my vote to grant them the benefit of a reprieve; and as they show signs of amendment, so shall mercy or justice be used towards them: in the meantime, neighbour, take them into custody, and keep them safe at home; but let none be permitted to converse with them."

"Content," cried the barber; and, to save himself the labour of looking on any more books of that kind, he bid the house-keeper take all the great volumes, and throw them into the yard. This was not spoken to one stupid or deaf, but to one who had a greater mind to be burning them, than weaving the finest and largest web: so that, laying hold of no less than eight volumes at once, she presently made them leap towards the place of execution.

"But what shall we do with all these smaller books that are left?" said the barber.

"Certainly," replied the curate, "these cannot be books of knight-errantry, they are too small; you will find they are only poets."

And so opening one, it happened to be the Diana of Montemayor; which made him say (believing all the rest to be of that stamp), "These do not deserve to be punished like the others, for they neither have done, nor can do, that mischief which those stories of chivalry have done, being generally ingenious books, that can do nobody any prejudice."

"Oh! good sir," cried the niece, "burn them with the rest, I beseech you; for should my uncle get cured of his knight-errant frenzy, and betake himself to the reading of these books, we should have him turn shepherd, and so wander through the woods and fields; nay, and what would be worse yet, turn poet, which they say is a catching and incurable disease."

"The gentlewoman is in the right," said the curate; "and it will not be amiss to remove that stumbling-block out of our friend's way; and since we began with the Diana of Montemayor, I am of opinion we ought not to burn it, but only take out that part of it which treats of the magician Felicia and the enchanted water, as also all the longer poems; and let the work escape with its prose, and the honour of being the first of that kind."

"Here," quoth the barber, "I have a book called the Ten Books of the Fortunes of Love, by Anthony de Loiraco, a Sardinian poet."

"Now we have got a prize," cried the curate. "I do not think since Apollo was Apollo, the muses muses, and the poets poets, there ever was a more humorous, more whimsical book! Of all the works of the kind commend me to this, for in its way 'tis certainly the best and most singular that ever was published; and he that never read it may safely think he never in his life read anything that was pleasant."

With that he laid it aside with extraordinary satisfaction; and the barber went on: "The next," said he, "is the Shepherd of Filida."

"He's no shepherd," replied the curate, "but a very discreet courtier; keep him as a precious jewel."

"Here's a bigger," cried the barber, "called the Treasure of divers Poems."

"Had there been less of it," said the curate, "it would have been more esteemed. 'Tis fit the book should be pruned and cleared of some inferior things that encumber and deform it: keep it, however, because the author is my friend, and for the sake of his other more heroic and lofty productions. What's the next book?"

"The Galatea of Miguel de Cervantes," replied the barber.

"That Cervantes has been my intimate acquaintance these many years," said the curate; "and I know he has been more conversant with misfortunes than with poetry. His book, indeed, has I don't know what, that looks like a good design; he aims at something, but concludes nothing: therefore we must stay for the second part, which he has promised us; perhaps he may make us amends, and obtain a full pardon, which is denied him for the present; till that time keep him close prisoner at your house."

"I will," quoth the barber: "but see, I have here three more for you, the Araucana of Don Alonso de Ercilla; the Austirada of Juan Ruffo, a magistrate of Cordova; and the Monserrato of Christopher de Virves, a Valentian poet."

"These," cried the curate, "are the best heroic poems we have in Spanish, and may vie with the most celebrated of Italy! Reserve them as the most valuable performances which Spain has to boast of in poetry."

At last the curate grew so tired with prying into so many volumes, that he ordered all the rest to be burnt at a venture. But the barber showed him one which he had opened by chance ere the dreadful sentence was passed.

"Truly," said the curate, who saw by the title it was the Tears of Angelica, "I should have wept myself, had I caused such a book to share the condemnation of the rest; for the author was not only one of the best poets in Spain, but in the whole world, and translated some of Ovid's fables with extraordinary success."

CHAPTER VII

Don Quixote's second sally in quest of adventures.

At the instant of the last decision, Don Quixote was heard calling out aloud, "This way! this way! valorous knights! here it is you must exert the force of your invincible arms, for the courtiers begin to get the better of the tournament!"

This outcry, to which the whole party ran, put a stop to all further scrutiny of the books that remained; and therefore it is believed, that to the fire, without being seen or heard, went the Carolea, and Leon of Spain, with the Acts of the Emperor, composed by Don Louis de Avila, which, without doubt, must have been among those that were left: and perhaps, had the priest seen them, they had not undergone so rigorous a sentence.

When they entered the chamber, they found Don Quixote continuing his ravings, and with his drawn sword laying furiously about him, back-stroke and fore-stroke, being as broad awake as if he had never been asleep. Closing in with him, they laid him upon his bed by main force; when, after being a little composed, he turned himself to the priest, and said, "Certainly, my lord archbishop Turpin, it is a great disgrace to us, who call ourselves the twelve peers, to let the knights-courtiers carry off the victory, without more opposition, after we, the adventurers, had gained the prize in the three preceding days."

"Say no more, my worthy friend," said the priest; "it may be God's will to change our fortune, and what is lost to-day may be won to-morrow; for the present, mind your health; for you must needs be extremely fatigued, if not sorely wounded."

"Wounded! no," said Don Quixote; "but bruised and battered I most certainly am; for Don Roldan, with the trunk of an oak, has pounded me to a mummy, and all out of sheer envy, because he sees that I am the sole rival of his prowess. But may I never more be called Rinaldo of Montauban, if, as soon as I am able to rise from this bed, I do not make him pay dearly for it, in spite of his enchantments: and now bring me some breakfast, for I feel as if nothing would do me so much good, and let me alone to revenge my wrongs."

They did so; and having taken refreshment, he fell fast asleep again, leaving them more astonished than before at his madness.

The night was no sooner set in, than the housekeeper kindled a fire, and burned all the books that were either in the yard, or the house; and some must have perished that deserved to be treasured up in perpetual archives; but their fate, and the laziness of the scrutineers, would not permit it: and in them was fulfilled the saying "that a saint may sometimes suffer for a sinner."

Another remedy, which the priest and barber prescribed for their friend's malady, was, to alter his apartment, and wall up the closet in which the books had been kept, in the hope that upon his getting up, and not finding them, the cause being removed, the effect might cease; and it was agreed they should pretend, that an enchanter had carried them away, room and all; which things were done accordingly within the two days that Don Quixote was confined to his bed. When he rose, the first thing he did was to visit, as had been supposed, his study; and, not finding the room where he left it, he went up and down looking for it: coming to the place where the door used to be, he felt with his hands, and stared about in every direction, without speaking a word; at last he asked the housekeeper where the room stood, in which his books were. She, who was already well tutored what to answer, said to him —

"What room, or what nothing, does your worship look for? there is neither room nor books in this house; for the devil himself has carried all away."

"It was not the devil," said the niece, "but an enchanter, who came one night, after your departure hence, upon a cloud, and, alighting from a serpent on which he rode, entered into the room. I know not what he did there, but after a short time out he came, flying through the roof, and left the house full of smoke; and when we went to see what he had been doing, we could find neither books nor room; only we very well remember, both I and mistress housekeeper here, that when the old thief went away, he said with a gruff voice, that for a secret enmity he bore to the owner of those books and of the room, he had done a mischief, which would soon be manifest. He told us also, that he was the sage Munniaton."

"Freston, he meant to say," quoth Don Quixote.

"I know not," answered the housekeeper, "whether his name be Freston or Friton; all I know is, that it ended in ton."

"It doth so," replied Don Quixote; "he is a wise enchanter, a great enemy of mine, and bears me a grudge, because by the mystery of his art he knows that, in process of time, I shall engage in single combat with a knight whom he favours, and shall vanquish him, without his being able to prevent it: and for this reason he endeavours to do me all the discourtesy he can: but let him know from me, it will be difficult for him to withstand or avoid what is decreed by Heaven."

"Who doubts that?" said the niece. "But, dear uncle, what have you to do with these quarrels? Would it not be better to stay quietly at home, than to ramble about the world seeking for better bread than wheaten, not considering, that many go for wool and return shorn themselves."

"My dear niece," answered Don Quixote, "how little dost thou know of the matter? Before they shall shear me, I will pluck and tear off the beards of all those who shall dare think of touching a single hair of my moustache." Neither of the women would make further reply; for they saw his choler beginning to kindle.

He stayed after this fifteen days at home, very composed, without discovering any symptom of relapse, or inclination to repeat his late frolics; in which time there passed many very pleasant discourses between him and his two gossiping friends, the priest and the barber; he affirming, that the world stood in need of nothing so much as knights-errant, and the revival of chivalry; and the priest sometimes contradicting him, and at other times acquiescing, for without this artifice there would have been no means left to bring him to reason.

In the meantime, Don Quixote tampered with a neighbouring labourer, an honest man, but of a very shallow brain; to whom he said so much, used so many arguments, and made so many fair promises, that at last the poor silly clown consented to go with him, and be his squire. Among other inducements to entice him to do it willingly, Don Quixote failed not to tell him, that it was likely such an adventure would present itself, as might secure him the conquest of some island in the time that he might be picking up a straw or two, and then the squire might promise himself to be made governor of the place. Allured with these large promises, and many others, Sancho Panza (for that was the name of the fellow) forsook his wife and children to be his neighbour's squire.

This done, Don Quixote made it his business to furnish himself with money; to which purpose, selling one house, mortgaging another, and losing by all, he at last got a pretty good sum together. He also borrowed a target of a friend; and, having patched up his head-piece and beaver as well as he could, he gave his squire notice of the day and hour when he intended to set out, that he also might furnish himself with what he thought necessary; but, above all, he charged him to provide himself with a wallet; which Sancho promised to do, telling him he would also take his ass along with him, which being a very good one might be a great ease to him, for he was not used to travel much a-foot. The mentioning of the ass made the noble knight pause awhile; he mused and pondered whether he had ever read of any knight-errant, whose squire used to ride upon an ass; but he could not remember any precedent for it; however, he gave him leave at last to bring his ass, hoping to mount him more honourably with the first opportunity, by unhorsing the next discourteous knight he should meet. He also furnished himself with linen, and as many other necessities as he could conveniently carry, according to the innkeeper's advice. Which being done, Sancho Panza, without bidding either his wife or children good-bye, and Don Quixote, without taking any more notice of his housekeeper or of his niece, stole out of the village one night, not so much as suspected by anybody, and made such haste, that by break of day they thought themselves out of reach, should they happen to be pursued. As for Sancho Panza, he was riding like a patriarch, with his canvas knapsack, or wallet, and leathern bottle; having a huge desire to see himself governor of the island, which his master had promised him.

As they jogged on, "I beseech your worship, Sir Knight-errant," quoth Sancho to his master, "be sure you don't forget what you promised me about the island; for I daresay I shall make shift to govern it, let it be never so big."

"You must know, friend Sancho," replied Don Quixote, "that it has been the constant practice of knights-errant in former ages to make their squires governors of the islands or kingdoms they conquered: now I am resolved to outdo my predecessors; for whereas sometimes other knights delayed rewarding their squires till they were grown old and worn out with services, and then put them off with some title, either of count, or at least marquis of some valley or province, of great or small extent; now if thou and I do but live, it may happen, that, before we have passed six days together, I may conquer some kingdom, having many other kingdoms annexed to its imperial crown; and this would fall out most luckily for thee; for then would I presently crown thee king of one of them. Nor do thou imagine this to be a mighty matter; for so strange accidents and revolutions so sudden and so unforeseen attend the profession of chivalry, that I might easily give thee a great deal more than I have promised."

"Why, should this come to pass," quoth Sancho Panza, "and I be made a king by some such miracle as your worship says, then Mary Gutierrez would be at least a queen, and my children infantas and princes, an't like your worship."

"Who doubts of that?" cried Don Quixote.

"I doubt of it," replied Sancho Panza; "for I cannot help believing, that, though it should rain kingdoms down upon the face of the earth, not one of them would sit well upon Mary Gutierrez's head; for, I must needs tell you, she's not worth two brass jacks to make a queen of: no, countess would be better for her; and that, too, will be as much as she can handsomely manage."

"Recommend the matter to providence," returned Don Quixote; "'twill be sure to give what is most expedient for thee."

CHAPTER VIII

Of the good success which the valorous Don Quixote had in the most terrifying and incredible adventure of the windmills, with other transactions worthy to be transmitted to posterity.

As they were thus discoursing, they discovered some thirty or forty windmills, in the plain; and as soon as the knight had spied them, "Fortune," cried he, "directs our affairs better than we could have wished; look yonder, Sancho, there are at least thirty outrageous giants, whom I intend to encounter; and, having deprived them of life, we will begin to enrich ourselves with their spoils: for they are lawful prize; and the extirpation of that cursed brood will be an acceptable service to heaven."

"What giants?" quoth Sancho Panza.

"Those whom thou seest yonder," answered Don Quixote, "with their long extended arms; some of that detested race have arms of so immense a size that sometimes they reach two leagues in length."

"Pray look better, sir," quoth Sancho: "those things yonder are not giants, but windmills, and the arms are their sails, which being whirled about by the wind make the mill go."

"'Tis a sign," cried Don Quixote, "thou art but little acquainted with adventures! I tell thee, they are giants; and therefore, if thou art afraid, go aside and say thy prayers, for I am resolved to engage in combat with them all."

This said, he clapped spurs to his horse, without giving ear to his squire, who bawled out to him, and assured him that they were windmills, and no giants. But he was so fully possessed with a strong conceit of the contrary, that he did not so much as hear his squire, nor was he sensible of what they were, although he was already very near them.

"Stand, cowards!" cried he as loud as he could; "stand your ground, ignoble creatures, and fly not basely from a single knight, who dares encounter you all."

At the same time the wind rising, the mill-sails began to move, which, when Don Quixote spied, "Base miscreants," cried he, "though you move more arms than the giant Briareus,¹ you shall pay for your arrogance."

He most devoutly recommended himself to his Lady Dulcinea, imploring her assistance in this perilous adventure; and so covering himself with his shield, and couching his lance, he rushed with Rozinante's utmost speed upon the first windmill he could come at, and running his lance into the sail the wind whirled it about with such swiftness, that the rapidity of the motion presently broke the lance into shivers, and hurled away both knight and horse along with it, till down he fell, rolling a good way off in the field. Sancho Panza ran as fast as his ass could drive to help his master, whom he found lying, and not able to stir.

"Did not I give your worship fair warning?" cried he; "did not I tell you they were windmills, and that nobody could think otherwise, unless he had also windmills in his head?"

"Peace, friend Sancho," replied Don Quixote; "there is nothing so subject to the inconstancy of fortune as war. I am verily persuaded, that cursed necromancer Freston, who carried away my study and my books, has transformed these giants into windmills, to deprive me of the honour of the victory; such is his inveterate malice against me; but in the end, all his pernicious wiles and stratagems shall prove ineffectual against the prevailing edge of my sword."

"So let it be," replied Sancho.

And heaving him up again upon his legs, once more the knight mounted poor Rozinante, who was half disjoined with his fall.

This adventure was the subject of their discourse, as they made the best of their way towards the pass of Lapice; for Don Quixote took that road, believing he could not miss of adventures in one so mightily frequented.

Sancho desired him now to consider that it was high time to go to dinner; but his master answered him, that he might eat whenever he pleased; as for himself, he was not yet disposed to do so. Sancho, having obtained leave, fixed himself as orderly as he could upon his ass; and, taking some victuals out of his wallet, fell to munching lustily; and ever and anon he lifted his bottle to his nose, and fetched such hearty pulls, that it would have made the best-pampered vintner in Malaga dry to have seen him.

In fine, they passed that night under some trees; from one of which Don Quixote tore a withered branch, which in some sort was able to serve him for a lance, and to this he fixed the head or spear of his broken lance. But he did not sleep all that night, keeping his thoughts intent on his dear Dulcinea, in imitation of what he had read in books of chivalry, where the knights pass their time, without sleep, in forests and deserts, wholly taken up with entertaining thoughts of their absent ladies. The next day they went on directly towards the pass of Lapice, which they discovered about three o'clock.

When they came near it:

"Here it is, brother Sancho," said Don Quixote, "that we may, as it were, thrust our arms up to the very elbows in that which we call adventures. But let me give thee one necessary caution; know that, though thou shouldst see me in the greatest extremity of danger, thou must not offer to draw thy sword in my defence, unless thou findest me assaulted by base plebeians and vile scoundrels; for in such a case thou mayest assist thy master; but if those with whom I am fighting are knights, thou must not do it; for the laws of chivalry do not allow thee to encounter a knight till thou art one thyself."

"Never fear," quoth Sancho; "I'll be sure to obey your worship in that, I'll warrant you; for I have ever loved peace and quietness, and never cared to thrust myself into frays and quarrels."

As they were talking, they spied coming towards them two monks of the order of St. Benedict mounted on two dromedaries, for the mules on which they rode were so high and stately, that they seemed little less. After them came a coach, with four or five men on horseback, and two muleteers on foot. There proved to be in the coach a Biscayan lady, who was going to Seville to meet her husband, that was there in order to embark for the Indies, to take possession of a considerable post. Scarce had the Don perceived the monks, who were not of the same company, though they went the same way, but he cried to his squire, "Either I am deceived, or this will prove the most famous adventure that ever was known; for without all question those two black things that move towards us must be necromancers, that are carrying away by force some princess in that coach; and 'tis my duty to prevent so great an injury."

"I fear me this will prove a worse job than the windmills," quoth Sancho. "These are Benedictine monks, and the coach must belong to some traveller. Take warning, sir, and do not be led away a second time."

"I have already told thee, Sancho," replied Don Quixote, "thou art miserably ignorant in matters of adventures: what I say is true, and thou shalt find it so presently."

This said, he spurred on his horse, and posted himself just in the midst of the road where the monks were to pass. And when they came within hearing, he immediately cried out in a loud and haughty tone, "Release those high-born princesses whom you are violently conveying away in the coach, or else prepare to meet with instant death, as the just punishment of your deeds."

The monks stopped, no less astonished at the figure than at the expressions of the speaker. "Sir Knight," cried they, "we are no such persons as you are pleased to term us, but religious men of the order of St. Benedict, that travel about our affairs, and are wholly ignorant whether or no there are any princesses carried away by force in that coach."

"I am not to be deceived," replied Don Quixote; "I know you well enough, perfidious caitiffs"; and immediately, without waiting their reply, he set spurs to Rozinante, and ran so furiously, with his lance couched, against the first monk that, if he had not prudently flung himself to the ground, the knight would certainly have laid him either dead, or grievously wounded. The other observing this clapped his heels to his mule's flanks, and scoured over the plain as if he had been running a race with the wind. Sancho no sooner saw the monk fall, but he leapt off his ass, and running to him, began to strip him immediately; but the two muleteers, who waited on the monks, came up to him, and asked why he offered to strip him. Sancho told them that this belonged to him as lawful plunder, being the spoils won in battle by his lord and master Don Quixote. The fellows, with whom there was no jesting, not knowing what he meant by his spoils and battle, and seeing Don Quixote at a good distance in deep discourse by the side of the coach, fell both upon poor Sancho, threw him down, tore his beard from his chin, trampled on him, and there left him lying without breath or motion. In the meanwhile the monk, scared out of his wits and as pale as a ghost, got upon his mule again as fast as he could, and spurred after his friend, who stayed for him at a distance, expecting the issue of this strange adventure; but being unwilling to stay to see the end of it, they made the best of their way, making more signs of the cross than if the devil had been posting after them.

Don Quixote was all this while engaged with the lady in the coach.

"Lady," cried he, "your discretion is now at liberty to dispose of your beautiful self as you please; for the presumptuous arrogance of those who attempted to enslave your person lies prostrate in the dust, overthrown by this arm: and that you may not be at a loss for the name of your deliverer, know I am called Don Quixote de la Mancha, by profession a knight-errant and adventurer, captive to that peerless beauty Donna Dulcinea del Toboso: nor do I desire any other recompense for the service I have done you, but that you return to Toboso to present yourself to that lady, and let her know what I have done to purchase your deliverance."

All that Don Quixote said was overheard by a certain squire, who accompanied the coach, a Biscayner, who, finding he would not let it go on, but insisted upon its immediately returning to Toboso, flew at Don Quixote, and, taking hold of his lance, addressed him, in bad Castilian, and worse Biscayan, after this manner:

"Get thee gone, cavalier; I swear if thou dost not quit the coach thou shalt forfeit thy life, as I am a Biscayner."

Our knight, who understood him very well, with great calmness answered, "Wert thou a gentleman, as thou art not, I would before now have chastised thy folly and presumption, thou pitiful slave."

To which the Biscayner replied, "I no gentleman! I swear thou liest, as I am a Christian; if thou wilt throw away thy lance, and draw thy sword, thou shalt see I will make no more of thee than a cat does of a mouse: Biscayner by land, gentleman by sea, gentleman for the devil, and thou liest: look then if thou hast anything else to say."

"Thou shalt see that presently, as said Agrages," answered Don Quixote; and throwing down his lance, he drew his sword, and grasping his buckler set upon the Biscayner, with a determined resolution to put him to death. The Biscayner, seeing him come on in that manner, would fain have alighted from his mule, which, being but a sorry hack, was not to be depended upon, but had only time to draw: it, however, fortunately happened that he was close to the coach, out of which he snatched a cushion, to serve him for a shield; and immediately they began to fight, as if they had been mortal enemies. The rest of the company would fain have made peace between them, but could not succeed; for the Biscayner swore in his gibberish, that, if they would not let him finish the combat, he would kill his mistress, and everybody that offered to oppose it. The lady, amazed and terrified at what she saw, ordered the coachman to drive a little out of the way, and she sat at a distance, beholding the conflict; in the progress of which, the Biscayner bestowed on one of the shoulders of Don Quixote, and above his buckler, so mighty a stroke that, had it not been for his coat of mail, he would have been cleft to the very girdle. Don Quixote, feeling the weight of this terrific blow, ejaculated in a loud and pious tone, "O Dulcinea, lady of my soul, flower of all beauty, now aid thy knight, who, for the satisfaction of thy great goodness, exposes himself to this great peril."

The ejaculation, the drawing the sword, the covering himself with his buckler, and attacking the Biscayner, were the business of a moment, for he resolved to venture all on the fortune of a single effort. The Biscayner, who saw him coming thus upon him, and perceived his bravery by his resolution, resolved to imitate his example, and accordingly waited for him, shielding himself with his cushion; but he was not able to turn his mule either to the right or the left, for she was already so jaded, and so little used to such sport, that she would not stir a step.

Don Quixote, then, as we have said, advanced against the wary Biscayner, with his lifted sword, fully determined to cleave him asunder; and the Biscayner expected him, with his sword also lifted up, and guarded by his cushion. All the bystanders trembled, and were in breathless suspense, at what might be the event of the prodigious blows with which they threatened each other; and the lady in the coach, and her waiting-women, put up a thousand prayers to heaven, and vowed an offering to every image and place of devotion in Spain, if God would deliver them and their squire from the great peril they were in. But the misfortune is, that in this very critical minute, the author of the history leaves the battle unfinished, excusing himself, that he could find no further account of these exploits of Don Quixote than what he has already related. It is true, indeed, that the second undertaker of this work would not believe that so curious a history could be lost in oblivion, or that the wits of La Mancha should have so little curiosity, as not to preserve in their archives, or their cabinets, some papers relating to this famous knight; and upon that presumption he did not despair to find the conclusion of this delectable history; in which, Heaven favouring his search, he at last succeeded, as shall faithfully be recounted.

THE SEVENTEENTH AND EIGHTEENTH CENTURIES

During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries European literature passed from the poetry and independence of the Renaissance, through the prose and uniformity of the age of Classicism, to the beginnings of another great emancipation of the human spirit in the Romantic Movement.

The interpretation of the relation of the individual Christian to the Church and to God, which characterized the Reformation, continued into the seventeenth century and resulted in a stricter code of living and a greater simplicity of Church organization, exemplified on the Continent by the teachings of John Calvin (1509-1564) and in England by Puritanism. The Puritans and their brethren on the Continent were filled with a passion for liberty and righteousness such as the world had never known. The friction between the Protestants and the Catholics of Germany and Austria resulted in the Thirty Years' War (1618-1648), which involved not only these countries but also Spain, France, and other powers, and caused an enormous loss of life and property. The religious controversies of the time are reflected in the writings of the Frenchman Pascal (p. 743) and many other seventeenth-century authors.

Along with the struggles for religious emancipation went a gradually increasing desire for greater personal liberty and the beginnings of democracy in the modern sense of the term. During the seventeenth century men began to question such ancient doctrines as that of the divine right of kings, and the lower classes became more and more conscious of their rights as citizens and as human beings. In England the people rebelled against the injustice of Charles I (1625-1649), tried the king for his life, executed him, and established a commonwealth modeled, as they believed, on the brotherhood of the saints in glory. In France the oppression and wasteful extravagance of the upper classes, headed by Louis XIV (1643-1715), kindled the fires of unrest and discontent that were destined to burst forth a century later in the red flames of the French Revolution. The new creed of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity" as the fundamental principle of true democracy was reflected in the writings of many authors of the eighteenth century. The two most famous French writers of the century were the social theorist and novelist Rousseau (p. 746) and the brilliant, skeptical, satirical Voltaire (p. 758).

The growth of democratic ideas was accompanied by increased education and a demand for literature better suited to the tastes of the lower and middle classes. The desire of the average reader for narratives dealing with people more like himself than the heroes of medieval romance led to the creation of the modern novel, a new literary form which came into being during the late seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries. The beginnings of the modern novel are best illustrated by the writings of Daniel Defoe and Henry Fielding in England and, in France, by the work of Lesage, whose Gil Blas (p. 786), following in the wake of the immortal Cervantes (p. 608), is one of the greatest works of fiction ever produced. There is perceptible in the literature of the period a development of characterization, that was assisted by numerous collections of character sketches, among which the Characters of the Frenchman La Bruyère (p. 777) were especially popular and widely imitated, notably by Addison and other English writers.

The chief literary movement of the seventeenth century was the development of Classicism. The Classicists illustrated in their own works, and sought to impress upon others, the importance of moderation and conformity to set rules both in literature and in life. Their watchwords were "Reason" and "Common Sense." They admired the cultured man of London and Paris society rather than the simple, unlearned peasant, and preferred the carefully trimmed paths and hedges of an Italian garden to the natural, uncultivated beauty of the countryside. In literary composition they distrusted emotion and originality, and taught that literature should be composed according to the principles supposedly illustrated in the great masterpieces of Greece and Rome, — hence the name Classicists. Under the influence of Classicism lyric poetry naturally declined, while prose and the drama developed greatly. Letter writing as a fine art flourished (p. 780). The Classical Age has sometimes been called the Age of Prose or the Age of Reason. Though Classicism often made for artificiality, its demand for careful workmanship gave to literature precision, elegance, and clarity. In France the literary doctrines of the Classicists were best illustrated by the critical writings of Boileau (p. 762); in England by Pope's well-known Essay on Criticism.

In French literature the seventeenth century is known as le grand siècle, "the great century." Under Louis XIV France became the most powerful state in Europe, and Paris the center of art and culture for the civilized world. French literature, especially the drama, reached a height of excellence it never attained before or since. As writers of tragedy Corneille and Racine, though following in general the rules of the Classicists, treated their themes with a dignity and exaltation that elevated their plays far above the common run of French dramas. Racine is particularly noteworthy for his portrayal of female characters. Corneille's plays, especially The Cid (p. 621), give the author a right to be called "the greatest tragic dramatist of France on the Classical model." Though the influence of Classicism was strong in England, no English dramatist ever produced a Classical tragedy comparable to those of seventeenth-century France.

Much closer to real life than French Classical tragedy is the work of the comic dramatist Molière, who ranks with Shakespeare as one of the most gifted portrayers of human character in the history of literature. Molière combined a keen feeling for the comic with a profound wisdom regarding human life. He elevated the lighter side of French drama from farce and burlesque to true comedy, making his art an effective vehicle for social satire and reform. Molière's dramas have exercised a widespread influence upon the modern stage. Holberg and Goldoni (p. 675) have been called respectively the Danish and the Italian Molière.

Among the non-dramatic poets of seventeenth-century France, La Fontaine (p. 779) deserves especial mention as the author of one of the most famous of the many collections of animal fables. The innocuous-looking animal fable becomes, in his hands, a powerful weapon of social and political satire.

During the eighteenth century in France, as in England, the doctrines and practice of the Classicists gradually gave place to a freer and less artificial conception of literature and life which led ultimately to the Romantic Movement. In English literature the transition from Classicism to Romanticism was especially marked. After the middle of the eighteenth century a simpler and more sentimental view of literature, religion, and life, coupled with an increased admiration for the Middle Ages, the popular ballads, and other forms of folk literature gradually displaced the cut and dried doctrines of the Classicists and finally led to the great outburst of lyric poetry which marked the close of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century.

Italy, which during the Renaissance had been the intellectual leader of Europe, began during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to follow the lead of other European countries, especially of England and France. The most important literary work of the period is to be found in the drama.

In Spanish literary history the seventeenth century has been called "The Golden Age." Here belong not only the closing years of Cervantes's life but also the long list of plays produced by the two great dramatists Lope de Vega (p. 514) and Calderón. The eighteenth century in Spain was a period of literary decline.

In German literature the seventeenth century was a rather barren period, but with the coming of the next century German literary men began to feel the influence of Classicism, and later a new enthusiasm for simplicity, for the Middle Ages, and for folk literature, chiefly stimulated by English influences, led to the work of the Grimm brothers, Goethe, Schiller, and other writers of the Romantic period. Among German writers of the eighteenth century Lessing deserves especially to be known because of his literary criticism (p. 768) and his notable contributions to the national drama (p. 701).

(1606-1684)

The long life of Pierre Corneille comprehends the most important period of French dramatic history. Corneille saw the development of tragi-comedy out of the Senecan tragedy under the hand of Alexander Hardy; he was in the thick of the furious struggle over the false Aristotelian unities; he knew Molière and even responded somewhat to his inspiration; and he lived to see his own popularity eclipsed by that of Racine. He was born in Rouen, the eldest son of a barrister, who held a government position. Corneille, like his father, was prepared for the profession of law; he was admitted to the bar in 1624. Four years later he was made attorney-general in the department of waters and forests. But, as he never made any attempt to practice law seriously, his professional life took little of his attention. He began his dramatic work with a series of comedies, the first of which was Mélite (1629). Finally attracting the attention of Richelieu, he was invited in 1633 to assist in a pretentious dramatic festival, la Comédie des Tuileries. His first important tragedy was Médée (1634-35), a play based on tragedies of the same name by Seneca and Euripides. It was at this time that he became acquainted with the Spanish dramatists and found in them the heroic and romantic qualities toward which he was temperamentally inclined. He wrote a number of pieces in the Spanish manner, the most famous of which was The Cid (1636). This play, first presented in 1637, met with such astonishing popularity as to arouse the jealousy of Corneille's rivals. The play was attacked from all sides, dramatists, critics, and even Richelieu himself, condemning it on the score that it violated the sacred rules of dramatic construction, that it made too much of Spanish customs, that the plot was not original, and that it approved the illegal custom of duelling. Although the public continued to attend the performances of the play in great numbers, Corneille seems to have taken the criticism seriously; for his next play, Horace, appearing three years later, contained none of the elements that had been found distasteful in The Cid. This piece was almost as successful as The Cid in spite of the fact that it was not so good a play. Corneille wrote three more plays before 1645, Polyeucte, Pompée, and Rodogune; and it is on these three, along with Horace and The Cid, that his fame chiefly rests. A number of attractive comedies followed, the most notable of which is Le Menteur (1643), and a lyric opera, Andromède (1650). The later plays, however, never achieved the success of those written before 1645. The last ten years of his life Corneille spent in retirement, working on the final revision of his works, the first edition of which had been published in 1660.

The Cid is based upon a play by the Spanish dramatist Guillen de Castro, entitled Las Mocedades del Cid. Corneille's obligation to his source, nevertheless, is no more specific than Shakespeare's debt to Lodge in A Winter's Tale. He remodeled the whole plot to bring it into accord with his dramatic purpose, which was to represent the struggle between duty and passion in the mind of his hero. Here, as in many of his other plays, Corneille shows his preoccupation with the dramatic idea of the hero who opposes his will to the forces of his environment and wins. Although his characters are types rather than familiar and human personalities, it would be a mistake to assume that they cannot engage our interest. A type character in the hands of a great poet like Corneille can be used with powerful literary and moral effect.

ACT I

*Enter CHIMÈNE and ELVIRE.*¹

CHIMÈNE. Tell me, Elvire, is this a true report?
 In naught dost thou disguise my father's words?

ELVIRE. My heart thrills with delight when I recall them.
 Your love for Roderick vies with his esteem;

Unless I read amiss his inmost soul,
 He will command that you return his love.

CHIMÈNE. Repeat, I pray, a second time the cause
 Why thou dost think that he approves my choice;

What hope he gives me, let me learn anew;
 Such welcome news I could forever hear.
 Thou canst not with too sure a promise pledge

The sunlight of his sanction to our love.
 What utterance gave he on the secret plot

That Roderick and Sancho made with thee?

Hast thou not made too clear the differences

Which draw me to my chosen Roderick's side?

ELVIRE. No, an indifferent heart I pictured yours,
 That kindles not, nor blights, the hope of either,

And, not too stern, nor yet too soft, but waits

Your father's wish in choosing you a husband.

5 This filial spirit charmed him, as his lips
 And every feature quick assurance gave.
 And since your heart demands his very words

Repeated o'er and o'er — why, here they are:

10 "Wisely she waits my choice; they both are worthy,

Of noble blood, of faithful, valiant soul.
 Their youthful faces speak the unbroken

15 line
 Of shining virtues handed proudly down.
 In Roderick's glance no slightest trace I see

Of aught but courage high and stainless honor.

20 Cradled amid war's trophies was this son,
 So many warriors has his house produced.
 A marvelous tale of valor and emprise,
 His father's glorious acts have long been told;

And the seamed brow that tells the flight of years
 Speaks clearer still his mighty deeds in arms.

30 The son will prove fully worthy of the sire;
 'Twould please me should he win my daughter's love."

Then to the council-chamber did he haste,
 Whose pressing hour an interruption made;

But from his hurried words I think 'tis clear

He leans not strongly to the suit of either.
 The king must choose a tutor for his son,

40 And this high service to your father gives;
 The choice is certain, and his valor rare
 Admits no fear of question or dispute;
 His unmatched gifts ne'er meet a rival claim,

45 Whether in royal court or honor's field.
 And since your Roderick has his father's word

To press the marriage, at the council's close,

¹ The dramatists of Corneille's day worried themselves very little about their expository material. Whatever the audience needed to know in order to follow the progress of the action or understand the relation between characters was frankly introduced into the opening scenes in the form of dialogues between leading characters and their confidential friends.

Your heart may well assure you of his plea,
And in a tender hope will rest content.

CHIMÈNE. My troubled heart in hope finds little ease,
But, burdened with sad doubt, asks certainty:

Fate in a moment can reverse her will;
Even this happiness may mean a sorrow.

ELVIRE. Nay, happily that fear shall be dispelled.

CHIMÈNE. Away! — to wait the issue,
what it be.

(Exeunt CHIMÈNE and ELVIRE.)

Enter the INFANTA,¹ LEONORA, and Page.

INFANTA. Page, quickly tell Chimène
she stays too long Before her promised coming; my affection

Complains that she neglects the heart that loves her.

(Exit Page.)

LEONORA. Madam, some longing burns within your soul,
For at each meeting anxiously you seek
The daily progress of her lover's suit.

INFANTA. Have I not reason? Her young heart is pierced

By darts myself did level at her breast.
Her lover Roderick was my lover first,
And 'tis to me she owes his passion deep;
Thus having forged these lovers' lasting chains,

I yearn to see the end of all their pains.

LEONORA. Madam, their dear delight in mutual love
Finds, as I read your heart, no echo there,
But sorrow weighs your spirit at their hopes.

Can your great soul feel grief at others' joy?

Why should your love for them react in pain,

And cause you suffering in their hour of rapture?

But, pardon, madam, I am overbold.

INFANTA. Concealment deepens sorrow, therefore hear

What struggles my too-loving heart has borne;

Listen what fierce assault my courage braves.

The tyrant Love spares neither high nor
low;

5 This cavalier whose heart I've given away
I love!

LEONORA. You love him!

INFANTA. Feel my bounding pulse!
Mark what its conqueror's name alone can do;

It knows its master.

LEONORA. Madam, pardon me,
I would not fail in gentle courtesy,
And rudely censure you for this affection.

But for a royal princess so to stoop
As to admit a simple cavalier Within her heart — what would your father say?

What all Castile? Yours is the blood of kings!

Have you remembered that?

INFANTA. So well, alas!
That I would ope these veins ere I would prove

False to the sacred trust of rank and name.
In noble souls, 'tis true, worth, worth alone

Should kindle love's bright fires; and did
I choose

To justify my passion, many a one
As high-born as myself could give me cause.

But honor heeds not Love's excuses fond,*
And sense, surprised, makes not my courage less.

The daughter of a king must mate with
kings;

No other hand than kingly sues for mine.
To save my heart from well-nigh fatal
stroke,

With mine own hand I turned the steel
away.

I drew the bond that binds him to Chimène,

And tuned their notes to love to still my own.

No longer wonder that my harassed soul,
With restless haste, will urge their nuptials
on.

¹ Whether or not the Infanta is an artistic or even a necessary addition to the play has been the subject of much literary comment and discussion.

² This is the first expression of the keynote of the play.

Love lives on hope, and dies when hope is dead —

A flame that needs perpetual renewal.
My heart has suffered much; but if this tie

Be consummated with no long delay,
My hope is dead, my wounded spirit healed.

But till that hour I'm rent with varying pangs;

I will to lose, yet suffer in my loss;
The love I would resign I still would keep;
And thus the court that to Chimène he pays

Excites the secret pain I cannot hide.
Love moves my sighs for one whose rank I scorn.

My mind divided feels a double pang;
My will is strong; my heart is all aflame.
I dare not hope from their united lives
More than a mingled sense of joy and pain.
Honor and Love war on this fatal field;
Neither can wholly conquer, neither yield.

LEONORA. Madam, I blame not, but I pity you,

And have no word to utter, save that I Sigh with your sighs and suffer in your grief.

But since your royal heart, unstained and strong,

Can front an ill so tempting and so sharp,
And bear it down, your noble spirit soon Will know again its sweet serenity.

Time is the friend of Virtue; with its aid You will forget; and Heaven, whose God is just,

Will not forsake you in this trying hour.

INFANTA. My surest hope is hope's own swift defeat.

Enter Page.

INFANTA (to Leonora). Go, entertain her in the gallery.

LEONORA. Here, brooding o'er your sorrow, will you stay?

INFANTA. No, I but wish to hide my grief from her,

And to assume a joy I scarce can feel;
I follow soon.

INFANTA (alone). Just Heaven, whence I must hope alone for aid,

Put to this bitter suffering an end;
Grant me repose; in honor's path be guide;
In others' bliss my own I fain would seek.
Three hearts are waiting for this marriage bond;

Oh, hasten it, or strengthen my weak soul!
The tie that makes these happy lovers one Will break my fetters and my anguish end.
But I am lingering; I will seek Chimène;
Her gentle presence will assuage my pain.

(Exit INFANTA.)

Enter the COUNT and DIÈGUE.

COUNT. At last you win the prize; the royal hand
Uplifts you to a place where I should stand.
You are to train the young prince of Castile.

DIÈGUE. His justice and his gratitude the king
Has blended in this honor to my house.

COUNT. Kings, howsoever great they be, are men,

And, like us all, they oftentimes strangely err;

All courtiers may, in this, a warning see
That present service meets but poor reward.

DIÈGUE. No longer let us speak upon a theme

So chafing to your spirit; kindness may Have turned the balance quite as much as merit.

But to a king whose power is absolute 'Tis due to take, nor question, what he wills.

An added honor I would ask of you —
The union of our houses and our names.
You have a daughter, I an only son,

Their marriage would forever make us one
In more than friendship's bonds; this favor grant.

COUNT. To such alliance does this youth presume?

Will the new splendor of your office serve
To puff his mind with swelling vanity?

Use your new dignity, direct the prince,
Instruct him how a province should be ruled

So all his subjects tremble 'neath his laws,
And love and terror make his throne secure;

To civic duties add a soldier's life —

To laugh at hardship, ply the trade of Mars

Undaunted and unequalled; pass long days
And nights on horseback; to sleep fully armed;

To force a stronghold, and, the battle won,
To owe the glory to himself alone.
Instruct him by example; his young eyes
Must in yourself his perfect pattern see.

DIÈGUE. Your envious soul speaks in 10
your sneering words;

But, for example, he need only turn
The pages of my life; therein he'll read,
Through a long story of heroic acts,
How to subdue the nations, storm a fort, 15
Command an army, and to make a name
Whose wide renown shall rest on mighty deeds.

COUNT. Living examples are the only guides; 20

Not from a book a prince his lesson learns.
Your boasted years a single day of mine
Equals not only, but surpasses oft.
Valiant you have been; I am valiant now!
On my strong arm this kingdom rests se- 25
cure;

When my sword flashes, Aragon retreats,
Granada trembles; by my name of might Castile is girdled round as by a wall.
Without me you would pass 'neath other 30
laws,

And soon you'd have your enemies your kings.

Each day, each flying hour, exalts my fame, 35
Adds victory unto victory, praise to praise.

Under the guarding shadow of my arm
The prince should prove his mettle on the field, 40
Should learn by seeing conquest how to conquer.

In his young princehood he should early win

The loftiest heights of courage; he should 45
see —

DIÈGUE. I know! you serve the king, your master, well;

'Neath my command I've often watched you fight; 50

And since the stiffening currents of old age

Have chilled my powers, your prowess nobly shows —

No more; what I have been, you are today.

5 'Tis true, however, that, when choice is due,

Our monarch sees a difference 'twixt us still.

COUNT. Nay! you have stolen what was mine by right! ¹

DIÈGUE. To win an honor is the proof of merit.

COUNT. He is most worthy who can use it best.

DIÈGUE. To be refused it is poor proof of worth.

COUNT. You've used a courtier's wiles, and won by trick!

DIÈGUE. My fame has been my only partisan.

COUNT. Admit the king but honors your old age.

DIÈGUE. My years the king but measures by my deeds.

COUNT. If deeds are years, I'm elder far than you!

DIÈGUE. Who not obtained this honor not deserved it.

COUNT. I not deserved it? I?

DIÈGUE. Yes, you!

COUNT. Old man,
Thine insolence shall have its due reward.
(Gives him a blow.)

DIÈGUE (drawing his sword). Quick, run me through! — the first of all my race

To wear a flush of shame upon my brow.

COUNT. What dost thou hope thine impotence can do?

DIÈGUE. O God! my worn-out strength at need forsakes me.

COUNT. Thy sword is mine, but thou wouldst be too vain

If I should take this trophy of thy fall.

Adieu! Go read the prince, in spite of sneers,

For his instruction, thy life's history.

This chastisement of insolent discourse

Will prove, methinks, no slight embellishment.

(Exit COUNT.)

DIÈGUE. Rage and despair! age, my worst enemy!
 Must my great life end with a foul disgrace?
 Shall laurels gained with slowly whitening locks,
 In years of warlike toils, fade in a day?
 And does the arm all Spain has wondered at,
 Whose might has often saved the king his throne,
 And kept the rod of empire in his grasp,
 Betray me now, and leave me unavenged?
 O sad remembrance of my vanished glory!
 O years of life undone in one short hour! 15
 This new-won height is fatal to my fortune,
 A precipice from which my honor falls.
 Must the Count's triumph add the final pang
 To death dishonorable, to life disgraced? 20
 The office, Count, is thine; thine the high place
 Of tutor to my prince, for thine own hand,
 With envious insult, the king's choice reversed,
 And leaves me here with hope and honor gone.
 And thou, brave instrument of my exploits,
 But useless ornament of feeble age,
 Once terror of my enemies, but now
 A bauble, not a man's defense at need —
 My sword! — go, quit thy now dishonored master;
 Pass, to avenge me, into worthier hands!

Enter RODERICK.

DIÈGUE. Hast thou a brave heart, Roderick?
RODERICK. Any man
 Except my father soon would prove it so. 40
DIÈGUE. O pleasing choler! wrath that soothes my hurt!
 My own blood speaks in this resentment swift,
 And in thy heat my youth comes back to me. 45
 My son, my scion, come, repair my wrong;
 Avenge me instantly!
RODERICK. For what? for what?
DIÈGUE. For an affront so cruel, so unjust,
 'Tis fatal to the honor of our house.
 A blow! across my cheek! his life had paid,

Save that my nerveless arm betrayed my will.
 This sword, which I again can never wield,
 I pass to thee for vengeance to the death.
 Against this arrogance thy courage set;
 Only in blood such stains are cleansed, and thou
 Must kill or die. This man, mine enemy,
 Whom thou must meet, is worthy of thy steel;
 Begrimed with blood and dust, I've seen him hold
 An army terror-stricken at his will,
 And break a hundred squadrons by his charge;
 And, to say all, more than a leader brave,
 More than a warrior great, he is — he is —
RODERICK. In mercy speak!
DIÈGUE. The father of Chimène!
RODERICK. Chimène!
DIÈGUE. Nay, answer not; I know thy love;
 But who can live disgraced deserves not life. 25
 Is the offender dear, worse the offense.
 Thou know'st my wrong; its quittance lies with thee;
 I say no more; avenge thyself and me!
 Remember who thy father is — and was! 30
 Weighed down with Fate's misfortunes heaped on me,
 I go to mourn them. Do thou fly to vengeance!

(Exit DIÈGUE.)

RODERICK. My heart's o'erwhelmed with woe.
 A mortal stroke that mocks my tender trust
 Makes me avenger of a quarrel just,
 And wretched victim of an unjust blow.
 Though crushed in spirit, still my pride must cope
 With that which slays my hope.
 So near to love's fruition to be told —
 O God, the strange, strange pain! —
 My father has received an insult bold,
 The offender is the father of Chémene.
 'Mid conflicts wild I stand.
 I lift my arm to strike my father's foe,
 But Love with mighty impulse urges
 "No!"

Pride fires my heart, affection stays my hand;

I must be deaf to Passion's calls, or face
A life of deep disgrace.

Whate'er I do, fierce anguish follows me —
O God, the strange, strange pain!

Can an affront so base unpunished be?
But can I fight the father of Chimène?

To which allegiance give? —
To tender tyranny or noble bond? —
A tarnished name or loss of pleasures fond?
Unworthy or unhappy must I live.

(To his sword.) Thou dear, stern hope of souls high-born and bold

And fired with love untold,
But enemy of my new dreams of bliss,

Sword, cause of all my pain,
Was't given me to use for this, for this? —
To save my honor, but to lose Chimène?

I must seek death's dread bourne.
To weigh my duty and my love is vain.
If I avenge his death, her hate I gain,

If I no vengeance take, I win her scorn;
Unfaithful must I prove to hope most

sweet,
Or for that hope unmeet.

What heals my honor's wounds augments
my grief,

And causes keener pain;
Be strong, my soul! Since death's my sole relief,

I'll die, nor lose the love of my Chimène.

What, die without redress?
Seek death — so fatal to my future fame?
Endure that Spain shall heap on me the shame

Of one who failed in honor's sorest stress?

All for a love whose hope my frenzied heart
Already sees depart?

I'll list no longer to the subtle plea
Which but renews my pain;

Come, arm of mine, my choice turns now
to thee,

Since naught, alas! can give me back
Chimène.

Yes, love my will misled.
My father — life and name to him I owe —
Whether of grief or from a mortal blow

I die, my blood all pure and true I'll shed.

Too long I've dallied with a purpose weak;
Now vengeance swift I seek.

5 The flush of shame mounts hotly to my brow,

That I can deem it pain
To save my father's house. I haste e'en

now

10 To seek — woe's me! — the father of Chimène.

(Exit RODERICK.)

ACT II

Enter ARIAS and the COUNT.

COUNT. I grant you that my somewhat hasty blood

Took fire too soon, and carried me too far;
But — what is done, is done: the blow was struck.

ARIAS. To the king's will let your proud spirit yield.

25 This moves him deeply, and his anger roused

Will make you suffer penalty extreme.
No just defense can you before him plead;

The deed was gross, the aged victim great;
30 No common rule that serves 'twixt man and man

Will meet the high demand exacted here.
COUNT. The king can use my life to suit his will.

35 ARIAS. You add the fault of anger to your deed.

The king still loves you well; appease his wrath;

You know his wish; you will not disobey?

COUNT. To disobey — a little — were no crime,

Should it preserve the fame I most do prize.
But were it such, forsooth, my valiant service

45 More than suffices for o'erlooking it.

ARIAS. For deeds howe'er illustrious and high,

A king can ne'er become a subject's debtor.
Better than any other you should know

50 Who serves his king well does his simple duty;

This haughty confidence will cost you
dear.

- COUNT. I will believe you when I pay the price.
- ARIAS. You should respect your monarch's sovereign will.
- COUNT. I can outlive a single day's displeasure.
- Let the whole state be armed to hurl me down —
- If I be made to suffer, Spain will fall!
- ARIAS. What! you, forsooth, defy the power supreme!
- COUNT. Why should I fear a sceptered hand whose grasp
- Is weaker than my own? He knows my use;
- My head, in falling, will shake off his crown.
- ARIAS. Let reason rule your action; be advised.
- COUNT. I wish no further counsel: all is said.
- ARIAS. What message to your king shall I report?
- COUNT. That I shall ne'er consent to my disgrace.
- ARIAS. Remember that you brave a tyrant's power.
- COUNT. The die is cast and longer speech is vain.
- ARIAS. Adieu, then, since I cannot change your will.
- E'en on your laureled head the bolt may strike!
- COUNT. I wait it without fear.
- ARIAS. 'Twill cast you down.
- COUNT. Then old Diègue will be well satisfied.
- (Exit ARIAS.)
- Who fears not death need surely not fear threats.
- My proud resolve yields not to weak disgrace;
- Though I be stripped of fortune, rank, and name,
- Myself alone can rob me of my honor.
- Enter RODERICK.
- RODERICK. Grant me a word, Count.
- COUNT. Speak.
- RODERICK. Dost know Diègue?
- COUNT. Yes.
- RODERICK. Listen, then, and let us softly speak.
- Dost also know that his now feeble arm Was once Spain's chiefest honor, valor, glory?
- COUNT. Perhaps!
- RODERICK. This fire enkindled in my eyes
- Marks the same blood as his; dost thou know that?
- COUNT. What matters that to me?
- RODERICK. I'll teach you, Count, At some four paces hence, what matters it.
- COUNT. Presumptuous youth!
- RODERICK. Speak quietly, I pray.
- My years are few, but, Count, in high-born souls,
- Valor and youth full oft united are.
- COUNT. And thou wouldst stand 'gainst me! thou vain, untried,
- Impudent upstart? Cease thy boyish brag!
- RODERICK. The temper of my steel will not demand
- A second proof; the first will be enough.
- COUNT. Know'st thou to whom thou speakest?
- RODERICK. I know well!
- Another than I am would hear with dread
- The mention of thy name: thy crowns of palm
- Must mean to me, 'twould seem, the stroke of doom.
- But bold I meet thine all-victorious arm;
- Where courage leads, there force will aye be found.
- A father's honor is a triple shield;
- Invincible thou art not, though unconquered.
- COUNT. Thy fearless words a fearless heart reveal.
- I've watched thy growing powers from day to day;
- In thee the future glory of Castile
- I have believed to see, and proud of heart,
- Was laying in thine own my daughter's hand.
- I know thy love, and charmed am I to learn
- That duty is a dearer mistress still,
- Nor soft emotions weaken warlike zeal.
- Thy manly worth responds to my esteem;
- And, wishing for my son a noble knight,
- I did not err when I made choice of thee.
- But pity stirs within me at thy words;

Such boldness ill befits thy youthful form;
 Let not thy maiden effort be thy last;
 I cannot fight a combat so unequal;
 A victory won without a peril braved
 Is but inglorious triumph, and for me Such contest is not fitting. None would dream
 Thou couldst withstand an instant, and regret
 At thy young, foolish death would e'er be mine.

RODERICK. Thy pity more insults me than thy scorn;
 Thou fear'st my arm, but dar'st attack my honor.

COUNT. Withdraw from here!

RODERICK. Let us to deeds, not words!

COUNT. Art tired of life?

RODERICK. Dost thou, then, fear to die?

COUNT. Come on! Thou'rt right. I'll help thee do thy duty!

'Tis a base son survives a father's fame!
 (Exeunt COUNT and RODERICK.)

Enter the INFANTA, CHIMÈNE, and LEONORA.

INFANTA. Nay, do not weep! allay thy grief, Chimène!

This sorrow should disclose thy spirit's strength.

After this transient storm a calm will fall,
 And happiness, deferred and clouded now,
 Will brighter seem in contrast. Do not weep!

CHIMÈNE. My heart, worn out with trouble, has no hope.

A storm so sudden and so terrible
 To my poor bark brings direful threat of wreck.

Ere I set sail upon my smiling sea,
 I perish in the harbor. I was loved
 By him I fondly loved; our sires approved;
 But even while I told my charming story
 At that same moment was the quarrel on,
 Whose sad recital changed my tale to woe.
 O cursed ambition! wrath's insanity!
 Pride, to my dearest wishes pitiless,
 Whose tyranny the noblest nature rules!
 In sighs and tears a heavy price I pay.

INFANTA. Thy fears o'ercome thee;
 'tis a hasty word;

The quarrel of a moment dies as soon.

The king already seeks to make a peace;
 And I, as well thou knowest, to dry thy tears

And heal thy grief would try the impossible.

CHIMÈNE. No reconciliation can avail.
 Such wounds are mortal and defy all art
 Of king or princess, of command or pleading.

And though an outward show of peace be gained,

The fires of hate, compressed within the
 heart,

Burn fiercer, and will break at last in flame.

INFANTA. When Love has bound Chimène and Roderick

In sacred marriage, hatred will depart;

Their fathers will forget, and happiness

Will silence discord in sweet harmony.

CHIMÈNE. I wish for such an end, but dare not hope.

'Tis a matched combat between two proud souls;

Neither will yield; I know them; I must weep!

The past I mourn, the future frightens me.

INFANTA. What fearest thou? an old man's feebleness?

CHIMÈNE. Brave sires make braver sons; Roderick is bold.

INFANTA. He is too young.

CHIMÈNE. Such men are born high-hearted!

INFANTA. Thou shouldst not fear his boldness overmuch;

He cannot wound thee, whom he loves so well;

A word from thy sweet lips will check his wrath.

CHIMÈNE. How shall I speak it? If he do not yield,

'Tis but an added burden to my heart;

And if he do, what will men say of him —
 His father's son, to see his father's fall,

Nor lift an arm of vengeance? In this strait

I stand confused, nor know what I would choose —

His too weak love, or his too stern refusal.

INFANTA. In thy high soul, Chimène, no thought can live

Unworthy of thee; love but more exalts.

But if, until this trouble be o'erpast,
I make a prisoner of this gallant youth,
Preventing thus the dread results you fear,
Would it offend thy proud and loving heart?

CHIMÈNE. Ah! madam, then my cares are quieted.

Enter the Page.

INFANTA. Page, summon Roderick hither; I would see him.

PAGE. He and the Count de Gormaz —

CHIMÈNE. Heaven, oh, help me!

INFANTA. What? Speak!

CHIMÈNE. Alone?

PAGE. Yes, and they muttered angrily.

CHIMÈNE. They've come to blows! All words are useless now;

Madam, forgive this haste — my heart will break!

(Exeunt CHIMÈNE and Page.)

INFANTA. Alas! that such inquietude is mine;

I weep her griefs, but Roderick still en-thrals;

My peace is gone; my dying flame revives.
The fate that parts Chimène from him she loves

Renews alike my sorrow and my hope.

Their separation, cruel though it be,

Excites a secret ecstasy in me.

LEONORA. Surely, the noble virtue of your soul

Yields not so soon to passion's baser thrall.

INFANTA. Nay, do not name it thus,
since in my heart,

Strong and triumphant, it controls my will.

Respect my love, for it is dear to me;

My nobler pride forbids it — yet I hope.

Ill-guarded 'gainst a madness so be-wild'ring,

My heart flies to a love Chimène has lost.

LEONORA. And thus your high resolve all-powerless fails?

And Reason lays her wonted scepter down?

INFANTA. Ah! Reason has a harsh and rude effect,

When such sweet poison has inflamed the
heart;

The patient loves his painful malady,

Nor willingly accepts a healing draught.

LEONORA. Be not beguiled by Love's seductions soft;

That Roderick is beneath you, all well
know.

INFANTA. Too well myself must know it, but my heart

Hears subtle words which Love, the flatterer, speaks.

If from this combat Roderick victor comes,
And this great warrior falls beneath his
blow,

What other plea need Love, the pleader,
use?

Who could withstand that conqueror's conqueror!

My fancy sets no bounds to his exploits;
Whole kingdoms soon would fall beneath his laws;

I see him on Granada's ancient throne;

The subject Moors with trembling do his
will;

Proud Aragon acknowledges him king,

And Portugal receives him, while the seas

Bear his high destiny to other lands.

In Afric's blood his laurels shall be dyed,
And all that e'er was said of greatest chief,

I hear of Roderick, this victory won;

Then in his love my highest glory lies.

LEONORA. Nay, madam, 'tis your fancy makes you dream

Of conquests whose beginning may not chance.

INFANTA. The count has done the deed
— Roderick enraged —

They have gone forth to combat — needs
there more?

LEONORA. E'en should they fight — since you will have it so —

Will Roderick prove the knight you picture him?

INFANTA. Nay, I am weak; my foolish mind runs wild;

Love spreads its snares for victims such as I.

Come to my chamber; there console my grief,

Nor leave me till this troubled hour is o'er.

(Exeunt INFANTA and LEONORA.)

Enter the KING, ARIAS, and SANCHE.

KING. Pray, is this haughty count bereft of sense?

Dares he believe his crime can be o'er-looked?

ARIAS. To him I have conveyed your strong desire;
Nothing I gained from long and earnest pleas.

KING. Just Heaven! A subject have I in my realm

So rash that he will disregard my wish?
My oldest, foremost courtier he affronts, 10
Then aims his boundless insolence at me!
The law, in my own court, he would decree:
Leader and warrior, great howe'er he be,
I'll school his haughty soul with lesson hard.

Were he the god of battles, valor's self,
Obedience to his sovereign he shall pay.
Although his act like chastisement de- served,

It was my will to show him leniency.
Since he abuses mercy, from this hour
He is a prisoner, all resistance vain.

SANCHO. Pray, sire, a brief delay may calm his mind.

Fresh from the quarrel he was first ap- 25
proached.

Boiling with passion. Sire, a soul like his,
So hasty and so bold, belies itself
In its first impulse; soon he'll know his fault,

But cannot yet admit he was the offender.

KING. Be silent, Sancho, and be warned henceforth.

He who defends the guilty shares the guilt.

SANCHO. Yea, sire, I will obey, but 35
grant me grace

To say one further word in his defense.

KING. What can you say for such a reckless man?

SANCHO. Concessions do not suit a lofty 40
soul

Accustomed to great deeds; it can con- ceive

Of no submission without loss of honor.

He cannot bend his pride to make amends; 45
Too humble is the part you'd have him play;

He would obey you were he less a man.

Command his arm, nourished 'mid war's alarms,

To right this wrong upon the field of honor.

The boldest champion who his steel will face

He will accept and make atonement swift.

KING. You fail in due respect, but youth is rash,

And in your ardor I your fault excuse.

5 A king, whom prudence ever should in- form,

Is guardian of his subjects' life and death.
O'er mine I watch with care, and jealously,
Like a great head, I guard my members well.

Your reason, then, no reason is for me;
You speak, a soldier; I must act, a king.
Moreover, let the count think what he will,
Obedience to his king ennobles him.

15 He has affronted me; he rudely stained
The honor of my son's appointed guide.
To strike a blow at him — 'tis nothing less
Than to attack with blows the power su- preme.

20 I'll hear no more. Listen! — there have been seen

Ten hostile vessels, with their colors up;
They've dared approach clear to the river's mouth.

ARIAS. The Moors have learned, per- force, to know you well;

Conquered so oft, what courage can they feel

To risk themselves against their con- queror? 30

KING. They'll never see, without a jeal- ous rage,

My scepter rule o'er Andalusia.

That lovely land, by them too long pos- sessed,

Always with envious eye they closely watch.

That was the only cause why Castile's throne

In old Seville I placed, now years ago;

I would be near, and ready at demand,

To overthrow uprising or attack.

ARIAS. They know, at cost of many a mighty chief,

45 That triumph, sire, your presence only needs.

Naught can you have to fear.

KING. Nor to neglect;

For confidence is danger's sure ally.

50 Well do you know with what an easy sweep

A rising tide may float them to our walls.
'Tis but a rumor; let no panic rise,

Nor causeless fears be spread by false alarms.

Stir not the city in the hours of night;
But doubly fortify the walls and harbor.

Enough, till more is known.

Enter ALONSO.

ALONSO. The count is dead!

Diègue has taken vengeance by his son!

KING. Soon as the affront I learned, I feared revenge.

Would that I might have turned that fatal wrath!

ALONSO. Chimène approaches, bathed in bitter tears,
And at your feet would she for justice plead.

KING. Compassion moves my soul at her mishaps;

But the count's deed, methinks, has well deserved

This chastisement of his audacity.

And yet, however just may be his doom,
I lose with pain a warrior strong and true,
After long service rendered to our state,
His blood poured out for us a thousand times.

His pride excites my anger, but my throne
His loss enfeebles while his death be-reaves.

Enter DIÈGUE and CHIMÈNE.

CHIMÈNE. Justice, sire, justice!

DIÈGUE. Ah, sire, let me speak!

CHIMÈNE. Behold me, at your feet!

DIÈGUE. I clasp your knees!

CHIMÈNE. 'Tis justice I demand!

DIÈGUE. Hear my defense!

CHIMÈNE. Punish the insolence of this bold youth!

He has struck down your kingdom's chief support!

My father he has slain!

DIÈGUE. To avenge his own!

CHIMÈNE. A subject's blood demands his monarch's justice!

DIÈGUE. A vengeance just demands no punishment.

KING. Rise, and in calmness let us hear of this.

Chimène, my deepest sympathy is stirred;
A grief not less than yours affects my heart.

(To DIÈGUE.) You will speak after, nor disturb her plaint.

CHIMÈNE. My father, sire, is dead;
mine eyes have seen

5 Great drops of blood roll from his noble side;

That blood that oft your walls has fortified;
That blood that many times your fights has won;

10 That blood which, shed, still holds an angry heat

To be outpoured for other lives than yours.
What in war's deadliest carnage ne'er was spilled,

15 The hand of Roderick sheds upon your soil.
Breathless and pale, I reached the fatal spot;

I found him lifeless, sire — forgive my tears;

20 In this sad tale words mock my trembling lips;

My sighs will utter what I cannot speak.

KING. Take courage, child; thy king henceforth shall be 25 Thy father, in the place of him that's lost.

CHIMÈNE. Such honor, sire, I ask not in my woe;

I said I found him lifeless: open wound
And blood outpoured, and mixed with horrid dust,

Showed me my duty, drove me here in haste;

That dreadful gaping mouth speaks with my voice,

35 And must be heard by the most just of kings.

O sire, let not such license reign unchecked
Beneath your sovereign sway, before your eyes;

40 So the most noble may, without restraint,
Suffer the blows of beardless insolence,
And a young braggart triumph o'er their glory,

Bathe in their blood and mock their memory.

45 This valiant warrior, slain, if unavenged,
Will surely cool the ardor of your knights.

O sire, grant vengeance for my father's death!

50 Your throne demands it more than my poor heart.

His rank was high, his death will cost you dear;

Pay death with death, and blood with blood avenge.

A victim, not for me, but for your crown,
Your person, and Your Majesty, I beg —
A victim that will show to all the state
The madness of a deed so arrogant.

KING. What say'st, Diègue?

DiÈGUE. Worthy of envy he Who, losing life's best gift, can part with life!

For age's weakness brings to noble souls
A mournful fate before its closing scene.
I, whose proud 'scutcheon is graved o'er with deeds,

I, whom a victor laurels oft have crowned, 15
To-day, because too long with life I've stayed,

Affronted, prostrate lie and powerless.
What neither siege nor fight nor ambuscade,

Nor all your foes, nor all my envious
friends,

Nor Aragon could do, nor proud Granada,
The count, your subject, jealous of your choice, 25

Bold in the power which youth has over
age,

Has done within your court, beneath your eye.

Thus, sire, these locks, 'neath war's rough 30
harness blanched,

This blood, so gladly lavished in your
cause,

This arm, the lifelong terror of your foes,
To a dishonored grave would have de- 35
scended,

Had not my son proved worthy of his sire,
An honor to his country and his king.

He took his father's sword, he slew the count, 40

He gave me back my honor cleansed from stain.

If to show courage and resentment deep,
If to avenge a blow, claim punishment,
On me alone should fall your anger's 45
stroke.

When the arm errs, the head must bear the blame.

Whether this be a crime of which we speak,
His was the hand, but mine, sire, was the 50
will.

Chimène names him her father's mur-derer;

The deed was mine; I longed to take his place.

Spare for your throne the arm of youth and might,

5 But slay the chief whom Time o'ermasters
soon.

If an old soldier's blood will expiate
And satisfy Chimène, 'tis hers to shed;
Far from repining at such stern decree,
10 I'll glory in an honorable death.

KING. Of deep and serious import is this deed,

And in full council must be gravely met.
Lead the count's daughter home; and you,
Diègue,

Shall be held prisoner by your word of honor.

Let Roderick be brought; I must do justice.

20 CHIMÈNE. 'Tis justice, sire, a murderer should die.

KING. Allay your grief, my child, and take repose.

CHIMÈNE. When silence urges thought, then anguish grows.

(Exeunt omnes.)

ACT III

Enter RODERICK and ELVIRE.

ELVIRE. Roderick, what hast thou done? why com'st thou here?

RODERICK. I follow my sad fate's unhappy course.

ELVIRE. Whence hast thou this audacity, to come

To places filled with mourning by thy deed?

Com'st here to brave the dead count's very shade? 40

Hast thou not killed him?

RODERICK. To my shame he lived;
My father's house demanded that he die.

ELVIRE. But why seek shelter 'neath thy victim's roof?

What murderer ever sought retreat so strange?

RODERICK. I come to yield myself up to my judge.

No more look on me with astonished eye;
I seek my death in penance for a death.

My love's my judge, my judge Chimène
alone.

Sharper than death the knowledge of her hate;

That I deserve, and I have come to ask
The sentence of her lips, her hand's death blow.

ELVIRE. Nay, rather flee her sight, her passion's force,
Remove thy presence from her fresh despair.

Flee! shun the promptings of her anguish 10 new
Which will but rouse to fury every feeling.

RODERICK. This dearest object of my heart's desire Cannot too sorely chide me in her wrath;
That is a punishment I well deserve.
In seeking for a death from hand of hers
I shun a hundred others worse to face.

ELVIRE. Chimène is at the palace, 20
drowned in tears,
And will return escorted from the king.
Flee, Roderick, flee! pray add not to my cares.

What would be said if here thou shouldst 25 be seen!

Wouldst thou that slander, adding to her woe,

Charge that she hide her father's murderer?

She'll soon return! Hark! hark! she comes, she's here!

Hide thyself, then, for her sake; Roderick, hide!

(Exit RODERICK.) 35

Enter SANCHE and CHIMÈNE.

SANCHE. True, madam, blood alone pays debts like this;
Your wrath is righteous, and your tears 40 are just.

I would not try with weak and foolish words

To calm your anger or console your grief.
But if to serve you I am capable,

My sword is at your service to command;
My love is yours to avenge your father's death;

If you I serve, my arm will outmatch his.

CHIMÈNE. O wretched that I am!

SANCHE. Accept my sword!

CHIMÈNE. It would offend the king, who pledges justice.

SANCHE. The march of Justice often is so slow

That crime escapes the tardy loiterer.

Her oft uncertain course costs tears and pain! 5

Suffer a knight to avenge you with his sword;

The way is sure, the punishment is swift.

CHIMÈNE. It is the last resort. If come it must,

And still my sorrows move your soul to pity,

You shall be free to avenge my injury.

SANCHE. To that one happiness my soul aspires, 15

And hoping this, I leave you, well content.
(Exit SANCHE.)

CHIMÈNE. At last, in freedom from a forced restraint,

I can pour out to thee my poignant woe,
Can give an utterance to my mournful sighs,

And let my soul tell all its many griefs.

My father's dead, Elvire; the maiden thrust

Of Roderick's sword has cut his life-thread short.

Weep, weep, my eyes, dissolve yourselves in tears;

30 One half my heart the other half entombs;
And for this mortal stroke, my heart that loves

Must vengeance take for that which is no more.

ELVIRE. Rest, madam, rest.

CHIMÈNE. Nay, mock me not with words!

In misery like mine to speak of rest!

Whence-ever shall my agony be soothed

Unless I hate the hand that caused my grief?

What respite can I hope from torment aye,
When love and hate both seek the criminal?

45 ELVIRE. You still can love the one who killed your father?

CHIMÈNE. Love is a word too weak for what I feel;

I do adore him, spite of my resentment;

50 My lover and my enemy are one.

Still, notwithstanding all my hatred fierce,

Against my father Roderick contends;

My filial love resists his sweet assault,

And struggles, feeble now, and now triumphant.

In this rude war of anger and of love;
My heart is rent, but stronger grows my soul;

I feel Love's power, but duty's deeper claims

Forbid that I should change or hesitate;
I balance not, nor swerve, when honor leads.

To me is Roderick dear; I weep his fate;
My heart pleads in his favor, yet, alas!
I am my father's daughter; he is dead.

ELVIRE. Shall you pursue it further?

CHIMÈNE. Cruel thought!

And cruel path which I am forced to tread!
I seek his life, yet fear my end to gain;
My death will follow his, yet he must die.

ELVIRE. Nay, madam, quit so terrible a task,

Nor on yourself impose a law so stern.

CHIMÈNE. My father dead — nay, snatched from my embrace!

Shall his dear blood unheard for vengeance cry?

Shall my weak heart, snared by seducing spells,

With woman's tears alone pay honor's debt?

Shall guileful love betray my filial duty,
And in a shameful silence still its voice?

ELVIRE. Believe me, madam, there is much excuse

For cooler counsels toward a loving heart,
Against a lover dear. You've made appeal

Unto the king himself; press not too far
Persistence in this purpose strange and sad.

CHIMÈNE. My word is pledged to vengeance; it must fall.

Love would beguile us with sweet subtleties;

To noble souls excuses shameful seem.

ELVIRE. If you love Roderick, he can not offend you.

CHIMÈNE. 'Tis true!

ELVIRE. Then, after all, what will you do?

CHIMÈNE. I will avenge my father, end my woe;

I'll follow him, destroy him, then I'll — die!

Enter RODERICK.

RODERICK. Nay, madam, you shall find an easier way;

5 My life is in your hand; your honor's sure.

CHIMÈNE. Elvire, where are we? Who is this I see?

Is Roderick in my house? — before my eyes?

10 RODERICK. I offer you my life; taste, when you will,

The sweetness of my death and your revenge.

CHIMÈNE. Oh, woe!

15 RODERICK. Pray, hear me!

CHIMÈNE. Nay, I die!

RODERICK. A moment!

CHIMÈNE. Go; let me die!

RODERICK. I would but speak a word.

20 You shall reply with sword-thrust at my heart.

CHIMÈNE. What! with a blade stained with my father's blood?

RODERICK. Chimène!

25 CHIMÈNE. Remove that object from mine eyes!

Its sight recalls thy crime and sues for death!

RODERICK. Nay, gaze upon it; 'twill excite still more

Thy hatred and thy wrath; 'twill haste my doom.

CHIMÈNE. 'Tis tinged with my own blood.

RODERICK. Plunge it in mine!

Wash in my veins what it has brought from thine.

CHIMÈNE. Oh, cruel steel, which in one awful day

A father's and a daughter's life can take. I cannot live and see it! Take it hence!

Thou did'st me hear, and yet thou strik'st me dead!

RODERICK. I do thy will, but cherish still the wish

Of ending by thy hand my wretched life. Not even love of thee works in my soul

Craven repentance for a righteous deed.

The fatal end of wrath too swift and hot Brought shame upon my father's honored head.

The insult of a blow what heart can bear?

The affront was mine, I sought its author swift,

And swift avenged the honor of my sire.

Were it again to do, again 'twere done!

But even 'gainst the inevitable deed,

My love long struggled for supremacy.

Judge how it ruled my heart, when I could pause,

In such an hour of rage, and hesitate

Between my house, my father, and — my love,

Compelled to wound thy heart or stand disgraced.

Myself I did accuse of haste undue,

Of passions too alive to feel affront.

Thy beauty might have turned the balance
still,

But for the thought that pressed itself at last —

A man disgraced had naught to offer thee, 20
And vainly would thy heart's voice plead
for me,

If nobleness were sunk in infamy.

To yield to love, to hearken to its cry,

Proved me unworthy of thy tenderness. 25

With sighs I tell thee o'er and o'er again,

And with my latest breath I still would say,

With cruel hand I've hurt thee, but naught else

Could blot my shame and leave me worthy
thee.

Now, honor and my father satisfied,

To thee I come, to pay my final debt;

To offer thee my life, I seek thee here.

That duty done, this only rests to do.

Thou need'st not tell me that thy father slain

Arms thee against me — see, thy victim
here!

Shrink not from offering up the blood of
him

Who shed thy father's nor can mourn the deed.

CHIMÈNE. Ah! Roderick, strangely 45
does my changeful heart

Defend thee who hast saved thy father's fame.

If my distracted mind has cruel seemed,

'Tis not with blame for thee, but in de- 50
spair.

The ardor of a high, unbroken spirit

That cannot brook an insult, well I know.

It was thy duty taught thee, but, alas!

In doing thine, thou teachest me mine
own.

The very terror of thy deed compels;

5 For, as thy father's name thou hast restored,

Mine also calls upon his child for vengeance.

But, oh! my love for thee drives me to madness!

My father's loss by other hand had left
The solace of thy presence and thy love,

A consolation sweet in misery.

I still had felt in grief thy sympathy,

15 And loved the hand that wiped my tears
away.

But now, in losing him thee too I lose;

This victory o'er my love his fame demands,

20 And duty, with the face of an assassin,
Drives me to work thy ruin and mine own.

For in my heart no more than in thine
own

Must courage yield to luring dreams of love.

My strength must equal thine. In thine offense

Thou hast but proved thy worth. By thine own death

30 Alone can I be worthy of thy love.

RODERICK. Defer no longer what thy cause demands.

It claims my head; I offer it to thee;

Make me the victim of thy just revenge.

35 I welcome the decree; I hail the stroke;

The tedious course of Justice to await

Retards thy glory, as my punishment.

'Tis welcome fate to die by thy dear hand.

CHIMÈNE. No, not thine executioner am I; 40

'Tis not for me to take thine offered life;

'Tis thine to make defense 'gainst my attack.

Some other hand than mine must work my
will;

Challenge I must, but punish never, never!

RODERICK. However love constrains thee for my sake,

Thy spirit must be equal to mine own,

Thyself hast said; then wouldst thou borrow arms

To avenge a father's death? Nay, my Chimène,

The soul of vengeance fails. No hand but mine
 Could slay thy father; thine must punish me.

CHIMÈNE. O cruelty, to stand upon this point!
 Thou didst not need my aid, I need not thine!

I follow thine example, and my spirit
 Will never share with thee my glory's task.
 My father's fame and I shall nothing owe
 To love of thine, or to thy late despair.

RODERICK. 'Tis thou that standest on a point of honor.
 Shall I ne'er win this mercy at thy hand?
 In thy dead father's name, for our love's sake,

In vengeance or in pity, slay me here!
 Thy wretched lover keener pain will know
 To live and feel thy hate than meet thy blow.

CHIMÈNE. Leave me, I hate thee not.

RODERICK. 'Tis my desert.

CHIMÈNE. I cannot.

RODERICK. When my deed is fully known,
 And men can say that still thy passion burns,

Dost thou not fear the cruel, stinging words
 Of censure and of malice? Silence them;
 Save thine own fame by sending me to death.

CHIMÈNE. My fame will shine the brighter for thy life,
 The voice of blackest slander will lift up
 My honor to the heavens, and mourn my griefs,

Knowing I love thee and yet seek thy life.
 Go, vex no longer my poor, troubled soul
 By sight of what I love and what I lose.
 Hide thy departure in the shade of night;
 For calumny may touch me, art thou seen;

The sole occasion for a slanderous word
 Is, that I suffer thee within my house.
 See that thou guard my virtue, and withdraw.

RODERICK. Oh, let me die!

CHIMÈNE. Depart.

RODERICK. What wilt thou do?

CHIMÈNE. The fires of wrath burn with the flames of love.

My father's death demands my utmost zeal;

'Tis duty drives me with its cruel goad,
 And my dear wish is — nothing to achieve.

RODERICK. O miracle of love!

CHIMÈNE. O weight of woe!

RODERICK. We pay our filial debt in suffering!

CHIMÈNE. Roderick, who would have thought —

RODERICK. Or could have dreamed —

CHIMÈNE. That joy so near so soon our grasp would miss?

RODERICK. Or storm so swift, already close to port,
 Should shatter the dear bark of all our hope?

CHIMÈNE. Oh, mortal griefs!

RODERICK. Regrets that count for naught!

CHIMÈNE. Pray, leave me now; I cannot longer hear.

RODERICK. Adieu! I go to drag a dying life,

Till it is ended at thine own command.

CHIMÈNE. If my dire fate e'er bring that hour to me,
 Thy breath and mine together will depart.
 Adieu! and let no eye have sight of thee.

(Exit RODERICK.)

ELVIRE. Madam, whatever ills kind Heaven may send —

CHIMÈNE. Trouble me not; pray, leave me with my grief.

35 I long for night's dark silence, and for tears.

(Exeunt ELVIRE and CHIMÈNE.)

Enter DIÈGUE.

DIÈGUE. Never a perfect happiness is ours;

Our best achievements have their bitter drop;

In each event, whate'er its promise be,
 45 Care troubles still the currents of our peace.

In my rejoicing o'er my honor saved,
 An anxious fear now seizes on my soul.
 The count whose hand affronted me is dead,

50 But now I seek in vain my avenger's face.
 Hither and yon I strive, with labor vain,
 To roam the city, broken as I am;

The remnant of my strength which age has left

Consumes itself in fruitless hours of search.
Each moment, in each place, I hear his voice,

I see his form — a shadow of the night.
I would embrace him — lo, he is not there! —

Till love, deceived, suspicious grows and fearful.

No marks of hasty flight do I discern,
And that strong troop of friends who served the count

Affrights me and suggests a thousand ills.
If Roderick lives, he breathes a dungeon's 15
air. —

Just Heaven! do I deceive myself again?
Or do I see at last my hope, my son?

'Tis he! I doubt no more; my vows are heard,

My fears dispelled, my anxious longings o'er.

Enter RODERICK.

DIÈGUE. At last, my Roderick, Heaven 25 restores thee mine.

RODERICK. Alas!

DIÈGUE. Mar not my new delight with sighs.

Let me find words to praise thee as I 30 would;

My valor sees in thee no cause to blush,
But marks a kindred spirit; live, O thee
The heroes of thy race, bold and renowned.

Thine ancestors are they, my son thou art. 35
Thine earliest sword-thrust equals all of mine;

Thine untaught youth, inspired by ardor great,

By this one effort touches my renown. 40
Prop of my age, and crown of all my fortune,

On these white hairs lay thy redeeming hand;

Come, kiss this cheek where still thou canst 45 behold

The mark of that affront thou hast avenged.

RODERICK. The honor is your due; I could no less,

Your blood in mine, your care my school of arms.

Most happy am I that my maiden blow

Did not disgrace the author of my life.

But in your satisfaction do not shun

To grant me, also, what my soul demands.
Your words too long have silenced my de-

5 spair,
Which bursts anew with every painful thought.

No mean regret for serving thee I feel;
But canst thou render back the price it 10 cost?

My arm, for thee, I've raised against my love,

And with the stroke I cast away my all!
No more, no more; I owed you life it- self;

That which I owed I've paid; your cause is won.

DIÈGUE. Nay, glory in the fruit of vic- tory;

20 I gave thee life, life's joy I owe to thee.

By all that honor means to men like me,
Far more than life I owe thee in return.

But spurn this weakness from thy warlike breast;

Love is a pleasure summoned when thou wilt;

Thy soul's one rightful master is thine honor.

RODERICK. What's this you teach me?

DIÈGUE. That which thou shouldst know.

RODERICK. My outraged honor turns upon myself,

And now thou dar'st to counsel teach- ery —

Treason to her I love! Baseness is one,
Whether in craven knight or lover false.

Wrong not with breath of doubt my faith- fulness;

40 To thee, to her, I would be wholly true.

Bonds such as mine cannot be broken thus;

A promise lives, though hope be dead for aye.

I cannot leave, nor can I win, Chimène;
In death I find my solace and my pain.

DIÈGUE. This is no time for thee to prate of death.

Thy country and thy prince demand thine arm. 50

The fleet, whose coming has aroused our fears,

Plots to surprise and pillage all our towns.

The Moors invade, the night's advancing tide

All silently may float them to our walls.
The court is shaken, and the people tremble;

Terror and tears are seen on every side;
'Tis my good fortune, in this hour of need,
To find five hundred followers, ready
armed

To avenge my quarrel, knowing my af- 10
front.

Their zeal thou hast prevented; now their hands

They shall dip deep in blood of Moorish chiefs.

Go, lead their line; assume thy rightful place.

This valiant band calls thee to be their head;

Front the assault of these old enemies; 20
If die thou wilt, seek there a noble death
In service of thy king and war's emprise.

Let the king owe his safety to thy loss.

Nay, but return, far rather, crowned with 25
bays,

Thy fame not narrowed to a vengeful
deed,

But broadened to a kingdom's strong defense.

Win silence from Chimène, grace from the king.

And if thou still wouldst gain her maiden
heart,

Know that to conquering hero it will 35 yield.

I waste thy time in words. Come, follow
me;

Forth to the fight, and let thy sovereign
see

What in the count he's lost he's gained in
thee.

(Exeunt DIÈGUE and RODERICK.)

ACT IV

Enter CHIMÈNE and ELVIRE.

CHIMÈNE. Is this no false report? — art sure, Elvire?

ELVIRE. Should I repeat how all do 50
sound his praise,

And bear to heaven the fame of his exploits,

And wonder at his youth, you'd scarce believe.

The Moors before him met a quick disgrace;

5 The attack was swift, but swifter still the flight.

After three hours of combat we had won
Two captive kings and victory secure;
Naught could resist the young chief's onset fierce.

CHIMÈNE. And Roderick's arm this miracle has wrought?

ELVIRE. Of his great prowess are two kings the prize,

15 Conquered and captured by his hand alone.

CHIMÈNE. How knowest thou the truth of this strange news?

ELVIRE. The people do extol him to the skies —

20 Call him their liberator and their angel,
The author and the guardian of their peace.

CHIMÈNE. The king, what thinks he of these mighty deeds?

ELVIRE. Not yet has Roderick braved the royal eye;

But the two captive kings, in fetters
bound,

Still wearing crowns, Diègue with joy
presents, 30

Entreating of the king, as recompense,
That he will see the conqueror and forgive.

CHIMÈNE. Is Roderick wounded?

ELVIRE. I've heard naught of it.

35 You lose your color! pray take heart again.

CHIMÈNE. I'll take again my weak heart's failing wrath!

Must I forget myself in thought of him!
Shall my lips join in praises of his deeds!

40 While honor's mute, and duty, dull, consents?

Be still, my love, and let my anger swell!
What are two conquered kings? My father's slain!

45 This mourning garb, which speaks of my distress,

Is the first token of his wondrous might!
Others may call his deeds magnanimous;
Here, every object testifies his crime.

May all this somber pomp which wraps me round —

This sweeping veil, these heavy depths of crape —

Add force to my resentment, fail it ever;
Nor let my love my honor overcome.

Should fond, alluring passion e'er prevail,
Recall my duty to my wavering mind,
And bid me fearless meet this hero proud.

ELVIRE. Calm yourself now; the Infanta is approaching.

Enter the INFANTA and LEONORA.

INFANTA. I come not vainly to console thy grief;

Rather my tears to mingle with thine own.

CHIMÈNE. Ah, madam, thou canst share the common joy;

'Tis thine to taste this Heaven-sent happiness;

The right to weep is mine, and mine alone.
The peril Roderick's wisdom could avert,
The public safety by his valor won,
Permit to me alone, to-day, a tear.

The city he has saved, the king has served —

His valorous arm brings woe to me alone.

INFANTA. 'Tis true, Chimène, he has great marvels wrought.

CHIMÈNE. This grievous news already reaches me;

On every side I hear him loud proclaimed
Noble in war, unfortunate in love.

INFANTA. Why shouldst thou suffer in this generous praise?

But now this youthful Mars delighted
thee;

He dwelt within thy heart, he owned thy sway;

To tell his praises is to sound thine own.

CHIMÈNE. Others may boast his deeds;
'tis not for me;

His praises are but torture to my soul;
My anguish deepens with his rising fame;
My loss is greater as he greater grows.
Ah, cruel torture of a heart that loves!
My passion burns the brighter with his worth,

While duty, stern defender of my course,
Would follow him to death in love's despite.

INFANTA. But yesterday thy duty's proud demands

Won from the court an admiration high,
So worthy of thy filial love it seemed;
Thy victory o'er thy passion was sublime;

But now — wilt have a faithful friend's advice?

CHIMÈNE. Not to hear you would show me base indeed.

INFANTA. To-day thy duty wears a different face;

The chief support of a whole nation's life,
A people's love and hope, is Roderick now.
On him the Moors with hopeless terror
gaze,

Securely leans on him our loved Castile.

The king himself can never now deny

Thy father's spirit moving in the youth;
Thou seek'st the public ruin in his death.

Thy country was thy father's country first,

And ne'er canst thou to hostile hands betray it.

Wilt thou pursue thy vengeance though its blow

Enwrap the kingdom in a fatal woe?

I plead not for thy lover; let thy heart

Cling to its filial ties; send him away,

And think no more of wedlock, but for us,

Thy country and thy king, preserve his
life.

CHIMÈNE. The gift of mercy is not mine to grant;

I cannot check the duty driving me;

Though in my heart the voice of love may plead,

Though prince and people praise him and adore,

Though all heroic souls encircle him —

My cypress-boughs his laurels shall o'er-spread.

INFANTA. 'Tis noble not to falter, my Chimène,

Though to avenge a father stabs our heart;
But 'tis a higher nobleness to place

The public good above all private wrong.

Believe me, to exclude him from thy soul

Will be the bitterest pang thou canst bestow.

Yield to the act thy country's weal demands,

Nor doubt thy king's most willing leniency.

CHIMÈNE. Whether he hear, I still must plead for justice.

INFANTA. Consider well what course you now will take.

Adieu! let solitude thy counsel aid.

CHIMÈNE. My father dead! — what choice remains for me?

(Exeunt omnes.)

Enter the KING, DIÈGUE, ARIAS, RODERICK, and SANCHE.

KING. Bold heir of an illustrious ancestry,

Ever the hope and glory of Castile,
Son of a race of valor unexcelled,
Whose best exploits thine own already rank,

For due reward my power is all too weak —
What thou hast earned thy king can never pay.

Our land set free from barbarous enemy,
My scepter in my hand, by thine secured.
The Moors despatched before the call to arms

Had fully warned the people of attack —
Deeds such as these a king must ever find
Beyond the hope of suitable reward.

But thy two royal captives, they, in sooth,
In my own presence recognize thy might.
Their CID they name thee, sovereign, lord,
and head.

I well might envy thee this title proud,
The highest in their land; but, no, I call
On all to know that thou the CID shalt be.

The CID henceforth art thou. To that great name

May every foe succumb! — Granada yield.
Toledo tremble, but on hearing it.

To all my subjects ever shall it show
How great the debt to thee we proudly owe.

RODERICK. Nay, sire, your words too highly speak my praise,
And make me flush with shame before a king

Whose generous honor is so undeserved.
The blood within these veins, the air I breathe —

All, all, to this great empire do I owe.
Had these been lost, and death alone been won,

A subject's duty only had I done.

KING. E'en duty done is not the whole of service;

Its glory is a courage quick and high,
Which, reckoning not with danger or defeat,

Pushes its way to triumph and renown.

Suffer thy praises from a grateful sovereign,

And now relate the story of thy deeds.

RODERICK. That in this sudden stress of peril, sire,

A troop of followers of my father's house
Urged me to be their leader, well you know.
My troubled soul was painfully perplexed —

I dared not lead the band without thy word,

But to approach thee was a fatal step.

Pardon the rashness, sire, that dared to act!

I chose to lose my head in serving thee,
Rather than while my followers stood in arms.

KING. The state defended is thy full defense,

And thy too heated vengeance I excuse.

Chimène, hereafter, has a cause forlorn;
I hear her but to comfort her; say on.

RODERICK. I take the lead, and, with defiant front,

The little column slowly makes advance;
Five hundred at the starting, but ere long
Three thousand was our number, strong and bold.

The frightened gathered courage at the sight.

A certain part I hurriedly conceal
In vessels lying at the river's mouth;
The rest whose numbers every hour increased,

Impatient for the fray, with me remain.

Close to the ground they crouched, and, still as death,

They passed the night, nor slept, nor scarcely breathed.

At my command, pretended, sire, from you,

The guard itself conceals, and aids my plot.
Just as the flow of tide comes rolling in,

By starlight pale, lo! thirty Moorish sails,
Mounting the wave, sweep to the harbor's mouth.

They enter; all seems tranquil; not a guard,

No soldiers on the quay, none on the walls.

Our ambush is complete, and fearlessly,
Not doubting their attack a full surprise,
They anchor, and debark; suspecting naught,

They rush into the embraces of their foes.
We spring from every hiding-place, and loud

A thousand cries of battle rise to heaven.
Then from the ships pour forth our armed men;

But half have sprung to land when, terror-
struck,

They see the fight is lost ere 'tis begun.

They came for pillage; they encounter 10 war.

We press them on the water, on the land;
Their blood, in rivers, flows upon our soil,
While dire disorder hinders all resistance.
But soon their leaders rally them with 15
shouts,

Their panic is dispelled, their ranks are formed,

Their terrors are forgotten in their fury.

To die without a struggle were a shame,
And bravely with their sabers they oppose.
On sea, on land, on fleet, within the port,
All was a field of carnage, death its lord.
Their blood and ours in horrid mixture ran.

Brave deeds were wrought which never will be known;

The darkness was a veil, 'neath which each man

Fought as it were alone; nor any knew 30
How victory inclined. I praised my men, Placed reinforcements here, changed orders there,

Nor knew till dawn which side was conqueror.

But day made clear our gain and their defeat.

Their courage fails them, with the fear of death;

And when they see approach a fresh com- 40
mand,

They seek their ships, cut cables, and their cries

Of terror and of anguish fill the air.

They wait not to discover if their kings 45
Are dead or wounded: in a tumult wild,
On the ebb-tide which bore them in at flood,

They take their desperate flight and quit
our shores.

The kings and others, left without retreat
Or hope of succor, make a valiant stand;
They sell their lives at cost of life in turn,

And fight till nearly every man is dead.

I urge surrender, but they listen not,
Till the last follower falls, when yield they must.

5 Then the two kings demand to see the chief;

I tell them who I am, they seek my grace;
I send them straightway to Your Majesty.
So the fight ended, lacking combatants.

'Twas in this manner, sire, that for your cause —

Enter ALONSO.

ALONSO. Chimène approaches, sire, to sue for justice.

KING. 'Tis sorry news! a duty most untimely!

Go, for I would not force thee on her
sight;

20 For sign of gratitude, I send thee hence;
But first receive thy monarch's kind embrace. (Embraces him.)

(Exit RODERICK.)

DIÈGUE. Chimène would save him from her own pursuit.

KING. 'Tis said she loves him still;
I'll test her heart;

Assume a mournful air —

Enter CHIMÈNE and ELVIRE.

KING. Chimène, your wishes with success are crowned;

Our foes have fallen beneath Roderick's hand.

35 Give thanks to Heaven, which hath avenged you thus.

(Aside to DIÈGUE.) Mark how her color changes at my words.

DIÈGUE. But see, she swoons, a token,
sire, most sure,

Of perfect love; this grief the secret tells
Which rules her soul. No longer can you doubt

Her passion's flame still burns with glow unquenched.

CHIMÈNE. Tell me, is Roderick dead?

KING. Nay, nay, he lives,
And still his love unchanged for thee remains.

50 Forget the anxious grief that mourns for
him.

CHIMÈNE. O sire, one swoons from joy
as well as grief;

The soul surprised with happiness grows weak;
Too sudden gladness every sense o'erwhelms.

KING. Thou canst not so deceive my watchful eye;
Thy grief, Chimène, too manifest appeared.

CHIMÈNE. Add, then, this deeper pain to my distress;
My swoon but told my disappointment sore;
My righteous wrath has brought me down to this.
His death would snatch him from my just revenge.

From wounds received in battle should he die,
What place remains for my unyielding will!

An end so honorable mocks my aim.
I wish him dead, but not with honor's stroke,
Not in a blaze of glory should he pass,
But on a scaffold, shrouded in disgrace.
Grant him a murderer's, not a patriot's death.

To die for country is a noble fate;
Not that for him, but with a blemished name,
A tarnished 'scutcheon, should his breath depart.

His victory gives me pleasure unalloyed —
The state gains stableness, and I, I gain
A victim worthier still my father's house.
No longer a rash youth, whose violence
Condemns itself; but great, chief among chiefs,

A warrior crowned with laurels, one whose fall
Would vindicate my purpose. But, alas!
My hopes beyond my reason bear me on.
What force is in my tears, which men despise?

The freedom of your empire is his own;
Under your power, he works his wicked will.

He from my feebleness has naught to fear,
O'er me, as o'er his enemies, he triumphs.
To stifle Justice in his victory
Makes a new trophy for this conqueror.
I serve his pomp when, trampling on the law,

He, with his captives, hears me speak his praise,
And from his car of triumph bids me follow.

KING. My child, your words are all too violent;
The scales of justice must not swerve a hair.

Thy father was the aggressor; that thou know'st.

Justice must see that mercy has a claim.
Nay, be not swift to oppose thy monarch's plea;

Consult thy heart; there still thy Roderick lives.

Thy love, though hidden, is a mighty thing,

And will approve this favor from thy king.

CHIMÈNE. Favor to him a cause of thanks from me!

The author of my woes, my bitter foe!
Is anger o'er a father slain, and wrath
For the assassin, such a trifling thing
That I, forsooth, must grateful be to him
Who thinks to aid my cause by mocking it?

Since tears call forth no justice from my king,

Redress by arms I now, sire, will demand.

By arms alone my happiness was wrecked,
By arms alone my vengeance should be wrought.

Of all you cavaliers I ask his head;
To him who brings it, I will give my hand.
Confirm the combat, sire, by your decree;
I wed the man who conquers Roderick.

KING. That ancient custom I would not restore.

The state was oft enfeebled 'neath its rule.
Under the false pretence of righting wrong,
The noblest oft would fall, the base escape.

A life whose import deepens to our state
Shall not be left to Fate's capricious whim;
From that ordeal of arms is Roderick free.
Whatever crime his hasty wrath has wrought

The flying Moors have borne with them afar.

DIÈGUE. What, sire, for him alone reverse the laws

Your court so oft has honored by observance?

What will your people think, or envy say,
 If 'neath your arm, a coward, he retreat,
 Nor make redress upon the field of honor,
 Where men of spirit seek a worthy death?
 Such favors would but tarnish his renown.
 Nay, let him drain unto the sweetest drops
 The draught of triumph. Bravely he front
 The bragging count; he will be brave
 again.

KING. Since you demand it, let it be;
 but know

A thousand warriors will replace the slain
 By Roderick conquered; for the offered prize

Will make an eager foe of every knight.
 To oppose them all would be a grievous wrong;

Once only shall he enter in the lists.

Choose whom thou wilt, Chimène, but choose with care;

No more reproaches will thy sovereign
 bear.

DIÈGUE. Let none be overlooked — not those who most

Do tremble at the prowess of his arm.
 The deeds of valor wrought by him to-day
 Will fright the boldest. Who would dare confront

A warrior so audacious and so keen?

SANCHO. Declare an open field! I enter it.

Rash though I be, I dare confront this knight.

Madam, this favor grant to my devotion;
 Your word's fulfillment shall I surely claim.

KING. Chimène, do you accept this champion?

CHIMÈNE. It is a promise, sire.

KING. To-morrow, then.

DIÈGUE. Nay, sire, why should there longer be delay?

The brave are ever ready. Now's the time.

KING. He scarce has quit his battle with the Moors.

DIÈGUE. While in your presence he took breathing space.

KING. An hour or two of respite I impose.

And lest this combat seem to speak my will —

To show the deep reluctance that I feel
 In suffering this bloody pass at arms —
 I and my court will straight withdraw us
 hence.

5 (To ARIAS.) You shall be judge between these combatants;

See that the laws of honor govern them.

The combat ended, lead to me the victor.

Whoe'er he be, the prize is still the same.

10 With mine own hand Chimène I would present,

And for his guerdon she her faith shall plight.

CHIMÈNE. What, sire, impose on me a law so stern?

15 KING. Thou murmurest, but thy changeful, loving heart,

If Roderick wins, will gladly take his part.

Cease to complain of such a mild decree;

20 The victor shall thy husband surely be.

(Exeunt omnes.)

ACT V

Enter RODERICK, and CHIMÈNE.

CHIMÈNE. What, Roderick! whence this boldness — to my face?

Go! — this will cost my honor. Leave me,
 pray.

30 RODERICK. Madam, to death I go, but ere I die,

To offer you a last farewell I come.

The love that keeps me vassal to your
 laws

35 Even in death demands my homage still.

CHIMÈNE. And wilt thou die?

RODERICK. I count the moment blest
 That satisfies your hatred with my life.

CHIMÈNE. But wilt thou die? Sancho is not the one

To terrify that dauntless soul of thine!

What renders thee so weak, or him so strong?

45 Before the combat, Roderick talks of death!

He who nor feared my father nor the Moors

Is going to fight one Sancho, and despairs!

Does courage thus desert thee, valorous
 knight?

RODERICK. I haste to punishment, and not to combat.

Since you desire my death, what wish have I
 To keep my life? My courage fails me not;
 But my indifferent arm will not preserve
 What thou dost find displeasing. Not a blow
 Could I have struck against the fiery Moors
 For wrong of mine alone; 'twas for my king,
 His people, and his kingdom, that I fought.
 To poorly guard myself were treachery.
 Life is not yet so hateful to my heart
 That basely I can sacrifice its claims.
 The question now is different. I alone
 Am in the balance. You demand my death;
 Your sentence I accept, although the hand
 You let inflict it should have been your own.
 He who shall wield your weapon in your stead
 Shall meet no sword-thrust answering to his steel.
 I cannot strike the man that fights for you;
 I joy to think his blow is from your hand.
 Since 'tis your honor that his arms maintain,
 Unguarded shall I offer every point,
 Seeing in his your hand which slays me thus.
 CHIMÈNE. Let no blind folly lead thee to forget
 That glory ends with life. Though my just wrath
 Impels me to a course which I abhor,
 And forces me to follow thee to death —
 E'en though a sense of honor would demand
 A nerveless arm, an undefended blow —
 Remember, all the splendor of thy deeds
 Will change to shame when death has conquered thee.
 Who will believe thou didst not raise thy hand?
 Though I am dear, honor is dearer still,
 Else I had still my father, and the hope
 That fatal blow has cost thee would remain —
 The hope of calling me thine own Chimène.
 Thou canst not hold so cheap thy high renown
 To weakly, unresisting yield it up.
 What strange inconstancy can valor show!
 Thou shouldst have more or else thou shouldst have less!
 Is it to grieve me only thou art bold,
 And courage fails when courage I demand?
 Wilt thou my father's might so disallow
 That, conquering him, thou'lt to a weaker yield?
 Go, do not will to die, o'ercome my will;
 If life no longer charms thee, honor pleads.
 15 RODERICK. The count is dead, the Moors defeated fly —
 Still other claims to glory need I prove?
 Henceforth, my fame can scorn all self-defense.
 20 None would believe this heart of mine could quail.
 What can I not accomplish? Who will doubt
 That, honor gone, naught dear to me remains?
 No, doubt it if you will, this fatal fight
 Increases not nor lessens my renown.
 None e'er will dare my courage to impugn,
 Nor deem that I did meet my conquerer.
 "He loved Chimène" — 'tis thus the court will say —
 "He would not live and her resentment face.
 35 To the stern hand of Fate that followed him —
 Her vengeful hand — he yielded up his breath.
 She sought his life; to his great soul it seemed
 'Twould be ignoble did he care to live.
 He lost his love to save his father's name;
 He loses life for his dear mistress' sake.
 Whate'er of hope his heart had cherished still,
 Honor for love, and love for life, he chose."
 'Twill not obscure my glory thus to die,
 But brighter will its growing splendor shine.
 50 My willing death this honor high will win,
 No life but mine for thee redress could make.

'Tis a caprice of temper you indulge,
Which of your promised lord makes you unfit.

The wrath of Heaven will snatch him from
your arms,

And leave you as young Sancho's rightful bride.

CHIMÈNE. Elvire, the conflicts which my soul endures

Pray deepen not by prophecy malign.
Would Heaven ordain I might escape them
both;

If not, for Roderick all my vows ascend.
Not that my foolish love inclines me
thus,

But Sancho's prize I cannot, cannot be!
That fear o'ermasters every wish besides.
What is't I see? Undone! — I am undone!

Enter SANCHO.

SANCHO. 'Tis mine this sword to offer
at your feet.

CHIMÈNE. What! dripping still with Roderick's life-blood pure?
Perfidious wretch! how dar'st thou show thyself

To me, of my dear love by thee bereft?
Burst forth, my love! no longer need'st thou fear!

My father's death restrains thee never-
more;

By one fell blow my honor is assured,
My love set free, my soul plunged in despair.

SANCHO. With calmer mind —

CHIMÈNE. Thou speak'st to me again!
Assassin of a hero I adore!
Away! thou wast a traitor! Well I know That valiant knight by thee was never slain

In open combat. Nothing hope from me.

My champion thou! — my death thou'lt surely be!

SANCHO. What strange illusion! Hear me, I entreat!

CHIMÈNE. Think'st thou I'll listen to thy bragging tale —

With patience bear thine insolence which paints

His fall, my crime, and, chiefest still, thy valor?

Enter the KING, DIÈGUE, ARIAS, and ALONSO.

CHIMÈNE. Ah, sire, no more need I dissimulate

What vainly I have struggled to conceal.
I loved; 'twas known to you; but for my father

I could devote to death so dear a head.

Love, sire, to duty's desperate cause I gave.
Now Roderick is dead, my heart is changed
From foe relentless to afflicted lover.

To him who gave me life was vengeance
due;

But now my tears can fall for him I love.
Young Sancho in defending me destroys,
And of his murderous arm I am the prize.
In pity, sire, if pity move a king,
Revoke a law so terrible to me!

As recompense for victory, whose end
To me is loss of all on earth I love,
All that I have is his; myself, I pray,
May to a holy cloister now retire,
Where death shall find me weeping life
away.

DIÈGUE. No longer, sire, it seems to her a shame

To openly avow her heart's desire.

KING. Be undeceived, Chimène: thy Roderick lives!

The champion has, though vanquished, told thee false.

SANCHO. 'Twas her too hasty thought deceived herself.

To tell the issue of the fight I came —
How the brave warrior who her heart en-
chains,

After disarming me, thus nobly spoke:

"Fear naught! I'd leave the combat all in doubt,

Rather than pierce a heart that loves
Chimène.

My duty summons me at once to court.

Do thou convey to her the final chance,
And lay thy sword, her trophy, at her feet."

This had I done, but seeing me return, Bearing my sword, she deemed me conqueror.

Then love and anger, mingled suddenly,
Betrayed her into transports uncontrolled,
Nor could I gain a hearing for my tale.
Vanquished in combat, still I am content,

And gratefully accept my own defeat;
For though I love and lose my love, 'tis
sweet

This perfect love of theirs to consummate.

KING. My child, no flush of shame should mount thy cheek.

No longer seek to disavow thy flame.

Thy faithful love unmeasured praise shall
win,

Thy honor's safe, thy filial duty done.

Thy father is avenged; to do thy will

Thy Roderick's life thou hast in peril set.

'Twas Heaven ordained to save him for thine own;

Thou hast not shunned thy part; take thy reward;

Be not rebellious toward my wise decree,

Thy lover in thy loving arms enfold.

Enter RODERICK, INFANTA, and LEONORA.

INFANTA. No longer weep, Chimène.

With joy receive

This noble conqueror from thy princess'
hand.

RODERICK. I crave indulgence, sire, 25 that love's high claim

Impels me, in thy presence, to her feet. —
To ask no promised prize, Chimène, I come,

But once again my life to offer thee.

My love cannot for thee obey alone

The code of honor or a sovereign's will.

If still your father's death seem unavenged,
But speak your wish; you shall be satisfied.

A thousand rivals I will yet o'ercome,
To utmost bounds of earth I'll fight my way.

Alone I'll force a camp, an army rout,
The fame of demigods I'll cast in shade; 40
Whate'er the deeds my crime to expiate,
All things will I attempt and all achieve.

But if the voice of honor unappeased
Still clamors for the guilty slayer's death,
Arm not against me warrior such as I.
My head is at your feet: strike now the
blow!

You only can o'ercome the invincible;
No other hand than yours can vengeance take.

One thing I pray: let death end punishment;

From your dear memory ne'er banish me.

Your honor is exalted in my death;

As recompense let my remembrance live.

Say sometimes, thinking of my love for
you,

5 "He died, because he ne'er could be untrue."

CHIMÈNE. Nay, Roderick, rise. — Ah, sire, no more I hide

The feelings which have burst their long control.

His virtues high compel my heart to love.

A king commands; obedience is his due;

Yet, though my fate is sealed by sentence
stern,

Can you with eye approving give consent?

If duty drive me on to do your will,

Can justice the unnatural act confirm?

For Roderick's service to his monarch's
cause

20 Must I, the guerdon, though reluctant,
be?

A prey forever to remorseful shame

That in paternal blood my hands I've stained.

KING. Time changes all; a deed to-day unmeet

May seem hereafter lawful and benign.

Thou has been won by Roderick; thou art his.

30 This day his valor rightly gained the prize.
But since so freshly from the field he comes,

And still thy heart unreconciled remains,

I well might seem thy fair fame's enemy,
35 If I so soon reward his victory.

My law decreed no hour for nuptial vows,

Nor does delay show change in royal will.

Let a round year bring solace to thy
heart,

40 And dry the fountain of a daughter's tears.
For thee, brave knight, wait mighty deeds of arms:

The Moors on our own borders thou hast
slain,

45 Their plots confounded, their assaults
repelled;

Now into their own country push the war,
Command my army, plunder all their land.

50 Thy name of Cid their terrors will inflame;

Themselves have given it — king they'll choose thee now.

Fidelity is valor's noblest crown;
Return yet worthier of this lovely maid.
Let thy great deeds so loudly plead for
thee,

That pride and love will join to make her 5
thine.

RODERICK. To win Chimène and serve my glorious king,
My arm is iron and my heart is flame.

Though absence from her eyes I must endure,

I thank you, sire, for hope's unfailing bliss.

KING. Thy valor and my word assure thy hopes;

Her heart already is confessed thine own.

The filial honor that resists thee now,

To time, thy king, and thy high deeds will bow.

MOLIÈRE

(1622-1673)

The name by which we know the greatest of French comedy writers is one that he adopted for the stage. His real name was Jean-Baptiste Poquelin. Son of a Paris upholsterer, Molière was early sent to school, where he learned a good deal of grammar and a little science. It was expected that when he had finished he would take up his father's trade. At this time, however, the stage was coming into great prominence with the work of Corneille, Rotrou, Scarron, Cyrano de Bergerac, and others; Molière therefore abandoned his father's trade in 1643 and joined a small troupe of players who called themselves l'Illustre Théâtre. This troupe came to a bad end, but, nothing daunted, Molière formed a troupe of his own and travelled about France with them for thirteen years. During this period he studied the public taste and the practical aspect of show producing. The first public performance of one of his own plays took place in Lyons in 1655. By this time Molière's troupe had grown considerably better known, and it was only a short time before they were playing in Paris. In 1659 Molière set the Parisian public talking with his Les Précieuses ridicules, and from that time on his work was the subject of general controversy. The fashionable and influential public who attended his plays enjoyed them when the foibles of others were being made the target for Molière's mocking satire; but, since there was hardly a section of society that did not receive its rebuke, it was not long before his comedies had antagonized nearly every important group in the capital. Louis XIV, however, remained his patron and friend practically all through his life. Molière continued to write plays and to act in them to the end of his life. He died in 1673, while playing a part in his famous comedy The Imaginary Invalid.

Although perhaps not the best known, nor even the most popular during the author's lifetime, The Misanthrope (1666) is generally regarded as the finest product of Molière's genius. The structure has not that exact and definite quality that we find in the comedies directly influenced by Plautus and Terence (as, for example, Tartuffe); but for subtlety of humor and the striking juxtaposition of two opposite views of life, it stands far above any of his other comedies.

ACT I

SCENE I

10 PHILINTE. What is the matter? What troubles you, Alceste?

ALCESTE (seated). Leave me, I beg of you.

PHILINTE. But still, tell me, what 15 whim —

ALCESTE. Leave me, I say; take yourself out of sight.

PHILINTE. But at least you might listen to a man without being angry.

ALCESTE. I choose to be angry, and I do not choose to listen.

PHILINTE. I cannot understand you when your temper is hot; and though we are friends, I —

ALCESTE. Friends! I your friend? Strike my name off your list. Till now I have professed to be your friend; but, after what I have just seen of you, I tell you bluntly I am no longer. I will hold no place in a corrupted heart.

PHILINTE. Then, am I guilty in your eyes, Alceste?

ALCESTE. You ought to die of shame; such conduct cannot be excused; all men of honor must feel humiliated by it. I see you overwhelming a stranger with attentions; testifying the utmost ardor for him; making protestations, offers of service, vows; and, when I ask you afterward who he is, you can hardly tell me the man's name! Your ardor for him sinks the moment that you leave him, and you inform me he is nothing to you. Good God! it is a shameful thing, base, infamous, thus to degrade your soul by treachery; if I, through some misfortune, had done as much I would go hang myself in sheer remorse.

PHILINTE. I cannot see, for my part, that mine's a hanging case¹; so I make bold to appeal against your sentence and beg you not to hang me, if it please you.

ALCESTE. Jestings is most unseemly.

PHILINTE. Seriously, then, what would you have me do?

ALCESTE. I would have you be sincere, and, as a man of honor, say no word that is not from your heart.

PHILINTE. But when a man comes up to you and salutes you joyfully, surely you must pay him in the self-same coin, make some response to his civilities, return him offer for offer and vow for vow.

ALCESTE. No, — I cannot endure that abject custom which the majority of your worldly friends affect. I hate nothing so much as the bowing and scraping of those great makers of protestations, those affable givers of trumpery kisses, those obliging praters of empty words, who strive to outdo each other with civilities, and treat an honest man and a scoundrel with the same air and manner. What advantage is it to you if a man courts you, swears friendship, faith, zeal, honor, tenderness, makes you some fulsome compliment, and then turns round to the first rascal whom he meets, and does the same? No, no, a well-conditioned soul wants no esteem so prostituted; the finest hospitalities are valueless when we find ourselves rated with the crowd. Esteem is based on preference; to esteem the whole world alike is to feel no esteem for any one. And because you addict yourself to these vices of the time, morbleu! you are not of my kind. I refuse the vast complaisance of a heart that sees no shades of merit; I choose that mine shall be distinguished, and — to cut the matter short — the friend of the whole human race is not to my liking.

PHILINTE. But so long as we live in social life, we must pay the outward civilities that custom demands.

ALCESTE. No, I tell you, no; we ought to chastise, pitilessly, this shameful interchange of make-believe friendship. I want a man to be a man, and let the bottom of his heart be seen in all he says, and in all he does. Let it be himself who speaks, — not masking his real feelings behind false compliments.

PHILINTE. There are many situations in which plain frankness would become ridiculous, and is not permissible; and sometimes — if it please your lofty honor — it may be well to hide what is in our hearts. Would it be fitting, would it be decent to tell all men what we think of them? And if there be any one whom we dislike or think unpleasant ought we to let him know it?

ALCESTE. Yes.

PHILINTE. What! would you tell old Émilie that 'tis unbecoming at her age to play the pretty girl; or that the paint she wears shocks every one?

ALCESTE. Undoubtedly.

PHILINTE. Would you tell Dorilas that he is tiresome; that there is not an ear at court he does not weary with tales of his own bravery and the glory of his race?

ALCESTE. I should.

PHILINTE. You are joking.

ALCESTE. I am not joking. In future I will spare none. My eyes are too offended. Court and society both show me nought but things that stir my bile. When I see men living together as they do a black spleen seizes me, a bitter grief. Everywhere I find base flattery, injustice, self-interest, treachery, deceit. I cannot bear it longer; I am enraged; and my intention is to tell the truth henceforth, to all the human race.

PHILINTE. Your philosophic wrath is somewhat savage; I laugh at that black spleen I see has gripped you. You and I are like the brothers in the "School for Husbands," brought up as one, and yet —

ALCESTE. Good God! give up those dull comparisons.

PHILINTE. Give up yourself this churlish virulence. Your teachings cannot change the world. Since frankness charms you, I will tell you bluntly this disease of yours is laughed at everywhere you go. Such wrath against the ways of the world makes you ridiculous in the eyes of many.

ALCESTE. So much the better; good heavens! so much the better; that is what I want; to me 'tis the best of signs and a great satisfaction. Men have become so odious to me that I'd be grieved indeed to be well thought of by them.

PHILINTE. Then you attribute nought but evil to human nature?

ALCESTE. I do; I hate it with a dreadful hatred.

PHILINTE. All poor mortals, then, without exception, are included in this deep aversion? Surely there may be, in our present age —

ALCESTE. No, it is universal; I hate all men: some because they are wicked and evil-doers; others because they fawn upon the wicked, and dare not show that vigorous hatred which virtuous souls should feel to vice. From such compliance comes immunity for the bare-faced villain whom I now am suing. Behind his mask the knave is seen, wherever he is known, for what he is; the rolling of his eye, his bated voice, impose on none but those who do not live here. All others know about how the sneaking fellow, fit only to be shunned, has by the foulest actions foisted himself upon society, where his career, by their connivance clothed in splendor, makes merit groan and virtue blush. No cries of "shame" can make his miserable honor hear them. Call him a knave, a scoundrel, a damned villain, all the world agrees, and no man contradicts you; but — he is welcomed everywhere; wherever he may worm himself he's greeted; men smile upon him; and if there's a canvass to be made, a place to be intrigued for, you will see him get the better of honest men. Great God! it is to me a mortal wound to see how vice is thus condoned and trafficked with. At times the impulse seizes me to flee to a desert and renounce my kind.

PHILINTE. Good heavens! why take the customs of our time so hard; why be so little merciful to human nature? Examine it less sternly, and see its failures with some gentleness. In social life we need a pliant virtue; severe integrity is often blamable; sound reason shuns extremes, and teaches wisdom with sobriety. The rigid virtue of the olden time jars with our age and with our modern customs. We must yield somewhat to our time, and not reluctantly. It is a folly, second to no other, to meddle with the world and try to mend it. I see, as you do, fifty things a day which might be better, or take other courses. At every step I'm tempted to break forth, like you, but no one sees me do it. I take men gently just for what they are; I've trained my soul to tolerate what they do. At court and in society I think my phlegm, Alceste, is, to the full, as philosophic as your bile.

ALCESTE. But that phlegm, Philinte, which reasons well, is it incapable of indignation? Suppose, perchance, a friend betrayed you, or frauds were planned to steal your property, or wicked rumors spread to injure you, — could you endure all that and not be angry?

PHILINTE. Yes. I regard those evils, that your soul resents, as vices consequent to human nature; my soul is not more shocked by seeing men unjust, dishonest, selfish, than by the sight of vultures hungering after carnage, or thieving monkeys or infuriate wolves.¹

ALCESTE. I'll see myself betrayed, hacked into pieces, robbed, before I'll — Good God! why talk? such reasoning is sheer sophistry.

PHILINTE. Faith! I advise you to keep silence; don't rage against your kind so much, and give more care to the lawsuit which you have upon your hands.

ALCESTE. I shall give none; that I'm determined on.

PHILINTE. Then who do you expect will plead your case?

ALCESTE. Plead it? why, reason, my good right, and equity.

PHILINTE. Do you mean you will not go to see a single judge?²

ALCESTE. Not one. My cause is neither doubtful nor unjust.

PHILINTE. Agreed; but underhand intrigues are most disastrous, and —

ALCESTE. No; I'm resolved to take no steps. Either I am wrong, or I am right.

PHILINTE. Don't trust to that.

ALCESTE. I shall not stir a finger.

PHILINTE. Your enemy is strong, and may, by making a cabal, bear off —

ALCESTE. I care nought for that.

PHILINTE. Then you are wrong.

ALCESTE. So be it. I wish to see him win the case.

PHILINTE. But —

ALCESTE. I shall have pleasure if I lose my suit.

PHILINTE. But surely —

ALCESTE. I shall see in court if men will have the effrontery — will be wicked, scoundrelly, perverse enough — to do me injustice openly before the world.

PHILINTE. Oh, what a man!

ALCESTE. I would gladly lose my cause, did it cost me half my fortune, to prove that fact.

PHILINTE. The world would laugh at you in bitter earnest if it could hear you talk in this way.

ALCESTE. So much the worse for him who laughs.

5 PHILINTE. But this integrity you ask from every one, this honest and straightforward dealing in which you hug yourself, do you find it here in her you love? It does surprise me that having quarrelled with the human race so bitterly, you have been caught, in spite of much you might indeed think odious, by that which charms the eye. But what surprises me still more is the strange choice to which your heart is 15 pledged. Éliante, sincere and truthful, has a liking for you; Arsinoë, the prude, looks softly at you with a melting eye; and yet your soul rejects their love and makes itself a toy for Célimène, whose coquetry and treacherous wit symbol the morals of the present day. How comes it that, hating as you do our social foibles, you can endure the ways of that fair lady? Does all you hate cease to be evil in so 25 sweet a form? or — do you choose excuse it?

ALCESTE. No; the love I feel for that young widow in no way blinds me to her great defects. I am, in spite of the passion 30 she inspires in me, the first to see them and the first to blame. But with it all, in spite, too, of my will, she has — I own my weakness — the art of pleasing me. In vain I see her faults; in vain I blame her; in spite of all, she makes me love her. Her grace, her charm, are stronger than all else. Doubtless, my love will purge her soul of worldly vices in the course of time.

PHILINTE. If you do that you will have 40 done great things. Then you think she loves you?

ALCESTE. Yes, by heaven! I could not love her did she not love me.

PHILINTE. But if her love for you is so
45 apparent why do you fret yourself about your rivals?

ALCESTE. Because a heart which deeply loves needs that the object of that love be all its own; and I have come here now to tell her, as to that, all that my passion urges me to say.

² It is characteristic of the times that judges were understood to be influenced by personal and pecuniary inducements.

PHILINTE. For my part, if 'twere granted me to form a wish, her cousin Éliante would have my longings. Éliante's heart, which cares for yours, is steadfast and sincere; had your choice fallen there it would have been in keeping with your needs.

ALCESTE. True; my reason daily tells me so; but 'tis not reason that rules love.

PHILINTE. I greatly fear your passion and your hopes may —

SCENE II

ORONTE, PHILINTE, ALCESTE

ORONTE (to ALCESTE). They told me below that Célimène and Éliante had gone out shopping; but as they also said that you were here, I have come up to tell you from an honest heart how great an admiration I've conceived for you, and that I long have had an ardent wish to be among your friends. Yes, my heart revels in doing justice to great merit; and I eagerly desire some bond of friendship to unite us. A warm friend of my quality is not, I think, to be rejected. (During Oronte's harangue Alceste is dreamy and seems not to notice he is being spoken to. He does not come out of his reverie till Oronte says:) It is to you, if you please, that my words are addressed.

ALCESTE. To me, monsieur?

ORONTE. To you. Do you find them displeasing?

ALCESTE. Not at all. But my surprise is great, for I did not expect the honor I receive.

ORONTE. You need feel no surprise at the esteem in which I hold you, since that of the whole universe is yours.

ALCESTE. Monsieur —

ORONTE. The State has no reward that is not far beneath the dazzling merit all men see in you.

ALCESTE. Monsieur —

ORONTE. Yes; for my part, I hold you preferable to all I see that is most eminent.

ALCESTE. Monsieur —

ORONTE. May the heavens crush me if my words are false. To prove my feelings, suffer me to embrace you with an open heart — asking, as I do so, a place in your regard. Give me your hand, if it please you. You promise me, do you not, your friendship?

ALCESTE. Monsieur —

ORONTE. What! you refuse?

ALCESTE. Monsieur, the honor you propose to me is great. But friendship asks more mystery; and it is, assuredly, a profanation of that name to seek to use it upon all occasions. Such union is born of knowledge and of choice; we should know each other better before we bind ourselves; for each might have such dispositions that both would soon repent of our rash bargain.

ORONTE. Ah! there indeed you speak with judgment, and my esteem for you is all the greater. Let us leave time to knot these gentle bonds. Meantime, I place myself at your disposal. If you have any overtures to make at court, command me; for it is known I have some favor with the king; he listens to me; and, upon my word, in every way he treats me most considerately. In short, I am yours, to use as you may wish; and, as your mind is known to be so brilliant, I have come — in order to begin the tie between us — to read to you a sonnet I have lately written, and ask you if 'twere well to offer it to the public.

ALCESTE. Monsieur, I am most unfit to settle such a question. I beg you to excuse me.

ORONTE. Excuse you! why?

ALCESTE. I have the defect of being more sincere than persons wish.

ORONTE. But that is what I want. I should have reason to complain if, trusting to your sincerity to speak without disguise, you should deceive me.

ALCESTE. If that is how you take it, monsieur, I am willing.

ORONTE. Sonnet — It is a sonnet, monsieur. To Hope — in fact, to a lady who has granted some hope to my passion. To Hope — The lines are not grand, pompous poesy, but simple verses, tender, sweet and languishing.

ALCESTE. We shall see, monsieur.

ORONTE. To Hope — I know not whether the style will seem to you sufficiently clear and easy, and whether my choice of words will satisfy you.

ALCESTE. We shall see, monsieur.

ORONTE. I ought, perhaps, to tell you that I was only a quarter of an hour in writing them.

ALCESTE. Go on, monsieur; the time has nothing to do with it.

ORONTE (reading).

'Tis true that hope doth comfort bring,
And it rocks a time our sorrow;
But, Phillis, 'tis a sadder thing
If we leave not on the morrow.

PHILINTE. I am charmed already with the little poem.

ALCESTE (low to PHILINTE). What! have you the face to call that fine?

ORONTE (reading).

Your complaisance methinks is lost;
You ought to keep your favors low,
And not yourself put to such cost,
If hope is all you deign bestow.

PHILINTE. Ah! with what gallantry this phrase is turned.

ALCESTE (low to PHILINTE). Good heavens! vile flatterer, you are praising nonsense.

ORONTE (reading).

If hope eternally delayed
Quenches my ardor thus betrayed,
Death can alone my succor be.

Your smiles can nothing then repair,
Fair Phillis, it is all despair
When we must hope eternally.

PHILINTE. The cadence of that last line is charming, amorous, admirable.

ALCESTE (aside). Damn his cadence! The devil! 'tis poisonous; I would the words might choke him.

PHILINTE. I have never heard verses better turned.

ALCESTE (aside). Good God!

ORONTE (to PHILINTE). You flatter me; perhaps you think —

PHILINTE. I never flatter.

ALCESTE (aside). Ah, traitor! what are you doing now?

ORONTE (to ALCESTE). But you? Remember the terms of our treaty; speak to me, I entreat you in all sincerity.

ALCESTE. Monsieur, this matter is always delicate. We like to be flattered on our wit and wisdom. I said one day to a man whose name I will not mention, on hearing certain verses he had written, that it behooved a gallant man to restrain the lust of scribbling which seizes on us all, and put a curb upon his passion for notoriety through such amusements; and I also told him that by his eagerness to show his work to others he laid himself open to the jeers of malice.

ORONTE. Do you mean by that to tell me I am wrong in wishing —

ALCESTE. I do not say so. I warned him that cold criticism crushed; that for this weakness men were much decried; that they might have a hundred noble qualities, but the world would judge them only by their foibles.

ORONTE. You think, then, that my sonnet is amiss?

ALCESTE. I do not say so. I showed him, to stop his writing, how, in our day, this lust of scribbling has spoiled most worthy men.

ORONTE. Do I write badly, and resemble them?

ALCESTE. I do not say so. Finally I said: "What pressing need have you to make these rhymes? What devil drives you into print? If the issue of a wretched book is ever pardonable it is when some poor luckless fellow has written it for bread. Believe me, resist your temptations; deprive the public of your labors. Don't sacrifice — no matter who may urge it — the name you bear at court as a most worthy man to take from grasping printers the repute of a ridiculous and miserable author." That is what I endeavored to make him understand.

ORONTE. This is all very well, and I think I understand you. But may I not know what there is in my sonnet —

ALCESTE. Frankly, it is good for nothing but to put in the fire. You have modelled yourself on the worst examples. None of your expressions are natural. "Rocks a time" — what is that? "We leave not on the morrow" — who leave? "And not yourself put to such cost" — what a phrase! And what may this mean:

"Phillis, it is all despair when we must hope eternally?" This figurative style, of which our present writers are so proud, is out of keeping with sincerity and sound writing. 'Tis a mere trick of words, pure affectation. That is not the way in which nature speaks. The shocking taste of the present century alarms me; coarse as our fathers were, their taste was better. As for me, I care far less for the finest things 10 of the day than for this old song I'll now repeat to you: —

"If the king had given to me
His great town, his belle Paris,
Would I but leave my sweet, my dear,
My dear I love so well;
I should say to the King Henri,
Take back, take back your belle Paris,
I love my love,
O gay!
I love my love too

The rhyme is not rich, and the style is old-fashioned; but do you not see how much better it is than all that affectation at which good sense groans? That's 25 what the heart says when it really loves. (To PHILINTE, who is laughing.) Yes, you may scoff; but, in spite of your beaux esprits, I think more of that song than of all the flowery pomposity and false brilliancy 30 which they cry up.

ORONTE. For my part, I insist that my verses are good.

ALCESTE. You have your reasons for thinking so, and you must allow me to 35 have my reasons, which decline to submit to yours.

ORONTE. 'Tis sufficient for me to know that others think well of them.

ALCESTE. Others have the art of feign- 40 ing; I have not.

ORONTE. Did nature allot you a monopoly of brains?

ALCESTE. Shou'd I have more if I praised your verses?

ORONTE. I can do very well without your approval.

ALCESTE. You must, if you please, do without it.

ORONTE. I would like to see you com- 50 pose, in your style, a sonnet on that subject.

ALCESTE. I might, by ill luck, make sonnets as bad; but I should take good 5 care that no one ever saw them.

ORONTE. You speak very curtly; and all this assumption —

ALCESTE.* Go, seek elsewhere the incense that you want.

ORONTE. Be pleased, my little monsieur, to lower your tone.

ALCESTE. Faith! my grand monsieur, I speak as I choose.

PHILINTE (placing himself between them).
15 Messieurs, hey! messieurs; this is going too far. Let the matter drop, I beg of you.

ORONTE. Yes, I am wrong, I own it, and I leave the house. I'am your valet, 20 monsieur, and with all my heart.¹

ALCESTE. And I your humble servant.

ACT II

SCENE I

ALCESTE, CÉLIMÈNE

ALCESTE. Madame, will you allow me to speak frankly? I am not contented with your ways of action; they stir such bitterness within my breast I feel 'twere better we should break apart. Yes, to speak otherwise would be deceiving you. Sooner or later, inevitably, the break must come. Were I to pledge you to the 35 contrary a thousand times, I should be unable to keep my promise.

CÉLIMÈNE. Is it to quarrel with me that you have wished to bring me home?

ALCESTE. Quarrel, no. But your disposition is, madame, to give to each new-comer access to your soul; you allow too many lovers to beset you, and my heart cannot adapt itself to that.

CÉLIMÈNE. Then, do you hold me 45 guilty because men love me? How can I help it if they think me lovable? And when they take such pleasant pains to see me, am I to take a stick and drive them forth?

ALCESTE. No, it is not a stick you need,

madame, but a heart less facile and less tender to their wishes. I know your charms attend you wheresoe'er you go; but your welcome holds in bonds the admirers whom your eyes attract; its sweetness, offered to all who pay you homage, completes the work your charms began. The smiling hope you grant them fastens their assiduities upon you; but if you made your kindness less inclusive this mob of lovers would be put to flight. Tell me, at least, why Clitandre has the luck to please you? On what foundation of worth or splendid virtue do you base the regard with which you honor him? Is it the inordinate length of his little-finger nail that wins him the esteem you are seen to give him? Have you succumbed, with all the fashionable world, to the dazzling merit of that blond periwig? Are the fine ruffles at his knees the reasons that you like him? those knots of ribbon, have they charmed you? Is it the allure-ment of his mighty breeches which wins your soul to making him your slave? Or his manner of laughing, his falsetto voice, have they discovered the secret power of touching you?

CÉLIMÈNE. How unjustly you take umbrage at Clitandre! You know the reason why I treat him kindly; he has promised to interest all his friends in this lawsuit I have upon my hands.

ALCESTE. Lose your suit bravely, madame, and curry no favor with a rival I dislike.

CÉLIMÈNE. But you are growing jealous of the universe!

ALCESTE. Because you welcome the whole universe too well.

CÉLIMÈNE. That very thing should soothe your nettled soul; my favors, as you see, are shed on all; if one alone received them you would have far more cause to take offence.

ALCESTE. But I whom you reproach for too much jealousy, what favors have I more than they, if I may ask?

CÉLIMÈNE. The happiness of knowing you are loved.

ALCESTE. How can my tortured heart believe it?

CÉLIMÈNE. I think that, having taken pains to tell you so, such an admission ought to satisfy you.

ALCESTE. But what assurance have I that you are not, even now, saying the same to others?

CÉLIMÈNE. Certainly, for a lover, your gallant speeches are too pretty; you treat me with such graceful courtesy! Well, to remove that anxious question from your mind, I here unsay all that I said; make yourself easy; nothing can now deceive you but yourself.

ALCESTE. Good God! why must I love you? If I could snatch my heart out of your hands I would bless heaven for such rare luck! I do not deny that I have striven with all my strength to tear this terrible attachment from my soul; but every effort fails; it must be for my sins I love you so!

CÉLIMÈNE. Your passion for me is indeed unequalled!

ALCESTE. Yes, in that I can defy the world. My love is not to be conceived of; and no one, madame, has ever loved as I do.

CÉLIMÈNE. Your method of doing so is truly novel; it seems you love a woman that you may quarrel with her; your ardor blazes forth in angry words; and sure no love was ever yet so scolding.

ALCESTE. It rests with you to make that anger pass. For God's sake, madame, let us cut short these bickerings, speak heart to heart and put a stop —

SCENE II

CÉLIMÈNE, ALCESTE, BASQUE

CÉLIMÈNE. What is it?

BASQUE. Acaste is here.

CÉLIMÈNE. Well, show him up.

SCENE III

CÉLIMÈNE, ALCESTE

ALCESTE. What! am I never to have you to myself? Why are you so ready to receive the world? Can you not endure for a single moment of your day to deny yourself to visitors?

CÉLIMÈNE. Do you wish him to quarrel with me?

ALCESTE. You show him a deference that I do not like.

CÉLIMÈNE. He is a man who would never forgive me if he saw that I considered him intrusive.

ALCESTE. Is that a reason for disturbing yourself?

CÉLIMÈNE. Heavens, yes! good-will is of value among our fellows. He belongs to a set who, I scarcely know why, have acquired at court a right to be heard. They manage to obtain an entrance everywhere; and though, 'tis true, they may not serve us, they are able to do us a vast deal of harm. Therefore, no matter what support one has elsewhere, we ought never to quarrel with such babbling persons.

ALCESTE. In short, whatever happens and whoever comes, you find good reasons to see all the world; and these precautions about your lawsuit —

SCENE IV

ALCESTE, CÉLIMÈNE, BASQUE

BASQUE. Clitandre is also here, madame.

ALCESTE. Precisely! (Moves as if to go.)

CÉLIMÈNE. Where are you going?

ALCESTE. To leave you.

CÉLIMÈNE. Very good, go; leave the house; you may do as you choose.

SCENE V

ÉLIANTE, PHILINTE, ACASTE, CLITANDRE, CÉLIMÈNE, BASQUE, ALCESTE

ÉLIANTE (to CÉLIMÈNE). The two marquises are coming up. Has anyone announced them?

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes. (To BASQUE.) Place chairs for all. (To ALCESTE.) What! you did not go?

ALCESTE. No; for I wish, madame, to make you speak your mind, either for them or else for me.

CÉLIMÈNE. Hush, be silent.

ALCESTE. Today you shall explain yourself.

CÉLIMÈNE. You have lost your senses.

ALCESTE. Not at all. You shall declare yourself —

CLITANDRE. Ah! madame, I am just from the Louvre, where Cléonte, at the levee, was supremely absurd. Has he no friend who would with charitable advice enlighten him as to his manners?

CÉLIMÈNE. He is indeed a bungler in society; he makes himself conspicuous wherever he may be; and when one sees him after a slight interval he seems to be 10 more ridiculous than ever.

ACASTE. Talk of ridiculous people! i' faith, I've just been undergoing one of the most tiresome, — Damon, the moralizer, who, if you'll believe me, kept me one whole hour out of my chair, standing in the hot sun.

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes, he's a wonderful talker, who has the art of telling you nothing in a great harangue. There's never any point to what he says; 'tis only noise to which we listen.

ÉLIANTE (to PHILINTE). This beginning is cheerful; the conversation is starting at good speed against our neighbors.

CLITANDRE. But there's Timante, madame; he is rather a good fellow.

CÉLIMÈNE. Ah! he's a man of mystery from head to foot; he flings you, as he passes, a haggard glance, because, without a thing to do, he is always busy. His speeches are too full of flourishes; he pesters one to death by dint of mannerism. He always has some secret to whisper in one's ear, breaking up a conversation, — 35 and the secret is invariably nothing. Out of the merest trifle he makes a mystery; and even his good-byes, he whispers them.

ACASTE. And Géralde, madame?

CÉLIMÈNE. Oh! that wearisome chatterer! when will he cease to play the grand seigneur? He mingles only with the shining lights, and quotes his dukes, his princes and princesses. The quality infatuates him; and all his talk is now of horses, 45 equipages, dogs. He calls the personages of highest rank by their first names; the plain word "monsieur" is forgotten by him.

CLITANDRE. They say he is on the 50 closest terms with the Bleise.

CÉLIMÈNE. That poor stupid woman! oh, what dry intercourse! I suffer martyrdom when she comes to see me; I perspire with the effort to find something to say; the obtuseness of her expression kills the words on my lips. In vain I assault her stupid silence with all the commonplaces I can call to my assistance, — fine weather, rain, heat, cold. But those are topics that are soon exhausted, and then her visit, always intolerable, drags its fearful length along. In vain I look to see what time it is; I yawn a score of times; she does not budge more than a log of wood.

ACASTE. What do you think of Adrasté?

CÉLIMÈNE. Ah! what excessive pride! He is a man puffed up with admiration of himself. His sense of his deserts is never satisfied at court, and so he rails against the court, and proceedings daily. There's never an office, post, or privilege given but what he thinks he's treated with injustice.

CLITANDRE. But that young Cléon, at whose house all our best people now are visiting; what do you say of him?

CÉLIMÈNE. Why, that he makes his cook his merit, and that the world visits his dinners and not him.

ÉLIANTE. But he takes care that all the choicest things are served there.

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes; but I wish he would not serve himself; his silly person is a horrid dish which spoils, to my taste, all the feasts he gives.

PHILINTE. The world at any rate thinks highly of his uncle, Damis; what do you say of him, madame?

CÉLIMÈNE. He is a friend of mine.

PHILINTE. I think him an honest man, and he looks a wise one.

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes, but he pretends to too much mind; it irritates me. He is always straining; in what he says you see him in travail to produce bons mots. Since he took it into his head to be so clever, nothing pleases his taste, he is too fastidious. He sees defects in everything that's written; he thinks a wit should never praise; he counts it learned to find fault; fools only can admire his laugh. By approving nothing in the works of the day, he fancies he exalts himself above his fellows. Even in conversation he finds something to reprove; the topics are so low he will not condescend to them. He stands, arms folded, and, from the pinnacle of his mind, looks down in pity upon what we say.

ACASTE. God bless me! that's his veritable portrait.

CLITANDRE (to CÉLIMÈNE). For painting people to the life, you are incomparable.

ALCESTE. On, on, set on each other, my good friends at court! Spare none, let each man have his turn. And yet, if one of them appears in sight you haste to meet him, give him your hand, offer him flattering kisses, and swear by all the oaths to be his servant.

CLITANDRE. Why find fault with us? If what was said displeases you, address your reproaches to madame.

ALCESTE. No, by heaven! it is to you I make them; your compliant laughter incites her wit to these ill-natured speeches. Her satire feeds upon the wicked incense of your flattery; and if she did not see herself applauded her heart would be less prone to ridicule. 'Tis thus that flatterers are guilty of the vices which corrupt society.

PHILINTE. But why do you take such interest in the persons thus condemned, since you yourself would blame in them the self-same faults?

CÉLIMÈNE. Is it not monsieur's nature to contradict? Why expect him to agree with the general voice, or to refrain from exhibiting, wherever he may be, the cavilling spirit he received from heaven? The opinion of others is never agreeable to him. He sets up his own, believing he would be thought a common man if it were seen to agree with that of the world. The pleasure of contradicting has such charms for his soul that he sometimes, and not seldom, takes arms against himself, and wages war upon his own real feelings when he hears them uttered by the lips of others.

ALCESTE. The laugh is on your side, madame, and there's nothing to be said. You can wing your shafts of satire on me as you please.

PHILINTE. But is it not true that your mind antagonizes whatever is said, and is unable, from a bitterness you avow yourself, to endure that others should either blame or praise?

ALCESTE. Yes; for the reason that men are never right. My bitterness is just; I find them, wherever they may be, offensive flatterers or rash censors.

CÉLIMÈNE. But —

ALCESTE. No, madame, no; if I die for it, I must say that you find pleasure in things I cannot bear; and these friends here do wrong to foster in your soul this great indulgence of defects that injure it.

CLITANDRE. For myself I shall say nothing; but as for madame, I must openly declare that I have hitherto believed her faultless.

ACASTE. I see the graces and the attractions that heaven has granted her; but her defects have never, I must say, struck my eye.

ALCESTE. They all strike mine; and, far from overlooking them, I take pains, as she well knows, to bring them to her knowledge. The more we love our friends, the less we flatter them; it is by excusing nothing that pure love shows itself. For my part, I would banish those unworthy lovers who slavishly submit to all my sentiments, and by their weak compliance swing incense to my follies.

CÉLIMÈNE. In short, if hearts should look at things in your way, they must, in order to love truly, renounce all sweetness, and find the crown of perfect love in heaping insults on the object of it.

ÉLIANTE. Love, as a rule, is little ruled by laws. All lovers, as we know, boast of their choice. True passion does not see that which is blamable; the one beloved is always lovable. Defects love thinks perfections, and gives them pleasant names. The pallid one is comparable to the jasmine in her whiteness; the swarthy skin becomes a rich brunette; thinness gives freedom of motion and a slender waist; the portly dame is full of majesty; she who neglects her person and takes no pains to charm is called a careless beauty; the giantess becomes a goddess; the dwarf, an epitome of all heaven's marvels; the haughty spirit deserves a crown; the tricky mind has wit; the fool is kind; the chatterer, good-humored; the silent one maintains her virtuous modesty. 'Tis thus a lover whose passion is supreme loves even the defects of her he worships.

ALCESTE. And I maintain, yes I —

CÉLIMÈNE. Come, let us end this talk, and take a turn or two about the gallery. What! are you going, gentlemen?

CLITANDRE and ACASTE. Oh, no, madame.

ALCESTE. The fear of their departure weighs on your soul. Gentlemen, leave when you please; but, I warn you, I shall not go till you are gone.

ACASTE. Unless my presence importunes madame, I can stay here all day, for nothing calls me hence.

CLITANDRE. As for me, provided I return for the king's coucher, I have no other matters to attend to.

CÉLIMÈNE (to ALCESTE). You are joking, I am sure.

ALCESTE. No, not in any sense. We shall see now if it is I of whom you are anxious to be rid.

SCENE VI

ALCESTE, CÉLIMÈNE, ÉLIANTE, ACASTE,
CLITANDRE, PHILINTE, BASQUE

BASQUE (to ALCESTE). Monsieur, a man is below who wishes to see you, he says, on business which cannot be delayed.

ALCESTE. Tell him I know of no such urgent business.

BASQUE. He wears a jacket with great pleated basques, and gold upon it.

CÉLIMÈNE (to ALCESTE). Go, see who it is; or else, have him shown up.

SCENE VII

ALCESTE, CÉLIMÈNE, ÉLIANTE, ACASTE,
CLITANDRE, PHILINTE, A SOLDIER OF THE MARSHALS' GUARD

ALCESTE (advancing to meet him). Come in, monsieur. What do you want with me?

SOLDIER. Monsieur, I have two words to say to you.

ALCESTE. You can speak out; I am prepared to hear you.

SOLDIER. The Marshals,¹ whom I serve, monsieur, bid you come to them at once.

ALCESTE. Me? bid me, monsieur?

SOLDIER. Yes, you.

ALCESTE. But why?

PHILINTE (to ALCESTE). Because of that ridiculous affair between yourself and Oronte.

CÉLIMÈNE (to PHILINTE). What affair?

PHILINTE. Oronte and he had words about some verses he would not admire; and the Marshals wish to nip the matter in the bud.

ALCESTE. I will not have the base compliance —

PHILINTE. But you must obey the order; come, let us go.

ALCESTE. What sort of terms do they desire to make between us? Will the Marshals order me to think the verses that caused our quarrel good? I shall not unsay what I have said, — I think them bad.

PHILINTE. But a gentler tone —

ALCESTE. I shall not yield one inch; the lines are execrable.

CÉLIMÈNE. Come, come, make haste and go where you are summoned.

ALCESTE. I go, madame; but I shall soon return to settle, in this room, the matter we have been discussing.

ACT III

SCENE I

CLITANDRE, ACASTE

CLITANDRE. I observe, my dear marquis, that your soul is contented; all things make you cheerful, and nothing frets. Now, tell me in good faith, do you really believe, without self-deception, that you have any sound reason for being so happy?

ACASTE. Parbleu! I don't see, when I look myself over, any ground whatever for discontent. I have property, I am young, I belong to a house which has certain good reasons to call itself noble; and I think, through the rank to which my blood entitles me, there are very few stations in life that I cannot fill. As to courage, of which, of course, we ought to think first, I know, without vanity, that I am not lacking there; I have been seen by the world to carry on an affair in a sufficiently vigorous and dashing manner. As for wit, there's no question but what I have that, and with it enough good taste to judge without study, and to talk about everything. At the theatre, of which I am truly an idolator, I can wear a wise face, decide the fortunes of a play, and lead the applause at all the fine speeches which merit hurrahs. I'm sufficiently active; I've a good air and good looks, above all fine teeth, and my figure is slim. As to my style of dressing, I think, without vanity, that any one would be foolish to rival me there. My position in the world is as good as can be; the fair sex adore me; I stand well with the king; and, therefore, my dear marquis, I see, on all sides, every reason to be satisfied with myself.

CLITANDRE. Yes. But finding everywhere so many easy conquests, why do you persist in offering useless homage here?

ACASTE. Useless? Parbleu! I'm not of a kind nor of a temper to stand cold treatment from any beauty. 'Tis only common minds and ill-bred persons who burn persistently for frigid dames, or languish at their feet, endure their rigor, seek help from tears and sighs, and strive, by the painstaking of a long-drawn suit, to win the smiles their lack of merit forfeits. Men of my presence, marquis, are not made to love on credit and pay all the costs. However choice may be the lady's favors, I think, thank God, my value equals hers; and to do honor to a heart like mine is sure no reason it should cost her nothing. To put the thing on equitable grounds, she must at least meet my advance half-way.

CLITANDRE. So you think, marquis, you stand well with Célimène?

ACASTE. Marquis, I have some ground to think so.

CLITANDRE. Take my advice; get rid of that idea; it is an error. You flatter yourself, my friend, you blind yourself —

¹ The court of the Marshals of France took cognizance of quarrels and affairs of honor among gentlemen.

ACASTE. Quite true; I flatter and I blind myself.

CLITANDRE. Why call your happiness so perfect, then?

ACASTE. I flatter myself.

CLITANDRE. On what do you found your hopes?

ACASTE. I blind myself.

CLITANDRE. Then you have proofs to give you certainty?

ACASTE. I tell you, I deceive myself.

CLITANDRE. Can it be that Célimène has made you secret promises?

ACASTE. No, she rebuffs me.

CLITANDRE. Oh! cease this jesting, and let me know what hopes you really have.

ACASTE. I am the luckless, you the lucky one. She has so deep an aversion to me that one of these days I'll surely hang myself.

CLITANDRE. Ah ça! marquis, are you willing to settle our fates by agreeing that, if either of us can show some certain sign of having won her heart, the other shall make way for the fortunate lover and relieve him of a rival?

ACASTE. Parbleu! I like that sort of talk, and will, with all my heart, agree to it. But hush, here she comes.

SCENE II

CÉLIMÈNE, ACASTE, CLITANDRE

CÉLIMÈNE. What! still here?

CLITANDRE. Love stayed our feet.

CÉLIMÈNE. I have just heard a carriage entering the courtyard. Do you know whose it is?

CLITANDRE. No.

SCENE III

CÉLIMÈNE, ACASTE, CLITANDRE, BASQUE

BASQUE. Arsinoë, madame, is coming up to see you.

CÉLIMÈNE. What can that woman want with me?

BASQUE. Éliante is below, and is talking with her.

CÉLIMÈNE. Something is in her mind, or why should she come here?

ACASTE. She is thought to be a most consummate prude, and in the ardor of her zeal —

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes, yes, pure cant! At heart she's of the world; and all her efforts aim at hooking on to others — in which, however, she has small success. She cannot see without an envious eye a woman followed by a train of suitors; and her sour virtue, overlooked by all, is ever grumbling that the age is blind. She tries to cover with a veil of prudery the frightful solitude in which she lives; and, to save the honor of her scanty charms, she attributes sin to powers that they have not. And yet a lover would be most pleasant to my lady. She even shows some tenderness for Alceste; the attentions that he pays to me offend her; she tries to make it seem that I have stolen them; and her jealous spite, which she can scarce conceal, is felt in underhanded ways on every side. I have never seen anything, I think, so foolish; and with it all she is impertinent to the last degree. Therefore —

SCENE IV

ARSINOË, CÉLIMÈNE, CLITANDRE, ACASTE

CÉLIMÈNE. Ah! what fortunate fate brings me this visit? Madame, in all sincerity, I was beginning to feel most anxious for your welfare.

ARSINOË. I have come, madame, to offer you some advice, which I feel I owe to you.

CÉLIMÈNE. Ah! how good of you, and how glad I am to see you!

(CLITANDRE and ACASTE go out laughing.)

SCENE V

ARSINOË, CÉLIMÈNE

ARSINOË. The departure of those gentlemen is timely.

CÉLIMÈNE. Shall we sit down?

ARSINOË. It is not necessary. Madame, friendship should, above all, be shown in things that most affect our fellows; and as there are none more vitally important than those of honor and decorum, I have come to prove the friendship my heart feels for you by offering counsel which concerns your honor. Yesterday I visited some friends, of sterling virtue. There the conversation turned on you; unfortunately, your conduct and its notoriety were not approved. The crowd of men you suffer to approach you, your coquetry, and the rumors it excites, received more censure and far harsher blame than I could wish. You will readily conceive the course I took. I said all that I could in your defence; excused you, firmly, as to your intentions, offering to vouch for your good soul. But — as you know — there are things in life that cannot be excused, however much we wish to do so, and I found myself, at last, constrained to admit that your manner of living does certainly seem wrong, and has — to the world — an injurious appearance; also that mischievous tales are being told of it, and that your conduct might, if you were only willing, give far less ground for condemnation. Not that I think your virtue really injured — God forbid that I should think so! But the world believes in the mere shadow of sin; and it is not enough to satisfy our conscience only. Madame, I think your mind too reasonable to take amiss this useful counsel, or to attribute it to other motives than the hearty zeal which binds me to your interests.

CÉLIMÈNE. Madame, I have many thanks to render you; such counsel can but gratify me; and, far from taking it amiss, I wish to recognize the favor you have done me by instantly returning it with other counsel which concerns your honor. As you have shown yourself so heartily my friend by telling me the rumors people spread about me, I wish to follow, in my turn, so kind an example by telling you what people say of you. The other day, at a house where I was visiting, I met some persons of high character, who, speaking of a soul's true kindness, turned their remarks, madame, on you. Unfortunately, your prudery and your bursts of pious zeal were not regarded by them as a good example. This affection of a grave demeanor; your endless talks of virtue and of honor; your frowns and outcries at the shadow of indecency which one ambiguous word can cast upon yourself; the pitying glances you bestow on others; your frequent lectures, your sour censure of things that in themselves are pure and innocent, — all this, if I may speak to you quite frankly, madame, was blamed with one consent. What is the good, they said, of all this modesty, this virtuous exterior, if it belies the rest? 'Tis true she says her prayers with rigid punctuality, but then she beats her servants and she does not pay them; in pious places she displays her zeal, but she paints her face in order to seem handsome; and she covers up the nakedness of pictures, but has a liking for realities. As for me, madame, I took up firmly your defence with each and all; assuring them that what they said was slanderous. But their views clashed with mine; and their conclusion was that you would do well to meddle less with others' actions and look more closely to your own. They said we ought to look at home a good long time before we think of judging other people; that an exemplary life alone gives weight to our correction of the lives of others; moreover that in any case 'tis better to remit that duty to those whom heaven has selected for it. Madame, I think you are too reasonable to take amiss this useful counsel, or to attribute it to other motives than the hearty zeal which binds me to your interests.

ARSINOË. I know that in reproving we subject ourselves to much; but I did not expect this sharp retort, madame; and I see plainly, by its very bitterness, that my sincere advice has cut you to the heart.

CÉLIMÈNE. Quite the contrary, madame; and if the world were wise these mutual counsels would be made the custom. Given in good faith, they would dispel the utter blindness each has for himself. It rests with you to carry on this faithful office with your past zeal. Let us take pains to tell ourselves, between ourselves, just what you hear of me, and I of you.

ARSINOË. Ah, madame, I shall hear nought of you; it is of me the most reproving things are said.

CÉLIMÈNE. Madame, I think that all things may be praised and blamed; and each award is just, according to age or fancy. There is a season for coquettish gallantry; there is another, still more suitable, for prudery. 'Tis wise, from policy, to choose that style when time has deadened the glow of youth; it serves to cover a mortifying downfall. I don't deny that some day I may follow on your traces, for age brings everything. But it is still too early, madame, as everybody knows, to be a prude at twenty.

ARSINOË. You plume yourself on very slight advantages, and ring your age with wonderful effect! But an advantage that you share with many is not so much to boast of, after all. I know not why your temper drives you, madame, thus to provoke me in so strange a way.

CÉLIMÈNE. And I, madame, I really know not why you constantly declaim against me everywhere. Must I be punished for your disappointments? Is it my fault that no one courts you? What can I do if men will love me, and will persist in offering vows your heart may wish to take away from me? The field is open to you. I do not hinder any of your charms from winning lovers.

ARSINOË. Alas! and do you really think the number of your lovers, of which you seem so vain, can trouble others; or that we do not find it easy to appraise the price at which you gain them? Do you think to persuade us — who see how things are going — that your good qualities alone attract your followers; or that they burn for you with honest love, and court you solely for your virtue? The world is not a dupe; it is not blind by such vain pretences. Many a woman fitted to inspire the tenderest sentiments does not have lovers; from that the argument is plain: their hearts cannot be won without great effort, for none may woo us for our beauty only, but all must buy the right of courting us. Therefore you need not swell with pride for such poor sparkles of a trivial victory. Correct the self-conceit of your attractions, and cease to treat us superciliously. If our eyes envied the conquests you obtain, methinks we all could do as you do, — cease to conduct ourselves with self-respect, and let you see that others can have suitors when they please.

CÉLIMÈNE. Then have them, madame; let me see it done; with this rare secret make the effort to please and —

ARSINOË. Madame, let us end this conference; it irritates too much your soul and mine. I should already have taken leave of you, were I not forced to wait here for my carriage.

CÉLIMÈNE. Pray stay as long as suits you, madame; nothing need hasten your departure. But, not to weary you with my presence, I'll give you better company; and monsieur here, whom chance has brought so opportunely, shall fill my place and entertain you better.

SCENE VI

ALCESTE, CÉLIMÈNE, ARSINOË

CÉLIMÈNE. Alceste, I have a letter I must write; it cannot be delayed without some blame to me. Stay with madame; she will have the kindness, I am sure, to excuse my incivility.

SCENE VII

ALCESTE, ARSINOË

ARSINOË. You see she wishes me to entertain you until my carriage comes; and her civility could provide me with nothing more truly charming than this interview. Persons of lofty merit draw forth the esteem and love of every one; and yours, undoubtedly, has secret charms which lead my heart to enter all your interests. I wish the court, with more propitious eyes, would do full justice to your claims. You have much cause for indignation. I am angry almost daily to see that nothing has been done for you.

ALCESTE. For me, madame? On what pretensions should I base a claim? What service to the State have I been known to render? What have I done, if you please, so brilliant in itself that I have cause to grumble because the court does nothing in return for it?

ARSINOË. It is not every one on whom our court casts a propitious eye who has done good service to the State. Opportunity is needed as well as power. The great deserts that all men see in you ought —

ALCESTE. For heaven's sake, madame, say nothing of my deserts. Why do you wish the court to trouble itself about them? Its cares would be too many and its hands too full if it unearthed the merits of everybody.

ARSINOË. A dazzling merit will unearth itself; and yours is thought extreme on every side. I must tell you now that yesterday, in two distinguished houses, you were much praised by persons of great weight.

ALCESTE. Hey! madame, 'tis nowadays the fashion to laud every one. That is the way by which the present century levels everything. All are of equal merit; it is no longer an honor to be praised. Why! praises are stuffed down your throat, flung at your head; and there's my valet's name in the gazette!

ARSINOË. For my part, I have wished you to obtain some place at court in which to show your merit to the world. If only you consented, we would intrigue a little, and, to oblige you, start a few machines. I myself have men in hand whom I could use, and they would make the way quite smooth for you.

ALCESTE. Madame, what would you have me do at court? The disposition that I feel within me requires rather that I keep away from it. Heaven did not make me, when it gave me breath, with a soul congenial to the courtly atmosphere. I am conscious that I do not possess the necessary virtues to succeed there and do my duty. Frankness and sincerity are my chief talents; and he who does not have the gift of hiding what he thinks had better make short stay in courtly regions. Outside the court, of course we cannot have the strong support or the titles of honor it gives nowadays. But, in losing those advantages, we are spared the vexatious trifling of silly persons; we need not suffer merciless rebuffs, nor be compelled to praise the verse of Monsieur Such-a-one, nor shower incense on Madame This-or-that, nor undergo the brains of seedling marquises.

ARSINOË. Then we will drop, since you desire it, this matter of the court; but my heart is forced to pity you in your love; and, if I may disclose my thoughts upon it, I wish with all my soul 'twere better placed. Indeed you have deserved a gentler fate, for she who charms you is unworthy of you.

ALCESTE. In saying that, I beg you to remember, madame, this lady is your friend.

ARSINOË. Yes. But my conscience is too wounded to bear a moment longer the wrong she does you. The state in which I see you grieves my soul too much; I am forced to warn you she betrays your love.

ALCESTE. You show me thus, madame, a tender impulse; such warnings would oblige a lover.

ARSINOË. Yes, though she be my friend, she is, and I dare say it, unworthy to enthrall a good man's heart; hers has for you a counterfeited tenderness.

ALCESTE. It may be so, madame; we cannot see the hearts of others. But your charity might well have paused before you cast this painful thought in mine.

ARSINOË. Oh! if you do not wish to be undeceived, there is no need to tell you anything; that, indeed, is easy.

ALCESTE. No, it can not end so. This is a subject on which, no matter what is learned, doubts are more cruel than the worst of truths. For my part, I would rather nothing were told me unless it could be shown with certainty.

ARSINOË. That is enough. Upon this subject you shall have full light. Yes, I will let you trust your own eyes only. Give me your hand to take me home. There I will show you positive proof of the unfaithful heart of her you love. And, if for other eyes your own could long, it may be you would find some there to comfort you.

ACT IV

SCENE I

ÉLIANTE, PHILINTE

PHILINTE. No, a soul so hard to manage was never seen; no reconciliation was ever yet so troublesome to bring about. In vain they tried in every way to move him; out of his fixed opinion he would not be dragged. Never did a more fantastic quarrel, I am sure, engage the wisdom of the Marshals. "No, gentlemen," he said, "I shall not retract. On every other matter I will agree with him, but not on this. Why is he affronted? Of what does he complain? Is his fame injured because he cannot write poems? What does my opinion, which he takes so ill, signify to him? A man can be a gentleman and make bad verses. Such matters do not touch his honor, and I hold him to be a gallant man in every other way; a man of quality, of courage, deserving of anything you please, but — a bad writer. I will praise, if you wish it, his way of living, of spending money, his skill on horse-back, in fencing, dancing; but as for praising his verses, I beg to be excused! When a man has not the happiness to be able to write better than that, he ought to repress, under pain of death, his desire to make rhymes." Finally, all the grace and concession to which, with great effort, his feelings were brought could only induce him to say — thinking that he softened his style exceedingly: "Monsieur, I am sorry to be so critical, and I heartily wish, out of good-will to you, that I could have thought your sonnet better." After which an embrace was hastily brought about in order to conclude the proceedings as fast as possible.

ÉLIANTE. He certainly is very singular in his manner of acting; but, I must confess, I esteem him highly. The sincerity on which his soul so prides itself has something noble and heroic in it. 'Tis a virtue rare indeed in these days; and I wish I could see it in others as in him.

PHILINTE. As for me, the more I see of him the more amazed I am at this passion to which he yields his heart. With the nature it has pleased God to give him, I cannot see how it is that he loves as he does; and still less do I see why your cousin should be the woman to whom his heart inclines.

ÉLIANTE. It only shows that love is not invariably produced in hearts by harmony of disposition; and all those theories of gentle sympathy are in this case belied.

PHILINTE. But do you think, from what you see, that he is loved?

ÉLIANTE. That is a point it is not easy to make out. How can we judge how truly she may love him? Her heart is never really sure itself; sometimes she loves and does not know it; at other times she thinks she loves and there is nothing in it.

PHILINTE. I think our friend will find more grief than he imagines with your cousin. To tell the truth, if he possessed my heart, he would have turned his homage elsewhere, and by a wiser choice have shown, madame, that he profits by the kindness you have shown him.

ÉLIANTE. For myself, I stand on no punctilio, for I think that in such matters we should show good faith. I do not oppose his tenderness for Célimène; on the contrary, my heart is interested for her, and if the thing depended upon me I should myself unite him to the one he loves. But if in such a choice (as well may happen) his love should meet some unpropitious fate, and it so chanced another's suit were crowned, I could resolve to accept his homage then; for the refusal suffered by him in such a case would cause me no repugnance.

PHILINTE. Neither do I oppose, madame, the kindness which your charming soul bestows upon him; and he himself can tell you, if he will, what I have taken pains to say to him about it. But if, by the marriage which he now desires, you should be unable to receive his vows, I shall then seek the transcendent favor which your soul with so much generosity now gives to him, — happy when his heart turns elsewhere, if yours, madame, falls back on mine.

ÉLIANTE. You are making merry, Philinte.

PHILINTE. No, madame; I am speaking now of my soul's best; and I await the occasion to offer myself openly; trusting, with all my heart, the moment soon may come.

SCENE II

ALCESTE, ÉLIANTE, PHILINTE

ALCESTE. Ah! avenge me, madame, 5 for an affront which has, at last, conquered my constancy.

ÉLIANTE. What is it? What can have moved you thus?

ALCESTE. That which I can't conceive 10 of without dying. And the upheaval of all the natural world could not unhinge me more than this disaster. 'Tis done, 'tis over! My love — I cannot speak of it!

ÉLIANTE. Try to control your mind.

ALCESTE. Oh, just Heaven! why were such charms joined to the vices of the basest souls?

ÉLIANTE. But still, what have —

ALCESTE. Ah! all is ruined; I am — I 20 am betrayed, I am destroyed. Célimène — who could believe it? — Célimène deceives me; she is unfaithful.

ÉLIANTE. Have you just grounds for that belief?

PHILINTE. Perhaps it is mere suspicion, lightly kindled. Your jealous mind invents, at times, chimeras.

ALCESTE. Ha! morbleu! monsieur, mind your own affairs. (To ÉLIANTE.) I am, 30
alas! too certain of her treachery; for here, in my pocket, written by her own hand, is a letter to Oronte which proves to my very eyes her shame and my disgrace — Oronte! whose homage I believed 35 she fled; the one of all my rivals whom I feared the least.

PHILINTE. A letter easily misleads at sight, and is often not so guilty as we think it.

ALCESTE. Monsieur, once more, let me alone, I beg; and keep your interest for your own concerns.

ÉLIANTE. You ought to moderate your anger. And this outrage —

ALCESTE. Madame, it rests with you to avenge it. It is to you I have recourse to free my heart from poignant anguish. Avenge me on your cousin, your ungrateful and perfidious cousin, who basely has 50 betrayed a faithful love. Avenge me for a wrong which you must hold in horror.

ÉLIANTE. I avenge you! how?

ALCESTE. Accept my heart — accept it, madame, and take the place of that unfaithful woman. In that way only can I have revenge; I wish to punish her by the honest vows, the deep affection, the respectful suit, the assiduous service, and the fervent duty my heart henceforth will offer on your altar.

ÉLIANTE. I pity what you suffer, certainly, and I do not reject the heart you offer me; but the wrong is not, perhaps, so great as you imagine, and you may still give up these thoughts of vengeance. When we are hurt by some one who has a 15 deep attraction we are apt to make rash plans we do not execute. We may see powerful reasons to break our chain, and yet a guilty dear one soon is innocent; and then the revenge we wish to take is easily dispelled, and we see 'tis but a lovers' quarrel after all.

ALCESTE. No, no, madame, I assure you, no. The offence is mortal. I break my bonds, and there is no return. Nothing 25 can change my firm intention, for I should punish myself were I to love her still. Here she is; my anger is redoubled by her presence. I will denounce her treacherous actions to her face, and so confound her. After which, freed once for all from her deceitful charm, I'll bring to you a heart at liberty.

SCENE III

CÉLIMÈNE, ALCESTE

ALCESTE (aside). Oh, heaven! can I be master of my emotions?

CÉLIMÈNE (aside). Heyday! (To AL- 40 CESTE.) What troubles you thus? Why these sighs, these gloomy looks? Are they meant for me?

ALCESTE. Of all the wrongs of which the soul is capable, nothing compares 45 with your disloyalty. Fate, devils, and the anger of high Heaven have never yet produced a thing so evil.

CÉLIMÈNE. Here's sweetness truly, and I like it much.

ALCESTE. Do not jest; this is no time to laugh; blush rather, for there is ample reason; I have sure proofs of your betrayal. This was the meaning of my troubled soul; 'twas not in vain my love became alarmed; those frequent doubts you thought so odious were warnings of the calamity before me. In spite of all your care and cleverness in deception, my star was telling me of that I had to fear. But do not think that I will suffer the sting of such an outrage and not take vengeance. I know we have no power over desire; that love is, everywhere, born independent; no force can thrust it on the heart, and every soul is free to choose its conqueror. Therefore I should have had no reason to complain had your lips spoken truly, and refused my suit when first I pressed it. My heart would then have had no right to quarrel with its fate. But to find my love accepted with false vows — that is betrayal, that is perfidy, which cannot be too sternly punished, and I will give the reins to my resentment. Yes, yes, fear all after such infamy; I am no more myself, I am all anger! Stabbed by the mortal blow your hand has struck, my senses are no longer ruled by reason; I yield to the promptings of a just resentment, and I will not answer for what I now may do.

CÉLIMÈNE. But what has caused, if I may ask, this violent fit of anger? Have you lost your reason?

ALCESTE. Yes, yes, I have lost it! I lost it when from the sight of you I took, for my sorrow, the poison that is killing me, and when I trusted the sincerity of all those traitorous charms which so enthralled me.

CÉLIMÈNE. What is this treachery of which you thus complain?

ALCESTE. Ah! double-heart, that knows so well the art of feigning! But I have the means at hand all ready to confound it. Cast your eyes here, and recognize your writing. This discovered letter suffices to convict you; against this witness there is no reply.

CÉLIMÈNE. Is this the matter that has so disturbed you?

ALCESTE. You do not blush to see that letter?

CÉLIMÈNE. And why, pray, should I blush to see it?

ALCESTE. What! do you add audacity to treachery? Will you disavow that note because it does not bear your seal?

CÉLIMÈNE. Why should I disavow a letter written by me?

ALCESTE. Can you see it without shame for the crime toward me of which it proves you guilty?

CÉLIMÈNE. You are, upon my word, a most unreasonable man.

ALCESTE. What! do you dare defy that ocular proof, and say that in its tenderness to Oronte there is nothing to outrage me and make you blush?

CÉLIMÈNE. Oronte! who says the letter was to him?

ALCESTE. The persons who placed it in my hands this day. But I'll agree it might be for another — if so, would my heart have less reason to complain of yours? would you be guiltless toward me?

CÉLIMÈNE. But if it be a woman to whom I wrote that letter, why should it wound you? where's the crime of that?

ALCESTE. Ha! the shift is good, the evasion admirable! I did not expect, I must admit, this trick, but it convinces me completely. How dare you have recourse to vulgar subterfuge? Do you think me blind? Go on, and let me see the crooked ways, the shifty air by which you will maintain so clear a falsehood; I'd like to know how you can twist to suit a woman the words of that letter which is full of passion. Explain, to hide your lack of truth, the words I now will read to you —

CÉLIMÈNE. I do not choose it. I think you are ridiculous enough, to use your power as you do, and dare to tell me to my face all this.

ALCESTE. No, no; be not so angry; take some pains to justify these words of yours —

CÉLIMÈNE. No, I refuse to hear them; what it may please you to believe in this affair is of the smallest consequence to me.

ALCESTE. I beg of you, tell me the truth; I will be satisfied — if I can be — that the letter is to a woman.

CÉLIMÈNE. No, the letter is to Oronte; I wish it to be believed. I receive his attentions with great pleasure; I admire what he says, I value what he is. I am ready to agree to all you say. Now, do as you please, take your own course; but do not wear me out with such scenes any longer.

ALCESTE (aside). Heavens! was ever my fate more cruel? Was ever heart so treated? What! when a just displeasure forces me to speak, 'tis I who am complained of, I who make the quarrel! My grief and my suspicions are goaded on, and I am told I may believe the worst — in which she glories! And yet my heart is still so cowardly as not to break the chain that binds me to her, or arm itself with laudable contempt for the ungrateful object it has loved too well. (To CÉLIMÈNE.) Ah! you know well, perfidious woman, how to make my weakness serve your ends in spite of myself, and how to use the fatal love, born of your eyes, to carry out your purposes. Defend yourself, at least, from a crime that overwhelms me; cease this affectation of being guilty. Prove to me, if you can, the innocence of that letter; my tenderness consents to come to your assistance — strive to seem faithful, and I, in turn, will strive to think you so.

CÉLIMÈNE. Oh! you are mad with all your jealous transports; you don't deserve the love I feel for you. I should like much to know what could induce me to stoop so low as to deceive you; and why, if my heart leaned another way, I should not say so with sincerity. How is it that the kind assurance I gave you of my feelings was not enough to save me from your suspicions? Has such a pledge no power against them? and is it not insulting me to listen to their voice? Because a woman's heart makes a strong effort when it owns its love; because the honor of our sex — that enemy to ardor — firmly opposes such avowals, should the lover for whose sake we overcome those obstacles, should he be the one to doubt our truth? Is he not guilty in suffering others to say these things — at least without a combat? Go! such foul suspicions deserve my anger; you are not worth the esteem in which I held you. How foolish I have been! I am vexed with my simplicity in keeping any kindness in my heart for you.

I ought to turn my love elsewhere, and give you thus a subject of legitimate complaint.

ALCESTE. Ah! traitress, my weakness is indeed a mystery. Doubtless you are deceiving me with those soft words. What of it? I must follow my destiny; my soul is given over to your worship. I wish to see the end of this, and know what is your heart, — and whether it is black enough to still betray me.

CÉLIMÈNE. No, for you do not love me as I must be loved.

ALCESTE. Ah! my love is far beyond compare; and in its ardor to show itself for what it is to all the world, it even forms desires against you. Yes, I would fain that no one thought you lovable; I would you were reduced to misery; that Heaven denied you everything; that you had nor rank, nor birth, nor wealth, so that my love might make some startling sacrifice to heal the injustice destiny had done you, and that my heart might have the joy and glory of seeing you hold all things through my love.

CÉLIMÈNE. That's a strange fashion of wishing well to me; heaven grant you may not have the chance of it. But here's your valet, seemingly excited.

SCENE IV

CÉLIMÈNE, ALCESTE, DUBOIS

ALCESTE. What is all this? and why this frightened air?

DUBOIS. Strange things have happened. Matters are going wrong in our affairs —

ALCESTE. How?

DUBOIS. Monsieur, we must get away at once. We must slip off silently.

ALCESTE. But your reason, say? Why do you use such language?

DUBOIS. The reason is we must be packing.

ALCESTE. Ha! I'll break your head assuredly if you don't answer differently.

DUBOIS. Monsieur, a man all black in face and clothes came to the house, and even to the kitchen; where he left a paper, scribbled in such a way that one had need to be worse than any devil to read it. It concerns, no doubt, your lawsuit, but all the fiends in hell, I think, could never make it out.

ALCESTE. Well, what of it? What has that paper to do, you fool, with the departure that you talked about?

DUBOIS. Monsieur, an hour later a gentleman who visits you came hurrying to see you in much excitement. Not finding you, he charged me, civilly (knowing with what zeal I serve you), to tell you — 10 Stay, I wish I could recall his name.

ALCESTE. No matter for his name; what did he tell you?

DUBOIS. Well, he was one of your friends, that must suffice. He told me 15 you were in danger of arrest, and must get off at once.

ALCESTE. But why? Did he not specify the reason?

DUBOIS. No; he asked for pen and ink 20 and wrote a line by which you can, I think, get to the bottom of this mystery.

ALCESTE. Give it me, then.

CÉLIMÈNE. What can all this mean?

ALCESTE. I do not know; but I will 25 clear it up. Come, you impertinent devil, give me the note.

DUBOIS (after searching long in his pocket). Faith! monsieur — I believe — I've left it on your table.

ALCESTE. I don't know what prevents me from —

CÉLIMÈNE. Do not be angry; but go at once and see what all this means.

ALCESTE. It seems that fate, whatever 35 pains I take, has sworn to hinder all our interviews. But to defeat it, promise, my love, madame, that you will let me speak with you again this evening.

ACT V

SCENE I

ALCESTE, PHILINTE

ALCESTE. My resolution is taken, I tell you.

PHILINTE. But, however hard the blow, must it compel you —

ALCESTE. Useless to say a word, useless 50 to reason with me; nothing that you can do will turn me from my purpose. The age in which we live is too perverted; I desire to withdraw from intercourse with men. Honor, uprightness, decency and the laws were openly arrayed against my adversary; on all sides was the equity of 5 my cause proclaimed; and on the faith of my just rights I rested tranquilly. And now behold, I am defrauded of success; justice is with me, but I lose my case! A traitor, whose scandalous history is well known to all, comes off victorious by the blackest falsehood! Those who were on my side yield to his treachery! He cuts my throat and makes them think it is right. The weight of his canting artifice — 10 all jugglery! — has overthrown the Right and baffled Justice: he wins a verdict which has crowned a crime. And, not content with the great wrong he has already done me, he is spreading everywhere a villainous book, the very reading of which is most condemnable, — a book that merits the rigor of the law; and the lying rascal has the effrontery to say I wrote it! And Oronte mutters low and tries maliciously to circulate the calumny, — he, who holds the rank of an honest man at court; to whom I have been sincere and frank; he, who came to me, with an eager ardor which I did not seek, and asked for my opinion 30 on his verses. And because I treated him with honesty, refusing to be false to him or truth, he helps to crush me with an imaginary crime, and now becomes my greatest enemy! Never will his soul forgive me because, forsooth! I could not say his verse was good. And all men, damn them! have become like that. These are the actions to which glory leads them! Here's the good faith, the virtuous zeal, 40 the justice, and the honor we expect of them! No, no, it is too much to bear such suffering. I will escape this nest of villains, and since with human beings we must live like wolves, traitors! you shall not have 45 my life among you.

PHILINTE. I think you are too hasty in forming that design; the harm is not so great as you would make it. The deal this man has dared impute to you has not obtained enough belief to make the authorities arrest you. That false report is dying of itself; it is an action that will injure only him who did it.

ALCESTE. Injure him, indeed! He does not fear the scandal of such tricks. He has the world's permission to be a scoundrel; and so far from his credit being injured by this deed you'll see him in some honored place tomorrow.

PHILINTE. Nevertheless 'tis certain no one has given much belief to the tale his malice spreads about you. On that score you have nothing at all to fear. As for the verdict on your lawsuit, of which indeed you may complain, justice may yet be won; you can appeal against this judgment —

ALCESTE. No, I shall hold to it. However great the wrong that verdict does me, I will not have it quashed; it shows too plainly how the Right is wronged. I wish it to remain for all posterity, — a signal mark, a noted testimony to the wickedness of this age. 'Twill cost me twenty thousand francs, but with that sum I buy the right to curse the iniquity of human nature and to keep alive my everlasting hatred to it.

PHILINTE. In short —

ALCESTE. In short, your efforts are superfluous. What can you find to say upon this matter, monsieur? Will you have the effrontery to bid me to my face excuse the infamy of what has happened?

PHILINTE. No, I am one with you in what you say. In these days all things go by base intrigue and selfish interests; craft carries all before it. Men ought indeed to be made of other metal; but is their lack of probity a reason to withdraw yourself from social life? All human frailty is a means of exercising our philosophy. That is the finest work of virtue. If every one were clothed with integrity, if every heart were just, frank, kindly, the other virtues would be well-nigh useless, since their chief purpose is to make us bear with patience the injustice of our fellows. And so, a heart of honest virtue —

ALCESTE. I know your words are of the best, monsieur, your excellent arguments are most abundant; but you waste your time in making those fine speeches. Reason demands for my soul's good that I retire. I have not enough control over my tongue; I cannot answer for what I might be led to say; I should have twenty duels on my hands at once. Leave me, without further argument, to wait for Célimène. She must consent to my design. 'Tis that which brings me here to speak with her. I am about to see whether her heart does truly love me; this coming hour will prove it to me once for all.

PHILINTE. Let us go up to Éliante while awaiting Célimène.

ALCESTE. No, my soul is full of care; do you go up, and leave me in this gloomy corner with my black misery.

PHILINTE. 'Tis cruel company. I will find Éliante and bring her down.

SCENE II

CÉLIMÈNE, ORONTE, ALCESTE

ORONTE. Yes, it is for you to say, madame, whether you will bind me wholly to you by these tender ties. I must have full assurance from your soul to mine; a lover cannot bear these hesitations. If the ardor of my passion has power to move you, you should not feign unwillingness to let me know it. The proof I ask of you is, plainly, no longer to admit Alceste among your suitors; to sacrifice him, madame, to my love; and banish him from your house this very day.

CÉLIMÈNE. But why are you so angry with him now, you whom I have often known to speak of him with favor?

ORONTE. Madame, there is no need of explanations. The question is, What are your sentiments? Choose, if you please, between us; keep one or else the other; my resolution waits upon your will.

ALCESTE (advancing from his corner). Yes, monsieur is right. Madame, you must choose. In this his wishes accord with mine; the self-same passion prompts me, the same intention brings me hither. My love must have some certain proof of yours. Things cannot thus drag on another day; this is the moment to reveal your heart.

ORONTE. Monsieur, if your suit succeeds, I do not mean that my importunate love shall trouble it.

ALCESTE. Monsieur, I shall not seek, jealous or not, to share her heart with you.

ORONTE. If she prefers your love to mine —

ALCESTE. If she is capable of any leaning toward you —

ORONTE. I swear I will no longer court her.

ALCESTE. I swear I will no longer see her.

ORONTE. Madame, it is for you to speak without constraint.

ALCESTE. Madame, you can explain yourself without anxiety.

ORONTE. You have but to say on whom your wishes fall.

ALCESTE. You have but to speak the truth and choose between us.

ORONTE. What! at making such a choice you seem to be distressed!

ALCESTE. What! your soul hesitates and seems uncertain!

CÉLIMÈNE. Good heavens! this demand is most ill-timed; how little sense or reason either of you show! I know myself the preference I feel; my heart is not upon the scales, suspended doubtfully between you. Nothing could be more quickly made than the choice you ask for; but I should feel, to tell the truth, too much embarrassment in making this avowal to your face. A choice like this must seem unkind to one; it should not, therefore, openly be made in presence of both. A heart will always show its leanings plainly enough without compelling it to bare itself; some gentler means can sure be found to show a lover that his attentions are unwelcome.

ORONTE. No, no, I do not fear a frank avowal, and I consent for my part —

ALCESTE. And I demand it. It is this very publishing I dare exact. I will not have you shirk the truth in any way. To keep on terms with all the world is what you study. But no more dallying, no more indecision now; you must explain yourself decisively; or else I take refusal for decision, and I shall know, for my part, how to explain your silence; I shall consider said the wrong that I expect of you.

ORONTE. Monsieur, I thank you for your indignation, and I say to madame, here, the same as you.

CÉLIMÈNE. How you annoy me with your whims! What justice is there in what you ask? Have I not told you the motive that restrains me? Here is Éliante, she shall judge this matter.

SCENE III

ÉLIANTE, PHILINTE, CÉLIMÈNE,
ORONTE, ALCESTE

CÉLIMÈNE. Cousin, I am persecuted by these two men, whose scheme appears to have been concerted. They each demand, with equal heat, that I shall here proclaim, in presence of both, the choice my heart has made; and that, in giving this decision openly, I shall forbid one or the other from paying me attentions. Tell me if things are ever done in that way.

ÉLIANTE. Do not consult me; you may find that you appeal to the wrong person. Frankly, I am for those who speak their thoughts.

ORONTE. Madame, it is in vain that you seek to evade us.

ALCESTE. All your evasions are ill-seconded.

ORONTE. You must, you shall speak out, and end this vacillation.

ALCESTE. It is enough if you persist in silence.

ORONTE. I ask but a single word to end the matter.

ALCESTE. And I shall comprehend you if you say no word.

SCENE IV

ARSINOË, ACASTE, CLITANDRE, CÉLIMÈNE, ORONTE, ALCESTE, ÉLIANTE,
PHILINTE

ACASTE (to CÉLIMÈNE). Madame, we have come, Clitandre and I, to clear up, if you please without offence, a trifling matter.

CLITANDRE (to ORONTE and ALCESTE). Your presence, gentlemen, is very timely, for you are both concerned in this affair.

ARSINOË (to CÉLIMÈNE). It may surprise you, madame, to see me here, and I must tell you that these gentlemen have caused my coming. They came to see me to complain of something my heart cannot believe. I have too high an esteem for your real depth of soul to think you capable of so great a wrong. My eyes refused their strongest testimony; and my friendship, overlooking our small jars, has brought me to you in their company that I may see you clear yourself at once of this foul calumny.

ACASTE. Madame, we wish to see, in a kindly spirit, how you will take these facts. Here is a letter written by you to Clitandre.

CLITANDRE. And here is a tender billet written by you to Acaste.

ACASTE (to ORONTE and ALCESTE). Gentlemen, this writing is well known to you, of course. I do not doubt that her civilities have frequently enabled you to see it. But the letter itself is worthy of being read. (Reads.)

"What a strange man you are to blame me for my gayety, and to declare that I am never so pleased as when you are not with me. Nothing was ever more unjust; and if you do not come at once and beg my pardon for this offence, I will never in my life forgive you for it. Our tall, ungainly viscount —"

He ought to be present, and hear this.

"Our tall, ungainly viscount, the first whom you complain of, is a man who never pleased me; and since I saw him, for an hour together, spit in a pond in order to make bubbles, I have had a poor opinion of him. As for the little marquis —"

That is myself, gentlemen; I say it without vanity.

"As for the little marquis, who held my hand today for a long time, I think him the most finical of little beings; there's nothing of him but his nobility. And as for the man of the green ribbons —"

(To ALCESTE.) Your turn now, monsieur.

"As for the man of the green ribbons, he amuses me at times with his bluntness and his surly grumbling; but there are moments when I think him the most irritating mortal upon earth. As for the man of sonnets —"

(To ORONTE.) This is to your address, monsieur.

"As for the man of sonnets, who has flung himself into poesy and wishes to be an author in defiance of everybody, I do not give myself the trouble to listen to him. His prose fatigues me even more than his verses. Therefore, do pray believe that I am not so gay and amused in your absence as you fancy, and that I think of you — more than I could wish — at the parties of pleasure to which I am dragged; it is a wonderful seasoning of all enjoyments to think of those we love."

CLITANDRE. And here am I, in this billet to Acaste. "Your Clitandre, of whom you speak, and who says sweet things to me, is the very last man for whom I could feel regard. He is absurd to imagine he is loved; and you are still more absurd to fancy you are not loved. Exchange opinions; and then you will, both of you, be more nearly right. Come and see me as often as you can, and help me to bear the annoyance of being beset by him." There, madame, is the model of a noble character; you know what it is called. Enough! We shall each exhibit, wherever we go, this glorious picture of your heart.

ACASTE. I might say much to you, for the subject is a fine one; but I do not count you worthy of my anger. I will let you see that little marquises can win, for consolation, hearts that are worth far more than yours. (Exeunt marquises.)

SCENE V

CÉLIMÈNE, ÉLIANTE, ARSINOË, ALCESTE, ORONTE, PHILINTE

ORONTE. Can it be that you tear me thus to pieces after all that you have written and said to me? Does your heart, adorned with such fine semblances of love, give itself, in turn, to all the human race? Go! — I have been a dupe, but I am one no longer. You have done me, madame, a service in letting me unmask you. I shall profit in the heart I thus regain, and find my vengeance in your loss. (To ALCESTE.) Monsieur, I offer no further hindrance to your love; you can conclude your treaty with madame. (Exit.)

CÉLIMÈNE, ÉLIANTE, ARSINOË,
ALCESTE, PHILINTE

ARSINOË. Truly this is the basest act I have ever known. I cannot keep silence, for I feel so shocked. Was ever any conduct seen like yours? I take no interest in those other men, but as for monsieur 10 (motioning to ALCESTE) who rested all his happiness on you, a man like him, of honor and great merit, who cherished you with absolute idolatry, ought he —

ALCESTE. Allow me, madame, if you 15 please, to manage my affairs myself. Pray do not take upon yourself superfluous cares. In vain my heart hears you take up its quarrel; it is not in a state to pay for great zeal. If by another choice I wished 20 to avenge myself it would not be on you that choice would fall.

ARSINOË. Eh! do you imagine, monsieur, that such a thought exists, or any eagerness is felt to win you? I think your 25 mind is far too full of vanity if it can flatter itself with that belief. Madame's rejected leavings are a merchandise one would be foolish indeed to take a fancy to. Pray undeceive yourself; carry your 30 thoughts less high; I'm not the sort of woman you should aspire to. You would do well to keep your sighs for her; I long to see so suitable a match. (Exit.)

SCENE VII

CÉLIMÈNE, ÉLIANTE, ALCESTE,
PHILINTE

ALCESTE (to CÉLIMÈNE). Madame, I 40 have kept silence, in spite of all that I have seen and heard. I have allowed all others to speak before me. Have I controlled myself enough, and may I now —

CÉLIMÈNE. Yes, say all; you have a 45 right to complain, and to reproach me as you will. I have done wrong, — I here confess it; and my discomfited soul will seek no vain excuse to answer you. I have despised the anger of the others, but I admit my crime to you. Your indignation, without a doubt, is reasonable. I know how guilty I must seem to you, — how all things go to prove I have betrayed you. In short, you have every right to hate me. Do so; I consent.

ALCESTE. Ah! can I, traitress? Can I 5 thus conquer love? However I may long to hate you, have I a heart within me to obey my will? (To ÉLIANTE and PHILINTE.) See what this abject tenderness can do! I call you both to witness my great weakness. And yet, this is not all; you are about to see me carry that weakness farther, show what a folly 'tis to call us wise, and prove that in all hearts there's still the man. (To CÉLIMÈNE.) Yes, I am 15 willing to forget your guilt; my heart is ready to excuse it and call this wrong a foible to which the vices of the times misled your youth, — provided you here consent to clasp hands with the purpose I have formed to separate from men and live apart in country solitudes; to which, without delay you now must follow me. In that way only can you still repair, before the eyes of all men, the wrong that you 25 have done me. Do this, and notwithstanding the notoriety which noble hearts abhor, I still shall find it in my heart to love you.

CÉLIMÈNE. I! renounce the world before I am old, and bury myself with you 30 in country solitudes?

ALCESTE. But if your love responds to mine what matters all the world to you? Will you not be content with me alone?

CÉLIMÈNE. Solitude has terrors for a 35 heart so young. I feel that mine has not the grandeur, nor the strength, to resolve upon a scheme of this kind. If the bestowal of my hand can satisfy your wishes I will consent to tie the knot of marriage —

ALCESTE. No; my soul revolts against you now; this hard refusal moves me more than all the rest. And since you cannot in so sweet a tie find all in me as I found all in you, go! — I reject you. This 45 sore outrage frees me forever from your unworthy bonds. (Exit CÉLIMÈNE.)

SCENE VIII

ÉLIANTE, ALCESTE, PHILINTE

ALCESTE (to ÉLIANTE). Madame, your beauty is adorned with every virtue; never have I seen aught in you but strict sincerity. I have long valued you most highly. Let me continue to esteem you thus; and suffer that my heart, in all its divers troubles, should not demand the honor of your bonds. I feel myself unworthy; I begin to know that heaven did not give me life for the ties of marriage. 'Twould be too base a homage to offer you the leavings of a heart not worth your own; therefore —

ÉLIANTE. You can fulfil that thought, Alceste. My hand is not so difficult to bestow, for here's your friend, who, if I asked him, would willingly accept it.

PHILINTE. Ah! that honor, madame, is my sole desire. To gain it, I would sacrifice both blood and life.

ALCESTE. And may you ever taste of true contentment, by keeping, each for each, such sentiments. As for me, betrayed on all sides, crushed by injustice, I leave a pit where vices triumph, to seek somewhere on earth a lonely spot where I am free to be a man of honor.

PHILINTE. Come, madame, come, let us employ all ways to thwart this scheme his heart proposes.

ITALIAN

GOLDONI

(1707-1793)

Carlo Goldoni was brought up in Venice by tender and indulgent parents who in no way discouraged his interest in the theater. As a child he was delighted with marionettes, which his father worked for him, and at the age of eight he composed his first comedy. All through his youth he seized upon every opportunity for stage experience. He was supposed to study medicine, but, unable to overcome his repugnance to it, he turned to the study of law. His law course was seriously interrupted by his dramatic enterprises, but he finally finished and started to practice in Venice. Here clients were not sufficiently numerous to interfere with his great preoccupation, the theater, which kept him wandering about Italy from city to city and composing plays. He settled in Pisa in 1744 and for three years proved an ability to make a success of the practice of law. But the call of the theater and the great demand for plays turned him again to his writing. From 1748 to 1762 he wrote a great number of dramas, some of which suffered somewhat from hasty composition. He encountered much opposition among the literary critics of his own country, and, being a reluctant controversialist, he accepted an invitation in 1762 to write for the stage in Paris. Here he was not successful, for he found that in Paris as in Italy he must compose in the old style. He managed, however, to work out a number of pleasing fantasies in the manner later adopted by Beaumarchais and Sardou. But in general he found Paris slow to take up anything new; and he was about to quit the city when he received a position as teacher of Italian to the royal princesses. He still contributed to the theater, supported during the latter part of his life by a small pension. In 1787 he composed his Mémoires, and in 1793 he died, without having returned to his native land.

Goldoni followed the tendencies of his time in his preoccupation with subjects of moral edification; but his method of inculcating morals, based as it was upon the presentation of the good, heavily burdened his art. Forgetting that the ill may be more instructive than the good, he resorted to positive instruction and frequently loaded up his dialogue with preaching. In general, however, he strove for greater realism than had been customary among dramatists of his time, and his pictures of middle-class life are admirable for their simplicity and naturalness. He excelled especially in the comedy of character in its outward manifestations, depicting this outward life with an enthusiasm and a freshness of color and delicacy of touch that make him an inimitable painter of manners. In form he aimed to strip his dramas of the numerous complications of plot that had cluttered up the stage and confused action, and turned all his efforts toward clarity and naturalness. He has been called the "Italian Molière."

CHARACTERS

PHILIBERT, a rich Dutch merchant.

GIANNINA, his daughter.

RICCARDO, a broker.

COSTANZA, his daughter.

DE LA COTTERIE, a French lieutenant.

MARIANNA, Mademoiselle Giannina's servant.

GASCOIGNE, De la Cotterie's servant.

The Scene is at the Hague, in the house of PHILIBERT.

ACT I

SCENE I

GASCOIGNE, packing his master's trunk. Enter MARIANNA.

MAR. May I wish good-morning to 20 Monsieur Gascoigne?

GAS. Yes, my sweet Marianna, I thank you for your good-morning, but good-night would be more agreeable to me from your lips.

MAR. From what I see, I should rather wish you a pleasant journey.

GAS. Oh, my precious jewel, such a melancholy departure must be followed by a most doleful journey!

MAR. Then you are sorry to go?

GAS. How can you doubt it? After having enjoyed your delightful society for six months, can I leave you without the deepest sorrow?

MAR. And who forces you to do what is so disagreeable?

GAS. Do you not know? My master.

MAR. Masters are not wanting at the Hague, and you can easily find one who 40 will give you better wages than a poor French officer, a prisoner of war, and a man in every way roughly used by fortune.

GAS. Pardon me, such language does not become so good a girl as you are. I 45 have for many years had the honour of serving my excellent master; his father, I may say, recommended me to him; I have attended him in the war, and have not shunned danger to show my fidelity. 50 He is poor, but never man had a better heart. Were he promoted, I am sure I should share his good fortune. Would you desire me to abandon him, and let him return to France without me?

MAR. You speak like the worthy fellow you are; but I cannot conceal my affection for you.

GAS. Dear Marianna, I am as much distressed as you are, but I hope to see you again, and then to be able to say, Here I am. I can support you, and, if you wish it, 10 I am yours.

MAR. Heaven grant it! But why is the Lieutenant in such haste to depart? My master is fond of his company, and I think the daughter not less so than the 15 father.

GAS. Too true; and that is his reason for going.

MAR. What! does he dislike people to be fond of him?

GAS. Ah, my Marianna, my poor master is desperately in love with your young mistress; he leads the most wretched life in the world; he knows their love for each other is increasing every day, and, as they 25 can no longer hide it, he fears for himself, and for Mademoiselle Giannina. Your master is rich, and mine is poor. Monsieur Philibert has this only daughter, and will not give her to a younger son, a soldier; one, in short, who would have to 30 live on her means. The Lieutenant, though poor, is a man of honour; he respects the obligations of hospitality, of friendship, of good faith; he fears he may be overcome 35 and seduced by love, and that he in turn may seduce his mistress from her duty. This being the case, he does violence to his feelings, sacrifices love to principle, and is resolved to go.

MAR. I admire his heroic conduct, but could not imitate it.

GAS. We must exert self-control.

MAR. You can do so more easily than I.

GAS. Indeed, a man's resolution is stronger than a woman's.

MAR. Say rather his affections are weaker.

GAS. So far as regards me, you are 50 wrong.

MAR. I look at acts, not words.

GAS. What can I do to convince you of my love?

MAR. Monsieur Gascoigne does not need me for a teacher.

GAS. Do you wish me to marry you before I go?

MAR. That would, indeed, remove all doubt.

GAS. But then I should have to leave you.

MAR. And could you have the heart to abandon me?

GAS. Oh, you might go with me!

MAR. That would be much better.

GAS. To encounter so many hardships?

MAR. In truth, that would not suit me so well.

GAS. Should I remain here with you, would that satisfy you?

MAR. Perfectly.

GAS. For how long?

MAR. A year at least.

GAS. And after a year, would you let me go?

MAR. Yes, a year after our marriage, if you found it easy to do so.

GAS. I daresay you would let me go 25 after a month.

MAR. I know better.

GAS. I am sure of it.

MAR. Let us try.

GAS. My master is coming; another 30 time we will talk it over.

MAR. Ah, Monsieur Gascoigne, this conversation has unnerved me; do what you please, I trust to you. — (Aside.) Indeed, I know not what I say. (Exit.) 35

GAS. If I had not more sense than she, the folly would have been committed before now.

Enter DE LA COTTERIE.

DE LA COT. (To himself.) Oh, Heaven! how wretched I am! how unfortunate!

GAS. The trunk, sir, is packed.

DE LA COT. Ah, Gascoigne! I am in despair.

GAS. Alas! what misfortune has happened?

DE LA COT. The worst that could befall me.

GAS. Our troubles seldom come alone. 50

DE LA COT. Mine is alone, but so great that I cannot support it.

GAS. I suppose you allude to your love?

DE LA COT. Yes; but it has increased to such a degree that I have no longer firmness enough to resist it.

GAS. What if the lady is unconcerned at your departure, and does not love you as you imagine she does?

DE LA COT. On the contrary, she is more affectionate, and more devoted to me than ever. Oh, God! what will my 10 despair drive me to? I saw her weep.

GAS. Well, this is bad enough, but I thought it was something much worse.

DE LA COT. Inhuman! unfeeling! vile plebeian soul! can you imagine anything 15 worse in the world than the tears of a tender-hearted, distressed lady, who accuses me of cruelty, who makes my resolution waver, and puts to a severe trial my honour, my reputation, and my friend- 20 ship?

GAS. I am not conscious of deserving so harsh a reproof; this is a just recompense for ten years' service.

DE LA COT. Ah! put yourself in my place, and then, if you can, condemn my transports. My wounds, my blood, my being a prisoner of war, which prevents my promotion, the narrowness of my fortune, all appear nothing in comparison with the love which inflames my soul. The excellent principles of the young lady prevented her from assuring me that I possessed her heart, and in consequence I resolved to leave her. Ah! at the mo- 35 ment of taking leave, tears and sobs prevented her from speaking, and they proved her love was equal to mine. My wretchedness is extreme; my resolution seems barbarous; and now, frantic with love, reason 40 appears to desert me.

GAS. Take time, sir; remain here. Monsieur Philibert is the best man in the world; in Holland they pride themselves on their hospitality, and our host takes 45 the greatest interest in you, and in your health. You are not perfectly cured, and this is a good reason for not going.

DE LA COT. I will think over what you say; very little would change my determination.

GAS. With your leave I will at once unpack the trunk. (Unpacking.)

DE LA COT. (Apart.) What will they say if I remain after having taken my leave?

GAS. (Apart.) Marianna will not be sorry for this.

DE LA COT. (Apart.) If I allege I am unwell, my sadness will make it appear so.

GAS. (Apart.) Nor indeed am I.

DE LA COT. But the longer I remain, the more my love increases; and what remedy can there be for it? what hope is there for my desperate passion?

GAS. Time accomplishes wonders. (Still unpacking.)

DE LA COT. How much better to meet death at once than to live in such torture!

GAS. My master will be obliged to me.

DE LA COT. What shall I do?

GAS. The trunk is unpacked, sir.

DE LA COT. Who told you to unpack it?

GAS. I said I was going to do it, and you did not forbid me.

DE LA COT. Blockhead! put up the clothes. I shall go.

GAS. Well, whatever happens, let them remain now.

DE LA COT. Do not make me angry.

GAS. I will put them up this evening.

DE LA COT. Do it at once, and order the post-horses at twelve o'clock.

GAS. And the tears of Mademoiselle?

DE LA COT. Wretch! have you the heart to torment me?

GAS. My poor master!

DE LA COT. Indeed, I am an object of compassion.

GAS. Let us stay.

DE LA COT. No.

GAS. Shall I pack up the things, then?

DE LA COT. Yes.

GAS. How I pity him! (Putting the clothes in the trunk.)

DE LA COT. Can I leave this house without seeing her again?

GAS. While he continues in this state of mind, we shall never be done.

DE LA COT. By leaving her, I fear my love will not leave me.

GAS. Alas, poor master! (Looking out.) What do I see?

DE LA COT. What is the matter? Why do you stop?

GAS. I am going on, sir.

DE LA COT. You are confused?

GAS. A little.

DE LA COT. What are you looking at?

GAS. Nothing.

DE LA COT. Oh, Heaven! Mademoiselle Giannina! What an encounter! What do you advise me to do?

GAS. I do not know; any course is dangerous.

DE LA COT. Do not leave me.

GAS. I will not.

DE LA COT. I will go away.

GAS. As you please.

DE LA COT. I cannot.

GAS. I pity you.

DE LA COT. Why does she stop? Why does she not come in?

GAS. She is afraid of disturbing you.

DE LA COT. No; it is because you are here.

GAS. Then I will go. (Going.)

DE LA COT. Stay.

GAS. I will remain, then.

DE LA COT. Have you the snuff-box?

GAS. I will go for it. (Exit.)

DE LA COT. Hear me! where are you going? Poor me! Gascoigne! (Calls.)

Enter GIANNINA.

GIAN. Are you in want of anything?

DE LA COT. Excuse me, I want my servant.

GIAN. If yours is not here, there are others. Do you want any one?

DE LA COT. No, I thank you; my trunk must be packed up.

GIAN. And are you disturbed in this manner about so trifling an affair? do you fear there will not be time? Perhaps you are already expecting horses? If the air of this country is not favourable to your health, or rather if you are tired of us, I will myself hasten forward your departure.

DE LA COT. Mademoiselle, have compassion on me; do not add to my suffering.

GIAN. If I knew the cause of your suffering, instead of increasing, I would endeavour to diminish it.

DE LA COT. Seek the cause in yourself; there is no need for me to tell you.

GIAN. Then you go away on my account?

DE LA COT. Yes, it is on your account that I am compelled to hasten my departure.

GIAN. Have I become so odious in your sight?

DE LA COT. Oh, Heaven! you never appeared to me so lovely; your eyes never beamed with so much tenderness.

GIAN. Ah, were this true, you would not be so anxious to go.

DE LA COT. If I loved only the beauty of your person, I should yield to the strength of my attachment, which bids me stay with you; but I love you for your virtues; I see your peace of mind is in danger, and, in return for the kindness you have shown me, I mean to sacrifice the dearest hopes of my life.

GIAN. I do not believe you have so little resolution as not to be able to control your passion, and you do me injustice if you think I cannot resist the inclinations of my heart. I own my love for you without a blush: this virtuous love, I feel, will never leave me, and I cannot persuade myself a man is less able than I am to sustain with glory the conflict of his passions. I can love you without danger; it is happiness enough for me to see you. You, on the contrary, by determining to depart, go in quest of more easy enjoyment, and show that your obstinacy prevails over your love. It is said hope always comforts the lover. He who will not use the means proves he cares but little for the end, and, if you go, you will still suffer the tortures of disappointed desire; you will act either with culpable weakness, or unfeeling indifference. Whatever cause hurries you away, go, proud of your resolution, but be at least ashamed of your cruelty.

DE LA COT. Ah, no, Mademoiselle! do not tax me with ingratitude, do not accuse me of cruelty. I thought, by my departure, to do you an act of kindness. If I am wrong, pardon me. If you command it, I will remain.

GIAN. No; my commands shall never control your inclination; follow the dictates of your own heart.

DE LA COT. My heart tells me to remain.

GIAN. Then obey it without fear, and, if your courage does not fail, rely on my constancy.

DE LA COT. What will your father say to my change of mind?

5 GIAN. He is almost as much grieved at your departure as I am; he is not satisfied about your recovery; and whether it is the consequence of your wound, or of mental affliction, the surgeons do not believe your health is re-established, and my father thinks it too soon for you to undertake the journey. He loves and esteems you, and would be much pleased at your remaining.

15 DE LA COT. Has he any suspicion of my love for you? and that it is mutual?

GIAN. Our conduct has given him no cause for suspicion.

DE LA COT. Can it be possible it has never passed through his mind that I, an open, frank man, and a soldier, might be captivated by the beauty and merit of his daughter?

GIAN. A man like my father is not inclined to suspicion; the cordiality with which he received you as a guest in his family assures him he may rely on the correct conduct of an officer of honour; and his knowledge of my disposition makes him perfectly easy: he does not deceive himself in regard to either of us. A tender passion has arisen in our hearts, but we will neither depart from the laws of virtue, nor violate his confidence.

DE LA COT. Is there no hope his goodness may make him agree to our marriage?

GIAN. My hope is that in time it will; the obstacles do not arise from motives of interest, but from the customs of our nation. Were you a merchant of Holland, poor, with only moderate expectations, you would immediately obtain my hand, and a hundred thousand florins for an establishment; but an officer, who is a younger son, is considered among us as a wretched match, and were my father inclined to give his consent, he would incur the severe censure of his relations, his friends, and indeed of the public.

50 DE LA COT. But I cannot flatter myself with the prospect of being in a better condition.

GIAN. In the course of time circumstances may occur that may prove favourable to our union.

DE LA COT. Do you reckon among these the death of your father?

GIAN. Heaven grant that the day may be distant! but then I should be my own mistress.

DE LA COT. And do you wish me to remain in your house as long as he lives?

GIAN. No, Lieutenant; stay here as long as your convenience permits, but do not appear so anxious to go while there are good reasons for your remaining. Our hopes do not depend on the death of my father, but I have reasons to flatter myself our attachment in the end may be rewarded. Our love we must not relinquish, but avail ourselves of every advantage that occasion may offer.

DE LA COT. Adorable Giannina, how much am I indebted to your kindness! Dispose of me as you please; I am entirely yours; I will not go unless you order me to do so. Persuade your father to bear with my presence, and be certain that no place on earth is so agreeable to me as this.

GIAN. I have only one request to make.

DE LA COT. May you not command?

GIAN. Have regard for one defect which is common to lovers; — do not, I entreat you, give me any cause for jealousy.

DE LA COT. Am I capable of doing so?

GIAN. I will tell you. Mademoiselle Costanza, in the last few days, has visited our house more frequently than usual; her eyes look tenderly on you, and she manifests rather too much sympathy for your misfortunes. You are of a gentle disposition, and, to own the truth, I sometimes feel uneasy.

DE LA COT. Henceforth I will use the greatest caution, that she may indulge no hopes, and that you may be at ease.

GIAN. But so conduct yourself, that neither my jealousy nor your love for me shall be remarked.

DE LA COT. Ah, would to Heaven, Mademoiselle, our troubles were at an end!

GIAN. We must bear them, to deserve good fortune.

DE LA COT. Yes, dearest, I bear all with this delightful hope. Permit me now to inquire for my servant, to get him to countermand the horses.

GIAN. Were they ordered?

DE LA COT. Yes, indeed.

GIAN. Unkind one!

DE LA COT. Pardon me.

GIAN. Let the order be countermanded before my father knows it.

DE LA COT. My hope and my comfort! may Heaven be propitious to our wishes, and reward true love and virtuous constancy. (Exit.)

GIAN. I never could have believed it possible for me to be brought to such a step; that I should, of my own accord, use language and contrive means to detain him. But unless I had done so, in a moment he would have been gone, and I should have died immediately afterwards. But here comes my father; I am sorry he finds me in our visitor's room. Thank Heaven, the Lieutenant is gone out! All appearance of sorrow must vanish from my face.

Enter PHILIBERT.

PHIL. My daughter, what are you doing in this room?

GIAN. Curiosity, sir, brought me here.

PHIL. And what excites your curiosity?

GIAN. To see a master who understands nothing of such things, and an awkward servant endeavouring to pack up a trunk.

PHIL. Do you know when he goes away?

GIAN. He intended going this morning, but, in walking across the room, his legs trembled so, that I fear he will not stand the journey.

PHIL. I think his present disease has deeper roots than his wound.

GIAN. Yet only one hurt has been discovered by the surgeons.

PHIL. Oh, there are wounds which they know nothing of.

GIAN. Every wound, however slight, makes its mark.

PHIL. Eh! there are weapons that give an inward wound.

GIAN. Without breaking the skin?

PHIL. Certainly.

GIAN. How do these wounds enter?

PHIL. By the eyes, the ears, the touch.

GIAN. You must mean by the percussion of the air.

PHIL. Air! no, I mean flame.

GIAN. Indeed, sir, I do not comprehend you.

PHIL. You do not choose to comprehend me.

GIAN. Do you think I have any mischievous design in my head?

PHIL. No; I think you a good girl, wise, prudent, who knows what the officer suffers from, and who, from a sense of propriety, appears not to know it.

GIAN. (Aside.) Poor me! his manner of talking alarms me.

PHIL. Giannina, you seem to me to blush.

GIAN. What you say, sir, of necessity makes me blush. I now begin to understand something of the mysterious wound of which you speak; but, be it as it may, I know neither his disease nor the remedy.

PHIL. My daughter, let us speak plainly. Monsieur de la Cotterie was perfectly cured a month after he arrived here; he was apparently in health, ate heartily, and began to recover his strength; he had a good complexion, and was the delight of our table and our circle. By degrees he grew sad, lost his appetite, became thin, and his gaiety was changed to sighs. I am something of a philosopher, and suspect his disease is more of the mind than of the body, and, to speak still more plainly, I believe he is in love.

GIAN. It may be as you say; but I think, were he in love, he would not be leaving.

PHIL. Here again my philosophy explains everything. Suppose, by chance, the young lady of whom he is enamoured were rich, dependent on her father, and could not encourage his hopes; would it be strange if despair counselled him to leave her?

GIAN. (Aside.) He seems to know all.

PHIL. And this tremor of the limbs, occurring just as he is to set out, must, I should say, viewed philosophically, arise from the conflict of two opposing passions.

GIAN. (Aside.) I could imprecate his philosophy!

PHIL. In short, the benevolence of my character, hospitality, to which my heart is much inclined, humanity itself, which causes me to desire the good of my neighbour, all cause me to interest myself in him; but I would not wish my daughter to have any share in this disease.

GIAN. Ah, you make me laugh! Do I look thin and pale? am I melancholy? What says your philosophy to the external signs of my countenance and of my cheerfulness?

PHIL. I am suspended between two opinions: you have either the power of self-control, or are practising deception.

GIAN. Have you ever found me capable of deception?

PHIL. Never, and for that reason I cannot believe it now.

GIAN. You have determined in your own mind that the officer is in love, which is very likely; but I am not the only person he may be suspected of loving.

PHIL. As the Lieutenant leaves our house so seldom, it is fair to infer his disease had its origin here.

GIAN. There are many handsome young ladies who visit us, and one of them may be his choice.

PHIL. Very true; and, as you are with them, and do not want wit and observation, you ought to know exactly how it is, and to relieve me from all suspicion.

GIAN. But if I have promised not to speak of it?

PHIL. A father should be excepted from such a promise.

GIAN. Yes, certainly, especially if silence can cause him any pain.

PHIL. Come, then, my good girl, let us hear. — (Aside.) I am sorry I suspected her.

GIAN. (Aside.) I find myself obliged to deceive him. — Do you know, sir, that poor Monsieur de la Cotterie loves to madness Mademoiselle Costanza?

PHIL. What! the daughter of Monsieur Riccardo?

GIAN. The same.

PHIL. And does the girl return his affection?

GIAN. With the greatest possible ardour.

PHIL. And what obstacle prevents the accomplishment of their wishes?

GIAN. Why, the father of the girl will hardly consent to give her to an officer who is not in a condition to maintain her reputably.

PHIL. A curious obstacle, truly. And who is this Monsieur Riccardo, that he has such rigorous maxims? He is nothing but a broker, sprung from the mud, grown rich amid the execrations of the people. Does he think to rank himself among the merchants of Holland? A marriage with an officer would be an honour to his daughter, and he could not better dispose of his ill-got wealth.

GIAN. It seems, then, if you were a broker, you would not refuse him your daughter?

PHIL. Assuredly not.

GIAN. But, being a Dutch merchant, the match does not suit you?

PHIL. No, certainly not; not at all — you know it very well.

GIAN. So I thought.

PHIL. I must interest myself in behalf of Monsieur de la Cotterie.

GIAN. In what manner, sir?

PHIL. By persuading Monsieur Riccardo to give him his daughter.

GIAN. I would not advise you to meddle in the affair.

PHIL. Let us hear what the Lieutenant will say.

GIAN. Yes, you should hear him first. — (Aside.) I must give him warning beforehand.

PHIL. Do you think he will set out on his journey immediately?

GIAN. I know he has already ordered his horses.

PHIL. I will send directly to see.

GIAN. I will go myself, sir. — (Aside.) I must take care not to make matters worse.

PHIL. (Alone.) I feel I have done injustice to my daughter in distrusting her; it is a happiness to me to be again certain of her sincerity. There may be some concealed deception in her words, but I will not believe her so artful; she is the daughter of a man who loves truth, and never departs from it, even in jest. Everything she tells me is quite reasonable: the officer may be in love with Mademoiselle Costanza; the absurd pride of the father considers the match as far below what his daughter is entitled to. I will, if possible, bring about the marriage by my mediation. On the one hand, we have nobility reduced in circumstances; on the other, a little accidental wealth; these fairly balance one another, and each party will find the alliance advantageous.

Enter MARIANNA.

MAR. Isn't my mistress here, sir?

PHIL. She is just gone.

MAR. By your leave. (Going.)

PHIL. Why are you in such haste?

MAR. I am going to find my mistress.

PHIL. Have you anything of consequence to say to her?

MAR. A lady has asked for her.

PHIL. Who is she?

MAR. Mademoiselle Costanza.

PHIL. Oh! is Mademoiselle Costanza here?

MAR. Yes; and I suspect, by her coming at this unusual hour, that it is something extraordinary that brings her here.

PHIL. I know what this extraordinary something is. (Smiling.) Say to Mademoiselle Costanza, that, before going to my daughter's room, I will thank her to let me see her here.

MAR. You shall be obeyed, sir.

PHIL. Is the officer in?

MAR. No, sir, he is gone out.

PHIL. As soon as he returns, ask him to come to me in this room.

MAR. Yes, sir. Do you think he will go away to-day?

PHIL. I am sure he will not.

MAR. Indeed, his health is so bad, that it would be dangerous for him to proceed on his journey.

PHIL. He shall remain with us, and he shall get well.

MAR. My dear master, you alone have the power of restoring him to health.

PHIL. I? How! do you know what is the Lieutenant's disease?

MAR. I know it; but do you, sir?

PHIL. I know everything.

MAR. Who told you?

PHIL. My daughter.

MAR. Indeed! (With an expression of surprise.)

PHIL. Why are you surprised? Would not my daughter be wrong to conceal the truth from her father?

MAR. Certainly; she has acted most wisely.

PHIL. Now we can find the remedy.

MAR. In truth, it is an honourable love.

PHIL. Most honourable.

MAR. The Lieutenant is an excellent young man.

PHIL. Most excellent.

MAR. It is his only misfortune that he is not rich.

PHIL. A handsome fortune with his wife would indeed make his situation more comfortable.

MAR. If the father is satisfied, no one has a right to complain.

PHIL. A father with an only child, when he finds an opportunity of marrying her respectably, ought to be pleased to avail himself of it.

MAR. May God bless you! these are sentiments worthy of so good a man. I am delighted both for the officer and the young lady. — (Aside.) And not less so for myself, as my beloved Gascoigne may now remain with me. (Exit.)

Enter MADemoiselle COSTANZA.

PHIL. (To himself.) Good actions deserve praise, and every person of sense will approve of what I am doing.

COST. Here I am, sir, at your commands.

PHIL. Ah, Mademoiselle Costanza! it gives me great pleasure to see you.

COST. You are very kind.

PHIL. I am gratified at your friendship for my daughter.

COST. She deserves it, and I love her with all my heart.

PHIL. Ah, do not say with all your heart!

COST. Why not? are you not convinced I love her sincerely?

PHIL. Sincerely, I believe, but not with all your heart.

COST. Why should you doubt it?

PHIL. Because, if you loved my daughter with all your heart, there would be none of it left for any one else.

COST. You make me laugh; and who should have a part of it?

PHIL. Ah, Mademoiselle, we understand!

COST. Indeed, I do not understand.

PHIL. Now let us dismiss Lady Modesty, and introduce Lady Sincerity.

COST. (Aside.) I cannot discover what he is aiming at.

PHIL. Tell me, have you come on purpose to visit my daughter?

COST. Yes, sir.

PHIL. No, Mademoiselle.

COST. For what, then?

PHIL. Know I am an astrologer. I am visited by a certain spirit that tells me everything, and hence I have learnt this: Mademoiselle Costanza has come not to visit those who stay, but those who go away.

COST. (Aside.) I suspect there is some truth in what the spirit says.

PHIL. What! are you puzzled how to answer?

COST. I will answer you frankly: if I have come to show civility to your guest, I do not perceive I deserve reproof.

PHIL. Reproof! on the contrary, praise; acts of civility ought not to be omitted — especially when dictated by a more tender feeling.

COST. You seem to be in a humour for jesting this morning.

PHIL. And you seem to be out of spirits; but I lay a wager I can cheer you up.

COST. Indeed?

PHIL. Without fail.

COST. And how?

PHIL. With two words.

COST. And what are those fine words?

PHIL. You shall hear them. Come this way — a little nearer. The Lieutenant is not going away. Does not your heart leap at this unexpected news?

COST. For mercy's sake! Monsieur Philibert, do you believe me in love?

PHIL. Say no, if you can.

COST. No; I can say it.

PHIL. Swear to it.

COST. Oh, I will not swear for such a trifle.

PHIL. You wish to hide the truth from me, as if I had not the power of serving you, or was unwilling to do so, and of serving the poor young man too, who is so unhappy.

COST. Unhappy, for what?

PHIL. On account of you.

COST. On account of me?

PHIL. Yes, you; we are in the dark, so that his love for you is in a manner hidden, and every one does not know that his despair sends him away.

COST. Despair for what?

PHIL. Because your father, from pride and avarice, will not consent to give you to him: this, my girl, is the whole affair.

COST. It appears that you know more of it than I do.

PHIL. You know, and do not choose to know. I make allowance for your modesty; but when a gentleman speaks to you, when a man of my character exerts himself in your behalf, you ought to lay aside modesty and open your heart freely.

COST. You take me so by surprise, I am embarrassed what answer to make.

PHIL. Let us end this conversation. Tell me, like an honest girl as you are, do you not love Monsieur de la Cotterie?

COST. You force me to own it.

PHIL. (Aside.) Thank Heaven! so my daughter spoke the truth. — And he loves you with an equal affection.

COST. Of that, sir, I know nothing.

PHIL. If you do not know it, I tell you so; he loves you to perdition.

COST. (Aside.) Can it be possible? and he has never declared it to me!

PHIL. And I have undertaken to persuade your father.

COST. But does my father know I am in love with the officer?

PHIL. He certainly ought to know.

COST. He has never mentioned it to me.

PHIL. Oh, your father will soon come and talk with you on the subject.

COST. He has never objected to my coming here, where I meet the officer.

PHIL. He knows that you are visiting in an honourable house; no greater liberty would be allowed you here than is proper for a modest young lady. In a word, are you willing that I should manage the affair?

5 COST. Entirely willing.

PHIL. Bravo! this is enough; and what would it avail you to deny with your lips what your looks proclaim? the flame that burns in your heart sparkles in your eyes.

10 COST. You have a most penetrating glance.

PHIL. Ah, here comes the officer.

COST. By your leave, sir.

PHIL. Where are you going?

15 COST. To Mademoiselle Giannina.

PHIL. Remain here, if you will.

COST. Oh no, sir, excuse me — your servant. — (Aside.) I am overjoyed! I know not in what world I am! (Exit.)

20

PHILIBERT, alone.

PHIL. How amusing these girls are! Boldness and modesty are mingled in so strange a manner, that it is a pleasure to observe them. Here is an instance of love to devotion, and if it succeeds it will be owing to my daughter's intervention.

Enter DE LA COTTERIE.

DE LA COT. They told me, sir, that you asked for me.

PHIL. Have you seen Mademoiselle Giannina?

DE LA COT. No, sir, I have not seen her.

35 PHIL. I am sorry that you appear so melancholy.

DE LA COT. One whose health is bad cannot be expected to look cheerful.

40 PHIL. Do you not know I am a physician, and have the skill to cure you?

DE LA COT. I did not know that you were skilled in the medical art.

PHIL. Well, my friend, capacities often exist where they are not suspected.

DE LA COT. Why, then, have you not prescribed for me before now?

PHIL. Because I did not sooner know the nature of your disease.

DE LA COT. Do you think you know it now?

PHIL. Yes, certainly — indubitably.

DE LA COT. If you are learned in the medical art, sir, you know much better than I do how fallacious and how little to be relied on are all the symptoms that seem to indicate the causes of disease.

PHIL. The indications of your disease are so infallible, that I am confident there is no mistake, and on condition that you trust to my friendship, you shall soon have reason to be content.

DE LA COT. And by what process do you propose to cure me?

PHIL. My first prescription shall be for you to abandon all intention of going away, and to take the benefit of this air, which will speedily restore you to health.

DE LA COT. On the contrary, I fear this air is most injurious to me.

PHIL. Do you not know that even from hemlock a most salutary medicine is extracted?

DE LA COT. I am not ignorant of the late discoveries, but your allusion covers some mystery.

PHIL. No, my friend; so far as mystery is concerned, each of us is now acting his part; but let us speak without metaphor. Your disease arises from love, and you think to find a remedy by going away, whereas it is an act of mere desperation. You carry the arrow in your heart, and hope to be relieved; but the same hand which placed it there must draw it out.

DE LA COT. Your discourse, sir, is altogether new to me.

PHIL. Why pretend not to understand me! Speak to me as a friend who loves you, and takes the same interest in you as if you were his son. Consider: by dissembling you may destroy your happiness for ever. My attachment to you arises from a knowledge of your merit, and from your having spent several months with me; besides, I should be mortified for you to have contracted in my house an unhappy passion; and therefore I most zealously interfere in your favour, and am anxious to find a remedy for you.

DE LA COT. My dear friend, how have you discovered the origin of my unhappiness?

PHIL. Shall I say the truth? — my daughter revealed it to me.

DE LA COT. Heavens! had she the courage to disclose it?

PHIL. Yes, after a little persuasion she told me everything.

DE LA COT. Oh, by the friendship you possess for me, have pity on my love!

PHIL. I have pity on you; I know what human frailty is at your age, and the violence of passion.

DE LA COT. I confess I ought not to have encouraged my affection, and concealed it from such a friend.

PHIL. This is the only complaint I have to make. You have not treated me with that unreserved confidence which I think I was entitled to.

DE LA COT. I had not the courage.

PHIL. Well, Heaven be praised! There is yet time. I know the girl loves you, for she told me so herself.

DE LA COT. And what do you say to it, sir?

PHIL. I approve of the marriage.

DE LA COT. You overwhelm me with joy.

PHIL. You see I am the good physician who understands the disease and knows the remedy.

DE LA COT. I can hardly feel assured of this great happiness.

PHIL. Why not?

DE LA COT. I thought the narrowness of my fortune an insuperable obstacle.

PHIL. Family and merit on your side are equal to a rich dower on the other.

DE LA COT. Your kindness to me is unequalled.

PHIL. But my kindness has yet done nothing; now it shall be my endeavour to provide for your happiness.

DE LA COT. This will depend entirely on your own good heart.

PHIL. We must exert ourselves to overcome the difficulties.

DE LA COT. And what are the difficulties?

PHIL. The consent of the father of the girl.

DE LA COT. My friend, it seems you are making game of me; from the way you spoke just now, I thought all obstacles were removed.

PHIL. But I have not mentioned it to him yet.

DE LA COT. To whom have you not mentioned it?

PHIL. To the father of the girl.

DE LA COT. Oh, Heavens! and who is the father of the girl?

PHIL. Good! You do not know him? you do not know the father of Mademoiselle Costanza, that horrid savage, Monsieur Riccardo, who has grown rich by usury, and has no idol but his money?

DE LA COT. (Aside.) I shall go mad! Thus end all my hopes.

PHIL. Riccardo does not visit at my house, you never go out, so it is not surprising you do not know him.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Ah! I am obliged to dissemble, not to disclose my love at a moment so unpropitious.

PHIL. But how did you know the father would not give you his daughter if you did not know him?

DE LA COT. I had reasons for thinking so, and for my despair there is no remedy.

PHIL. Am I not your physician?

DE LA COT. All your attention will be unavailing.

PHIL. Leave it to me; I will go immediately to find Monsieur Riccardo, and I flatter myself —

DE LA COT. No, sir, do not.

PHIL. It seems the prospect of success turns your head; just now you were all joy. Whence arises this sudden change?

DE LA COT. I am certain it will end unfortunately.

PHIL. Such despondency is unworthy of you, and unjust to me.

DE LA COT. Do not add to my unhappiness by your interference.

PHIL. Are you afraid the father will be obstinate? let me try.

DE LA COT. By no means; I am altogether opposed to it.

PHIL. And I am altogether for it, and will speak to him.

DE LA COT. I shall leave the Hague; I shall go in a few minutes.

PHIL. You will not treat me with so much incivility.

Enter GIANNINA.

GIAN. What, sirs, is the cause of this altercation?

PHIL. Monsieur de la Cotterie acts towards me with a degree of ingratitude that is anything but agreeable.

GIAN. Is it possible he can be capable of this?

DE LA COT. Ah, Mademoiselle, I am a most unfortunate man!

PHIL. I may say he does not know his own mind. He confessed his passion, and, when I offered to assist him, fell into transports; and then, when I promised to obtain the hand of Mademoiselle Costanza for him, he got furious, and threatened to go away.

GIAN. I am surprised the Lieutenant should still speak of leaving us.

DE LA COT. Would you have me stay and entertain such hopes? (Ironically.)

GIAN. I would have you stay, and entertain a mistress who loves you. With my father's permission, you shall hear what Mademoiselle Costanza has just said of you.

PHIL. May I not hear it?

GIAN. Impossible; my friend directed me to tell it to him alone.

PHIL. (Aside.) I shall hear all from my daughter when we are by ourselves.

GIAN. (Apart to DE LA COTTERIE.) I have contrived to make my father believe you were in love with Mademoiselle Costanza. As you love me, say it is so, and talk no more of going away.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Oh, the strata-gems of love!

PHIL. Will you still persist in your obstinacy?

DE LA COT. Ah, no, sir; I rely on your kindness.

PHIL. Do you desire me to speak to Monsieur Riccardo?

DE LA COT. Do what you please.

PHIL. Are you still anxious to go?

DE LA COT. I promise you to remain

here.

PHIL. (Aside.) What magic words have wrought this change? I am curious to hear them.

DE LA COT. Pardon, I pray you, my strange conduct.

PHIL. Willingly; the actions of lovers are often extravagant. Tell me, Giannina, is Mademoiselle Costanza gone?

GIAN. No, sir; she is waiting in my room.

PHIL. Go, Lieutenant, and keep her company for a little while.

DE LA COT. I would rather not, sir.

GIAN. Go, go. — (Aside to DE LA COTTERIE.) Listen! Wait for me in the antechamber; I will be there presently.

DE LA COT. I shall obey you, sir. (Exit.)

PHIL. (Aside.) The power of words! — 15 Well, what did you say to him?

GIAN. I told him to go to his mistress; that she expected him.

PHIL. But the first time you spoke to him?

GIAN. I said that Mademoiselle Costanza had hope she could persuade her father.

PHIL. Why did you not tell him so openly, before me?

GIAN. Things said in private often make the greatest impression.

PHIL. Perhaps so.

GIAN. By your leave. (Going.)

PHIL. Where are you going?

GIAN. To encourage this timid gentleman.

PHIL. Yes, by all means; I recommend him to you.

GIAN. Doubt not I shall take good care 35 of him. (Exit.)

PHIL. My girl has a good heart, and mine is like hers.

ACT II

SCENE I. The chamber of MADEMOISELLE GIANNINA.

MADemoISELLE COSTANZA, alone, seated.

COST. Who would ever have thought Monsieur de la Cotterie had such a liking for me? It is true he has always treated me with politeness, and been ready to converse with me; but I cannot say I have 50 observed any great signs of love. Now I have always loved him, but have not had courage enough to show it. I flatter myself he too loves me, and for the same reason conceals it; in truth a modest officer is a strange animal, and it is hard to believe in its existence. Monsieur Philibert must have reasons for what he says, and I am well pleased to think him not mistaken, especially as I have no evidence that he is so. Here comes my handsome soldier — but Mademoiselle Giannina is with him; she never permits us to be alone together for a moment. I have some suspicion she is my rival.

Enter MADEMOISELLE GIANNINA and DE LA COTTERIE.

GIAN. Keep your seat, Mademoiselle; excuse me for having left you alone for a little while. I know you will be kind enough to forgive me, and I bring some 20 one with me, who, I am sure, will secure your pardon.

COST. Though surely in your own house and with a real friend such ceremony is needless, your company is always agree- 25 able. I desire you will put yourself to no inconvenience.

GIAN. Do you hear, Lieutenant? You see we Dutch are not without wit.

DE LA COT. This is not the first time 30 I have observed it.

COST. Monsieur de la Cotterie is in a house that does honour to our country, and, if he admires ladies of wit, he need not go out of it.

GIAN. You are too polite, Mademoiselle.

COST. I simply do justice to merit.

GIAN. Let us not dispute about our merits, but rather leave it to the Lieu- 40 tenant to decide.

DE LA COT. If you wish a decision, you must choose a better judge.

GIAN. A partial one, indeed, cannot be a good judge.

COST. And to say nothing of partiality, he feels under obligations to you as the mistress of the house.

GIAN. Oh, in France, the preference is always given to the guest: is it not so, Lieutenant?

DE LA COT. It is no less the custom in Holland, than in my own country.

COST. That is to say, the greater the merit, the greater the distinction with which they are treated.

GIAN. On that principle you would be treated with the most distinction.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) I shall get into 5 trouble if this conversation continues.

COST. By your leave, Mademoiselle.

GIAN. Why do you leave us so soon?

COST. I am engaged to my aunt; I promised to dine with her to-day, and it is 10 not amiss to go early.

GIAN. Oh, it is too early; your aunt is old, and you will perhaps still find her in bed.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Do not prevent 15 her from going.

GIAN. He begs me to detain you.

COST. I am overpowered by your politeness. (Curtseying.) — (Aside.) Her amusement is to torment me.

GIAN. (To COSTANZA.) What say you, my friend, have I not a good heart?

COST. I must praise your kindness to me.

GIAN. (To DE LA COTTERIE.) And do 25 please you, too, own you are under obligations to me?

DE LA COT. Yes, certainly, I have reason to be grateful to you; you, who know my feelings, must be conscious of the 30 great favour you do me. (Ironically.)

GIAN. (To COSTANZA.) You hear him? he is delighted.

COST. My dear friend, as you have such a regard for me, and take so much 35 interest in him, allow me to speak freely to you. Your worthy father has told me a piece of news that overwhelms me with joy and surprise. If all he has told me be true, I pray you, Monsieur De la Cotterie, 40 to confirm it.

GIAN. This is just what I anticipated; but as your conversation cannot be brief, and your aunt expects you, had you not better defer it to another opportunity? 45

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Heaven grant I may not be still more involved!

COST. A few words are all I ask.

GIAN. Come, Lieutenant, take courage, and say all in a few words.

DE LA COT. Indeed, I have not the courage.

GIAN. No, my dear, it is impossible to express in a few words the infinite things he has to say to you.

COST. It will be enough if he says but one word.

GIAN. And what is that?

COST. That he really loves me.

GIAN. Pardon me; the Lieutenant is too polite to speak of love to one young lady in the presence of another; but I can, by going away, give you an opportunity of conversing together, and so remove all obstacles to an explanation. (Going.)

DE LA COT. Stay, Mademoiselle!

COST. Yes, and mortify me no more. Be assured I should never have spoken with the boldness I have done, had you not led me to do so. I do not comprehend your meaning; there is an inconsistency in your conduct; but, be it as it may, 20 time will bring the truth to light. And now permit me to take leave.

GIAN. My dear friend, pardon my inattention to you on first coming. You are mistress to go or remain as you

Enter PHILIBERT.

PHIL. What delightful company! But why are you on your feet? why do you not sit down?

GIAN. Costanza is just going.

PHIL. (To COSTANZA.) Why so soon?

GIAN. Her aunt expects her.

PHIL. No, my dear young lady, do me the favour to remain; we may want you, and in affairs of this kind moments are often precious. I have sent to your father, to say I desire to have a conversation with him; I am certain he will come. We will have a private interview, and, however little he may be inclined to give his consent, I shall press him so as not to leave him time to repent; if we agree, I will call you both immediately into my room.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Our situation is becoming more critical every moment.

PHIL. (To DE LA COTTERIE.) You seem to me to be agitated.

GIAN. It is the excess of joy.

PHIL. (To COSTANZA.) And what effect has hope on you?

COST. I have more fear than hope.

PHIL. Rely on me. For the present, be content to remain here; and, as we do not know exactly when your father will come, stay to dinner with us.

GIAN. She cannot stay, sir.

PHIL. Why not?

GIAN. Because she promised her aunt to dine with her to-day.

COST. (Aside.) I see she does not wish me to remain.

PHIL. The aunt who expects you is 10 your father's sister?

COST. Yes, sir.

PHIL. I know her; she is my particular friend. Leave it to me. I will get you released from the engagement, and, as soon 15 as Monsieur Riccardo comes here, I will send word to her where you are, and she will be satisfied.

COST. I am grateful, Monsieur Philibert, for your great kindness; permit me 20 for a moment to see my aunt, who is not well. I will soon return, and avail myself of your politeness.

PHIL. Very well; come back quickly.

COST. Good-morning to you; you will 25 soon see me again.

GIAN. Good-bye. — (Aside.) If she does not come back I shall not break my heart.

PHIL. Adieu, my dear. — One moment. 30 Lieutenant, for a man who has been in the wars, you do not seem quite as much at your ease as you should be.

COST. Why do you say so, sir?

PHIL. Because you are letting Made- 35 moiselle go away without taking notice of her — without one word of civility.

COST. Indeed, he has said but few.

DE LA COT. (To PHILIBERT.) I ought not to abuse the privilege you have given 40 me.

PHIL. (Aside.) I understand. — Giannina, a word with you.

GIAN. Yes, sir?

PHIL. (Aside to GIANNINA.) It is not 45 right for a young lady to thrust herself between two lovers in this manner; on account of you, they cannot speak two words to each other.

GIAN. (To PHILIBERT.) They spoke 50 in whispers together.

PHIL. (To DE LA COTTERIE.) Well, if you have anything to say to her —

DE LA COT. There will be time enough, sir.

PHIL. (To GIANNINA.) Attend to me.

COST. (Aside to DE LA COTTERIE.) At 5 least assure me of your affection.

DE LA COT. (Aside to COSTANZA.) Excuse me, Mademoiselle. (GIANNINA coughs aloud.) (Aside.) I am exceedingly embarrassed.

COST. (Loud enough for all to hear.) Is it possible you will not say once that you love me?

GIAN. (To COSTANZA, with asperity.) How many times do you want him to tell you so? Did he not say so before me?

PHIL. (To GIANNINA, with asperity.) No meddling, I tell you.

COST. Do not disturb yourself, Mademoiselle; to see clearly here is not easy. I wish you all a good-morning. Adieu, Lieutenant. — (Aside.) He is worried by this troublesome girl. (Exit.)

PHIL. (To GIANNINA.) I am not pleased with your ways.

GIAN. My dear father, let me amuse myself a little. I, who am so free from love, like sometimes to vex these lovers. As it was I who discovered their passion for each other, they are under obligations to me for their approaching happiness; hence they may pardon my jokes.

PHIL. You girls are the devil! but the time will come, my daughter, when you will know how trying to lovers are these little teasing ways. You are now old enough, and the first good offer that presents itself, be prepared to accept it. What says Monsieur de la Cotterie! Am I not right?

DE LA COT. Quite right.

GIAN. Monsieur Quite Right, that is for me to decide, not for you.

PHIL. Are you averse to being married?

GIAN. If I could find a husband to my 55 taste —

PHIL. I shall be pleased if he is to your taste — to mine he certainly must be; the fortune I intend for you will make you equal to the best match in Holland.

GIAN. The father of Mademoiselle Costanza says the same.

PHIL. Do you compare Monsieur Riccardo with me? or do you compare yourself to the daughter of a broker? You vex me when you talk so. I will hear no more.

GIAN. But I do not say —

PHIL. I'll hear no more. (Exit.)

DE LA COT. Ah, my Giannina, our affairs are worse than ever. How much better not to have taken such a step!

GIAN. Who could have foreseen my father would involve himself as he has done?

DE LA COT. I see no remedy but my 10 immediate departure.

GIAN. Such weakness I did not expect.

DE LA COT. Then I may be forced to marry Mademoiselle Costanza.

GIAN. Do so, if you have the heart.

DE LA COT. Or shall the whole mystery be explained?

GIAN. It would be a most unhandsome act, to expose me to the shame of having contrived such a deception.

DE LA COT. Then do you suggest some plan.

GIAN. All I can say is this: think no more of going away. As to marrying Mademoiselle Costanza, it is absurd; to 25 discover our plot preposterous. Resolve, then, on some plan to secure at the same time our love, our reputation, and our happiness. (Exit.)

DE LA COT. Excellent advice! but 30 among so many things not to be done, where shall we find what is to be done? Alas! nothing remains but absolute despair. (Exit.)

SCENE II

Enter MONSIEUR PHILIBERT, alone.

PHIL. I can never believe Monsieur Riccardo refuses to come here; he knows 40 who I am, and that it is to his interest not to offend one who can do him either good or harm. He must remember I lent him ten thousand florins when he commenced business, but there are persons 45 who easily forget benefits, and regard neither friends nor relations, when they can no longer make use of them.

Enter MARIANNA.

MAR. If I do not interrupt you, Monsieur Philibert, I would say something to you.

PHIL. I am now at leisure.

MAR. I would speak to you of an affair of my own.

PHIL. Well, be quick, for I am expecting 5 company.

MAR. I will tell you in two words: with your permission, I would get married.

PHIL. Get married, then! much good may it do you!

MAR. But this is not all, sir. I am a poor girl, and have now lived ten years in your family; with what attention and fidelity I have served you, you know. I ask you, not for the value of the thing, 15 but as a mark of your favour, to make me a small present.

PHIL. Well, I will do something for you as a recompense for your faithful services. Have you found a husband?

MAR. Yes, sir.

PHIL. Bravo! I am glad of it. And you tell me of it after it is all arranged?

MAR. Pardon me, sir; I should not do so now, but accident has led me to an engagement with a young man of small means, which makes me come to you.

PHIL. I will lay a wager it is the servant of the officer with whom you are in love.

MAR. You are right, sir.

PHIL. And are you willing to travel all over the world with him?

MAR. I am in hopes he will live here, if his master marries, as they say —

PHIL. Yes, it is likely he will get married. 35

MAR. No one should know better than you, sir.

PHIL. I am most anxious to see him happy.

MAR. As that is the case, sir, I consider it as though it were already done.

PHIL. There may be difficulties in the way, but I hope to overcome them.

MAR. There are none, I think, on the 45 part of the young lady.

PHIL. No; she is much in love with him.

MAR. That is evident.

PHIL. And when do you propose to be 50 married?

MAR. If it please you, sir, at the same time my young lady is married.

PHIL. What young lady?

MAR. My mistress, your daughter.

PHIL. If you wait till then, you will have time enough.

MAR. Do you think her marriage will be long delayed?

PHIL. Good! Before talking of her marriage, the husband must be found.

MAR. Why, is there not a husband?

PHIL. A husband! not that I know of.

MAR. You do not know?

PHIL. Poor me! I know nothing of it. Tell me what you know, and do not hide the truth.

MAR. You astonish me! Is she not to marry Monsieur de la Cotterie? Did you 15 not tell me so yourself, and that you were pleased at it?

PHIL. Blockhead! Did you suppose I would give my daughter to a soldier — the younger son of a poor family? to one 20 who has not the means of supporting her in the way she has been accustomed to from her birth?

MAR. Did you not say just now that Monsieur de la Cotterie was about to be 25 married, and that you were most anxious for his happiness?

PHIL. To be sure I did.

MAR. And, pray, whom is he to marry, if not Mademoiselle Giannina?

PHIL. Blockhead! Are there no girls at the Hague but her?

MAR. He visits at no other house.

PHIL. And does nobody come here?

MAR. I do not perceive that he pays 35 attention to any one but my young mistress.

PHIL. Blockhead! Don't you know Mademoiselle Costanza?

MAR. A blockhead cannot know every- 40 thing.

PHIL. Has my daughter made you her confidant?

MAR. She always speaks of the officer with the greatest esteem, and expresses 45 much pity for him.

PHIL. And did you believe her pity proceeded from love?

MAR. I did.

PHIL. Blockhead!

MAR. I know, too, he wanted to go away, because he was in despair —

PHIL. Well?

MAR. Fearing her father would not give his consent.

PHIL. Excellent!

MAR. And are you not that father?

5 PHIL. Are there no other fathers?

MAR. You gave me to understand they were to be married.

PHIL. How absurd is your obstinacy!

MAR. I will venture my head I am 10 right.

PHIL. You should understand your mistress better, and respect her more than to think so.

MAR. Indeed, it is an honourable love.

PHIL. Begone directly!

MAR. I see no great harm in it.

PHIL. Here comes some one — Monsieur Riccardo. Go quickly.

MAR. You are too rough, sir.

PHIL. Blockhead!

MAR. We shall see who is the block-head, I or —

PHIL. You or I the blockhead?

MAR. I — or that man passing along 25 the street. (Exit.)

PHIL. Impertinent! whether she gets married or not, she shall stay no longer in my house. To have such an opinion of my daughter! Giannina is not capable of 30 it; no, not capable.

Enter MONSIEUR RICCARDO.

RIC. Your servant, Monsieur Philibert.

PHIL. Good-day to you, Monsieur Riccardo. Excuse me if I have put you to any inconvenience.

RIC. Have you any commands for me?

PHIL. I wish to have some conversation with you. Pray be seated.

RIC. I can spare but a few moments.

PHIL. Are you much engaged just now?

RIC. Yes, indeed; among other things, I am harassed by a number of people about the case of the smugglers who have been 45 arrested.

PHIL. I have heard of it. Are these poor people still in prison?

RIC. Yes; and I wish they may remain 50 there until their house is utterly ruined.

PHIL. And have you the heart to bear the tears of their children?

RIC. Had they not the heart to violate the laws of the customs — to defraud the revenue? I wish I could catch them oftener; do you not know that smugglers on conviction pay all costs?

PHIL. (Aside.) Oh! his vile employment.

RIC. Well, what have you to say to me?

PHIL. Monsieur Riccardo, you have a 10 daughter to marry.

RIC. Yes, and a plague to me she is.

PHIL. Does her being in your house put you to any inconvenience?

RIC. No; but the thought of providing 15 for her when she marries does.

PHIL. (Aside.) How contemptible! — If she wishes to marry, you must provide for her.

RIC. I shall do so; I shall be obliged 20 to do so; but on one of two conditions: without a fortune, if she marries to please herself, — with one, if to please me.

PHIL. I have a proposal to make to you.

RIC. Let me hear it, but be quick.

PHIL. Do you know a certain French officer who is a guest in my house?

RIC. Do you propose him for my daughter?

PHIL. Say I did, would you have any objection?

RIC. An officer, and a Frenchman! He shall have my daughter neither with nor without a fortune.

PHIL. Are you, then, opposed to the French and the military?

RIC. Yes, to both equally; much more so if they are united in the same person. I hate the French, because they are not 40 friends to commerce and industry, as we are; they care for nothing but suppers, the theatre, and amusement. With soldiers I have no reason to be pleased: I know how much I lose by them. They 45 contend we contractors are obliged to maintain their infantry — their horse; and, when they are in quarters, they waste a whole arsenal full of money.

PHIL. The French officer of whom I 50 speak is an honourable man; he has no vice, and is moreover of a noble family.

RIC. Is he rich?

PHIL. He is a younger son.

RIC. If he is not rich, I value but little his nobility, and still less his profession.

5 PHIL. My dear friend, let us speak confidentially. A man like you, blessed with a large fortune, can never better employ fifty or sixty thousand florins, than by bestowing them on his daughter, when she marries so worthy a man.

RIC. On this occasion, I would not give ten livres.

PHIL. And to whom will you give your daughter?

RIC. If I am to dispose of so large a sum of money, I wish to place it in one of the best houses in Holland.

PHIL. You will never do so.

RIC. I shall never do so?

PHIL. No, never.

RIC. Why not?

PHIL. Because the respectable houses in Holland have no occasion to enrich themselves in this manner.

25 RIC. You esteem this French officer highly?

PHIL. Most highly.

RIC. Why not then give him your own daughter?

30 PHIL. Why not? Because — because I do not choose.

RIC. And I do not choose to give him mine.

PHIL. There is some difference between 35 you and me.

RIC. I do not perceive in what it consists.

PHIL. We know very well how you began.

RIC. But we do not know how you will end.

PHIL. Your language is too arrogant.

RIC. Were we not in your house, it should be stronger.

PHIL. I will let you know who I am.

RIC. I am not afraid of you.

PHIL. Go; we will speak of this again.

RIC. Yes, again. — (Aside.) If he ever falls into my hands — if I catch him in the least evasion of the revenue laws — I swear I will destroy him. (Exit.)

PHIL. A rascal! a brute without civility! an impertinent fellow!

Enter DE LA COTTERIE.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Their conference, ending in an altercation, makes me hope he has refused his daughter.

PHIL. (Aside.) I am not I, if I do not let him see —

DE LA COT. Monsieur —

PHIL. An ill-tempered, worthless —

DE LA COT. Are these compliments intended for me, sir?

PHIL. Pardon me; I am carried away by my anger.

DE LA COT. Who has offended you?

PHIL. That insolent fellow, Monsieur 15 Riccardo.

DE LA COT. And has he refused his consent to the marriage?

PHIL. (Aside.) I am sorry I must bring this new trouble on the poor Lieu- 20 tenant.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Heaven be praised! fortune at last aids me.

PHIL. My friend, never give way to resentment — to impatience of temper.

DE LA COT. Tell me the truth; does he refuse his daughter?

PHIL. A man in this world ought to be prepared for any event.

DE LA COT. I am impatient to hear 30 the truth.

PHIL. (Aside.) Ah! if I tell him, he will drop down dead.

DE LA COT. (Aside.) This suspense is intolerable.

PHIL. (Aside.) Yet he must know.

DE LA COT. By your leave, sir. (Going.)

PHIL. Stay a moment. — (Aside.) If he goes, there is danger he will destroy himself from despair.

DE LA COT. Why not tell me at once what he said to you?

PHIL. Control yourself. Do not give way to despair, because an avaricious, presumptuous, ignorant father refuses to 45 marry his daughter respectably. There is a way to manage it in spite of him.

DE LA COT. No, sir; when the father refuses, it is not proper for me to persist.

PHIL. Well, what do you mean to do? 50

DE LA COT. To go far away, and to sacrifice my love to honour, duty, and universal quiet.

PHIL. And have you the heart to abandon a girl who loves you? — to leave her a prey to despair? — soon to receive the sad intelligence of her illness, perhaps of 5 her death!

DE LA COT. Ah, Monsieur Philibert, your words will kill me! if you knew their force, you would be cautious how you used them.

PHIL. My words will conduct you to joy, to peace, to happiness.

DE LA COT. Ah, no! rather to sorrow and destruction.

PHIL. It is strange that a man of spirit like you should be so easily discouraged.

DE LA COT. If you knew my case, you would not talk so.

PHIL. I know it perfectly, but do not consider it desperate. The girl loves you — you love her passionately. This will not be the first marriage between young persons that has taken place without the consent of parents.

DE LA COT. Do you approve of my 25 marrying the daughter without the consent of the father?

PHIL. Yes — in your case — considering the circumstances, I do approve of it. If the father is rich, you are of a noble family. You do him honour by the connection; he provides for your interest by a good dowry.

DE LA COT. But, sir, how can I hope for any dowry when I marry his daughter 35 in this manner? The father, offended, will refuse her the least support.

PHIL. When it is done, it is done. He has but this only child; his anger may last a few days, and then he must do what 40 so many others have done: he will receive you as his son-in-law, and perhaps make you master of his house.

DE LA COT. And may I hope for this?

PHIL. Yes, if you have courage.

DE LA COT. I do not want courage; the difficulty lies in the means.

PHIL. There is no difficulty in the means. Hear my suggestions. Made- 50 moiselle Costanza must now be at her aunt's. Do what I tell you. Give up your dinner to-day, as I shall do mine on your account. Go and find her. If she loves you in earnest, persuade her to show her love by her actions. If the aunt is favourable to your designs, ask her protection, and then, if the girl consents, marry her.

DE LA COT. And if the injured father should threaten to send me to prison?

PHIL. Carry her with you into France.

DE LA COT. With what means? With what money?

PHIL. Wait a moment. (Goes and opens a bureau.)

DE LA COT. (Aside.) Oh, Heavens! how unconscious is he that he is encouraging me to an enterprise, of which the injury may fall on his own head!

PHIL. Take this. Here are a hundred guineas in gold, and four hundred more in notes: these five hundred guineas will serve you for some time; accept them from my friendship. I think I can make the father of the girl return them to me.

DE LA COT. Sir, I am full of confusion —

PHIL. What confuses you? I am astonished at you! you want spirit; you want courage. Go quickly, and do not lose a moment. In the meantime, I will observe the movements of Monsieur Riccardo, and, if there is any danger of his surprising you, I will find persons to keep him away. Let me know what happens, either in person or by note. My dear friend, you seem already to have recovered your spirits. I rejoice for your sake. May fortune be propitious to you! — (Aside.) I am anxious to see Monsieur Riccardo in a rage — in despair. (Closes the bureau.)

DE LA COT. (Aside.) He gives me counsel, and money to carry it into effect. What shall I resolve on? what plan shall I follow? Take fortune on the tide; and he can blame no one but himself, who, contriving a stratagem against another, falls into his own snare. (Exit.)

MONSIEUR PHILIBERT, alone.

PHIL. In truth, I feel some remorse of conscience for the advice and aid I have given. I remember, too, that I have a daughter, and I would not have such an injury done to me. Nature tells us, and the law commands, not to do to others what we should not wish done to us. But

I am carried along by several reasons; a certain gentleness of disposition inclining me to hospitality, to friendship, makes me love the Lieutenant, and take almost the same interest in him as if he were my son. The marriage appears to me to be a suitable one, the opposition of Monsieur Riccardo unjust, and his severity to his daughter tyranny. Add to all this the uncivil treatment I have received from him, the desire to be revenged, and the pleasure of seeing his pride humbled. Yes, if I lose the five hundred guineas, I shall have the satisfaction of seeing my friend made happy, and Monsieur Riccardo mortified.

Enter MADEMOISELLE COSTANZA.

COST. Here I am, sir.

PHIL. (Disturbed.) What brings you here?

COST. Did you not send for me?

PHIL. (As before.) Have you seen Monsieur de la Cotterie?

COST. No, sir, I have not seen him.

PHIL. Return at once to your aunt's.

COST. Do you drive me from your house?

PHIL. No, I do not drive you away, but I advise you — I entreat. Go quickly, I tell you.

COST. I wish to know the reason.

PHIL. You shall know it when you are at your aunt's.

COST. Has anything new occurred?

PHIL. Yes, there is something new.

COST. Tell me what it is.

PHIL. Monsieur de la Cotterie will tell you.

COST. Where is he?

PHIL. At your aunt's.

COST. The Lieutenant has not been there.

PHIL. He is this moment gone there.

COST. What for?

PHIL. Return; then you will know it.

COST. Have you spoken to my father?

PHIL. Yes; ask your husband that is to be.

COST. My husband!

PHIL. Yes, your husband.

COST. Monsieur de la Cotterie?

PHIL. Monsieur de la Cotterie.

COST. May I rely on it?

PHIL. Go directly to your aunt's.

COST. Please tell me what has happened.

PHIL. Time is precious; if you lose time, you lose your husband.

COST. Ah me! I will run with all speed; 5 would that I had wings to my feet. (Exit.)

Enter MADEMOISELLE GIANNINA.

PHIL. Two words from the Lieutenant are worth more than a thousand from 10 me.

GIAN. Is what Monsieur de la Cotterie has told me true, sir?

PHIL. What has he told you?

GIAN. That you advised him to marry 15 the girl without the consent of her father.

PHIL. Did he tell you this in confidence?

GIAN. Yes, sir.

PHIL. (Aside.) I am displeased at his indiscretion.

GIAN. And that you gave him five hundred guineas to aid him in the scheme.

PHIL. (Aside.) Imprudent! I am almost sorry I did so.

GIAN. Your silence confirms it; it is true, then?

PHIL. Well, what do you say to it?

GIAN. Nothing, sir. It is enough for me to know you did it. Your humble 30 servant, sir.

PHIL. Where are you going?

GIAN. To amuse myself.

PHIL. In what manner?

GIAN. With the marriage of Monsieur 35 de la Cotterie.

PHIL. But it has not taken place yet.

GIAN. I hope it soon will.

PHIL. Be cautious — mention it to no 40 one.

GIAN. Never fear; it will be known as soon as it is over. You will have the credit of contriving it, and I shall be most happy when it is done. (Exit.) 45

PHIL. (Alone.) I hope she will not imitate this bad example; but there is no danger. She is a good girl, and, like me, can distinguish between cases, and understands what is proper; and as I 50 know how she has been brought up, under my own care, I have no apprehensions such a misfortune may befall me.

ACT III

SCENE I

PHILIBERT and MARIANNA.

MAR. Excuse me for interrupting you again.

PHIL. I suppose you have some new piece of nonsense?

MAR. I hope you will not again call me blockhead.

PHIL. Not unless you utter more absurdities.

MAR. I have only to tell you I am just going to be married, and to bespeak your kindness.

PHIL. Then you have determined to marry before your mistress?

20 MAR. No, sir; she is to be married to-day, and I shall be married to-morrow.

PHIL. And you do not wish me to call you blockhead?

MAR. You still persist in concealing it 25 from me?

PHIL. Concealing what?

MAR. The marriage of my young lady.

PHIL. Are you out of your senses?

MAR. Now, to show you I am not so foolish, I will own a fault I have committed, from curiosity. I stood behind the hangings, and heard Monsieur de la Cotterie talking with your daughter, and it is fixed on that they are to be married privately this evening, and you have given five hundred guineas on account of her portion.

PHIL. On account of her portion! (Laughing.)

MAR. Yes, I think on account of her portion; I saw the guineas with my own eyes.

PHIL. Yes, you are foolish, more foolish, most foolish.

MAR. (Aside.) He vexes me so I hardly know what to do.

PHIL. The Lieutenant, however, has acted very improperly; he ought not to have mentioned it to my daughter, especially when there was danger of being overheard.

MAR. If you hide it from me for fear I shall make it public, you do wrong to my discretion.

PHIL. Your discretion, indeed! you conceal yourself, listen to what people are talking about, misunderstand them, and then report such nonsense.

MAR. I was wrong to listen, I admit; but as to misunderstanding, I am sure I heard right.

PHIL. You will force me to say or do something not very pleasant.

MAR. Well, well! where did Mademoiselle Giannina go just now?

PHIL. Where did she go?

MAR. Did she not go out with Monsieur de la Cotterie?

PHIL. Where?

MAR. I heard they went to Madame Gertrude's.

PHIL. To my sister's?

MAR. Yes, sir.

PHIL. Giannina may have gone there, but not the Lieutenant.

MAR. I know they went out together, sir.

PHIL. The Lieutenant may have accompanied her; my sister's house is near the place where he was to go; my daughter might choose to be at hand to hear the news. I know all; everything goes on well, and I say again you are a blockhead.

MAR. (Aside.) This is too bad; I can scarcely keep my temper.

PHIL. See who is in the hall — I hear some one.

MAR. (Aside.) Oh, it will be excellent if a trick has been played on the old gentleman! but it is impossible. (Exit.)

PHIL. (Alone.) Heaven grant it may end well! The imprudence of the Lieutenant might have ruined the plot, but young persons are subject to these indiscretions. I fortunately had sense enough when I was a young man, and have more now I am old.

Enter GASCOIGNE.

GAS. Your servant, Monsieur Philibert.

PHIL. Good-day, my friend. What news have you?

GAS. My master sends his best compliments.

PHIL. Where is the Lieutenant? What is he doing? How go his affairs?

GAS. I believe this note will give you full information.

PHIL. Let us see. (Opens it.)

GAS. (Aside.) As he does not send me away, I will remain here.

PHIL. (To himself.) There is a paper enclosed, which seems to be written by my daughter. Let us first know what my friend says.

GAS. (Aside.) Marianna is listening behind the hangings; she is as curious as I am.

PHIL. (Reading.) "Monsieur: Your advice has encouraged me to a step which I should not have had the boldness to venture on, however urged by the violence of my love." Yes, indeed, he wanted courage. "I have carried Mademoiselle to a respectable and secure house, that is to say, to her aunt's."

He must have met Costanza, and they have gone together. I did well to send her quickly; all my own work!

"The tears of the girl softened the good old lady, and she assented to our marriage." Excellent, excellent! it could not be better done.

"Orders were given for a notary to be called in, and the marriage service was performed in the presence of two witnesses."

Admirable — all has gone on well. "I cannot express to you my confusion, not having the courage to ask anything but your kind wishes; the rest will be added in the writing of your daughter, whom you will more readily pardon. I kiss your hand."

What does he want of me that he has not the courage to ask, and gets my daughter to intercede? Let me read the enclosed. He must have gone immediately to my sister's, to let Giannina know when the marriage was over. Well, what says my daughter?

"Dear father." She writes well — a good mercantile hand; she is a fine girl, God bless her. "Permit me, through this letter, to throw myself at your feet, and to ask your pardon." Oh, Heavens! what has she done?

"Informed by yourself of the advice you had given to Monsieur de la Cotterie, and of the money you furnished him with to carry it into execution, I have yielded to my affection, and married the Lieutenant."

Oh, infamous! Deceiver! traitress! abandoned! They have killed me!

Enter MARIANNA.

MAR. What has happened, sir?

PHIL. Help me! support me! for Heaven's sake do not leave me!

MAR. How can such a blockhead help 10 you?

PHIL. You are right; laugh at me — abuse me — show me no mercy. I deserve it all, and I give you full liberty to do so.

MAR. No; I feel compassion for you.

PHIL. I am not worthy of your compassion.

GAS. Do not, sir, abandon yourself to despair; my master is an honourable 20 gentleman, of a noble family.

PHIL. He has ruined my daughter; he has destroyed my hopes.

MAR. You are able to provide handsomely for him.

PHIL. And shall my estate go in this way?

GAS. Pardon me, sir; the same arguments you urged to convince Monsieur Riccardo may serve to convince your- 30 self.

PHIL. Ah, traitor! do you amuse yourself at my folly?

MAR. Gascoigne speaks to the purpose, and you have no right to complain of him. 35 (With warmth.)

PHIL. Yes, insult me, rejoice at my disgrace!

MAR. I have pity on you, blinded as you are by anger.

GAS. Condemn yourself for the fruits of your own bad advice.

PHIL. Why deceive me? why make me believe the love of the officer was for Mademoiselle Costanza?

GAS. Because love is full of stratagems, and teaches lovers to conceal their passion, and to contrive schemes for their own happiness.

PHIL. And if Monsieur Riccardo had 50 agreed to the marriage of his daughter, what a figure I should have made in the affair!

GAS. My master never asked you to interfere for him.

PHIL. No, but he let me do it.

GAS. Say, rather, that you did not 5 understand him.

PHIL. In short, they have betrayed and cheated me; the conduct of my daughter is treacherous, and that of the Lieutenant infamous.

GAS. You should speak more respectfully, sir, of an officer.

MAR. Remember, soldiers wear swords.

PHIL. Yes, that is right; all he has to 15 do now is to kill me.

GAS. My master has no such cruel design; you will soon see him come to ask your pardon.

PHIL. I do not wish to see him at all.

GAS. Your daughter, then, shall come instead of him.

PHIL. Name her not to me.

MAR. Your own flesh and blood, sir!

PHIL. Ungrateful! she was my love — 25 my only joy.

GAS. What is done cannot be undone.

PHIL. I know it, insolent — I know it too well.

GAS. Do not be offended with me, sir.

MAR. Have compassion on him, his anger overpowers him. My poor master! he hoped to marry his daughter to a man of his own choice — to have her always 35 near him — to see his grandchildren around him — to delight in their caresses, and to instruct them himself.

PHIL. All my hopes are gone; no consolation is left for me.

40 GAS. Do you think, sir, your excellent son-in-law, a worthy Frenchman, and a good soldier, cannot provide grandchildren for you?

MAR. Not a year shall pass, but you 45 will see the finest boy in the world gambling around your feet.

PHIL. My hatred for the father will make me hate the child.

MAR. Oh, the sense of consanguinity will cause you to forget every injury.

GAS. You have one only daughter in the world; can you have the heart to abandon her — never to see her more?

PHIL. My anguish of mind will kill me. (Covers his face with his hands.)

MAR. Gascoigne!

GAS. What do you say?

MAR. Do you understand me? (Makes a sign for him to go out.)

GAS. I understand.

MAR. Now is the time.

GAS. So it may prove.

PHIL. What do you say?

MAR. I am telling Gascoigne to go away, to disturb you no longer, and not to abuse your patience.

PHIL. Yes, let him leave me.

GAS. Your servant, sir. Excuse me, if, after having committed such an offence in your house, you see me no more. My master, as things appear at present, will be forced to leave this, and to carry his wife to France. Have you no message to your poor daughter?

PHIL. Do you think he will go away so soon?

GAS. He told me, if he received no kind answer from you, to order horses immediately.

MAR. It is a great grief to a father never to see his daughter again.

PHIL. Is your master a barbarian? is he so ungrateful? Could I have done more for him? And he has used me with the greatest inhumanity; to seduce the heart of my daughter, and the whole time to conceal it from me.

GAS. He would willingly have brought her to you before now, but for the fear of your resentment.

PHIL. Perfidious! I have to applaud him for his handsome action, — I have to be grateful for his treachery; he shuns the reproaches of an offended father, — he cannot bear to hear himself called traitor.

GAS. I understand; by your leave. (Going.)

PHIL. Tell him he must never dare to come in my presence; I do not wish to see him, — I do not desire it.

GAS. (Aside.) I understand perfectly; nature never fails. (Exit.)

MAR. (Aside.) Matters will soon be accommodated.

PHIL. (To himself.) My own injury! this is good! — to my own injury!

MAR. To turn your thoughts from this subject, sir, may I now speak to you concerning my own affairs?

PHIL. I need nothing else to torment me but for you to talk of your marriage. I hate the very word, and never wish to hear it again while I live.

MAR. It seems, then, you want the world to come to an end.

PHIL. For me it is ended.

MAR. My poor master! and where will your estate go — your riches?

PHIL. May the devil take them!

MAR. You would die rich, and let your daughter live in want?

PHIL. Poor unhappy girl!

MAR. And would you carry this hatred in your bosom, and feel remorse at your death?

PHIL. Be silent, devil! torture me no more.

Enter MADEMOISELLE COSTANZA.

COST. Monsieur Philibert, you have made sport of me.

PHIL. (Aside.) This was wanting to complete all.

COST. I have been waiting two hours, and no one has appeared.

PHIL. (Aside.) I know not what answer to make.

COST. Did you not urge me to return to my aunt's, telling me the Lieutenant would be there?

MAR. My young lady, you shall hear how it was. The Lieutenant had to go to the aunt's, — and to the aunt's he went. There he was to have an understanding with Mademoiselle, — and he had an understanding with Mademoiselle. But the poor gentleman mistook the house: instead of going to Aunt Hortensia's he found himself at Aunt Gertrude's, and, instead of marrying Mademoiselle Costanza, he has married Mademoiselle Giannina.

COST. Can it be possible they have laughed at and deceived me in this manner? Speak, Monsieur Philibert; tell me truly what has been done, and do not suppose me patient enough to submit to such an injury.

PHIL. Oh, if I submit to it, you must submit too.

COST. And what have you to submit to?

PHIL. On your account I have been accessory to the ruin of my daughter.

COST. On my account?

PHIL. Yes; the machine I contrived for you has fallen on my own head.

MAR. Fortunately my master's skull is reasonably thick.

COST. I understand nothing of all this.

PHIL. I will tell you plainly and distinctly the whole affair. Know then —

Enter MONSIEUR RICCARDO.

RIC. (To COSTANZA.) What are you doing here?

PHIL. (To himself.) Another torment!

COST. Sir, you have never forbidden my coming here.

RIC. Well, now I forbid it. I know what you have come for; I know your love for the foreigner, and your schemes against my authority and your own honour.

PHIL. (To RICCARDO, with asperity.) You know nothing. If you knew as much as I do, you would not speak so.

RIC. I speak so in consequence of what you told me this morning, and no light matter it is; enough to make me forbid my daughter's coming to your house.

MAR. Are you afraid they will marry her against your wishes?

RIC. I may well fear it.

MAR. Listen to me: if she does not marry my master, there is nobody else here for her to marry.

RIC. Where is the Frenchman — the officer?

MAR. Shall I tell him, sir?

PHIL. Ah! he will hear it soon enough.

MAR. Know, then, the officer has presumed to marry my young mistress.

RIC. Ah! (With surprise.)

PHIL. Oh! (With vexation.)

COST. This is the wrong I apprehended. Ah, my father, resent the insult they have offered to me! They have made use of me to accomplish their designs; they have flattered me to expose me to ridicule; and the injury I have received is an insult to our family.

RIC. Yes, I will resent the insult they have offered to me. You I will send to a convent; and Monsieur Philibert makes amends for his offence by his own shame.

PHIL. (Aside.) Quite right — I deserve yet more.

COST. (Aside.) Wretched me! to what am I brought by my passion, my wretchedness, and disobedience!

PHIL. My dear friend, excuse my impatient manner. I acknowledge the injustice I have done you, and Heaven punishes me rightly for my improper intentions. Ah, Monsieur Riccardo, I have lost my daughter! — I contrived my own disgrace!

RIC. Lost! she is only married — not entirely lost.

PHIL. I fear I shall never see her again. Who knows but that monster has already carried her away? I gave him five hundred guineas to carry away my heart — my daughter — my only daughter — my love — my only love! Ah, could I embrace her once more! I wish to know if she is gone; I want to see her again. If she is gone, I will kill myself with my own hand. (Going, meets his daughter.)

Enter MADEMOISELLE GIANNINA, and, a little after, DE LA COTTERIE.

GIAN. Ah, dearest father!

PHIL. Ah, most ungrateful daughter!

GIAN. For mercy's sake, pardon me! (Throws herself on her knees.)

PHIL. Do you deserve pardon?

GIAN. Your anger is most just.

PHIL. (Aside.) I shall not survive it; I must die.

RIC. Both are to be pitied.

COST. (Aside.) I shall be revenged if her father refuses to forgive her.

PHIL. Rise.

GIAN. I will not rise without your pardon.

PHIL. How could you have the heart to cause me so great an affliction?

GIAN. Ah, sir, your advice —

PHIL. Not a word of it! torture me no more; never mention again my own folly and weakness. Rise; on that condition I pardon you.

GIAN. Oh, dearest father! (Rises.)

COST. (Aside.) She obtains forgiveness on easy terms.

GIAN. Ah, sir, let your grace extend —

PHIL. Do not speak to me of your husband!

GIAN. Oh, give him a place in your heart, or I shall be forced to leave you.

PHIL. Perfidious! to talk so to your father!

GIAN. Conjugal duty will oblige me to take this step.

PHIL. Oh, hard fate of a father! but it is just — I deserve more.

RIC. My friend, the act is done, there is no remedy. I advise you to be reconciled to him before your curious mishap is known throughout the whole city.

PHIL. (To COSTANZA.) I entreat you, Mademoiselle — I entreat you not to make it known, for the sake of my honour and reputation. (To MARIANNA.) I tell you not to speak of it. My daughter, 20 mention it to no one.

GIAN. No, for the love of Heaven, let nobody hear of it. Quick! let everything be settled before any one leaves this room. Quick, my dear husband, come here; 25 throw yourself at my father's feet, ask his pardon, kiss his hand; and do you pardon him, receive him for a son-in-law and for a son. Quick! hush! that no one may hear of it. (She rapidly does everything as she says it.)

PHIL. (Aside.) I am confounded; I know not what to say.

COST. He has not the firmness to resist the sight of his ungrateful daughter. (Exit.) 35

DE LA COT. Have I your pardon, sir?

PHIL. Do you think you deserve it?

GIAN. For Heaven's sake, say no more! We must take care that nobody shall know what has happened. My father is 40 anxious to save the honour of his family; and, above all things, I charge you never to urge in your justification that he advised the scheme, and gave you five hundred guineas to carry it into execution.

PHIL. (To GIANNINA, with asperity.) I commanded you not to mention it.

GIAN. I was only informing my husband of your commands.

RIC. Well, Monsieur Philibert, are you reconciled?

PHIL. What can I do? I am constrained by necessity, by affection, by my own kind disposition, to be reconciled to them. You are husband and wife, you are in my house, remain here, and may Heaven bless you!

GIAN. Oh, perfect happiness!

DE LA COT. I hope, sir, you will never 15 repent of your pardon and kindness to me.

MAR. Hush! quick! that nobody may know it.

PHIL. What now?

MAR. Hush! quick! There is a little affair of mine to be finished. Gascoigne is to be my husband, with the permission of our masters.

GAS. (To his master.) By your leave, 25 sir. (Gives her his hand.)

MAR. Hush! quick! that nobody may know it.

GIAN. Against your marriage nothing can be said; mine may be condemned. I confess that I have exceeded the limits of duty, that I have been wanting in respect to my father, and have exposed to hazard my own honour and the reputation of my family. Those who now see me happy, 35 and not punished, must be cautious not to follow a bad example; let them rather say it has pleased Heaven to mortify the father, and not that the daughter is exempt from remorse and regret. Most kind spectators, let the moral of this representation be a warning to families, and may whatever enjoyment you derive from it be consistent with the principles of duty and of virtue.

GERMAN

LESSING

(1729-1781)

Gotthold Ephraim Lessing was born in Saxony, the son of a Lutheran minister. Brilliant, voracious of knowledge, he went at seventeen to the University of Leipsic to prepare for the pulpit; but at the University he acquired an interest in writing which led him, upon his departure from Leipsic, to take up writing for journals. Even at this period his writing was distinguished by erudition and a forceful style. During the Seven Years' War he served as secretary to the general in command in Silesia. At the close of the war he returned to write Laokoön and Minna von Barnhelm. Laokoön is an important critical essay in which the author upholds the belief that poetry is an essentially different art from painting or sculpture and that it is less limited in scope than either.

Lessing's writings brought him little profit. His ability was recognized everywhere, but his uncompromising and independent spirit made it difficult for him to accept or hold a lucrative position. Even at the zenith of his literary career he lived in discomfort, if not in actual penury. Although he is chiefly notable as a critic, his dramas deserve attention because they illustrate the development of literary taste enunciated in his criticism. Lessing was a classicist in quite another sense than Racine, Boileau, Voltaire, or Pope. Caring little for the sanctity of the classical rules themselves, he believed that a great dramatist like Sophocles got at the important elements of human life, and that modern writers should study him. Hence, his particular brand of classicism constituted a revolt against the set rules and mechanical formulæ of the French neo-classical school, which he disapproved of not because they were French but because he thought them cramped and inflexible. Lessing was extremely desirous that Germany should break away from France and write her own literature; and he advocated a literature devoid of nationalistic bias — a literature of the world. His attitude, best represented by the Hamburg Dramaturgy, one of the world's most important pieces of dramatic criticism, seems to form a link between the Age of Classicism and the Age of Romanticism.

In his dramas his classical tendencies and his ambition for universality are both illustrated. Miss Sara Sampson (1755) shows English influence, deals with English characters, and is at the same time essentially a modern Medea; the scene of Emilia Galotti (1772) is laid in Italy, and the story is a modernization of the Roman tale of Virginius; the plot of Nathan the Wise (1779) is based on Hebrew literature, and the ethical lesson is intended for all mankind. In the comedy Minna von Barnhelm (1763) Lessing's scope is somewhat more restricted than in his tragedies. It is a military play in which Lessing shows his disapproval of mercenary military service, and, by bringing together the Prussian Tellheim and the Saxon Minna, indicates that the enmity between these two parts of the German empire is unnatural and due only to temporary disagreements. It is a neatly constructed comedy and altogether charming. Looking to England, we find somewhat similar technique in Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer.

The following translation comes from the Dramatic Works of G. E. Lessing, edited by Ernest Bell, London, G. Bell and Sons, 1914.

CHARACTERS

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, a discharged officer.
 MINNA VON BARNHELM.
 FRANZISKA, her lady's maid.
 JUST, servant to the MAJOR.
 PAUL WERNER, an old Sergeant of the MAJOR'S.
 THE LANDLORD of an Inn.
 A LADY.
 AN ORDERLY.
 RICCAUT DE LA MARLINIÈRE.

The scene alternates between the Parlour of an Inn, and a Room adjoining it.

ACT I

SCENE I

JUST.

JUST (sitting in a corner, and talking while asleep). Rogue of a landlord! You treat us so? On, comrade! hit hard! (He strikes with his fist, and wakes through the exertion.) Ha! there he is again! I cannot shut an eye without fighting with him. I wish he got but half the blows. Why, it is morning! I must just look for my poor master at once; if I can help it, he shall not set foot in the cursed house again. I wonder where he has passed the night?

SCENE II

LANDLORD, JUST.

LAND. Good-morning, Herr Just; good-morning! What, up so early! Or shall I say — up so late?

JUST. Say which you please.

LAND. I say only — good-morning! and that deserves, I suppose, that Herr Just should answer "Many thanks."

JUST. Many thanks.

LAND. One is peevish, if one can't have one's proper rest. What will you bet the Major has not returned home, and you have been keeping watch for him?

JUST. How the man can guess everything!

LAND. I surmise, I surmise.

JUST (turns round to go). Your servant!

LAND. (stops him). Not so, Herr Just!

JUST. Very well, then, not your servant!

LAND. What, Herr Just, I do hope you are not still angry about yesterday's affair! Who would keep his anger over night?

JUST. I; and over a good many nights.

LAND. Is that like a Christian?

JUST. As much so as to turn an honourable man who cannot pay to a day, out of doors, into the street.

LAND. Fie! who would be so wicked?

JUST. A Christian innkeeper. — My master! such a man! such an officer!

LAND. I thrust him from the house into the streets? I have far too much respect for an officer to do that, and far too much pity for a discharged one! I was obliged to have another room prepared for him. Think no more about it, Herr Just. (Calls.) — Hullo! I will make it good in another way. (A lad comes.) Bring a glass; Herr Just will have a drop; something good.

JUST. Do not trouble yourself, Mr. Landlord. May the drop turn to poison, which . . . But I will not swear; I have not yet breakfasted.

LAND. (to the lad, who brings a bottle of spirits and a glass). Give it here; go! Now, Herr Just; something quite excellent; strong, delicious, and wholesome. (Fills, and holds it out to him.) That can set an over-taxed stomach to rights again!

JUST. I hardly ought! — And yet why should I let my health suffer on account of his incivility? (Takes it, and drinks.)

LAND. May it do you good, Herr Just!

JUST (giving the glass back). Not bad! But, Landlord, you are nevertheless an ill-mannered brute!

LAND. Not so, not so! . . . Come, another glass; one cannot stand upon one leg.

JUST (after drinking). I must say so much — it is good, very good! Made at home, Landlord?

LAND. At home, indeed! True Dantzig, real double distilled!

JUST. Look ye, Landlord; if I could play the hypocrite, I would do so for such stuff as that; but I cannot, so it must out. — You are an ill-mannered brute all the same.

LAND. Nobody in my life ever told me that before. . . . But another glass, Herr Just; three is the lucky number!

JUST. With all my heart! — (Drinks.) Good stuff indeed, capital! But truth is good also, and indeed, Landlord, you are an ill-mannered brute all the same!

LAND. If I was, do you think I should let you say so?

JUST. Oh! yes; a brute seldom has spirit.

LAND. One more, Herr Just: a four stranded rope is the strongest.

JUST. No, enough is as good as a feast! And what good will it do you, Landlord? I shall stick to my text till the last drop in the bottle. Shame, Landlord, to have such good Dantzig, and such bad manners! To turn out of his room, in his absence — a man like my master, who has lodged at your house above a year; from whom you have had already so many shining thalers¹; who never owed a heller ¹ in his life — because he let payment run for a couple of months, and because he does not spend quite so much as he used.

¹ A thaler amounted approximately to what is now the American dollar.

LAND. But suppose I really wanted the room and saw beforehand that the Major would willingly have given it up if we could only have waited some time for his return! Should I let strange gentlefolk like them drive away again from my door? Should I wilfully send such a prize into the clutches of another innkeeper? Besides, I don't believe they could have got a lodging elsewhere. The inns are all now quite full. Could such a young, beautiful, amiable lady remain in the street? Your master is much too gallant for that. And what does he lose by the change? Have not I given him another room?

JUST. By the pigeon-house, at the back, with a view between a neighbour's chimneys.

LAND. The view was uncommonly fine, before the confounded neighbour obstructed it. The room is otherwise very nice, and is papered —

JUST. Has been!

LAND. No, one side is so still. And the little room adjoining, what is the matter with that? It has a chimney which, perhaps, smokes somewhat in the winter —

JUST. But does very nicely in the summer. I believe, Landlord, you are mocking us into the bargain!

LAND. Come, come; Herr Just, Herr Just —

JUST. Don't make Herr Just's head hot —

LAND. I make his head hot? It is the Dantziger does that.

JUST. An officer, like my master! Or do you think that a discharged officer is not an officer, who may break your neck for you? Why were you all, you Landlords, so civil during the war? Why was every officer an honourable man then, and every soldier a worthy, brave fellow? Does this bit of a peace make you so bumptious?

LAND. What makes you fly out so, Herr Just!

JUST. I will fly out.

SCENE III

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, LANDLORD,
JUST.

MAJ. T. (entering). Just!

JUST (supposing the LANDLORD is still speaking). Just? Are we so intimate?

MAJ. T. Just!

JUST. I thought I was "Herr Just" with you.

LAND. (seeing the MAJOR). Hist! hist! Herr Just, Herr Just, look round; your master —

MAJ. T. Just, I think you are quarrelling! What did I tell you?

LAND. Quarrel, your honour? God forbid! Would your most humble servant dare to quarrel with one who has the honour of being in your service?

JUST. If I could but give him a good whack on that cringing cat's back of his!

LAND. It is true Herr Just speaks up for his master, and rather warmly; but in that he is right. I esteem him so much the more: I like him for it.

JUST. I should like to knock his teeth out for him!

LAND. It is only a pity that he puts himself in a passion for nothing. For I feel quite sure that your honour is not displeased with me in this matter, since — necessity — made it necessary —

MAJ. T. More than enough, sir! I am in your debt; you turn out my room in my absence. You must be paid, I must seek a lodging elsewhere. Very natural.

LAND. Elsewhere? You are going to quit, honoured sir? Oh, unfortunate stricken man that I am. No, never! Sooner shall the lady give up the apartments again. The Major cannot and will not let her have his room. It is his; she must go; I cannot help it. I will go, honoured sir —

MAJ. T. My friend, do not make two foolish strokes instead of one. The lady must retain possession of the room —

LAND. And your honour could suppose that from distrust, from fear of not being paid, I . . . As if I did not know that your honour could pay me as soon as you pleased. The sealed purse . . . five hundred thalers in louis d'ors¹ marked on it — which your honour had in your writing-desk . . . is in good keeping.

MAJ. T. I trust so; as the rest of my property. Just shall take them into his keeping, when he has paid your bill —

LAND. Really, I was quite alarmed when I found the purse. I always considered your honour a methodical and prudent man, who never got quite out of money . . . but still, had I supposed there was ready money in the desk —

MAJ. T. You would have treated me rather more civilly. I understand you. Go, sir; leave me. I wish to speak with my servant.

LAND. But, honoured sir —

MAJ. T. Come, Just; he does not wish to permit me to give my orders to you in his house.

LAND. I am going, honoured sir! My whole house is at your service. (Exit.)

SCENE IV

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, JUST.

JUST (stamping with his foot and spitting after the LANDLORD). Ugh!

MAJ. T. What is the matter?

JUST. I am choking with rage.

MAJ. T. That is as bad as from plethora.

JUST. And for you, sir, I hardly know you any longer. May I die before your eyes, if you do not encourage this malicious, unfeeling wretch. In spite of gallows, axe, and torture I could . . . yes, I could have throttled him with these hands, and torn him to pieces with these teeth!

MAJ. T. You wild beast!

JUST. Better a wild beast than such a man!

MAJ. T. But what is it that you want?

JUST. I want you to perceive how much he insults you.

MAJ. T. And then —

JUST. To take your revenge. . . . No, the fellow is beneath your notice!

MAJ. T. But to commission you to avenge me? That was my intention from the first. He should not have seen me again, but have received the amount of his bill from your hands. I know that you can throw down a handful of money with a tolerably contemptuous mien.

JUST. Oh! a pretty sort of revenge!

MAJ. T. Which, however, we must defer. I have not one heller of ready money, and I know not where to raise any.

JUST. No money! What is that purse then with five hundred dollars' worth of louis d'ors, which the Landlord found in your desk?

MAJ. T. That is money given into my charge.

JUST. Not the hundred pistoles¹ which your old sergeant brought you four or five weeks back?

MAJ. T. The same. Paul Werner's; right.

JUST. And you have not used them yet? Yet, sir, you may do what you please with them. I will answer for it that

MAJ. T. Indeed!

JUST. Werner heard from me, how they had treated your claims upon the War 25 Office. He heard —

MAJ. T. That I should certainly be a beggar soon, if I was not one already. I am much obliged to you, Just. And the news induced Werner to offer to share his 30 little all with me. I am very glad that I guessed this. Listen, Just; let me have your account, directly too; we must part.

JUST. How! what!

MAJ. T. Not a word. There is someone 35 coming.

SCENE V

LADY in mourning, MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, JUST.

LADY. I ask your pardon, sir.

MAJ. T. Whom do you seek, Madam?

LADY. The worthy gentleman with whom I have the honour of speaking. You 45 do not know me again. I am the widow of your late captain.

MAJ. T. Good heavens, Madam, how you are changed!

LADY. I have just risen from a sick bed, to which grief on the loss of my husband brought me. I am troubling you at a very early hour, Major von Tellheim, but I am going into the country, where a kind, but also unfortunate friend, has for the present offered me an asylum.

¹ Louis d'ors and pistoles amount to approximately four dollars apiece in American money.

MAJ. T. (to JUST). Leave us.

SCENE VI

LADY, MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

MAJ. T. Speak freely, Madam! You must not be ashamed of your bad fortune 10 before me. Can I serve you in any way?

LADY. Major —

MAJ. T. I pity you, Madam! How can I serve you? You know your husband was my friend; my friend, I say, 15 and I have always been sparing of this title.

LADY. Who knows better than I do how worthy you were of his friendship — how worthy he was of yours? You would 20 have been in his last thoughts, your name would have been the last sound on his dying lips, had not natural affection, stronger than friendship, demanded this sad prerogative for his unfortunate son, 25 and his unhappy wife.

MAJ. T. Cease, Madam! I could willingly weep with you; but I have no tears to-day. Spare me! You come to me at a time when I might easily be misled to 30 murmur against Providence. Oh! honest Marloff! Quick, Madam, what have you to request? If it is in my power to assist you, if it is in my power —

LADY. I cannot depart without fulfilling his last wishes. He recollected, shortly before his death, that he was dying a debtor to you, and he conjured me to discharge his debt with the first ready money I should have. I have sold his carriage, 40 and come to redeem his note.

MAJ. T. What, Madam! Is that your object in coming?

LADY. It is. Permit me to count out the money to you.

MAJ. T. No, Madam. Marloff a debtor to me! that can hardly be. Let us look, however. (Takes out a pocketbook, and searches.) I find nothing of the kind.

LADY. You have doubtless mislaid his note; besides, it is nothing to the purpose. Permit me —

MAJ. T. No, Madam; I am careful not to mislay such documents. If I have not got it, it is a proof that I never had it, or that it has been honoured and already returned by me.

LADY. Major!

MAJ. T. Without doubt, Madam; Marloff does not owe me anything — nor can I remember that he ever did owe me anything. This is so, Madam. He has much rather left me in his debt. I have never been able to do anything to repay a man who shared with me good and ill luck, honour and danger, for six years. I shall 15 not forget that he has left a son. He shall be my son, as soon as I can be a father to him. The embarrassment in which I am at present —

LADY. Generous man! But do not think so meanly of me. Take the money, Major, and then at least I shall be at ease.

MAJ. T. What more do you require to tranquillize you, than my assurance that the money does not belong to me? Or do you wish that I should rob the young orphan of my friend? Rob, Madam; for that it would be in the true meaning of the word. The money belongs to him; invest 30 it for him.

LADY. I understand you; pardon me if I do not yet rightly know how to accept a kindness. Where have you learnt that a mother will do more for her child than for the preservation of her own life? I am going —

MAJ. T. Go, Madam, and may you have a prosperous journey! I do not ask you to let me hear from you. Your news might come to me when it might be of little use to me. There is yet one thing, Madam; I had nearly forgotten that which is of most consequence. Marloff also had claims upon the chest of our old 45 regiment. His claims are as good as mine. If my demands are paid, his must be paid also. I will be answerable for them.

LADY. Oh! Sir . . . but what can I 50 say? Thus to purpose future good deeds is, in the eyes of heaven, to have performed them already. May you receive its reward, as well as my tears. (Exit.)

SCENE VII

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

MAJ. T. Poor, good woman! I must not forget to destroy the bill. (Takes some papers from his pocketbook and destroys them.) Who would guarantee that my own wants might not some day tempt me to make use of it?

SCENE VIII

JUST, MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

MAJ. T. Is that you, Just?

JUST (wiping his eyes). Yes.

MAJ. T. You have been crying?

JUST. I have been writing out my account in the kitchen, and the place is full of smoke. Here it is, sir.

MAJ. T. Give it to me.

JUST. Be merciful with me, sir. I know well that they have not been so with you; still —

MAJ. T. What do you want?

JUST. I should sooner have expected my death, than my discharge.

MAJ. T. I cannot keep you any longer: I must learn to manage without servants. (Opens the paper and reads.) "What my master, the Major, owes me: — Three months and a half wages, six thalers per month, is 21 thalers. During the first part of this month, laid out in sundries — 1 thaler 7 groschen 9 pfennigs. Total, 22 thalers 7gr. 9pf." Right; and it is just that I also pay your wages, for the whole of the current month.

JUST. Turn over, sir.

MAJ. T. Oh! more? (Reads.) "What I owe my master, the Major: — Paid for me to the army-surgeon twenty-five thalers. Attendance and nurse during my cure, paid for me, thirty-nine thalers. Advanced, at my request, to my father — who was burnt out of his house and robbed — without reckoning the two horses of which he made him a present, fifty thalers. Total 114 thalers. Deduct the above 22 thalers, 7gr. 9pf.; I remain in debt to my master, the Major, 91 thalers, 16gr. 3pf." You are mad, my good fellow!

JUST. I willingly grant that I owe you much more; but it would be wasting ink to write it down. I cannot pay you that: and if you take my livery from me too, which, by the way, I have not yet earned, — I would rather you had let me die in the workhouse.

MAJ. T. For what do you take me? You owe me nothing; and I will recommend you to one of my friends, with whom you will fare better than with me.

JUST. I do not owe you anything, and yet you turn me away!

MAJ. T. Because I do not wish to owe you anything.

JUST. On that account? Only on that account? As certain as I am in your debt, as certain as you can never be in mine, so certainly shall you not turn me away now. Do what you will, Major, I remain in your service; I must remain.

MAJ. T. With your obstinacy, your insolence, your savage boisterous temper towards all who you think have no business to speak to you, your malicious pranks, your love of revenge, —

JUST. Make me as bad as you will, I shall not think worse of myself than of my dog. Last winter I was walking one evening at dusk along the river, when I heard something whine. I stooped down, and reached in the direction whence the sound came, and, when I thought I was saving a child, I pulled a dog out of the water. That is well, thought I. The dog followed me; but I am not fond of dogs, so I drove him away — in vain. I whipped him away — in vain. I shut him out of my room at night; he lay down before the door. If he came too near me, I kicked him; he yelped, looked up at me, and wagged his tail. I have never yet given him a bit of bread with my own hand; and yet I am the only person whom he will obey, or who dare touch him. He jumps about me, and shows off his tricks to me, without my asking for them. He is an ugly dog, but he is a good animal. If he carries it on much longer, I shall at last give over hating him.

MAJ. T. (aside). As I do him. No, there is no one perfectly inhuman. Just, we will not part.

JUST. Certainly not! And you wanted to manage without servants! You forget your wounds, and that you only have the use of one arm. Why, you are not able to dress alone. I am indispensable to you; and I am — without boasting, Major, — I am a servant who, if the worst comes to the worst, can beg and steal for his master.

MAJ. T. Just, we will part.

JUST. All right, Sir!

SCENE IX

SERVANT, MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, JUST.

SER. I say, comrade!

JUST. What is the matter?

SER. Can you direct me to the officer who lodged yesterday in that room? (pointing to the one out of which he is coming).

JUST. That I could easily do. What have you got for him?

SER. What we always have, when we have nothing — compliments. My mistress hears that he has been turned out on her account. My mistress knows good manners, and I am therefore to beg his pardon.

JUST. Well then, beg his pardon; there he stands.

SER. What is he? What is his name?

MAJ. T. I have already heard your message, my friend. It is unnecessary politeness on the part of your mistress, which I beg to acknowledge duly. Present my compliments to her. What is the name of your mistress?

SER. Her name! We call her my lady.

MAJ. T. The name of her family?

SER. I have not heard that yet, and it is not my business to ask. I manage so that I generally get a new master every six weeks. Hang all their names!

JUST. Bravo, comrade!

SER. I was engaged by my present mistress a few days ago, in Dresden. I believe she has come here to look for her lover.

MAJ. T. Enough, friend. I wished to know the name of your mistress, not her secrets. Go!

SER. Comrade, he would not do for my master.

SCENE X

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, JUST.

MAJ. T. Just! see that we get out of this house directly! The politeness of this strange lady affects me more than the churlishness of the host. Here, take this ring — the only thing of value which I have left — of which I never thought of making such a use. Pawn it! get eighty louis d'ors for it: our host's bill can scarcely amount to thirty. Pay him, and remove my things. . . . Ah, where? Where you will. The cheaper the inn, the better. You will find me in the neighbouring coffee-house. I am going; you will see to it all properly?

JUST. Have no fear, Major!

MAJ. T. (comes back). Above all things, do not let my pistols be forgotten, which hang beside the bed.

JUST. I will forget nothing.

MAJ. T. (comes back again). Another thing: bring your dog with you too. Do you hear, Just?

SCENE XI

JUST.

JUST. The dog will not stay behind, he will take care of that. Hem! My master still had this valuable ring! and carried it in his pocket instead of on his finger! My good landlord, we are not yet so poor as we look. To him himself, I will pawn you, you beautiful little ring! I know he will be annoyed that you will not all be consumed in his house. Ah! —

SCENE XII

PAUL WERNER, JUST.

JUST. Hullo, Werner! good-day to you, Werner. Welcome to the town.

WER. The accursed village! I can't manage to get at home in it again. Merry, my boys, merry; I have got some more money! Where is the Major?

JUST. He must have met you; he just went down stairs.

WER. I came up the back stairs. How is he? I should have been with you last week, but —

JUST. Well, what prevented you?

WER. Just, did you ever hear of Prince Heraclius?

JUST. Heraclius? Not that I know of.

WER. Don't you know the great hero of the East?

JUST. I know the wise men of the East well enough, who go about with the stars on New Year's Eve.

WER. Brother, I believe you read the 10 newspapers as little as the Bible. You do not know Prince Heraclius. Not know the brave man who seized Persia, and will break into the Ottoman Porte in a few days? Thank God, there is still war somewhere in the world! I have long enough hoped it would break out here again. But there they sit and take care of their skins. No, a soldier I was, and a soldier I must be again! In short (looking round carefully, to see if anyone is listening), between 20 ourselves, Just, I am going to Persia, to have a few campaigns against the Turks, under his Royal Highness Prince Heraclius.

JUST. You?

WER. I myself. Our ancestors fought bravely against the Turks; and so ought we too, if we would be honest men and good Christians. I allow that a campaign against 30 the Turks cannot be half so pleasant as one against the French; but then it must be so much the more beneficial in this world and the next. The swords of the Turks are all set with diamonds.

JUST. I would not walk a mile to have my head split with one of their sabres. You will not be so mad as to leave your comfortable little farm!

WER. Oh! I take that with me. Do 40 you see? The property is sold.

JUST. Sold?

WER. Hist! Here are a hundred ducats,¹ which I received yesterday towards the payment: I am bringing them for 45 the Major.

JUST. What is he to do with them?

WER. What is he to do with them? Spend them; play them, or drink them away, or whatever he pleases. He must 50 have money, and it is bad enough that they have made his own so troublesome to him. But I know what I would do, were I in his place. I would say — "The deuce take you all here; I will go with Paul Werner to Persia!" Hang it! Prince Heraclius must have heard of Major von Tellheim, if he has not heard of Paul Werner, his late sergeant. Our affair at Katzenhäuser —

JUST. Shall I give you an account of 10 that?

WER. You give me! I know well that a fine battle array is beyond your comprehension. I am not going to throw my pearls before swine. Here, take the hundred ducats; give them to the Major: tell 15 him, he may keep these for me too. I am going to the market now. I have sent in a couple of loads of rye; what I get for them he can also have.

JUST. Werner, you mean it well; but we don't want your money. Keep your ducats; and your hundred pistoles you 20 can also have back safe, as soon as you please.

25 WER. What, has the Major money still?

JUST. No.

WER. Has he borrowed any?

JUST. No.

WER. On what does he live, then?

JUST. We have everything put down in the bill; and when they won't put anything more down, and turn us out of the house, we pledge anything we may happen 30 to have, and go somewhere else. I say, Paul, we must play this landlord here a trick.

WER. If he has annoyed the Major, I am ready.

JUST. What if we watch for him in the evening, when he comes from his club, and give him a good thrashing?

WER. In the dark! Watch for him! Two to one! No, that won't do.

JUST. Or if we burn his house over his 35 head?

WER. Fire and burn! Why, Just, one hears that you have been baggage-boy and not soldier. Shame!

JUST. Or if we ruin his daughter? But 40 she is cursedly ugly.

WER. She has probably been ruined long ago. At any rate you don't want any help there. But what is the matter with you? What has happened?

¹ Ducats were old coins valued at what would be a little over two dollars in American money.

JUST. Just come with me, and you shall hear something to make you stare.

WER. The devil must be loose here, then?

JUST. Just so; come along.

WER. So much the better! To Persia, then; to Persia.

ACT II

SCENE I — Minna's Room.

MINNA, FRANZISKA.

MIN. (in morning dress, looking at her watch). Franziska, we have risen very early. The time will hang heavy on our hands.

FRAN. Who can sleep in these abominable large towns? The carriages, the watchmen, the drums, the cats, the soldiers, never cease to rattle, to call, to roll, to mew, and to swear; just as if the last thing the night is intended for was for sleep. 25 Have a cup of tea, my lady!

MIN. I don't care for tea.

FRAN. I will have some chocolate made.

MIN. For yourself, if you like.

FRAN. For myself! I would as soon 30 talk to myself as drink by myself. Then the time will indeed hang heavy. For very weariness we shall have to make our toilets, and try on the dress in which we intend to make the first attack.

MIN. Why do you talk of attacks, when I have only come to require that the capitulation be ratified?

FRAN. But the officer whom we have dislodged, and to whom we have apolo- 40 gized, cannot be the best bred man in the world, or he might at least have begged the honour of being allowed to wait upon you.

MIN. All officers are not Tellheims. 45 To tell you the truth, I only sent him the message in order to have an opportunity of inquiring from him about Tellheim. Franziska, my heart tells me my journey will be a successful one and that I shall 50 find him.

FRAN. The heart, my lady! One must not trust to that too much. The heart echoes to us the words of our tongues. If the tongue was as much inclined to speak the thoughts of the heart, the fashion of keeping mouths under lock and key would have come in long ago.

MIN. Ha! ha! mouths under lock and key. That fashion would just suit me.

FRAN. Rather not show the most beautiful set of teeth, than let the heart 10 be seen through them every moment.

MIN. What, are you so reserved?

FRAN. No, my lady; but I would willingly be more so. People seldom talk of the virtue they possess, and all the more 15 often of that which they do not possess.

MIN. Franziska, you made a very just remark there.

FRAN. Made! Does one make it, if it occurs to one?

MIN. And do you know why I consider it so good? It applies to my Tellheim.

FRAN. What would not, in your opinion, apply to him?

MIN. Friend and foe say he is the bravest man in the world. But who ever heard him talk of bravery? He has the most upright mind; but uprightness and nobleness of mind are words never on his 30 tongue.

FRAN. Of what virtues does he talk then?

MIN. He talks of none, for he is wanting in none.

FRAN. That is just what I wished to hear. 35

MIN. Wait, Franziska; I am wrong. He often talks of economy. Between ourselves, I believe he is extravagant.

FRAN. One thing more, my lady. I have often heard him mention truth and constancy towards you. What if he be inconstant?

MIN. Miserable girl! But do you mean that seriously?

FRAN. How long is it since he wrote to you?

MIN. Alas! he has only written to me once since the peace.

FRAN. What — a sigh on account of the peace? Surprising! Peace ought only to make good the ill which war causes; but it seems to disturb the good which the latter, its opposite, may have occasioned. Peace should not be so capricious! . . . How long have we had peace? The time seems wonderfully long, when there is so little news. It is no use the post going regularly again; nobody writes, for nobody has anything to write about.

MIN. "Peace has been made," he wrote to me, "and I am approaching the fulfilment of my wishes." But since he only wrote that to me once, only once — FRAN. And since he compels us to run after this fulfilment of his wishes ourselves . . . If we can but find him, he shall pay for this! Suppose, in the meantime, he may have accomplished his wishes, and we should learn here that —

MIN. (anxiously). That he is dead?

FRAN. To you, my lady; and married to another.

MIN. You tease, you! Wait, Franziska, I will pay you out for this! But talk to me, or I shall fall asleep. His regiment was disbanded after the peace. Who knows into what a confusion of bills and papers he may thereby have been brought? Who knows into what other regiment, or to what distant station, he may have been sent? Who knows what circumstances — There's a knock at the door.

FRAN. Come in!

SCENE II

LANDLORD, MINNA, FRANZISKA.

LAND. (putting his head in at the door). Am I permitted, your ladyship?

FRAN. Our landlord? — Come in!

LAND. (a pen behind his ear, a sheet of paper and an inkstand in his hand). I am come, your ladyship, to wish you a most humble good-morning; (to FRANZISKA) and the same to you, my pretty maid.

FRAN. A polite man!

MIN. We are obliged to you.

FRAN. And wish you also a good-morning.

LAND. May I venture to ask how your ladyship has passed the first night under my poor roof?

FRAN. The roof is not so bad, sir; but the beds might have been better.

LAND. What do I hear! Not slept well! Perhaps the over-fatigue of the journey —

MIN. Perhaps.

LAND. Certainly, certainly, for other-wise . . . Yet, should there be anything not perfectly comfortable, my lady, I hope you will not fail to command me.

FRAN. Very well, Mr. Landlord, very well! We are not bashful; and least of all should one be bashful at an inn. We shall not fail to say what we may wish.

LAND. I next come to . . . (taking the pen from behind his ear).

FRAN. Well?

LAND. Without doubt, my lady, you are already acquainted with the wise regulations of our police.

MIN. Not in the least, sir.

LAND. We landlords are instructed not to take in any stranger, of whatever rank or sex he may be, for four-and-twenty hours, without delivering, in writing, his name, place of abode, occupation, object of his journey, probable stay, and so on, to the proper authorities.

MIN. Very well.

LAND. Will your ladyship then be so good . . . (going to the table, and making ready to write).

MIN. Willingly. My name is — LAND. One minute! (He writes.) "Date, 22nd August, A.D., &c.; arrived at the King of Spain hotel." Now your name, my lady.

MIN. Fräulein von Barnhelm.

LAND. (writes). "Von Barnhelm." Coming from . . . where, your ladyship?

MIN. From my estate in Saxony.

LAND. (writes). "Estate in Saxony." Saxony! Indeed, indeed! In Saxony, your ladyship? Saxony?

FRAN. Well, why not? I hope it is no sin in this country to come from Saxony!

LAND. A sin? Heaven forbid! That would be quite a new sin! From Saxony then? Yes, yes, from Saxony, a delightful country, Saxony! But if I am right, your ladyship, Saxony is not small, and has several — how shall I call them? — districts, provinces. Our police are very particular, your ladyship.

MIN. I understand. From my estate in Thuringia, then.

LAND. From Thuringia! Yes, that is better, your ladyship; that is more exact. (Writes and reads.) "Fräulein von Barnhelm, coming from her estate in Thuringia, together with her lady in waiting and two men servants."

FRAN. Lady in waiting! That means me, I suppose!

LAND. Yes, my pretty maid.

FRAN. Well, Mr. Landlord, instead of 10 "lady in waiting," write "maid in waiting." You say, the police are very exact; it might cause a misunderstanding, which might give me trouble some day when my banns are read out. For I really am still unmarried, and my name is Franziska, with the family name of Willig: Franziska Willig. I also come from Thuringia. My father was a miller, on one of my lady's estates. It is called Little Rammsdorf. 20 My brother has the mill now. I was taken very early to the manor, and educated with my lady. We are of the same age — one-and-twenty next Candlemas. I learnt everything my lady learnt. I should like 25 the police to have a full account of me.

LAND. Quite right, my pretty maid; I will bear that in mind, in case of future inquiries. But now, your ladyship, your business here?

MIN. My business here?

LAND. Have you any business with His Majesty the King?

MIN. Oh! no.

LAND. Or at our courts of justice?

MIN. No.

LAND. Or —

MIN. No, no. I have come here solely on account of my own private affairs.

LAND. Quite right, your ladyship; but 40 what are those private affairs?

MIN. They are . . . Franziska, I think we are undergoing an examination.

FRAN. Mr. Landlord, the police surely do not ask to know a young lady's se- 45 crets!

LAND. Certainly, my pretty maid; the police wish to know everything, and especially secrets.

FRAN. What is to be done, my 50 lady? . . . Well, listen, Mr. Landlord — but take care that it does not go beyond ourselves and the police.

MIN. What is the simpleton going to tell him?

FRAN. We come to carry off an officer from the king.

LAND. How? What? My dear girl!

FRAN. Or to let ourselves be carried off by the officer. It is all one.

MIN. Franziska, are you mad? The saucy girl is laughing at you.

LAND. I hope not! With your humble servant indeed she may jest as much as she pleases; but with the police —

MIN. I tell you what; I do not understand how to act in this matter. Suppose 15 you postpone the whole affair till my uncle's arrival. I told you yesterday why he did not come with me. He had an accident with his carriage ten miles from here, and did not wish that I should remain a night longer on the road, so I had to come on. I am sure he will not be more than four-and-twenty hours after us.

LAND. Very well, madam, we will wait for him.

MIN. He will be able to answer your questions better. He will know to whom, and to what extent, he must give an account of himself — what he must relate respecting his affairs, and what he may 30 withhold.

LAND. So much the better! Indeed one cannot expect a young girl (looking at FRANZISKA in a marked manner) to treat a serious matter with serious people in a 35 serious manner.

MIN. And his rooms are in readiness, I hope?

LAND. Quite, your ladyship, quite; except the one —

FRAN. Out of which, I suppose, you will have to turn some other honourable gentleman!

LAND. The waiting maids of Saxony, your ladyship, seem to be very compassionate.

MIN. In truth, sir, that was not well done. You ought rather to have refused us.

LAND. Why so, your ladyship, why so?

MIN. I understand that the officer who was driven out on our account —

LAND. Is only a discharged officer, your ladyship.

MIN. Well, what then?

LAND. Who is almost done for.

MIN. So much the worse! He is said to be a very deserving man.

LAND. But I tell you he is discharged.

MIN. The king cannot be acquainted with every deserving man.

LAND. Oh! doubtless he knows them; he knows them all.

MIN. But he cannot reward them all.

LAND. They would have been rewarded if they had lived so as to deserve it. But they lived during the war as if it would last for ever; as if the words "yours" and "mine" were done away with altogether. Now all the hotels and inns are full of them, and a landlord has to be on his guard with them. I have come off pretty well with this one. If he had no more money, he had at any rate money's worth; and I might indeed have let him remain quiet two or three months longer. However, it is better as it is. By-the-by, your ladyship, you understand about jewels, I suppose?

MIN. Not particularly.

LAND. Of course your ladyship must. I must show you a ring, a valuable ring. I see you have a very beautiful one on your finger; and the more I look at it, the more I am astonished at the resemblance it bears to mine. There! just look, just look! (taking the ring from its case, and handing it to her). What brilliancy! The diamond in the middle alone weighs more than five carats.

MIN. (looking at it). Good heavens! What do I see? This ring —

LAND. Is honestly worth fifteen hundred thalers.

MIN. Franziska! look!

LAND. I did not hesitate for a moment to advance eighty pistoles on it.

MIN. Do not you recognise it, Franziska?

FRAN. The same! Where did you get that ring, Mr. Landlord?

LAND. Come, my girl! you surely have no claim to it?

FRAN. We have no claim to this ring! My mistress's monogram must be on it, on the inner side of the setting. Look at it, my lady.

MIN. It is! it is! How did you get this ring?

LAND. I! In the most honourable way in the world. You do not wish to bring me into disgrace and trouble, your ladyship! How do I know where the ring properly belongs? During the war many a thing often changed masters, both with and without the knowledge of its owner. War was war. Other rings will have crossed the borders of Saxony. Give it me again, your ladyship; give it me again!

FRAN. When you have said from whom you got it.

LAND. From a man whom I cannot think capable of such things; in other respects a good man —

MIN. From the best man under the sun, if you have it from its owner. Bring him here directly! It is himself, or at any rate he must know him.

LAND. Who? who, your ladyship?

FRAN. Are you deaf? Our Major!

LAND. Major! Right! he is a Major, who had this room before you, and from whom I received it.

MIN. Major von Tellheim!

LAND. Yes, Tellheim. Do you know him?

MIN. Do I know him! He is here! Tellheim here! He had this room! He! he pledged this ring with you! What has brought him into this embarrassment? Where is he? Does he owe you anything? Franziska, my desk here! Open it! (FRANZISKA puts it on the table and opens it.) What does he owe you? To whom else does he owe anything? Bring me all his creditors! Here is gold: here are notes. It is all his!

LAND. What is this?

MIN. Where is he? Where is he?

LAND. An hour ago he was here.

MIN. Detested man! how could you act so rudely, so hardly, so cruelly towards him?

LAND. Your ladyship must pardon —

MIN. Quick! Bring him to me.

LAND. His servant is perhaps still here. Does your ladyship wish that he should look for him?

MIN. Do I wish it? Begone, run. For this service alone I will forget how badly you have behaved to him.

FRAN. Now then, quick, Mr. Landlord! Be off! fly! fly! (Pushes him out.)

SCENE III

MINNA, FRANZISKA.

MIN. Now I have found him again, Franziska! Do you hear? Now I have found him again! I scarcely know where I am for joy! Rejoice with me, Franziska. But why should you? And yet you shall; you must rejoice with me. Come, I will make you a present, that you may be able to rejoice with me. Say, Franziska, what shall I give you? Which of my things would please you? What would you like? Take what you will; only rejoice with me. I see you will take nothing. Stop! (Thrusts her hand into the desk.) There, Franziska (gives her money), buy yourself what you like. Ask for more, if it be not sufficient; but rejoice with me you must. It is so melancholy to be happy alone. Take it, then.

FRAN. It is stealing it from you, my lady. You are intoxicated, quite intoxicated with joy.

MIN. Girl, my intoxication is of a quarrelsome kind. Take it, or (forcing money into her hand) . . . and if you thank me . . . Stay, it is well that I think of it. (Takes more money from the desk.) Put that aside, Franziska, for the first poor wounded soldier who accosts us.

SCENE IV

LANDLORD, MINNA, FRANZISKA.

MIN. Well, is he coming?

LAND. The cross, unmannered fellow!

MIN. Who?

LAND. His servant. He refuses to go for him.

FRAN. Bring the rascal here, then. I know all the Major's servants. Which of them was it?

MIN. Bring him here directly. When he sees us he will go fast enough. (Exit LANDLORD.)

SCENE V

MINNA, FRANZISKA.

MIN. I cannot bear this delay. But, Franziska, how cold you are still! Why will you not share my joy with me?

FRAN. I would from my heart, if only —
MIN. If only what?

FRAN. We have found him again. But how have we found him? From all we hear, it must go badly with him. He must be unfortunate. That distresses me.

MIN. Distresses you! Let me embrace you for that, my dear playmate! I shall never forget this of you. I am only in love, you are good.

SCENE VI

LANDLORD, JUST, and the above.

LAND. With great difficulty I have brought him.

FRAN. A strange face! I do not know him.

MIN. Friend, do you live with Major von Tellheim?

JUST. Yes.

MIN. Where is your master?

JUST. Not here.

MIN. But you could find him?

JUST. Yes.

MIN. Will you fetch him quickly?

JUST. No.

MIN. You will be doing me a favour.

JUST. Indeed!

MIN. And your master a service.

JUST. Perhaps not.

MIN. Why do you suppose that?

JUST. You are the strange lady who sent your compliments to him this morning, I think?

MIN. Yes.

JUST. Then I am right.

MIN. Does your master know my name?

JUST. No; but he likes over-civil ladies as little as over-uncivil landlords.

LAND. That is meant for me, I suppose?

JUST. Yes.

LAND. Well, do not let the lady suffer for it then; but bring him here directly.

MIN. (to FRANZISKA). Franziska, give him some. . . .

have called yourself unhappy at all then. You should have told the whole, or kept quiet. Reason and necessity commanded you to forget me? I am a great stickler for reason; I have a great respect for necessity. But let me hear how reasonable this reason, and how necessary this necessity may be.

MAJ. T. Listen then, Madam. You call me Tellheim; the name is correct. But you suppose I am that Tellheim whom you knew at home; the prosperous man, full of just pretensions, with a thirst for glory; the master of all his faculties, both of body and mind; before whom the lists of honour and prosperity stood open; who, if he was not then worthy of your heart and your hand, dared to hope that he might daily become more nearly so. This Tellheim I am now, as little as I am my own father. They both have been. Now I am Tellheim the discharged, the suspected, the cripple, the beggar. To the former, Madam, you promised your hand; do you wish to keep your word?

MIN. That sounds very tragic. . . . Yet, Major Tellheim, until I find the former one again — I am quite foolish about the Tellheims — the latter will have to help me in my dilemma. Your hand, dear beggar! (taking his hand).

MAJ. T. (holding his hat before his face with the other hand, and turning away from her). This is too much! . . . What am I? . . . Let me go, Madam. Your kindness tortures me! Let me go.

MIN. What is the matter? Where would you go?

MAJ. T. From you!

MIN. From me (drawing his hand to her heart)? Dreamer!

MAJ. T. Despair will lay me dead at your feet.

MIN. From me?

MAJ. T. From you. Never, never to see you again. Or at least determined, fully determined, never to be guilty of a mean action; never to cause you to commit an imprudent one. Let me go, Minna! (Tears himself away, and Exit.)

MIN. (calling after him). Let you go, Minna? Minna, let you go? Tellheim! Tellheim!

ACT III

SCENE I — The Parlour.

JUST (with a letter in his hand).

JUST. Must I come again into this cursed house! A note from my master to her ladyship that would be his sister. I hope nothing will come of this, or else there will be no end to letter carrying. I should like to be rid of it; but yet I don't wish to go into the room. The women ask so many questions, and I hate answering — Ah! the door opens. Just what I wanted, the waiting puss!

SCENE II

FRANZISKA AND JUST.

FRAN. (calling through the door by which she has just entered). Fear not; I will watch. See! (observing JUST) I have met with something immediately. But nothing is to be done with that brute.

JUST. Your servant.

FRAN. I should not like such a servant.

JUST. Well, well, pardon the expression! There is a note from my master to your mistress — her ladyship — his sister, wasn't it? — sister.

FRAN. Give it me! (Snatches it from his hand.)

JUST. You will be so good, my master begs, as to deliver it. Afterwards you will be so good, my master begs, as not to think I ask for anything!

FRAN. Well?

JUST. My master understands how to manage the affair. He knows that the way to the young lady is through her maid, methinks. The maid will therefore be so good, my master begs, as to let him know whether he may not have the pleasure of speaking with the maid for a quarter of an hour.

FRAN. With me?

JUST. Pardon me, if I do not give you your right title. Yes, with you. Only for one quarter of an hour; but alone, quite alone, in private, tête-à-tête. He has something very particular to say to you.

FRAN. Very well! I have also much to say to him. He may come; I shall be at his service.

JUST. But when can he come? When is it most convenient for you, young woman? In the evening?

FRAN. What do you mean? Your master can come when he pleases; and now be off.

JUST. Most willingly! (Going.)

FRAN. I say! one word more! Where 10 are the rest of the Major's servants?

JUST. The rest? Here, there, and everywhere.

FRAN. Where is William?

JUST. The valet? He has let him go 15 for a trip.

FRAN. Oh! and Philip, where is he?

JUST. The huntsman? Master has found him a good place.

FRAN. Because he does not hunt now, 20 of course. But Martin?

JUST. The coachman? He is off on a ride.

FRAN. And Fritz?

JUST. The footman? He is promoted. 25

FRAN. Where were you then, when the Major was quartered in Thuringia with us that winter? You were not with him, I suppose!

JUST. Oh! yes, I was groom; but I was 30 in the hospital.

FRAN. Groom! and now you are —

JUST. All in all; valet and huntsman, footman and groom.

FRAN. Well, I never! To turn away so 35 many good, excellent servants, and to keep the very worst of all! I should like to know what your master finds in you!

JUST. Perhaps he finds that I am an honest fellow.

FRAN. Oh! one is precious little if one is nothing more than honest. William was another sort of a man! So your master has let him go for a trip!

JUST. Yes, he . . . let him — because 45 he could not prevent him.

FRAN. How so?

JUST. Oh! William will do well on his travels. He took master's wardrobe with him.

FRAN. What! he did not run away with it?

JUST. I cannot say that exactly; but, when we left Nürnberg, he did not follow us with it.

FRAN. Oh! the rascal!

JUST. He was the right sort! he could 5 curl hair and shave — and chatter — and flirt — couldn't he?

FRAN. At any rate, I would not have turned away the huntsman, had I been in the Major's place. If he did not want him any longer as huntsman, he was still a useful fellow. Where has he found him a place?

JUST. With the Commandant of Spandau.

FRAN. The fortress! There cannot be much hunting within the walls either.

JUST. Oh! Philip does not hunt there.

FRAN. What does he do then?

JUST. He rides — on the treadmill.

FRAN. The treadmill!

JUST. But only for three years. He made a bit of a plot amongst master's company, to get six men through the outposts.

FRAN. I am astonished; the knave!

JUST. Ah! he was a useful fellow; a huntsman who knew all the foot-paths and by-ways for fifty miles round, through forests and bogs. And he could shoot!

FRAN. It is lucky the Major has still got the honest coachman.

JUST. Has he got him still?

FRAN. I thought you said Martin was off on a ride: of course he will come 40 back!

JUST. Do you think so?

FRAN. Well, where has he ridden to?

JUST. It is now going on for ten weeks since he rode master's last and only horse 45 — to water.

FRAN. And has not he come back yet? Oh! the rascal!

JUST. The water may have washed the honest coachman away. Oh! he was a famous coachman! He had driven ten years in Vienna. My master will never get such another again. When the horses were in full gallop, he only had to say "Wo!" and there they stood, like a wall. Moreover, 50 he was a finished horse-doctor!

FRAN. I begin now to be anxious about the footman's promotion.

JUST. No, no; there is no occasion for that. He has become a drummer in a garrison regiment.

FRAN. I thought as much!

JUST. Fritz chummed up with a scamp, never came home at night, made debts everywhere in master's name, and a thousand rascally tricks. In short, the Major saw that he was determined to rise in the world (pantomimically imitating the act of hanging), so he put him in the right road.

FRAN. Oh! the stupid!

JUST. Yet a perfect footman, there is no doubt of that. In running, my master could not catch him on his best horse if he gave him fifty paces; but, on the other hand, Fritz could give the gallows a thousand paces, and, I bet my life, he would overhaul it. They were all great friends of yours, eh, young woman? . . . William and Philip, Martin and Fritz! Now, Just wishes you good-day. (Exit.)

SCENE III

FRANZISKA, and afterwards the LANDLORD.

FRAN. (looking after him seriously). I deserve the hit! Thank you, Just. I undervalued honesty. I will not forget the lesson. Ah! our unfortunate Major! (Turns round to enter her mistress's room, when the LANDLORD comes.)

LAND. Wait a bit, my pretty maid.

FRAN. I have not time now, Mr. Landlord.

LAND. Only half a moment! No further tidings of the Major? That surely could not possibly be his leave-taking!

FRAN. What could not?

LAND. Has not her ladyship told you? When I left you, my pretty maid, below in the kitchen, I returned accidentally into this room —

FRAN. Accidentally — with a view to listen a little.

LAND. What, girl! how can you suspect me of that? There is nothing so bad in a landlord as curiosity. I had not been here long, when suddenly her ladyship's door burst open: the Major dashed out; the lady after him; both in such a state of excitement; with looks — in attitudes — that must be seen to be understood. She seized hold of him; he tore himself away; she seized him again — "Tellheim." "Let me go, Madam." "Where?" Thus he drew her as far as the staircase. I was really afraid he would drag her down; but he got away. The lady remained on the top step; looked after him; called after him; wrung her hands. Suddenly she turned round; ran to the window; from the window to the staircase again; from the staircase into the room, backwards and forwards. There I stood; she passed me three times without seeing me. At length it seemed as if she saw me; but heaven defend us! I believe the lady took me for you. "Franziska," she cried, with her eyes fixed upon me, "am I happy now?" Then she looked straight up to the ceiling, and said again — "Am I happy now?" Then she wiped the tears from her eyes, and smiled, and asked me again — "Franziska, am I happy now?" I really felt, I know not how. Then she ran to the door of her room, and turned round again towards me, saying — "Come, Franziska, whom do you pity now?" and with that she went in.

FRAN. Oh! Mr. Landlord, you dreamt that.

LAND. Dreamt! No, my pretty maid; one does not dream so minutely. Yes, what would not I give — I am not curious: but what would not I give — to have the key to it!

FRAN. The key? Of our door? Mr. Landlord, that is inside; we took it in at night; we are timid.

LAND. Not that sort of key; I mean, my dear girl, the key — the explanation, as it were; the precise connexion of all that I have seen.

FRAN. Indeed! Well, good-bye, Mr. Landlord. Shall we have dinner soon?

LAND. My dear girl, not to forget what I came to say —

FRAN. Well? In as few words as possible.

LAND. Her ladyship has my ring still. I call it mine —

FRAN. You shall not lose it.

LAND. I have no fear on that account: I merely put you in mind. Do you see, I do not wish to have it again at all. I can guess pretty well how she knew the ring, and why it was so like her own. It is best in her hands. I do not want it any more; and I can put them down — the hundred pistoles which I advanced for it, to the lady's bill. Will not that do, my pretty maid?

SCENE IV

PAUL WERNER, LANDLORD, FRANZISKA.

WER. There he is!

FRAN. A hundred pistoles? I thought it was only eighty.

LAND. True, only ninety, only ninety. I will do so my pretty maid, I will do so.

FRAN. All that will come right, Mr. Landlord.

WER. (coming from behind, and tapping 20 FRANZISKA on the shoulder). Little woman — Little woman.

FRAN. (frightened). Oh! dear!

WER. Don't be alarmed! I see you are pretty, and a stranger, too. And strangers who are pretty must be warned. Little woman! little woman! I advise you to beware of that fellow! (pointing to the LANDLORD).

LAND. Ah! What an unexpected pleasure! Herr Werner! Welcome, welcome! Yes, you are just the same jovial, joking, honest Werner! So you are to beware of me, my pretty maid. Ha! ha! ha!

WER. Keep out of his way every- 35 where!

LAND. My way? Am I such a dangerous man? Ha! ha! ha! Hear him, my pretty maid! A good joke, isn't it?

WER. People like him always call it a 40 joke, if one tells them the truth.

LAND. The truth. Ha! ha! ha! Better and better, my pretty maid, isn't it? He knows how to joke! I dangerous? I? Twenty years ago there might have been 45 something in it. Yes, yes, my pretty maid, then I was a dangerous man: many a one knew it; but now —

WER. Oh! the old fool!

LAND. There it is! When we get old, 50 danger is at an end! It will be so with you too, Herr Werner!

WER. You utter old fool! Little woman, you will give me credit for enough common sense not to speak of danger from him. That one devil has left him, but seven others have entered into him.

5 LAND. Oh! hear him! How cleverly he can turn things about. Joke upon joke, and always something new! Ah! he is an excellent man, Paul Werner is. (To FRANZISKA, as if whispering). A well-to-do 10 man, and a bachelor still. He has a nice little freehold three miles from here. He made prize-money in the war, and was a sergeant to the Major. Yes, he is a real friend of the Major's; he is a friend who 15 would give his life for him.

WER. Yes; and that is a friend of the Major's — that is a friend . . . whose life the Major ought to take (pointing to the LANDLORD).

LAND. How! What! No, Herr Werner, that is not a good joke. I no friend to the Major! I don't understand that joke.

WER. Just has told me pretty things.

LAND. Just! Ah! I thought Just was speaking through you. Just is a nasty, ill-natured man. But here on the spot stands a pretty maid — she can speak, she can say if I am no friend of the Major's — 30 if I have not done him good service. And why should not I be his friend? Is not he a deserving man? It is true, he has had the misfortune to be discharged; but what of that? The king cannot be acquainted with all deserving officers; and, if he knew them, he could not reward them all.

WER. Heaven put those words into your mouth. But Just . . . certainly there is nothing remarkable about Just, but still Just is no liar; and if that what he has told me be true —

LAND. I don't want to hear anything about Just. As I said, this pretty maid here can speak. (Whispering to her). You know, my dear; the ring! Tell Herr Werner about it. Then he will learn better what I am. And that it may not appear as if she only said what I wish, I will not even be present. I will go; but you shall tell me after, Herr Werner, you shall tell me, whether Just is not a foul slanderer. (Exit.)

SCENE V

WERNER, FRANZISKA.

WER. Little woman, do you know my Major?

FRAN. Major von Tellheim? Yes, indeed, I do know that good man.

WER. Is he not a good man? Do you like him?

FRAN. From the bottom of my heart.

WER. Indeed! I tell you what, little woman, you are twice as pretty now as you were before. But what are the services, which the landlord says he has rendered our Major?

FRAN. That is what I don't know; unless he wished to take credit to himself for the good result which fortunately has arisen from his knavish conduct.

WER. Then what Just told me is true? (Towards the side where the LANDLORD went off.) A lucky thing for you that you are gone! He did really turn him out of his room? — To treat such a man so, because the donkey fancied that he had no more money! The Major no money!

FRAN. What! has the Major any money?

WER. By the load. He doesn't know how much he has. He doesn't know who is in his debt. I am his debtor, and have brought him some old arrears. Look, little woman, in this purse (drawing it out of one pocket) are a hundred louis d'ors; and in this packet (drawing it out of another pocket) a hundred ducats. All his money!

FRAN. Really! Why then does the Major pawn his things? He pledged a ring, you know —

WER. Pledged! Don't you believe it. Perhaps he wanted to get rid of the rubbish.

FRAN. It is no rubbish; it is a very valuable ring; which, moreover, I suspect, he received from a loving hand.

WER. That will be the reason. From a loving hand! Yes, yes; such a thing often puts one in mind of what one does not wish to remember, and therefore one gets rid of it.

FRAN. What!

WER. Odd things happen to the soldier in winter quarters. He has nothing to do then, so he amuses himself, and to pass the time he makes acquaintances, which he only intends for the winter, but which the good soul with whom he makes them looks upon for life. Then, presto! a ring is suddenly conjured on to his finger; he hardly knows himself how it gets there; and very often he would willingly give the finger with it, if he could only get free from it again.

FRAN. Oh! and do you think this has happened to the Major?

WER. Undoubtedly. Especially in Saxony. If he had had ten fingers on each hand, he might have had all twenty full of rings.

FRAN. (aside). That sounds important, and deserves to be inquired into. Mr. Freeholder, or Mr. Sergeant —

WER. Little woman, if it makes no difference to you, I like "Mr. Sergeant" best.

FRAN. Well, Mr. Sergeant, I have a note from the Major to my mistress. I will just carry it in, and be here again in a moment. Will you be so good as to wait? I should like very much to have a little talk with you.

WER. Are you fond of talking, little woman? Well, with all my heart. Go quickly. I am fond of talking too: I will wait.

FRAN. Yes, please wait. (Exit.)

SCENE VI

PAUL WERNER.

WER. That is not at all a bad little woman. But I ought not to have promised her that I would wait, for it would be most to the purpose, I suppose, to find the Major. He will not have my money, but rather pawns his property. That is just his way. A little trick occurs to me. When I was in the town, a fortnight back, I paid a visit to Captain Marloff's widow. The poor woman was ill, and was lamenting that her husband had died in debt to the Major for four hundred thalers, which she did not know how to pay. I went to see her again to-day; I intended to tell her that I could lend her five hundred thalers, when I had received the money for my property; for I must put some of it by, if I do not go to Persia. But she was gone; and no doubt she has not been able to pay the Major. Yes, I'll do that; and the sooner the better. The little woman must not take it ill of me; I cannot wait. (Is going in thought, and almost runs against the MAJOR, who meets him.)

SCENE VII

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, PAUL WERNER.

MAJ. T. Why so thoughtful, Werner?

WER. Oh! that is you. I was just going to pay you a visit in your new quarters, Major.

MAJ. T. To fill my ears with curses against the Landlord of my old one. Do not remind me of it.

WER. I should have done that by the way; yes. But, more particularly, I wished to thank you for having been so good as to take care of my hundred louis d'ors. Just has given them to me again. I should have been very glad if you would have kept them longer for me. But you have got into new quarters, which neither you nor I know much about. Who knows what sort of place it is? They might be stolen, and you would have to make them good to me; there would be no help for it. So I cannot ask you to take them again.

MAJ. T. (smiling). When did you begin to be so careful, Werner?

WER. One learns to be so. One cannot now be careful enough of one's money. I have also a commission for you, Major, from Frau Marloff; I have just come from her. Her husband died four hundred thalers in your debt; she sends you a hundred ducats here, in part payment. She will forward you the rest next week. I believe I am the cause that she has not sent you the whole sum. For she also owed me about eighty thalers, and she thought I was come to dun her for them — which, perhaps, was the fact — so she gave them me out of the roll which she had put aside for you. You can spare your hundred thalers for a week longer, better than I can spare my few groschens. There, take it! (Hands him the ducats.)

MAJ. T. Werner!

WER. Well! Why do you stare at me so? Take it, Major!

MAJ. T. Werner!

WER. What is the matter with you? What annoys you?

MAJ. T. (angrily striking his forehead, and stamping with his foot). That . . . the four hundred thalers are not all there.

WER. Come! Major, did not you understand me?

MAJ. T. It is just because I did understand you! Alas, that the best men should to-day distress me most!

WER. What do you say?

MAJ. T. This only applies partly to you. Go, Werner! (Pushing back WERNER'S hand with the money in it.)

WER. As soon as I have got rid of this.

MAJ. T. Werner, suppose I tell you that Frau Marloff was here herself early this morning —

WER. Indeed?

MAJ. T. That she owes me nothing now —

WER. Really?

MAJ. T. That she has paid me every penny — What will you say then?

WER. (thinks for a minute). I shall say that I have told a lie, and that lying is a low thing, because one may be caught at it.

MAJ. T. And you will be ashamed of yourself?

WER. And what of him who compels me to lie? Should not he be ashamed too? Look ye, Major; if I was to say that your conduct has not vexed me, I should tell another lie, and I won't lie any more.

MAJ. T. Do not be annoyed, Werner. I know your heart, and your affection for me. But I do not require your money.

WER. Not require it! Rather sell, rather pawn, and get talked about!

MAJ. T. Oh! people may know that I have nothing more. One must not wish to appear richer than one is.

WER. But why poorer? A man has something as long as his friend has.

MAJ. T. It is not proper that I should be your debtor.

WER. Not proper! On that summer day which the sun and the enemy made hot for us, when your groom, who had your canteen, was not to be found, and you came to me and said — "Werner, have you nothing to drink?" and I gave you my flask, you took it and drank, did you not? Was that proper? Upon my life, a mouthful of dirty water at that time was often worth more than such filth (taking the purse also out of his pocket, and holding out both to him). Take them, dear Major! Fancy it is water. God has made this, too, for all.

MAJ. T. You torment me: don't you hear, I will not be your debtor.

WER. At first, it was not proper; now, you will not. Ah! that is a different thing. (Rather angrily.) You will not be my debtor? But suppose you are already, Major? Or, are you not a debtor to the man who once warded off the blow that was meant to split your head; and, at another time, knocked off the arm which was just going to pull and send a ball through your breast? How can you become a greater debtor to that man? Or, is my neck of less consequence than my money? If that is a noble way of thinking, by my soul it is a very silly one too.

MAJ. T. To whom do you say that, Werner? We are alone, and therefore I may speak; if a third person heard us, it might sound like boasting. I acknowledge with pleasure, that I have to thank you for twice saving my life. Do you not think, friend, that if an opportunity occurred I would have done as much for you, eh?

WER. If an opportunity occurred! Who doubts it, Major? Have I not seen you risk your life a hundred times for the lowest soldier, when he was in danger?

MAJ. T. Well!

WER. But —

MAJ. T. Why cannot you understand me? I say, it is not proper that I should be your debtor; I will not be your debtor. That is, not in the circumstances in which I now am.

WER. Oh! so you would wait till better times. You will borrow money from me another time, when you do not want any; when you have some yourself, and I per-

MAJ. T. A man ought not to borrow, when he has not the means of repaying.

WER. A man like yourself cannot always be in want.

MAJ. T. You know the world. . . . Least of all should a man borrow from one who wants his money himself.

WER. Oh, yes; I am such a one! Pray, what do I want it for? When they want a sergeant, they give him enough to live on.

MAJ. T. You want it, to become something more than a sergeant — to be able to get forward in that path in which even the most deserving, without money, may remain behind.

WER. To become something more than a sergeant! I do not think of that. I am a good sergeant; I might easily make a bad captain, and certainly a worse general.

MAJ. T. Do not force me to think ill of you, Werner! I was very sorry to hear what Just has told me. You have sold your farm, and wish to rove about again. Do not let me suppose that you do not love the profession of arms so much as the wild dissolute way of living which is unfortunately connected with it. A man should be a soldier for his own country, or from love of the cause for which he fights. To serve without any purpose — to-day here, to-morrow there — is only travelling about like a butcher's apprentice, nothing more.

WER. Well, then, Major, I will do as you say. You know better what is right. I will remain with you. But, dear Major, do take my money in the meantime. Sooner or later your affairs must be settled. You will get money in plenty then; and then you shall repay me with interest. I only do it for the sake of the interest.

MAJ. T. Do not talk of it.

WER. Upon my life, I only do it for the sake of the interest. Many a time I have thought to myself — "Werner, what will become of you in your old age? when you are crippled? when you will have nothing in the world? when you will be obliged to go and beg!" And then I thought again — "No, you will not be obliged to beg: you will go to Major Tellheim; he will share his last penny with you; he will feed you till you die; and with him you can die like an honest fellow."

MAJ. T. (taking WERNER's hand). And, comrade, you do not think so still?

WER. No, I do not think so any longer. He who will not take anything from me, when he is in want, and I have to give, will not give me anything when he has to give, and I am in want. So be it. (Is going.)

MAJ. T. Man, do not drive me mad! Where are you going? (Detains him.) If I assure you now, upon my honour, that I still have money — If I assure you, upon my honour, that I will tell you when I have no more — that you shall be the first and only person from whom I will borrow anything — will that content you?

WER. I suppose it must. Give me your hand on it, Major.

MAJ. T. There, Paul! And now enough of that. I came here to speak with a certain young woman.

SCENE VIII

FRANZISKA (coming out of MINNA'S room), 25
MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, PAUL WERNER.

FRAN. (entering). Are you there still, Mr. Sergeant? (Seeing TELLHEIM.) And you there too, Major? I will be at your service instantly. (Goes back quickly into the room.) 30

SCENE IX

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, PAUL WERNER. 35

MAJ. T. That was she! But it seems you know her, Werner.

WER. Yes, I know her.

MAJ. T. Yet, if I remember rightly, when I was in Thuringia you were not with me. 40

WER. No; I was seeing after the uniforms in Leipsic.

MAJ. T. Where did you make her acquaintance, then?

WER. Our acquaintance is very young. Not a day old. But young friendship is warm.

MAJ. T. Have you seen her mistress, too?

WER. Is her mistress a young lady? She told me you are acquainted with her mistress.

MAJ. T. Did not you hear? she comes from Thuringia.

WER. Is the lady young?

MAJ. T. Yes.

WER. Pretty?

MAJ. T. Very pretty.

WER. Rich?

MAJ. T. Very rich.

WER. Is the mistress as fond of you as the maid is? That would be capital!

MAJ. T. What do you mean?

SCENE X

FRANZISKA (with a letter in her hand), MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, PAUL WERNER.

FRAN. Major —

MAJ. T. Franziska, I have not yet been able to give you a "Welcome" here. FRAN. In thought, I am sure that you have done it. I know you are friendly to me; so am I to you. But it is not at all kind to vex those who are friendly to you so much.

WER. (aside). Ah! now I see it. It is so!

MAJ. T. My destiny, Franziska! Did you give her the letter?

FRAN. Yes; and here I bring you . . . (holding out a letter).

MAJ. T. An answer!

FRAN. No, your own letter again.

MAJ. T. What! She will not read it!

FRAN. She would have liked, but — we can't read writing well.

MAJ. T. You are joking!

FRAN. And we think that writing was not invented for those who can converse with their lips whenever they please.

MAJ. T. What an excuse! She must read it. It contains my justification — all the grounds and reasons —

FRAN. My mistress wishes to hear them all from you yourself, not to read them.

MAJ. T. Hear them from me myself! That every look, every word of hers, may embarrass me; that I may feel in every glance the greatness of my loss.

FRAN. Without any pity! Take it. (Giving him his letter.) She expects you at three o'clock. She wishes to drive out and see the town; you must accompany her.

MAJ. T. Accompany her!

FRAN. And what will you give me to let you drive out by yourselves? I shall remain at home?

MAJ. T. By ourselves!

FRAN. In a nice closed carriage.

MAJ. T. Impossible!

FRAN. Yes, yes, in the carriage, Major. You will have to submit quietly; you cannot escape there! And that is the reason. In short, you will come, Major, and punctually at three. . . . Well, you wanted to speak to me too alone. What have you to say to me? Oh! we are not alone. (Looking at WERNER.)

MAJ. T. Yes, Franziska; as good as alone. But, as your mistress has not read my letter, I have nothing now to say to you.

FRAN. As good as alone! Then you have no secrets from the Sergeant?

MAJ. T. No, none.

FRAN. And yet I think you should have some from him.

MAJ. T. Why so?

WER. How so, little woman?

FRAN. Particularly secrets of a certain kind. . . . All twenty, Mr. Sergeant! (Holding up both her hands, with open fingers.)

WER. Hist! hist! girl.

MAJ. T. What is the meaning of that?

FRAN. Presto! conjured on to his finger, Mr. Sergeant (as if she was putting a ring on her finger).

MAJ. T. What are you talking about?

WER. Little woman, little woman, don't you understand a joke.

MAJ. T. Werner, you have not forgotten, I hope, what I have often told you; that one should not jest beyond a certain point with a young woman!

WER. Upon my life I may have forgotten it! Little woman, I beg —

FRAN. Well, if it was a joke, I will forgive you this once.

MAJ. T. Well, if I must come, Franziska, just see that your mistress reads my letter beforehand? That will spare me the pain of thinking again — of talking again, of things which I would willingly forget. There, give it to her! (He turns the letter in giving it to her, and sees that it has been opened.) But do I see aright? Why it has been opened.

FRAN. That may be. (Looks at it.) True, it is open. Who can have opened it? But really we have not read it, Major; really not. And we do not wish to read it, because the writer is coming himself. Come; and I tell you what, Major! don't come as you are now — in boots, and with such a head. You are excusable, you do not expect us. Come in shoes, and have your hair fresh dressed. You look too soldierlike, too Prussian for me as you are.

MAJ. T. Thank you, Franziska.

FRAN. You look as if you had been bivouacking last night.

MAJ. T. You may have guessed right.

FRAN. We are going to dress, directly too, and then have dinner. We would willingly ask you to dinner, but your presence might hinder our eating; and observe, we are not so much in love that we have lost our appetites.

MAJ. T. I will go. Prepare her somewhat, Franziska, beforehand, that I may not become contemptible in her eyes, and in my own. Come, Werner, you shall dine with me.

WER. At the table d'hôte here in the house? I could not eat a bit there.

MAJ. T. With me, in my room.

WER. I will follow you directly. One word first with the little woman.

MAJ. T. I have no objection to that. (Exit.)

SCENE XI

PAUL WERNER, FRANZISKA.

FRAN. Well, Mr. Sergeant!

WER. Little woman, if I come again, shall I too come smartened up a bit?

FRAN. Come as you please; my eyes will find no fault with you. But my ears will have to be so much the more on their guard. Twenty fingers, all full of rings. Ah! ah! Mr. Sergeant!

WER. No, little woman; that is just what I wished to say to you. I only rattled on a little. There is nothing in it. One ring is quite enough for a man. Hundreds and hundreds of times I have heard the Major say — "He must be a rascally soldier, who can mislead a young girl." So think I too, little woman. You may trust to that! I must be quick and follow him. A good appetite to you. (Exit.)

FRAN. The same to you! I really believe, I like that man! (Going in, she meets MINNA coming out.)

SCENE XII

MINNA, FRANZISKA.

MIN. Has the Major gone already, Franziska? I believe I should have been sufficiently composed again now to have detained him here.

FRAN. And I will make you still more composed.

MIN. So much the better! His letter! oh! his letter! Each line spoke the honourable noble man. Each refusal to accept my hand declared his love for me. I suppose he noticed that we had read his letter. I don't mind that, if he does but come. But are you sure he will come? There only seems to me to be a little too much pride in his conduct. For not to be willing to be indebted for his good fortune, even to the woman he loves, is pride, unpardonable pride! If he shows me too much of this, Franziska —

FRAN. You will discard him!

MIN. See there! Do you begin to pity him again already! No, silly girl, a man is never discarded for a single fault. No; but I have thought of a trick — to pay him off a little for this pride, with pride of the same kind.

FRAN. Indeed, you must be very composed, my lady, if you are thinking of tricks again.

MIN. I am so; come. You will have a part to play in my plot. (Exeunt.)

ACT IV

SCENE I — Minna's Room.

MINNA (dressed handsomely and richly, but in good taste), FRANZISKA. (They have just risen from a table, which a servant is clearing.)

FRAN. You cannot possibly have eaten enough, my lady.

MIN. Don't you think so, Franziska? Perhaps I had no appetite when I sat down.

FRAN. We had agreed not to mention him during dinner. We should have resolved likewise, not to think of him.

MIN. Indeed, I have thought of nothing but him.

FRAN. So I perceived. I began to speak of a hundred different things, and you made wrong answers to each. (Another servant brings coffee.) Here comes a beverage more suited to fancies — sweet, melancholy coffee.

MIN. Fancies! I have none. I am only thinking of the lesson I will give him. Did you understand my plan, Franziska?

FRAN. Oh! yes; but it would be better if he spared us the putting it in execution. MIN. You will see that I know him thoroughly. He who refuses me now with all my wealth will contend for me against the whole world, as soon as he hears that I am unfortunate and friendless.

FRAN. (seriously). That must tickle the most refined self-love.

MIN. You moralist! First you convict me of vanity — now of self-love. Let me do as I please, Franziska. You, too, shall do as you please with your Sergeant.

FRAN. With my Sergeant?

MIN. Yes. If you deny it altogether, then it is true. I have not seen him yet; but, from all you have said respecting him, I foretell your husband for you.

SCENE II

RICCAUT DE LA MARLINIÈRE, MINNA, FRANZISKA.

RIC. (before he enters). Est-il permis, Monsieur le Major?

FRAN. Who is that? Any one for us? (going to the door).

RIC. Parbleu! I am wrong. Mais non — I am not wrong. C'est la chambre —

FRAN. Without doubt, my lady, this gentleman expects to find Major von Tellheim here still.

RIC. Oui, dat is it! Le Major de Tellheim; juste, ma belle enfant, c'est lui que je cherche. Où est-il?

FRAN. He does not lodge here any longer.

RIC. Comment? Dere is four-and-twenty hour ago he did lodge here, and not lodge here any more? Where lodge he den?

MIN. (going up to him). Sir —

RIC. Ah! Madame, Mademoiselle, pardon, lady.

MIN. Sir, your mistake is quite excusable, and your astonishment very natural. Major von Tellheim has had the kindness to give up his apartments to me, as a stranger, who was not able to get them elsewhere.

RIC. Ah! voilà de ses politesses! C'est un très-galant homme que ce Major!

MIN. Where has he gone now? — truly I am ashamed that I do not know.

RIC. Madame not know? C'est domage; j'en suis fâché.

MIN. I certainly ought to have inquired. Of course his friends will seek him here.

RIC. I am vary great his friend, Madame.

MIN. Franziska, do you not know?

FRAN. No, my lady.

RIC. It is vary nécessaire dat I speak him. I come and bring him a nouvelle, of 30 say Madame to it? N'est pas, dat is a fine fellow! Ah! que Son Excellence a le cœur bien placé! He assure me au reste, if de Major has not reçu already une lettre de la main — a royal letter, dat to-day infailliblement must he receive one.

MIN. I regret it so much the more. But I hope to see him perhaps shortly. If it is a matter of indifference from whom he hears this good news, I would offer, 35 sir, —

RIC. I comprehend. Mademoiselle parle français? Mais sans doute; telle que je la vois! La demande était bien impolie; vous me pardonnerez, Mademoi- 40 selle.

MIN. Sir —

RIC. No! You not speak French, Madame?

MIN. Sir, in France I would endeavour 45 to do so; but why here? I perceive that you understand me, sir; and I, sir, shall doubtless understand you; speak as you please.

RIC. Good, good! I can also explain 50 me in your langue. Sachez donc, Mademoiselle, you must know, Madame, dat I come from de table of de ministre, ministre de, ministre de . . . What is le ministre out dere, in de long street, on de broad place?

MIN. I am a perfect stranger here.

5 RIC. Si, le ministre of de war departement. Dere I have eat my dinner; I ordinary dine dere, and de conversation did fall on Major Tellheim; et le ministre m'a dit en confidence, car Son Excellence est de mes amis, et il n'y a point de mystères entre nous; Son Excellence, I say, has trust to me, dat l'affaire from our Major is on de point to end, and to end good. He has made a rapport to de king, and de 15 king has resolved et tout à fait en faveur du Major. "Monsieur," m'a dit Son Excellence, "vous comprenez bien, que tout dépend de la manière, dont on fait envisager les choses au roi, et vous me connaissez. Cela fait un très-joli garçon que ce Tellheim, et ne sais-je pas que vous l'aimez? Les amis de mes amis sont aussi les miens. Il coûte un peu cher au Roi ce Tellheim, mais est-ce que l'on sert les rois 25 pour rien? Il faut s'entr'aider en ce monde; et quand il s'agit de pertes, que ce soit le Roi qui en fasse, et non pas un honnête homme de nous autres. Voilà le principe, dont je ne me dépars jamais." But what say Madame to it? N'est pas, dat is a fine fellow! Ah! que Son Excellence a le cœur bien placé! He assure me au reste, if de Major has not reçu already une lettre de la main — a royal letter, dat to-day infailliblement must he receive one.

MIN. Certainly, sir, this news will be most welcome to Major von Tellheim. I should like to be able to name the friend to him, who takes such an interest in his welfare.

RIC. Madame, you wish my name? Vous voyez en moi — you see, lady, in me, le Chevalier Riccaut de la Marlinière, Seigneur de Prêt-au-val, de la branche de Prems d'or. You remain astonished to hear me from so great, great a family, qui est véritablement du sang royal. Il faut le dire; je suis sans doute le cadet le plus 55 aventureux que la maison n'a jamais eu. I serve from may eleven year. Une affaire d'honneur make me flee. Den I serve de holy Papa of Rome, den de Republic St. Marino, den de Poles, den de States General, till enfin I am brought here. Ah! Mademoiselle, que je voudrais n'avoir jamais vu ce pays-ci. Had one left me in de service of de States General, should I be now at least colonel. But here always to remain capitaine, and now also a discharged capitaine.

MIN. That is ill luck.

RIC. Oui, Mademoiselle, me voilà ré-10 formé, et par là mis sur le pavé!

MIN. I am very sorry for you.

RIC. Vous êtes bien bonne, Mademoiselle. . . . No, merit have no reward here. Réformer a man, like me! A man who also have ruin himself in dis service! I have lost in it so much as twenty thousand livres. What have I now? Tranchons le mot; je n'ai pas le sou, et me voilà exactement vis-à-vis de rien.

MIN. I am exceedingly sorry.

RIC. Vous êtes bien bonne, Mademoiselle. But as one say — misfortune never come alone! qu'un malheur ne vient jamais seul: so it arrive with me. What 25 ressource rests for an honnête homme of my extraction, but play? Now, I always played with luck, so long I not need her. Now I very much need her, je joue avec un guignon, Mademoiselle, qui surpasse 30 toute croyance. For fifteen days, not one is passed. dat I always am broke. Yesterday, I was broke drie times. Je sais bien, qu'il y avait quelque chose de plus que le jeu. Car parmi mes pontes se 35 trouvaient certaines dames. I will not speak more. One must be very galant to les dames. Dey have invite me again to-day, to give me revanche; mais — vous m'entendez, Mademoiselle, — one must 40 first have to live, before one can have to play.

MIN. I hope, sir, —

RIC. Vous êtes bien bonne, Mademoiselle.

MIN. (Takes FRANZISKA aside.) Franziska, I really feel for the man. Would he take it ill, if I offer him something?

FRAN. He does not look to me like a man who would.

MIN. Very well! Sir, I perceive that — you play, that you keep the bank; doubtless in places where something is to be won. I must also confess that I . . . am very fond of play.

RIC. Tant mieux, Mademoiselle, tant mieux! Tous les gens d'esprit aiment le 5 jeu à la fureur.

MIN. That I am very fond of winning; that I like to trust my money to a man, who — knows how to play. Are you inclined, sir, to let me join you? To let me have a share in your bank?

RIC. Comment, Mademoiselle, vous voulez être de moitié avec moi? De tout mon cœur.

MIN. At first, only with a trifle. (Opens her desk and takes out some money.)

RIC. Ah! Mademoiselle, que vous êtes charmante!

MIN. Here is what I won a short time back; only ten pistoles. I am ashamed, 20 so little —

RIC. Donnez toujours, Mademoiselle, donnez. (Takes it.)

MIN. Without doubt, your bank, sir, is very considerable.

RIC. Oh! yes, vary considerable. Ten pistoles! You shall have, Madame, an interest in my bank for one third, pour le tiers. Yes, one third part it shall be — something more. With a beautiful lady one must not be too exac. I rejoice myself, to make by that a liaison with Madame, et de ce moment je recommence à bien augurer de ma fortune.

MIN. But I cannot be present, sir, 35 when you play.

RIC. For why it nécessaire dat you be present? We other players are honourable people between us.

MIN. If we are fortunate, sir, you will 40 of course bring me my share. If we are unfortunate —

RIC. I come to bring recruits, n'est pas, Madame?

MIN. In time recruits might fail. 45 Manage our money well, sir.

RIC. What does Madame think me? A simpleton, a stupid devil?

MIN. I beg your pardon.

RIC. Je suis des bons, Mademoiselle. 50 Savez-vous ce que cela veut dire? I am of the quite practised —

MIN. But still, sir, —

RIC. Je sais monter un coup —

MIN. (amazed). Could you?

RIC. Je file la carte avec une adresse.

MIN. Never!

RIC. Je fais sauter la coupe avec une dextérité.

MIN. You surely would not, sir! —

RIC. What not, Madame; what not? Donnez-moi un pigeonneau à plumer, et —

MIN. Play false! Cheat!

RIC. Comment, Mademoiselle? Vous appelez cela cheat? Corriger la fortune, l'enchaîner sous ses doigts, être sûr de son fait, dat you call cheat? Cheat! Oh! what a poor tongue is your tongue! what an awkward tongue!

MIN. No, sir, if you think so —

RIC. Laissez-moi faire, Mademoiselle, and be tranquille! What matter to you how I play! Enough! to-morrow, Madame, you see me again or with hundred pistol, or you see me no more. Votre très-humble, Mademoiselle, votre très-humble. (Exit quickly.)

MIN. (looking after him with astonishment and displeasure). I hope the latter, sir.

SCENE III

MINNA AND FRANZISKA.

FRAN. (angrily). What can I say? Oh! how grand! how grand!

MIN. Laugh at me; I deserve it. (After reflecting, more calmly.) No, do not laugh; I do not deserve it.

FRAN. Excellent! You have done a charming act — set a knave upon his legs again.

MIN. It was intended for an unfortunate man.

FRAN. And what is the best part of it, the fellow considers you like himself. Oh! I must follow him, and take the money from him. (Going.)

MIN. Franziska, do not let the coffee get quite cold; pour it out.

FRAN. He must return it to you; you have thought better of it; you will not play in partnership with him. Ten pistoles! You heard, my lady, that he was a beggar! (MINNA pours out the coffee herself.) Who would give such a sum to a beggar? And to endeavour, into the bargain, to save him the humiliation of having begged for it! The charitable woman who, out of generosity, mistakes the beggar, is in return mistaken by the beggar. It serves you right, my lady, if he considers your gift as — I know not what: (MINNA hands a cup of coffee to FRANZISKA.) Do you wish to make my blood boil still more? I do not want any. (MINNA puts it down again.) “Parbleu, Madame, merit have no reward here” (imitating the Frenchman). I think not, when such rogues are allowed to walk about unhanged.

MIN. (coldly and slowly, while sipping her coffee). Girl, you understand good men very well; but when will you learn to bear with the bad? And yet they are also men; and frequently not so bad as they seem. One should look for their good side. I fancy this Frenchman is nothing worse than vain. Through mere vanity he gives himself out as a false player; he does not wish to appear under an obligation to one; he wishes to save himself the thanks. Perhaps he may now go, pay his small debts, live quietly and frugally on the rest as far as it will go, and think no more of play. If that be so, Franziska, let him come for recruits whenever he pleases. (Gives her cup to FRANZISKA.) There, put it down! But, tell me, should not Tellheim be here by this time?

FRAN. No, my lady, I can find out neither the bad side in a good man, nor the good side in a bad man.

MIN. Surely he will come!

FRAN. He ought to remain away! You remark in him — in him, the best of men — a little pride; and therefore you intend to tease him so cruelly!

MIN. Are you at it again? Be silent! I will have it so. Woe to you if you spoil this fun of mine . . . if you do not say and do all, as we have agreed. I will leave you with him alone; and then — but here he comes.

SCENE IV

PAUL WERNER (comes in, carrying himself very erect as if on duty), MINNA, FRANZISKA.

FRAN. No, it is only his dear Sergeant.

MIN. Dear Sergeant! Whom does the "dear" refer to?

FRAN. Pray, my lady, do not make the man embarrassed. Your servant, Mr. Sergeant; what news do you bring us?

WER. (goes up to MINNA, without noticing FRANZISKA). Major von Tellheim begs to present, through me, Sergeant Werner, his most respectful compliments to Fräulein von Barnhelm, and to inform her that he will be here directly.

MIN. Where is he then?

WER. Your ladyship will pardon him; we left our quarters before it began to strike three; but the paymaster met us on the way; and, because conversation with those gentlemen has no end, the Major made me a sign to report the case to your ladyship.

MIN. Very well, Mr. Sergeant. I only hope the paymaster may have good news for him.

WER. Such gentlemen seldom have good news for officers. — Has your ladyship any orders? (Going.)

FRAN. Why, where are you going again, Mr. Sergeant? Had not we something to say to each other?

WER. (In a whisper to FRANZISKA, and seriously.) Not here, little woman; it is against respect, against discipline. . . . Your ladyship —

MIN. Thank you for your trouble. I am glad to have made your acquaintance. Franziska has spoken in high praise of you to me. (WERNER makes a stiff bow, and goes.)

SCENE V

MINNA, FRANZISKA.

MIN. So that is your Sergeant, Franziska?

FRAN. (aside). I have not time to reproach her for that jeering your. (Aloud.) Yes, my lady, that is my Sergeant. You think him, no doubt, somewhat stiff and wooden. He also appeared so to me just now; but, I observed, he thought he must march past you as if on parade. And, when soldiers are on parade, they certainly look more like wooden dolls than men. You should see and hear him when he is himself.

MIN. So I should indeed!

FRAN. He must still be in the next room; may I go and talk with him a little?

MIN. I refuse you this pleasure unwillingly: but you must remain here, Franziska. You must be present at our conversation. Another thing occurs to me. (Takes her ring from her finger.) There, take my ring; keep it for me, and give me the Major's in the place of it.

FRAN. Why so?

MIN. (whilst FRANZISKA is fetching the ring). I scarcely know, myself; but I fancy I see, beforehand, how I may make use of it. Some one is knocking. Give it to me, quickly. (Puts the ring on.) It is he.

SCENE VI

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM (in the same coat, but otherwise as FRANZISKA advised), MINNA, FRANZISKA.

MAJ. T. Madam, you will excuse the delay.

MIN. Oh! Major, we will not treat each other in quite such a military fashion. You are here now; and to await a pleasure is itself a pleasure. Well (looking at him and smiling), dear Tellheim, have we not been like children?

MAJ. T. Yes, Madam; like children, who resist when they ought to obey quietly.

MIN. We will drive out, dear Major, to see a little of the town, and afterwards to meet my uncle.

MAJ. T. What!

MIN. You see, we have not yet had an opportunity of mentioning the most important matters even. He is coming here to-day. It was accident that brought me here without him, a day sooner.

MAJ. T. Count von Bruchsal! Has he returned?

MIN. The troubles of the war drove him into Italy: peace has brought him back again. Do not be uneasy, Tellheim; if we formerly feared on his part the greatest obstacle to our union —

MAJ. T. To our union!

MIN. He is now your friend. He has heard too much good of you from too many people, not to become so. He longs to become personally acquainted with the man whom his heiress has chosen. He comes as uncle, as guardian, as father, to give me to you.

MAJ. T. Ah! dear lady, why did you not read my letter? Why would you not read it?

MIN. Your letter! Oh! yes, I remember you sent me one. What did you do with that letter, Franziska? Did we, or did we not read it? What was it you wrote to me, dear Tellheim?

MAJ. T. Nothing but what honour commands me.

MIN. That is, not to desert an honourable woman who loves you. Certainly that is what honour commands. Indeed, I ought to have read your letter. But what I have not read, I shall hear, shall I not?

MAJ. T. Yes, you shall hear it.

MIN. No, I need not even hear it. It speaks for itself. As if you could be guilty of such an unworthy act, as not to take me! Do you know that I should be pointed at for the rest of my life? My countrywomen would talk about me, and say, "That is she, that is the Fräulein von Barnhelm, who fancied that because she was rich she could marry the noble Tellheim; as if such men were to be caught with money." That is what they would say, for they are all envious of me. That I am rich, they cannot deny; but they do not wish to acknowledge that I am also a tolerably good girl, who would prove herself worthy of her husband. Is that not so, Tellheim?

MAJ. T. Yes, yes, Madam, that is like your countrywomen. They will envy you exceedingly a discharged officer, with sullied honour, a cripple, and a beggar.

MIN. And are you all that? If I mistake not, you told me something of the kind this forenoon. Therein is good and evil mixed. Let us examine each charge more closely. You are discharged? So you say. I thought your regiment was only drafted into another. How did it happen that a man of your merit was not retained?

MAJ. T. It has happened, as it must happen. The great ones are convinced that a soldier does very little through regard for them, not much more from a sense of duty, but everything for his own advantage. What then can they think they owe him? Peace has made a great many, like myself, superfluous to them; and at last we shall all be superfluous.

MIN. You talk as a man must talk, to whom in return the great are quite superfluous. And never were they more so than now. I return my best thanks to the great ones that they have given up their claims to a man whom I would very unwillingly have shared with them. I am your sovereign, Tellheim; you want no other master. To find you discharged is a piece of good fortune I dared scarcely dream of! But you are not only discharged; you are more. And what are you more? A cripple, you say! Well! (looking at him from head to foot), the cripple is tolerably whole and upright — appears still to be pretty well, and strong. Dear Tellheim, if you expect to go begging on the strength of your limbs, I prophesy that you will be relieved at very few doors; except at the door of a good-natured girl like myself.

MAJ. T. I only hear the joking girl now, dear Minna.

MIN. And I only hear the "dear Minna" in your chiding. I will not joke any longer; for I recollect that after all you are something of a cripple. You are wounded by a shot in the right arm; but, all things considered, I do not find much fault with that. I am so much the more secure from your blows.

MAJ. T. Madam!

MIN. You would say, "You are so much the less secure from mine." Well, well, dear Tellheim, I hope you will not drive me to that.

MAJ. T. You laugh, Madam. I only lament that, I cannot laugh with you.

MIN. Why not? What have you to say against laughing? Cannot one be very serious even whilst laughing? Dear Major, laughter keeps us more rational than vexation. The proof is before us. Your laughing friend judges of your circumstances more correctly than you do yourself. Because you are discharged, you say your honour is sullied; because you are wounded in the arm, you call yourself a cripple. Is that right? Is that no exaggeration? And is it my doing that all exaggerations are so open to ridicule? I dare say if I examine your beggary that it will also be as little able to stand the test. You may have lost your equipage once, twice, or thrice; your deposits in the hands of this or that banker may have disappeared together with those of other people; you may have no hope of seeing this or that money again which you may have advanced in the service; but are you a beggar on that account? If nothing else remained to you but what my uncle is bringing for you —

MAJ. T. Your uncle, Madam, will bring nothing for me.

MIN. Nothing but the two thousand pistoles which you so generously advanced to our government.

MAJ. T. If you had but read my letter, Madam!

MIN. Well, I did read it. But what I read in it, on this point, is a perfect riddle. It is impossible that any one should wish to turn a noble action into a crime. But explain to me, dear Major.

MAJ. T. You remember, Madam, that I had orders to collect the contribution for the war most strictly in cash in the districts in your neighbourhood. I wished to forego this severity, and advanced the money that was deficient myself.

MIN. I remember it well. I loved you for that deed before I had seen you.

MAJ. T. The government gave me their bill, and I wished, at the signing of the peace, to have the sum entered amongst the debts to be repaid by them. The bill was acknowledged as good, but my ownership of the same was disputed. People looked incredulous, when I declared that I had myself advanced the amount in cash. It was considered as bribery, as a douceur from the government, because I at once agreed to take the smallest sum with which I could have been satisfied in a case of the greatest exigency. Thus the bill went from my possession, and if it be paid will certainly not be paid to me. Hence, Madam, I consider my honour to be suspected! not on account of my discharge, which, if I had not received, I should have applied for. You look serious, Madam! Why do you not laugh? Ha! ha! ha! I am laughing.

MIN. Oh! stifle that laugh, Tellheim, I implore you! It is the terrible laugh of misanthropy. No, you are not the man to repent of a good deed, because it may have had a bad result for yourself. Nor can these consequences possibly be of long duration. The truth must come to light. The testimony of my uncle, of our government —

MAJ. T. Of your uncle! Of your government! Ha! ha! ha!

MIN. That laugh will kill me, Tellheim. If you believe in virtue and Providence, Tellheim, do not laugh so! I never heard a curse more terrible than that laugh! But, viewing the matter in the worst light, if they are determined to mistake your character here, with us you will not be misunderstood. No, we cannot, we will not, misunderstand you, Tellheim. And, if our government has the least sentiment of honour, I know what it must do. But I am foolish; what would that matter? Imagine, Tellheim, that you have lost the two thousand pistoles on some gay evening. The king was an unfortunate card for you: the queen (pointing to herself) will be so much the more favourable. Providence, believe me, always indemnifies a man of honour — often even beforehand. The action which was to cost you two thousand pistoles gained you me. Without that action, I never should have been desirous of making your acquaintance. You know I went uninvited to the first party where I thought I should meet you. I went entirely on your account. I went with a fixed determination to love you — I loved you already! with the fixed determination to make you mine, if I should find you as dark and ugly as the Moor of Venice. So dark and ugly you are not; nor will you be so jealous. But, Tellheim, Tellheim, you are yet very like him! Oh! the unmanageable, stubborn man, who always keeps his eye fixed upon the phantom of honour, and becomes hardened against every other sentiment!

Your eyes this way! Upon me, me, Tellheim! (He remains thoughtful and immovable, with his eyes fixed on one spot.) Of what are you thinking? Do you not hear me?

MAJ. T. (absent). Oh, yes; but tell me, how came the Moor into the service of Venice? Had the Moor no country of his own? Why did he hire his arm and his blood to a foreign land?

MIN. (alarmed). Of what are you thinking, Tellheim? It is time to break off. Come! (taking him by the hand). Franziska, let the carriage be brought round.

MAJ. T. (disengaging his hand, and following FRANZISKA). No, Franziska; I cannot have the honour of accompanying your mistress. Madam, let me still retain my senses unimpaired for to-day, and give me leave to go. You are on the right way to deprive me of them. I resist it as much as I can. But hear, whilst I am still myself, what I have firmly determined, and from which nothing in the world shall turn me. If I have not better luck in the game of life; if a complete change in my fortune does not take place; if —

MIN. I must interrupt you, Major. We ought to have told him that at first, Franziska. — You remind me of nothing. — Our conversation would have taken quite a different turn, Tellheim, if I had commenced with the good news which the Chevalier de la Marlinière brought just now.

MAJ. T. The Chevalier de la Marlinière! Who is he?

FRAN. He may be a very honest man, Major von Tellheim, except that —

MIN. Silence, Franziska! Also a discharged officer from the Dutch service, who —

MAJ. T. Ah! Lieutenant Riccaut!

MIN. He assured us he was a friend of yours.

MAJ. T. I assure you that I am not his.

MIN. And that some minister or other had told him, in confidence, that your business was likely to have the very best termination. A letter from the king must now be on its way to you.

MAJ. T. How came Riccaut and a minister in company? Something certainly must have happened concerning my affair; for just now the paymaster of the forces told me that the king had set aside all the evidence offered against me, and that I might take back my promise, which I had given in writing, not to depart from here until acquitted. But that will be all. They wish to give me an opportunity of getting away. But they are wrong. I shall not go. Sooner shall the utmost distress waste me away before the eyes of my calumniators, than —

MIN. Obstinate man!

MAJ. T. I require no favour; I want justice. My honour —

MIN. The honour of such a man —

MAJ. T. (warmly). No, Madam, you may be able to judge of any other subject, but not of this. Honour is not the voice of conscience, not the evidence of a few honourable men —

MIN. No, no, I know it well. Honour is . . . honour.

MAJ. T. In short, Madam . . . You did not let me finish. — I was going to say, if they keep from me so shamefully what is my own; if my honour be not perfectly righted — I cannot, Madam, ever be yours, for I am not worthy, in the eyes of the world, of being yours. Minna von Barnhelm deserves an irreproachable husband. It is a worthless love which does not scruple to expose its object to scorn. He is a worthless man, who is not ashamed to owe a woman all his good fortune; whose blind tenderness —

MIN. And is that really your feeling, Major? (turning her back suddenly). Franziska!

MAJ. T. Do not be angry.

MIN. (aside to FRANZISKA). Now is the time! What do you advise me, Franziska?

FRAN. I advise nothing. But certainly he goes rather too far.

MAJ. T. (approaching to interrupt them). You are angry, Madam.

MIN. (ironically). I? Not in the least.

MAJ. T. If I loved you less —

MIN. (still in the same tone). Oh! certainly, it would be a misfortune for me. And hear, Major, I also will not be the cause of your unhappiness. One should love with perfect disinterestedness. It is as well that I have not been more open! Perhaps your pity might have granted to me what your love refuses. (Drawing the ring slowly from her finger.)

MAJ. T. What does this mean, Madam?

MIN. No, neither of us must make the other either more or less happy. True love demands it. I believe you, Major; and you have too much honour to mistake love.

MAJ. T. Are you jesting, Madam?

MIN. Here! take back the ring with which you plighted your troth to me. (Gives him the ring.) Let it be so! We will suppose we have never met.

MAJ. T. What do I hear!

MIN. Does it surprise you! Take it, sir. You surely have not been pretending only!

MAJ. T. (takes the ring from her). Heavens! can Minna speak thus!

MIN. In one case you cannot be mine; in no case can I be yours. Your misfortune is probable; mine is certain. Farewell! (Is going.)

MAJ. T. Where are you going, dearest Minna?

MIN. Sir, you insult me now by that term of endearment.

MAJ. T. What is the matter, Madam? Where are you going?

MIN. Leave me. I go to hide my tears from you, deceiver! (Exit.)

SCENE VII

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, FRANZISKA.

MAJ. T. Her tears? And I am to leave her. (Is about to follow her.)

FRAN. (holding him back). Surely not, Major. You would not follow her into her own room!

MAJ. T. Her misfortune? Did she not speak of misfortune?

FRAN. Yes, truly; the misfortune of losing you, after —

MAJ. T. After? After what? There is more in this. What is it, Franziska? Tell me! Speak!

FRAN. After, I mean, she has made such sacrifices on your account.

MAJ. T. Sacrifices for me!

FRAN. Well, listen. It is a good thing for you, Major, that you are freed from your engagement with her in this manner.

5 — Why should I not tell you? It cannot remain a secret long. We have fled from home. Count von Bruchsal has disinherited my mistress, because she would not accept a husband of his choice. On that every one deserted and slighted her. What could we do? We determined to seek him, whom —

MAJ. T. Enough! Come, and let me throw myself at her feet.

FRAN. What are you thinking about! Rather go, and thank your good fortune.

MAJ. T. Pitiful creature! For what do you take me? yet no, my dear Fransizka, the advice did not come from your heart. Forgive my anger!

FRAN. Do not detain me any longer. I must see what she is about. How easily something might happen to her. Go now, and come again, if you like. (Follows MINNA.)

SCENE VIII

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

MAJ. T. But, Franziska! Oh! I will wait your return here. — No, that is more torturing! — If she is in earnest, she will not refuse to forgive me. — Now I want your aid, honest Werner! — No, Minna, I am no deceiver! (Rushes off.)

ACT V

SCENE I

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM (from one side), WERNER (from the other).

MAJ. T. Ah! Werner! I have been looking for you everywhere. Where have you been?

WER. And I have been looking for you, Major; that is always the way. — I bring you good news.

MAJ. T. I do not want your news now; I want your money. Quick, Werner, give me all you have; and then raise as much more as you can.

WER. Major! Now, upon my life, that is just what I said — "He will borrow money from me, when he has got it himself to lend."

MAJ. T. You surely are not seeking excuses!

WER. That I may have nothing to upbraid you with, take it with your right hand, and give it me again with your left.

MAJ. T. Do not detain me, Werner. It is my intention to repay you; but when 10 and how, God knows!

WER. Then you do not know yet that the treasury has received an order to pay you your money? I just heard it at —

MAJ. T. What are you talking about? 15 What nonsense have you let them palm off on you? Do you not see that if it were true I should be the first person to know it? In short, Werner, money! money!

WER. Very well, with pleasure. Here 20 is some! A hundred louis d'ors there, and a hundred ducats there. (Gives him both.)

MAJ. T. Werner, go and give Just the hundred louis d'ors. Let him redeem the ring again, on which he raised the money 25 this morning. But whence will you get some more, Werner? I want a good deal more.

WER. Leave that to me. The man who bought my farm lives in the town. The 30 date for payment is a fortnight hence, certainly; but the money is ready, and by a reduction of one half per cent —

MAJ. T. Very well, my dear Werner! You see that I have had recourse to you 35 alone — I must also confide all to you. The young lady you have seen is in distress —

WER. That is bad!

MAJ. T. But to-morrow she shall be 40 my wife.

WER. That is good!

MAJ. T. And the day after, I leave this place with her. I can go; I will go. I would sooner throw over everything here! 45 Who knows where some good luck may be in store for me. If you will, Werner, come with us. We will serve again.

WER. Really? But where there is war, Major!

MAJ. T. To be sure. Go, Werner, we will speak of this again.

WER. Oh! my dear Major! The day after to-morrow! Why not to-morrow? I will get everything ready. In Persia, Major, there is a famous war; what do you say?

5 MAJ. T. We will think of it. Only go, Werner!

WER. Hurrah! Long live Prince Heraclius! (Exit.)

SCENE II

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

MAJ. T. How do I feel! . . . My whole soul has acquired a new impulse. My own unhappiness bowed me to the ground; made me fretful, short-sighted, shy, careless: her unhappiness raises me. I see clearly again, and feel myself ready and capable of undertaking anything for her 20 sake. Why do I tarry? (Is going towards MINNA'S room, when FRANZISKA comes out of it.)

SCENE III

FRANZISKA, MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

FRAN. Is it you? I thought I heard your voice. What do you want, Major?

MAJ. T. What do I want! What is she 30 doing? Come!

FRAN. She is just going out for a drive.

MAJ. T. And alone? Without me? Where to?

FRAN. Have you forgotten, Major?

MAJ. T. How silly you are, Franziska! I irritated her, and she was angry. I will beg her pardon, and she will forgive me.

FRAN. What! After you have taken the ring back, Major!

MAJ. T. Ah! I did that in my confusion. I had forgotten about the ring. Where did I put it? (Searches for it.) Here it is.

FRAN. Is that it? (Aside, as he puts it again in his pocket.) If he would only look at it closer!

MAJ. T. She pressed it upon me so bitterly. But I have forgotten that. A full heart cannot weigh words. She will not for one moment refuse to take it again. 50 And have I not hers?

FRAN. She is now waiting for it in return. Where is it, Major? Show it to me, do!

MAJ. T. (embarrassed). I have . . . forgotten to put it on. Just — Just will bring it directly.

FRAN. They are something alike, I suppose; let me look at that one. I am very fond of such things.

MAJ. T. Another time, Franziska. Come now.

FRAN. (aside). He is determined not to be drawn out of his mistake.

MAJ. T. What do you say? Mistake!

FRAN. It is a mistake, I say, if you think that my mistress is still a good match. Her own fortune is far from considerable; by a few calculations in their own favour her guardians may reduce it to nothing. She expected everything from her uncle; but this cruel uncle —

MAJ. T. Let him go! Am I not man enough to make it all good to her again!

FRAN. Do you hear? She is ringing; I must go in again.

MAJ. T. I will accompany you.

FRAN. For heaven's sake, no! She forbade me expressly to speak with you. Come in at any rate a little time after me. (Goes in.)

SCENE IV

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

MAJ. T. (Calling after her.) Announce me! Speak for me, Franziska! I shall follow you directly. What shall I say to her? Yet, where the heart can speak, no preparation is necessary. There is one thing only which may need a studied turn . . . this reserve, this scrupulousness of throwing herself, unfortunate as she is, into my arms; this anxiety to make a false show of still possessing that happiness which she has lost through me. How she is to exculpate herself to herself — for by me it is already forgiven — for this distrust in my honour, in her own worth. . . . Ah! here she comes.

SCENE V

MINNA, FRANZISKA, MAJOR VON TELLHEIM.

MIN. (speaking as she comes out, as if not aware of the MAJOR'S presence). The carriage is at the door, Franziska, is it not? My fan!

MAJ. T. (advancing to her). Where are you going, Madam?

MIN. (with forced coldness). I am going out, Major. I guess why you have given yourself the trouble of coming back: to return me my ring. — Very well, Major von Tellheim, have the goodness to give it to Franziska. — Franziska, take the ring from Major von Tellheim! — I have no time to lose. (Is going.)

MAJ. T. (stepping before her). Madam! Ah! what have I heard? I was unworthy of such love.

MIN. So, Franziska, you have —

FRAN. Told him all.

MAJ. T. Do not be angry with me, Madam. I am no deceiver. You have, on my account, lost much in the eyes of the world, but not in mine. In my eyes you have gained beyond measure by this loss. It was too sudden. You feared it might make an unfavourable impression on me; at first you wished to hide it from me. I do not complain of this mistrust. It arose from the desire to retain my affection. That desire is my pride. You found me in distress; and you did not wish to add distress to distress. You could not divine how far your distress would raise me above any thoughts of my own.

MIN. That is all very well, Major, but it is now over. I have released you from your engagement; you have, by taking back the ring —

MAJ. T. Consented to nothing! On the contrary, I now consider myself bound more firmly than ever. You are mine, Minna, mine for ever. (Takes off the ring.) Here, take it for the second time — the pledge of my fidelity.

MIN. I take that ring again! That ring?

MAJ. T. Yes, dearest Minna, yes.

MIN. What are you asking me? that ring?

MAJ. T. You received it for the first time from my hand, when our positions were similar and the circumstances propitious. They are no longer propitious, but are again similar. Equality is always the strongest tie of love. Permit me, dearest Minna! (Seizes her hand to put on the ring.)

MIN. What! by force, Major! No, there is no power in the world which shall compel me to take back that ring! Do you think that I am in want of a ring? Oh! you may see (pointing to her ring) that I have another here which is in no way inferior to yours.

FRAN. (aside). Well, if he does not see it now!

MAJ. T. (letting fall her hand). What is this? I see Fräulein von Barnhelm, but I do not hear her. — You are pretending. — Pardon me, that I use your own words.

MIN. (in her natural tone). Did those words offend you, Major?

MAJ. T. They grieved me much.

MIN. (affected). They were not meant to do that, Tellheim. Forgive me, Tellheim.

MAJ. T. Ah! that friendly tone tells me you are yourself again, Minna; that you still love me.

FRAN. (exclaims). The joke would soon have gone a little too far.

MIN. (in a commanding tone). Franziska, you will not interfere in our affairs, I beg.

FRAN. (aside, in a surprised tone). Not enough yet!

MIN. Yes, sir, it would only be womanish vanity in me to pretend to be cold and scornful. No! Never! You deserve to find me as sincere as yourself. I do love you still, Tellheim, I love you still; but notwithstanding —

MAJ. T. No more, dearest Minna, no more! (Seizes her hand again, to put on the ring.)

MIN. (drawing back her hand). Notwithstanding, so much the more am I determined that that shall never be, — never! — Of what are you thinking, Major? — I thought your own distress was sufficient. You must remain here; you must obtain by obstinacy — no better phrase occurs to me at the moment — the most perfect satisfaction, obtain it by obstinacy. . . . And that even though the utmost distress should waste you away before the eyes of your calumniators —

MAJ. T. So I thought, so I said, when

I knew not what I thought or said. Chagrin and stifling rage had enveloped my whole soul; love itself, in the full blaze of happiness, could not illumine it. But it has sent its daughter, Pity, more familiar with gloomy misfortune, and she has dispelled the cloud, and opened again all the avenues of my soul to sensations of tenderness. The impulse of self-preservation awakes, when I have something more precious than myself to support, and to support through my own exertions. Do not let the word "pity" offend you. From the innocent cause of our distress we may hear the term without humiliation. I am this cause; through me, Minna, have you lost friends and relations, fortune and country. Through me, in me, must you find them all again, or I shall have the destruction of the most lovely of her sex upon my soul. Let me not think of a future in which I must detest myself. — No, nothing shall detain me here longer. From this moment I will oppose nothing but contempt to the injustice which I suffer. Is this country the world? Does the sun rise here alone? Where can I not go? In what service shall I be refused? And should I be obliged to seek it in the most distant clime, only follow me with confidence, dearest Minna — we shall want for nothing. I have a friend who will assist me with pleasure.

SCENE VI

An ORDERLY, MAJOR VON TELLHEIM,
MINNA, FRANZISKA.

FRAN. (seeing the ORDERLY). Hist, 40 Major!

MAJ. T. (to the ORDERLY). Whom do you want?

ORD. I am looking for Major von Tellheim. Ah! you are the Major, I see. I have to give you this letter from His Majesty the King (taking one out of his bag).

MAJ. T. To me?

ORD. According to the direction.

MIN. Franziska, do you hear? The Chevalier spoke the truth after all.

ORD. (whilst TELLHEIM takes the letter). I beg your pardon, Major; you should properly have had it yesterday, but I could not find you out. I learnt your address this morning only from Lieutenant Riccaut, on parade.

FRAN. Do you hear, my lady? — That is the Chevalier's minister. "What is the name of de ministre out dere, on de broad place?"

MAJ. T. I am extremely obliged to you for your trouble.

ORD. It is my duty, Major. (Exit.)

SCENE VII

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, MINNA,
FRANZISKA.

MAJ. T. Ah! Minna, what is this? What does this contain?

MIN. I am not entitled to extend my curiosity so far.

MAJ. T. What! You would still separate my fate from yours? — But why do I hesitate to open it? It cannot make me more unhappy than I am: no, dearest Minna, it cannot make us more unhappy — but perhaps more happy! Permit me. (While he opens and reads the letter, the LANDLORD comes stealthily on the stage.)

SCENE VIII

LANDLORD, the rest as before.

LAND. (to FRANZISKA). Hist! my pretty maid! A word!

FRAN. (to the LANDLORD). Mr. Landlord, we do not yet know ourselves what is in the letter.

LAND. Who wants to know about the letter! I come about the ring. The lady must give it to me again, directly. Just is there, and wants to redeem it.

MIN. (who in the meantime has approached the LANDLORD). Tell Just that it is already redeemed; and tell him by whom — by me.

LAND. But —

MIN. I take it upon myself. Go! (Exit LANDLORD.)

SCENE IX

MAJOR VON TELLHEIM, MINNA,
FRANZISKA.

FRAN. And now, my lady, make it up with the poor Major.

MIN. Oh! kind intercessor! As if the difficulties must not soon explain themselves.

MAJ. T. (after reading the letter, with much emotion). Ah! nor has he herein belied himself! Oh! Minna, what justice! what clemency! This is more than I expected; more than I deserve! — My fortune, my honour, all is re-established! — Do I dream? (Looking at the letter, as if to convince himself.) No, no delusion born of my own desires! Read it yourself, Minna; read it yourself!

MIN. I would not presume, Major.

15 MAJ. T. Presume! The letter is to me; to your Tellheim, Minna. It contains — what your uncle cannot take from you. You must read it! Do read it.

MIN. If it affords you pleasure, Major. 20 (Takes the letter and reads.)

"My dear Major von Tellheim,

"I hereby inform you, that the business which caused me some anxiety on account of your honour has been cleared up in your favour. My brother had a more detailed knowledge of it, and his testimony has more than proved your innocence. The Treasury has received orders to deliver again to you the bill in question, and to reimburse the sum advanced. I have also ordered that all claims which the Paymaster's Office brings forward against your accounts be nullified. Please to inform me whether your health 25 will allow of your taking active service again. I can ill spare a man of your courage and sentiments. I am your gracious KING," &c.

MAJ. T. Now, what do you say to that, 40 Minna?

MIN. (folding up and returning the letter). I? Nothing.

MAJ. T. Nothing?

MIN. Stay — yes. That your king, 45 who is a great man, can also be a good man. — But what is that to me! He is not my king.

MAJ. T. And do you say nothing more? Nothing about ourselves?

50 MIN. You are going to serve again. From Major, you will become Lieutenant-Colonel, perhaps Colonel. I congratulate you with all my heart.

MAJ. T. And you do not know me better? No, since fortune restores me sufficient to satisfy the wishes of a reasonable man, it shall depend upon my Minna alone, whether for the future I shall belong to any one else but her. To her service alone my whole life shall be devoted! The service of the great is dangerous, and does not repay the trouble, the restraint, the humiliation which it costs. Minna is not amongst those vain people who love nothing in their husbands beyond their titles and positions. She will love me for myself; and for her sake I will forget the whole world. I became a soldier from party feeling — I do not myself know on what political principles — and from the whim that it is good for every honourable man to try the profession of arms for a time, to make himself familiar with danger, and to learn coolness and determination. Extreme necessity alone could have compelled me to make this trial a fixed mode of life, this temporary occupation a profession. But now that nothing compels me, my whole and sole ambition is to be a peaceful and a contented man. This with you, dearest Minna, I shall infallibly become; this in your society I shall unchangeably remain. Let the holy bond unite us to-morrow; and then we will look round us, and in the whole wide habitable world seek out the most peaceful, the brightest, most smiling nook which wants but a happy couple to be a Paradise. There we will dwell; there shall each day . . . What is the matter, Minna? (MINNA turns away uneasily, and endeavours to hide her emotion.)

MIN. (regaining her composure). It is cruel of you, Tellheim, to paint such happiness to me, when I am forced to renounce it. My loss —

MAJ. T. Your loss! Why name your loss? All that Minna could lose is not Minna. You are still the sweetest, dearest, loveliest, best creature under the sun; all goodness and generosity, innocence and bliss! Now and then a little petulant; at times somewhat wilful — so much the better! So much the better! Minna would otherwise be an angel, whom I should honour with trepidation, but not dare to love. (Takes her hand to kiss it.)

MIN. (drawing away her hand). Not so, sir. Why this sudden change? Is this flattering impetuous lover the cold Tellheim! — Could his returning good fortune alone create this ardour in him? He will permit me during his passionate excitement to retain the power of reflection for us both. When he could himself reflect, I heard him say — "it is a worthless love which does not scruple to expose its object to scorn." — True; and I aspire to as pure and noble a love as he himself. Now, when honour calls him, when a great monarch solicits his services, shall I consent that he shall give himself up to love-sick dreams with me? that the illustrious warrior shall degenerate into a toying swain? No, Major, follow the call of your higher destiny.

MAJ. T. Well! if the busy world has greater charms for you, Minna, let us remain in the busy world! How mean, how poor is this busy world; you now only know its gilded surface. Yet certainly, Minna, you will . . . But let it be so! until then! Your charms shall not want admirers, nor will my happiness lack enviers.

MIN. No, Tellheim, I do not mean that! I send you back into the busy world, on the road of honour, without wishing to accompany you. Tellheim will there require an irreproachable wife! A fugitive Saxon girl who has thrown herself upon him —

MAJ. T. (starting up, and looking fiercely about him). Who dare say that! Ah! Minna, I feel afraid of myself, when I imagine that any one but yourself could have spoken so. My anger against him would know no bounds.

MIN. Exactly! That is just what I fear. You would not endure one word of calumny against me, and yet you would have to put up with the very bitterest every day. In short, Tellheim, hear what I have firmly determined, and from which nothing in the world shall turn me —

MAJ. T. Before you proceed, I implore you, Minna, reflect for one moment, that you are about to pronounce a sentence of life or death upon me!

MIN. Without a moment's reflection! . . . As certainly as I have given you back the ring with which you formerly pledged your troth to me, as certainly as you have taken back that same ring, so certainly shall the unfortunate Minna never be the wife of the fortunate Tellheim!

MAJ. T. And herewith you pronounce my sentence.

MIN. Equality is the only sure bond of love. The happy Minna only wished to live for the happy Tellheim. Even Minna in misfortune would have allowed herself to be persuaded either to increase or to assuage the misfortune of her friend through herself. . . . He must have seen, before the arrival of that letter, which has again destroyed all equality between us, that in appearance only I refused.

MAJ. T. Is that true? I thank you, Minna, that you have not yet pronounced the sentence. You will only marry Tellheim when unfortunate? You may have him. (Coolly.) I perceive now that it would be indecorous in me to accept this tardy justice; that it will be better if I do not seek again that of which I have been deprived by such shameful suspicion. Yes; I will suppose that I have not received the letter. Behold my only answer to it! (About to tear it up.)

MIN. (stopping him). What are you going to do, Tellheim?

MAJ. T. Obtain your hand.

MIN. Stop!

MAJ. T. Madam, it is torn without fail if you do not quickly recall your words. — Then we will see what else you may have to object to in me.

MIN. What! In such a tone? Shall I, must I, thus become contemptible in my own eyes? Never! She is a worthless creature, who is not ashamed to owe her whole happiness to the blind tenderness of a man!

MAJ. T. False! utterly false!

MIN. Can you venture to find fault with your own words when coming from my lips?

MAJ. T. Sophistry! Does the weaker sex dishonour itself by every action which does not become the stronger? Or can a man do everything which is proper in a woman? Which is appointed by nature to be the support of the other?

MIN. Be not alarmed, Tellheim! . . . I shall not be quite unprotected, if I must decline the honour of your protection. I shall still have as much as is absolutely necessary. I have announced my arrival to our ambassador. I am to see him to-day. I hope he will assist me. Time is flying. Permit me, Major —

MAJ. T. I will accompany you, Madam.

MIN. No, Major; leave me.

MAJ. T. Sooner shall your shadow desert you! Come, Madam, where you will, to whom you will, everywhere, to friends and strangers, will I repeat in your presence — repeat a hundred times each day — what a bond binds you to me, and with what cruel caprice you wish to break

SCENE X

JUST, the rest as before.

JUST (impetuously). Major! Major!

MAJ. T. Well!

JUST. Here quick! quick!

MAJ. T. Why? Come to me. Speak, what is the matter?

JUST. What do you think? (Whispers to him.)

MIN. (aside to FRANZISKA). Do you notice anything, Franziska?

FRAN. Oh! you merciless creature! I have stood here on thorns.

MAJ. T. (to JUST). What do you say? . . . That is not possible! . . . You? (Looking fiercely at MINNA.) Speak it out; tell it to her face. Listen, Madam.

JUST. The Landlord says, that Fräulein von Barnhelm has taken the ring which I pledged to him; she recognised it as her own, and would not return it.

MAJ. T. Is that true, Madam? No, that cannot be true!

MIN. (smiling). And why not, Tellheim? Why can it not be true?

MAJ. T. (vehemently). Then it is true! . . . What terrible light suddenly breaks in upon me! . . . Now I know you — false, faithless one!

MIN. (alarmed). Who, who is faithless?

MAJ. T. You, whom I will never more name!

MIN. Tellheim!

MAJ. T. Forget my name. . . . You came here with the intention of breaking with me. . . . It is evident! . . . Oh, that chance should thus delight to assist the faithless! It brought your ring into your possession. Your craftiness contrived to get my own back into mine!

MIN. Tellheim, what visions are you conjuring up! Be calm, and listen to me.

FRAN. (aside). Now she will catch it!

SCENE XI

WERNER (with a purse full of gold),
the rest as before.

WER. Here I am already, Major!

MAJ. T. (without looking at him). Who wants you?

WER. I have brought more money! A 20 thousand pistoles!

MAJ. T. I do not want them!

WER. And to-morrow, Major, you can have as many more.

MAJ. T. Keep your money!

WER. It is your money, Major. . . . I do not think you see whom you are speaking to!

MAJ. T. Take it away! I say.

WER. What is the matter with you? — 30 I am Werner.

MAJ. T. All goodness is dissimulation; all kindness, deceit.

WER. Is that meant for me?

MAJ. T. As you please!

WER. Why, I have only obeyed your commands.

MAJ. T. Obey once more, and be off!

WER. Major! (vexed). I am a man —

MAJ. T. So much the better!

WER. Who can also be angry.

MAJ. T. Anger is the best thing we possess.

WER. I beg you, Major.

MAJ. T. How often must I tell you? I 45 do not want your money!

WER. (in a rage). Then take it, who will! (Throws the purse on the ground, and goes to the side.)

MIN. (to FRANZISKA). Ah! Franziska, I 50 ought to have followed your advice. I have carried the jest too far. — Still, when he hears me . . . (going to him).

FRAN. (without answering MINNA, goes up to WERNER). Mr. Sergeant —

WER. (pettishly). Go along!

FRAN. Ah! what men these are.

MIN. Tellheim! Tellheim! (TELLHEIM, biting his fingers with rage, turns away his face, without listening.) No, this 10 is too bad. . . . Only listen! . . . You are mistaken! . . . A mere misunderstanding. Tellheim, will you not hear your Minna? Can you have such a suspicion? . . . I break my engagement with 15 you? I came here for that purpose? . . . Tellheim!

SCENE XII

TWO SERVANTS (running into the room from different sides), the rest as before.

FIRST SER. Your ladyship, his excellency the Count!

SECOND SER. He is coming, your ladyship!

25 FRAN. (running to the window). It is! it is he!

MIN. Is it? Now, Tellheim, quick!

MAJ. T. (suddenly recovering himself). Who, who comes? Your uncle, Madam! this cruel uncle! . . . Let him come; just let him come! . . . Fear not! . . . He shall not hurt you even by a look. He shall have to deal with me. . . . You do not indeed deserve it of me.

35 MIN. Quick, Tellheim! one embrace and forget all.

MAJ. T. Ah! did I but know that you could regret —

MIN. No, I can never regret having obtained a sight of your whole heart! . . . Ah! what a man you are! . . . Embrace your Minna, your happy Minna: and in nothing more happy than in the possession of you. (Embracing.) And now to meet him!

MAJ. T. To meet whom?

MIN. The best of your unknown friends.

MAJ. T. What!

MIN. The Count, my uncle, my father, your father. . . . My flight, his displeasure, my loss of property — do you not see that all is a fiction, credulous knight?

MAJ. T. Fiction! But the ring? the ring?

MIN. Where is the ring that I gave back to you?

MAJ. T. You will take it again? Ah! now I am happy. . . . Here, Minna (taking it from his pocket).

MIN. Look at it first! Oh! how blind are those who will not see! . . . What ring is that? the one you gave me? or the one I gave you? Is it not the one which I did not like to leave in the landlord's possession?

MAJ. T. Heavens! what do I see! What do I hear!

MIN. Shall I take it again now? Shall I? Give it to me! give it! (Takes it from him, and then puts it on his finger herself.) There, now all is right!

MAJ. T. Where am I? (Kissing her hand.) Oh! malicious angel, to torture me so!

MIN. As a proof, my dear husband, that you shall never play me a trick without my playing you one in return. . . . Do you suppose that you did not torture me also?

MAJ. T. Oh you actresses! But I ought to have known you.

FRAN. Not I, indeed; I am spoilt for acting. I trembled and shook, and was obliged to hold my lips together with my hand.

MIN. Nor was mine an easy part. — But come now —

MAJ. T. I have not recovered myself yet. How happy, yet how anxious, I feel. It is like awaking suddenly from a frightful dream.

MIN. We are losing time. . . . I hear him coming now.

HEIM), only four-and-twenty hours here, and friends — company already!

MIN. Guess who it is!

COUNT. Not your Tellheim, surely!

MIN. Who else! — Come, Tellheim (introducing him).

COUNT. Sir, we have never met; but at the first glance I fancied I recognised you. I wished it might be Major von Tellheim. — Your hand, sir; you have my highest esteem; I ask for your friendship. My niece, my daughter loves you.

MIN. You know that, my father! — And was my love blind?

COUNT. No, Minna, your love was not blind; but your lover — is dumb.

MAJ. T. (throwing himself in the COUNT's arms). Let me recover myself, my father!

COUNT. Right, my son. I see your heart can speak, though your lips cannot. I do not usually care for those who wear this uniform. But you are an honourable man, Tellheim; and one must love an honourable man, in whatever garb he may be.

MIN. Ah! did you but know all!

COUNT. Why should I not hear all? — Which are my apartments, landlord?

LAND. Will your Excellency have the goodness to walk this way?

COUNT. Come, Minna! Pray come, Major! (Exit with the LANDLORD and servants.)

MIN. Come, Tellheim!

MAJ. T. I will follow you in an instant, Minna. One word first with this man (turning to WERNER).

MIN. And a good word, methinks, it should be. Should it not, Franziska? (Exit.)

SCENE XIII

COUNT VON BRUCHSAL (accompanied by several servants and the LANDLORD).

The rest as before.

COUNT (entering). She arrived in safety, I hope?

MAJ. T. (pointing to the purse which WERNER had thrown down). Here, Just, pick up the purse, and carry it home. Go!

(JUST takes it up and goes.)

WER. (still standing, out of humour, in a corner, and absent till he hears the last words). Well, what now?

MAJ. T. (in a friendly tone while going up to him). Werner, when can I have the other two thousand pistoles?

WER. (in a good humour again instantly). To-morrow, Major, to-morrow.

MAJ. T. I do not need to become your debtor; but I will be your banker. All you good-natured people ought to have guardians. You are in a manner spend-thrifts. — I irritated you just now, Werner. WER. Upon my life you did! But I ought not to have been such a dolt. Now I see it all clearly. I deserve a hundred lashes. You may give them to me, if you will, Major. Only no more ill will, dear Major!

MAJ. T. Ill will! (shaking him by the hand). Read in my eyes all that I cannot say to you — Ah! let me see the man with a better wife and a more trusty friend than I shall have. — Eh! Franziska? (Exit.)

SCENE XV

WERNER, FRANZISKA.

FRAN. (aside). Yes, indeed, he is more than good! — Such a man will never fall in my way again. — It must come out. (Approaching WERNER bashfully.) Mr. Sergeant!

WER. (wiping his eyes). Well!

5 FRAN. Mr. Sergeant —

WER. What do you want, little woman?

FRAN. Look at me, Mr. Sergeant.

WER. I can't yet; there is something, I don't know what, in my eyes.

10 FRAN. Now do look at me!

WER. I am afraid I have looked at you too much already, little woman! — There, now I can see you. What then?

FRAN. Mr. Sergeant — don't you want 15 a Mrs. Sergeant?

WER. Do you really mean it, little woman?

FRAN. Really I do.

WER. And would you go with me to 20 Persia even?

FRAN. Wherever you please.

WER. You will! Hullo, Major, no boasting! At any rate I have got as good a wife, and as trusty a friend, as you. — 25 Give me your hand, my little woman! It's a match! — In ten years' time you shall be a general's wife, or a widow!

PHILOSOPHY AND CRITICISM

FRENCH

PASCAL

(1623-1662)

Blaise Pascal, philosopher and mathematician, was born at Clermont, the son of Étienne Pascal, president of the Court of Aids. At twelve, Pascal showed a pronounced talent for mathematics, and at sixteen wrote the Treatise on Conic Sections which astonished the great mathematician Descartes. In 1641 he suffered a malady which, though not serious in its physical effects, produced in him an irritability that pursued him through life. While recovering from an injury in Rouen, Pascal was visited by two Norman gentlemen who recommended to him the writings of Jansenius and others of the same school, a religious movement based on the writings of St. Augustine, having for its main tenet the elimination of free will and the dependence of salvation upon grace. Immediately attracted by the doctrine, Pascal had no difficulty in converting his father and his two sisters. Although many found in this doctrine an impetus to despair, Pascal seems to have been stirred up by it. He plunged into the study of physical science and in 1647 made the experiments leading up to his Treatise on Vacuum, the preface to which did much toward the establishment of modern scientific methods. In his subsequent studies he continued his search for certitude, which he believed could come only by divine revelation and happiness. Unable to find either certitude or happiness in the activities of the human intellect, he finally surrendered his Faust-like endeavor to understand the universe through human intelligence alone, and in 1645 retired to Port Royal, the great refuge of the Jansenists. He had in him, however, little of the theologian and was still the scientist and the philosopher even when he wielded his pen in defense of theology. From his retreat at Port Royal he carried on (1656-57) a remarkable controversy with the Jesuits, the details of which are preserved in his Provincial Letters. Later he planned his Apology for the Christian Religion, but the work was never finished. He died in 1662.

The Thoughts are the fragments of the projected Apology. Pascal's purpose was to show that religion is not contrary to reason, then to show that it is worthy of respect, then to make it so attractive that the good will wish it true, and last to indicate that it is true. His method, it must be admitted, was not much like that used by strictly theological writers, and the unpleasant effect of the Thoughts upon the more conservative theologians was due not to Pascal's lack of reverence or enthusiasm for Christianity but to his habit of writing like a layman. His exposition is marvelously clear, direct, and objective. He cared nothing for rhetorical ornament or outward flourishes, but drove straight to the mark without hesitation. This quality marks Pascal as not only one of the world's clearest thinkers, but also as one of the greatest writers of expository prose.

The following selections were translated by O. W. Wight in The Thoughts, Letters, and Opuscles of Blaise Pascal, Houghton Mifflin and Company, Boston, 1893.

THOUGHTS

CHAPTER II

I

Disproportion of Man. Let man, then, contemplate entire nature in her height and full majesty; let him remove his view from the low objects which surround him; let him regard that shining luminary placed as an eternal lamp to give light to the universe; let him consider the earth as a point, in comparison with the vast circuit described by that star (the sun); let him learn with wonder that this vast circuit itself is but a very minute point when compared with that embraced by the stars which roll in the firmament. But if our view stops there, let the imagination pass beyond: it will sooner be wearied with conceiving than nature with supplying food for contemplation. All this visible world is but an imperceptible point in the ample bosom of nature. No idea approaches it. In vain we extend our conceptions beyond imaginable spaces: we bring forth but atoms, in comparison with the reality of things. It is an infinite sphere, of which the center is everywhere, the circumference nowhere. In fine, it is the greatest discernible character of the omnipotence of God, that our imagination loses itself in this thought.

Let man, having returned to himself, consider what he is compared to what is; let him regard himself as a wanderer into this remote province of nature; and let him, from this narrow prison wherein he finds himself dwelling (I mean the universe), learn to estimate the earth, kingdoms, cities, and himself, at a proper value.

What is man in the midst of the infinite? But to show him another prodigy equally astonishing, let him seek in what he knows things the most minute; let a mite exhibit to him in the exceeding smallness of its body, parts incomparably smaller, limbs with joints, veins in these limbs, blood in these veins, humors in this blood, globules in these humors, gases in these globules; let him, still dividing these last objects, exhaust his powers of conception, and let the ultimate object at which he can arrive now be the subject of our discourse; he will think, perhaps, that this is the minutest atom of nature. I will show him therein a new abyss. I will picture to him not only the visible universe, but the conceivable immensity of nature, in the compass of this abbreviation of an atom. Let him view therein an infinity of worlds, each of which has its firmament, its planets, its earth, in the same proportion as the visible world; and on this earth animals, and, in fine, mites, in which he will find again what the first have given; and still finding in the others the same thing, without end, and without repose, let him lose himself in these wonders, as astonishing in their littleness as the others in their magnitude; for who will not marvel that our body, which just before was not perceptible in the universe, itself imperceptible in the bosom of the all, is now a colossus, a world, or rather an all, in comparison with the nothingness at which it is impossible to arrive?

Whoever shall thus consider himself will be frightened at himself, and observing himself suspended in the mass of matter allotted to him by nature, between these two abysses of infinity and nothingness, will tremble at the sight of these wonders; and I believe that, his curiosity being changed into admiration, he will be more disposed to contemplate them in silence, than to investigate them with presumption.

For, in fine, what is man in the midst of nature? A nothing in comparison with the infinite, an all in comparison with nothingness: a mean between nothing and all. Infinitely far from comprehending the extremes, the end of things and their principle are for him inevitably concealed in an impenetrable secret; equally incapable of seeing the nothingness whence he is derived, and the infinity in which he is swallowed up.

II

Greatness and Misery. Misery being inferred from greatness, and greatness from misery, some have inferred misery so much the more, as they have taken greatness for its proof; and others, inferring greatness so much the more strongly as they have inferred it from misery itself, all that the one class has been able to say to show greatness has only served as an argument to the other for inferring misery, since it is being so much the more miserable the greater the height is from which we have fallen; and vice versa. They oppose each other in a perpetual circle; being certain that, in proportion as men are enlightened, they find both greatness and misery in man. In a word, man knows that he is miserable; he is therefore miserable since he is so; but he is very great, since he knows it.

X

Man is but a reed, the weakest in nature, but he is a thinking reed. It is not necessary that the entire universe arm itself to crush him. A breath of air, a drop of water, suffices to kill him. But were the universe to crush him, man would still be more noble than that which kills him, because he knows that he dies; and the universe knows nothing of the advantage it has over him.

Our whole dignity consists then, in thought. Our elevation must be derived from this, not from space and duration, which we cannot fill. Let us endeavor, then, to think well: this is the principle of ethics.

CHAPTER IV

VI

Montaigne is wrong in declaring that custom ought to be followed simply because it is custom, and not because it is reasonable or just; but the people follow it for the sole reason that they believe it just: otherwise, they would not follow it, although it were custom; for men wish to be subject only to reason or justice. Custom, were not this the case, would pass for tyranny; but the empire of reason and justice is not more tyrannical than that of pleasure: these are principles natural to man.

It would be good, then, that we should obey the laws and customs, because they are laws; that we should know that there is none true and just to be introduced; that we know nothing of them, and that thus it is only necessary to follow the received; by this means, we would never quit them. But the people are not susceptible of this doctrine; and thus, as they suppose the truth may be found, and that it is in laws and customs, they have faith in them, and take their antiquity as a proof of their truth, and not simply of their authority without truth. Thus they obey them; but they are liable to revolt as soon as they are shown that laws and customs are worth nothing; as all may be shown to be, by regarding them on a certain side.

VII

There is a universal and essential difference between actions of will and all others.

Will is one of the principal organs of belief; not that it forms belief, but because things are true or false, according to the side on which we look at them. The will, that is more pleased with one than with another, hinders the mind from considering the qualities of those that it dislikes to see; and thus the mind, keeping pace with the will, fixes its attention upon the side that it likes, and thus it judges by what it sees in that.

XI

If we dreamed every night the same thing, it would affect us as much as the objects that we see every day; and if an artisan were sure of dreaming every night, during twelve hours, that he is a king, I believe he would be almost as happy as a king who should dream every night, during twelve hours, that he is an artisan.

If we dreamed every night that we were pursued by enemies, and agitated by these painful fancies, and were our days passed in different occupations, as on a journey, we should suffer almost as much as if this were true, and we should apprehend sleep as we apprehend waking when we fear to enter upon such misfortunes in reality. And, in fact, it would produce nearly the same ills as the reality. But inasmuch as dreams are different, and the same dream is varied, what we see in them affects us less than what we see waking, on account of the continuity, which, nevertheless, is not so continuous and equal that it does not also change, but less abruptly, except rarely, as when we are journeying, and then one says it seems to me that I am dreaming, for life is a somewhat less inconstant dream.

CHAPTER VI

XVI

Have you never seen people who, by way of complaining of the little regard you have for them, parade the example of people of quality who esteem them? I would answer them thus: Show me the merit by which you have charmed these persons, and I will esteem you the same.

XVII

A man who stations himself at the window to see the passers-by, — if I pass that way, can I say that he stationed himself there to see me? No; for he does not think of me in particular. But he who loves a person on account of that person's beauty, does he love the person? No; for the smallpox, which kills the beauty without killing the person, will destroy the love. And if one loves me for my judgment, for my memory, does he love me? No; for I may lose those faculties without losing myself. Where, then, is this me, if it is neither in the body nor in the soul; and how love the body or the soul, except for these endowments, which are not what constitute the me, since they are perishable? For could we love the substance of a person's soul abstractly and without reference to its qualities? This is impossible, and would be unjust. One never loves the person, then, but only the qualities. Let us, then, no longer ridicule those who claim honor for their place and office, for we love no one but for adventitious qualities.

CHAPTER VIII

XIX

The combat alone pleases us, not the victory. We love to see combats of animals, not the vanquisher let loose on the vanquished. What would we see but the crisis of victory? And as soon as it comes, we are satisfied. Thus in play, thus in the search after truth. We like to see in disputes the combat of opinions; but to contemplate truth discovered, not at all. To remark it with pleasure, we must see it emerging from dispute. Just so in the passions, there is a pleasure in seeing two contending passions in conflict; but when one is mistress, it is no longer anything but brutality. We never seek things, but the search after them. Thus, in the drama, tranquil scenes without fear are worthless; just so, extreme miseries without hope, brutal loves, and harsh severities.

XLI

Do you wish to be thought well of? Do not speak of it.

XLII

I lay it down as a fact that if all men knew what others say of them there would not be four friends in the world. This appears from the quarrels to which indiscreet reports occasionally give rise.

CHAPTER IX

XXX

The last thing that we find in making a book is to know what we must put first.

XXXII

What vanity is painting, which attracts admiration by the resemblance of things which in the original we do not admire!

XXXIV

Those who are accustomed to judge by sentiment understand nothing of matters of reasoning; for they wish at first to penetrate with one view, and are not accustomed to search for principles. And others, on the contrary, who are accustomed to reason by principles, comprehend nothing of matters of sentiment, seeking therein principles, and not being able to see them at one view.

ROUSSEAU

Jean Jacques Rousseau, greatest of romantic philosophers, was born in Geneva in 1712, the son of a clock-maker. At the death of his mother, his father and his aunts undertook his early training, and upon his father's removal from Geneva, Jean Jacques remained in the charge of an uncle and an aunt. At sixteen he ran away to Savoy, where he was sheltered by Mme. de Warens, an enthusiastic religionist who looked upon him as a possible convert to Catholicism. For a time he worked as a domestic servant, leading a wild, irregular life. Mme. de Warens, who hoped to have him trained for the priesthood, tried to take him in hand; but he soon abandoned classical studies for music, and then began a series of wanderings that ended at Mme. de Warens's establishment at Chambéry. The summers of 1738-1740, spent in study at Charmettes, prepared him for his entry into the intellectual world. His departure for Paris in 1741 marks the end of his friendship with Mme. de Warens.

For a time Rousseau continued to occupy himself with music; but his independence of spirit made him unpopular with patrons, and he was finally reduced to copying music as a means of livelihood. He had made friends, however, on his former visit to Paris. Diderot gave him the task of preparing articles on music for the Encyclopædia. He knew Fontenelle and Marivaux and became acquainted with Condillac. His growing reputation as a musician caused him to be in demand in many distinguished salons. He became secretary to Mme. Dupin. In 1749 the Academy of Dijon met to consider the question: Has the progress of science and art tended to corrupt or to purify manners? Rousseau's discourse on this question, the Discourse on Inequality, brought him instant fame. In spite of his rude manners and his dislike for polite society, he was whirled into the midst of metropolitan life. His desire to escape was answered by Mme. d'Épinay's offer of the use of her country house at Chevrette. Installed here in 1756, Rousseau looked forward to a very happy existence; but troubles growing from Mme. d'Épinay's attachment for him soon ended his tranquillity, and he was forced to give up his hermitage. He settled in a small house at Montmorency, where within five years he wrote the Nouvelle Héloïse, his Lettre sur les spectacles, his Contrat social (Social Contract), and his Émile. It was the last named book which destroyed his peace. It was severely censured on all sides and condemned by the French Parliament, and a warrant was issued for the arrest of the author. Rousseau sought refuge with the king of Prussia and later went to England (1765), where he was protected by David Hume until they quarreled. About this time he began to suffer from delusions of persecution, and his life became a continual flight from imaginary pursuers and a battle with poverty. At last he accepted the hospitality of the Marquis of Girardin at Ermenonville, where he died in 1778.

The Social Contract is one of the world's most influential political documents; perhaps the most distinctive assertion of natural right. The social contract is based on the assumption that government is only by the consent of the governed; that the people voluntarily transfer to certain rulers a certain amount of their natural right, but that no more should be given than is consistent with the welfare of the people. Society is an association for the preservation and protection of the people of whom it is composed, and no government is lawful which does not have for its particular aim and function the securing of public good. The justice of Rousseau's basic view can hardly be questioned. Most of the objections to his theory raised by later political scientists concerned his manner of working out the details.

The selection comes from the Social Contract by Jean Jacques Rousseau, London, J. M. Dent (Everyman's Library).

THE SOCIAL CONTRACT

BOOK I

I mean to inquire if, in the civil order, there can be any sure and legitimate rule of administration, men being taken as they are and laws as they might be. In this inquiry I shall endeavour always to unite what right sanctions with what is prescribed by interest, in order that justice and utility may in no case be divided.

I enter upon my task without proving the importance of the subject. I shall be asked if I am a prince or a legislator, to write on politics. I answer that I am neither, and that is why I do so. If I were a prince or a legislator, I should not waste 5 time in saying what wants doing; I should do it, or hold my peace.
 As I was born a citizen of a free State, and a member of the Sovereign, I feel that, however feeble the influence my voice can have on public affairs, the right of voting on them makes it my duty to study them: and I am happy, when I reflect upon governments, to find my inquiries always furnish me with new reasons for loving that of my own country.

CHAPTER I

SUBJECT OF THE FIRST BOOK

Man is born free; and everywhere he is in chains. One thinks himself the master of others, and still remains a greater slave than they. How did this change come about? I do not know. What can make it legitimate? That question I think I can answer.

If I took into account only force, and the effects derived from it, I should say: "As long as a people is compelled to obey, and obeys, it does well; as soon as it can shake off the yoke, and shakes it off, it does still better; for, regaining its liberty by the same right as took it away, either it is justified in resuming it, or there was no justification for those who took it away." But the social order is a sacred right which is the basis of all other rights. Nevertheless, this right does not come from nature, and must therefore be founded on conventions. Before coming to that, I have to prove what I have just asserted.

CHAPTER II

THE FIRST SOCIETIES

The most ancient of all societies, and the only one that is natural, is the family: and even so the children remain attached to the father only so long as they need him for their preservation. As soon as this need ceases, the natural bond is dissolved. The children, released from the obedience they owed to the father, and the father, released from the care he owed his children, return equally to independence. If they remain united, they continue so no longer naturally, but voluntarily; and the family itself is then maintained only by convention.

This common liberty results from the nature of man. His first law is to provide for his own preservation, his first cares are those which he owes to himself; and, as soon as he reaches years of discretion, he is the sole judge of the proper means of preserving himself, and consequently becomes his own master.

The family then may be called the first model of political societies: the ruler corresponds to the father, and the people to the children; and all, being born free and equal, alienate their liberty only for their own advantage. The whole difference is that, in the family, the love of the father for his children repays him for the care he takes of them, while, in the State, the pleasure of commanding takes the place of the love which the chief cannot have for the peoples under him.

Grotius¹ denies that all human power is established in favour of the governed, and quotes slavery as an example. His usual method of reasoning is constantly to establish right by fact. It would be possible to employ a more logical method, but none could be more favourable to tyrants.

It is then, according to Grotius, doubtful whether the human race belongs to a hundred men, or that hundred men to the human race: and, throughout his book, he seems to incline to the former alternative, which is also the view of Hobbes.² On this showing, the human species is divided into so many herds of cattle, each with its ruler, who keeps guard over them for the purpose of devouring them.

As a shepherd is of a nature superior to that of his flock, the shepherds of men, i.e. their rulers, are of a nature superior to that of the peoples under them. Thus, Philo³ tells us, the Emperor Caligula reasoned, concluding equally well either that kings were gods, or that men were beasts.

The reasoning of Caligula agrees with that of Hobbes and Grotius. Aristotle, before any of them, had said that men are by no means equal naturally, but that some are born for slavery, and others for dominion.

¹ Grotius (1583-1645), famous historian and political scientist, who is regarded by many as the founder of the modern study of government.

² Thomas Hobbes, English philosopher (1588-1679), author of the Leviathan, a study of the organization of the state.

³ Judæus Philo, Jewish Hellenistic philosopher, 20 B.C.-54 A.D. He was sent to Rome in 40 A.D. on an embassy to the emperor Caligula.

Aristotle was right; but he took the effect for the cause. Nothing can be more certain than that every man born in slavery is born for slavery. Slaves lose everything in their chains, even the desire of escaping from them: they love their servitude, as the comrades of Ulysses loved their brutish condition.¹ If then there are slaves by nature, it is because there have been slaves against nature. Force made the first slaves, and their cowardice perpetuated the condition.

I have said nothing of King Adam, or Emperor Noah, father of the three great monarchs² who shared out the universe, like the children of Saturn,³ whom some scholars have recognised in them. I trust to getting due thanks for my moderation; for, being a direct descendant of one of these princes, perhaps of the eldest branch, how do I know that a verification of titles might not leave me the legitimate king of the human race? In any case, there can be no doubt that Adam was sovereign of the world, as Robinson Crusoe was of his island, as long as he was its only inhabitant; and this empire had the advantage that the monarch, safe on his throne, had no rebellions, wars, or conspirators to fear.

CHAPTER III

THE RIGHT OF THE STRONGEST

The strongest is never strong enough to be always the master, unless he transforms strength into right, and obedience into duty. Hence the right of the strongest, which, though to all seeming meant ironically, is really laid down as a fundamental principle. But are we never to have an explanation of this phrase? Force is a physical power, and I fail to see what moral effect it can have. To yield to force in an act of necessity, not of will — at the most, an act of prudence. In what sense can it be a duty?

Suppose for a moment that this so-called "right" exists. I maintain that the sole ¹ A reference to Circe's transformation of Ulysses' men into swine.

² Shem, Ham, and Japheth, through whom Noah was supposed to have become the ancestor of the human race.

³ According to some traditions Saturn was the ruler of the universe in the first, or Golden Age. He was regarded by the Romans as the father of Jupiter and other divinities.

result is a mass of inexplicable nonsense. For, if force creates right, the effect changes with the cause: every force that is greater than the first succeeds to its right. As soon as it is possible to disobey with impunity, disobedience is legitimate; and, the strongest being always in the right, the only thing that matters is to act so as to become the strongest. But what kind of right is that which perishes when force fails? If we must obey perforce, there is no need to obey because we ought; and if we are not forced to obey, we are under no obligation to do so. Clearly, the word "right" adds nothing to force: in this connection, it means absolutely nothing.

Obeys the powers that be. If this means yield to force, it is a good precept, but superfluous: I can answer for its never being violated. All power comes from God, I admit; but so does all sickness: does that mean that we are forbidden to call in the doctor? A brigand surprises me at the edge of a wood: must I not merely surrender my purse on compulsion; but, even if I could withhold it, am I in conscience bound to give it up? For certainly the pistol he holds is also a power.

Let us then admit that force does not create right, and that we are obliged to obey only legitimate powers. In that case, my original question recurs.

CHAPTER IV

SLAVERY

Since no man has a natural authority over his fellow, and force creates no right, we must conclude that conventions form the basis of all legitimate authority among men.

If an individual, says Grotius, can alienate his liberty and make himself the slave of a master, why could not a whole people do the same and make itself subject to a king? There are in this passage plenty of ambiguous words which would need explaining; but let us confine ourselves to the word alienate. To alienate is to give or to sell. Now, a man who becomes the slave of another does not give himself; he sells himself, at the least for his subsistence: but for what does a people sell itself? A king is so far from furnishing his subjects with their subsistence that he gets his own only from them; and, according to Rabelais, kings do not live on nothing. Do subjects then give their persons on condition that the king takes their goods also? I fail to see what they have left to preserve.

It will be said that the despot assures his subjects civil tranquillity. Granted; but what do they gain, if the wars his ambition brings down upon them, his insatiable avidity, and the vexatious conduct of his ministers press harder on them than their own dissensions would have done? What do they gain, if the very tranquillity they enjoy is one of their miseries? Tranquillity is found also in dungeons; but is that enough to make them desirable places to live in? The Greeks imprisoned in the cave of the Cyclops¹ lived there very tranquilly, while they were awaiting their turn to be devoured.

To say that a man gives himself gratuitously is to say what is absurd and inconceivable; such an act is null and illegitimate, from the mere fact that he who does it is out of his mind. To say the same of a whole people is to suppose a people of madmen; and madness creates no right.

Even if each man could alienate himself, he could not alienate his children: they are born men and free; their liberty belongs to them, and no one but them has the right to dispose of it. Before they come to years of discretion, the father can, in their name, lay down conditions for their preservation and well-being, but he cannot give them irrevocably and without conditions: such a gift is contrary to the ends of nature, and exceeds the rights of paternity. It would therefore be necessary, in order to legitimise an arbitrary government, that in every generation the people should be in a position to accept or reject it; but, were this so, the government would be no longer arbitrary.

To renounce liberty is to renounce being a man, to surrender the rights of humanity and even its duties. For him who renounces everything no indemnity is possible. Such a renunciation is incompatible with man's nature; to remove all liberty from his will is to remove all morality from his acts. Finally, it is an empty and contradictory convention that sets up, on the one side, absolute authority, and, on the other, unlimited obedience. Is it not clear that we can be under no obligation to a person from whom we have the right to exact everything? Does not this condition alone, in the absence of equivalence or exchange, in itself involve the nullity of the act? For what right can my slave have against me, when all that he has belongs to me, and, his right being mine, this right of mine against myself is a phrase devoid of meaning?

Grotius and the rest find in war another origin for the so-called right of slavery. The victor having, as they hold, the right of killing the vanquished, the latter can buy back his life at the price of his liberty; and this convention is the more legitimate because it is to the advantage of both parties.

But it is clear that this supposed right to kill the conquered is by no means deducible from the state of war. Men, from the mere fact that, while they are living in their primitive independence, they have no mutual relations stable enough to constitute either the state of peace or the state of war, cannot be naturally enemies. War is constituted by a relation between things, and not between persons; and, as the state of war cannot arise out of simple personal relations, but only out of real relations, private war, or war of man with man, can exist neither in the state of nature, where there is no constant property, nor in the social state, where everything is under the authority of the laws.

Individual combats, duels and encounters, are acts which cannot constitute a state; while the private wars, authorised by the Establishments of Louis IX, King of France, and suspended by the Peace of God, are abuses of feudalism, in itself an absurd system if ever there was one, and contrary to the principles of natural right and to all good polity.

War then is a relation, not between man and man, but between State and State, and individuals are enemies only accidentally, not as men, nor even as citizens, but as soldiers; not as members of their country, but as its defenders. Finally, each State can have for enemies only other States, and not men; for between things disparate in nature there can be no real relation.

Furthermore, this principle is in conformity with the established rules of all times and the constant practice of all civilised peoples. Declarations of war are intimations less to powers than to their subjects. The foreigner, whether king, individual, or people, who robs, kills or detains the subjects, without declaring war on the prince, is not an enemy, but a brigand. Even in real war, a just prince, while laying hands, in the enemy's country, on all that belongs to the public, respects the lives and goods of individuals: he respects rights on which his own are founded. The object of the war being the destruction of the hostile State, the other side has a right to kill its defenders, while they are bearing arms; but, as soon as they lay them down and surrender, they cease to be enemies or instruments of the enemy, and become once more merely men, whose life no one has any right to take. Sometimes it is possible to kill the State without killing a single one of its members; and war gives no right which is not necessary to the gaining of its object. These principles are not those of Grotius: they are not based on the authority of poets, but derived from the nature of reality and based on reason.

The right of conquest has no foundation other than the right of the strongest. If war does not give the conqueror the right to massacre the conquered peoples, the right to enslave them cannot be based upon a right which does not exist. No one has a right to kill an enemy except when he cannot make him a slave, and the right to enslave him cannot therefore be derived from the right to kill him. It is accordingly an unfair exchange to make him buy at the price of his liberty his life, over which the victor holds no right. Is it not clear that there is a vicious circle in founding the right of life and death on the right of slavery, and the right of slavery on the right of life and death?

Even if we assume this terrible right to kill everybody, I maintain that a slave made in war, or a conquered people, is under no obligation to a master, except to obey him as far as he is compelled to do so. By taking an equivalent for his life, the victor has not done him a favour; instead of killing him without profit, he has killed him usefully. So far then is he from acquiring over him any authority in addition to that of force, that the state of war continues to subsist between them: their mutual relation is the effect of it, and the usage of the right of war does not imply a treaty of peace. A convention has indeed been made; but this convention, so far from destroying the state of war, presupposes its continuance.

So, from whatever aspect we regard the question, the right of slavery is null and void, not only as being illegitimate, but also because it is absurd and meaningless. The words slave and right contradict each other, and are mutually exclusive. It will always be equally foolish for a man to say to a man or to a people: "I make with you a convention wholly at your expense and wholly to my advantage; I shall keep it as long as I like, and you will keep it as long as I like."

CHAPTER V

THAT WE MUST ALWAYS GO BACK TO A FIRST CONVENTION

Even if I granted all that I have been refuting, the friends of despotism would be no better off. There will always be a great difference between subduing a multitude and ruling a society. Even if scattered individuals were successively enslaved by one man, however numerous they might be, I still see no more than a master and his slaves, and certainly not a people and its ruler; I see what may be termed an aggregation, but not an association; there is as yet neither public good nor body politic. The man in question, even if he has enslaved half the world, is still only an individual; his interest, apart from that of others, is still a purely private interest. If this same man comes to die, his empire, after him, remains scattered and without unity, as an oak falls and dissolves into a heap of ashes when the fire has consumed it.

A people, says Grotius, can give itself to a king. Then, according to Grotius, a people is a people before it gives itself. The gift is itself a civil act, and implies public deliberation. It would be better, before examining the act by which a people gives itself to a king, to examine that by which it has become a people; for this act, being necessarily prior to the other, is the true foundation of society.

Indeed, if there were no prior convention, where, unless the election were unanimous, would be the obligation on the minority to submit to the choice of the majority? How have a hundred men who wish for a master the right to vote on behalf of ten who do not? The law of majority voting is itself something established by convention, and presupposes unanimity, on one occasion at least.

CHAPTER VI

THE SOCIAL COMPACT

I suppose men to have reached the point at which the obstacles in the way of their preservation in the state of nature show their power of resistance to be greater than the resources at the disposal of each individual for his maintenance in that state. That primitive condition can then subsist no longer; and the human race would perish unless it changed its manner of existence.

But, as men cannot engender new forces, but only unite and direct existing ones, they have no other means of preserving themselves than the formation, by aggregation, of a sum of forces great enough to overcome the resistance. These they have to bring into play by means of a single motive power, and cause to act in concert.

This sum of forces can arise only where several persons come together: but, as the force and liberty of each man are the chief instruments of his self-preservation, how can he pledge them without harming his own interests, and neglecting the care he owes to himself? This difficulty, in its bearing on my present subject, may be stated in the following terms —

“The problem is to find a form of association which will defend and protect with the whole common force the person and goods of each associate, and in which each, while uniting himself with all, may still obey himself alone, and remain as free as before.” This is the fundamental problem of which the Social Contract provides the solution.

The clauses of this contract are so determined by the nature of the act that the slightest modification would make them vain and ineffective; so that, although they have perhaps never been formally set forth, they are everywhere the same and everywhere tacitly admitted and recognised, until, on the violation of the social compact, each regains his original rights and resumes his natural liberty, while losing the conventional liberty in favour of which he renounced it.

These clauses, properly understood, may be reduced to one — the total alienation of each associate, together with all his rights, to the whole community; for, in the first place, as each gives himself absolutely, the conditions are the same for all; and, this being so, no one has any interest in making them burdensome to others.

Moreover, the alienation being without reserve, the union is as perfect as it can be, and no associate has anything more to demand: for, if the individuals retained certain rights, as there would be no common superior to decide between them and the public, each, being on one point his own judge, would ask to be so on all; the state of nature would thus continue, and the association would necessarily become inoperative or tyrannical.

Finally, each man, in giving himself to all, gives himself to nobody; and, as there is no associate over whom he does not acquire the same right as he yields others over himself, he gains an equivalent for everything he loses, and an increase of force for the preservation of what he has.

If then we discard from the social compact what is not of its essence, we shall find that it reduces itself to the following terms:

"Each of us puts his person and all his power in common under the supreme direction of the general will, and, in our corporate capacity, we receive each member as an indivisible part of the whole."

At once, in place of the individual personality of each contracting party, this act of association creates a moral and collective body, composed of as many members as the assembly contains votes, and receiving from this act its unity, its common identity, its life and its will. This public person, so formed by the union of all other persons, formerly took the name of city, and now takes that of Republic or body politic; it is called by its members State when passive, Sovereign when active, and Power when compared with others like itself. Those who are associated in it take collectively the name of people, and severally are called citizens, as sharing in the sovereign power, and subjects, as being under the laws of the State. But these terms are often confused and taken one for another: it is enough to know how to distinguish them when they are being used with precision.

CHAPTER VII

THE SOVEREIGN

This formula shows us that the act of association comprises a mutual undertaking between the public and the individuals, and that each individual, in making a contract, as we may say, with himself, is bound in a double capacity; as a member of the Sovereign he is bound to the individuals, and as a member of the State to the Sovereign. But the maxim of civil right, that no one is bound by undertakings made to himself, does not apply in this case; for there is a great difference between incurring an obligation to yourself and incurring one to a whole of which you form a part.

Attention must further be called to the fact that public deliberation, while competent to bind all the subjects to the Sovereign, because of the two different capacities in which each of them may be regarded, cannot, for the opposite reason, bind the Sovereign to itself; and that it is consequently against the nature of the body politic for the Sovereign to impose on itself a law which it cannot infringe. Being able to regard itself in only one capacity, it is in the position of an individual who makes a contract with himself; and this makes it clear that there neither is nor can be any kind of fundamental law binding on the body of the people — not even the social contract itself. This does not mean that the body politic cannot enter into undertakings with others, provided the contract is not infringed by them; for, in relation to what is external to it, it becomes a simple being, an individual.

But the body politic or the Sovereign, drawing its being wholly from the sanctity of the contract, can never bind itself, even to an outsider, to do anything derogatory to the original act, for instance, to alienate any part of itself, or to submit to another Sovereign. Violation of the act by which it exists would be self-annihilation; and that which is itself nothing can create nothing.

As soon as this multitude is so united in one body, it is impossible to offend against one of the members without attacking the body, and still more to offend against the body without the members resenting it. Duty and interest therefore equally oblige the two contracting parties to give each other help; and the same men should seek to combine, in their double capacity, all the advantages dependent upon that capacity.

Again, the Sovereign, being formed wholly of the individuals who compose it, neither has nor can have any interest contrary to theirs; and consequently the sovereign power need give no guarantee to its subjects, because it is impossible for the body to wish to hurt all its members. We shall also see later on that it cannot hurt any in particular. The Sovereign, merely by virtue of what it is, is always what it should be.

This, however, is not the case with the relation of the subjects to the Sovereign, which, despite the common interest, would have no security that they would fulfil their undertakings, unless it found means to assure itself of their fidelity.

In fact, each individual, as a man, may have a particular will contrary or dissimilar to the general will which he has as a citizen. His particular interest may speak to him quite differently from the common interest: his absolute and naturally independent existence may make him look upon what he owes to the common cause as a gratuitous contribution, the loss of which will do less harm to others than the payment of it is burdensome to himself; and, regarding the moral person which constitutes the State as a persona ficta, because not a man, he may wish to enjoy the rights of citizenship without being ready to fulfil the duties of a subject. The continuance of such an injustice could not but prove the undoing of the body politic.

In order then that the social compact may not be an empty formula, it tacitly includes the undertaking, which alone can give force to the rest, that whoever refuses to obey the general will shall be compelled to do so by the whole body. This means nothing less than that he will be forced to be free; for this is the condition which, by giving each citizen to his country, secures him against all personal dependence. In this lies the key to the working of the political machine; this alone legitimises civil undertakings, which, without it, would be absurd, tyrannical, and liable to the most frightful abuses.

CHAPTER VIII

THE CIVIL STATE

The passage from the state of nature to the civil state produces a very remarkable change in man, by substituting justice for instinct in his conduct, and giving his actions the morality they had formerly lacked. Then only, when the voice of duty takes the place of physical impulses and right of appetite, does man, who so far had considered only himself, find that he is forced to act on different principles, and to consult his reason before listening to his inclinations. Although, in this state, he deprives himself of some advantages which he got from nature, he gains in return others so great, his faculties are so stimulated and developed, his ideas so extended, his feelings so ennobled, and his whole soul so uplifted, that, did not the abuses of this new condition often degrade him below that which he left, he would be bound to bless continually the happy moment which took him from it for ever, and, instead of a stupid and unimaginative animal, made him an intelligent being and a man.

Let us draw up the whole account in terms easily commensurable. What man loses by the social contract is his natural liberty and an unlimited right to everything he tries to get and succeeds in getting; what he gains is civil liberty and the proprietorship of all he possesses. If we are to avoid mistake in weighing one against the other, we must clearly distinguish natural liberty, which is bounded only by the strength of the individual, from civil liberty, which is limited by the general will; and possession, which is merely the effect of force or the right of the first occupier, from property, which can be founded only on a positive title.

We might, over and above all this, add, to what man acquires in the civil state, moral liberty, which alone makes him truly master of himself; for the mere impulse of appetite is slavery, while obedience to a law which we prescribe to ourselves is liberty. But I have already said too much on this head, and the philosophical meaning of the word liberty does not now concern us.

CHAPTER IX

REAL PROPERTY

Each member of the community gives himself to it, at the moment of its foundation, just as he is, with all the resources at his command, including the goods he possesses. This act does not make possession, in changing hands, change its nature, and become property in the hands of the Sovereign; but, as the forces of the city are incomparably greater than those of an individual, public possession is also, in fact, stronger and more irrevocable, without being any more legitimate, at any rate from the point of view of foreigners. For the State, in relation to its members, is master of all their goods by the social contract, which, within the State, is the basis of all rights: but, in relation to other powers, it is so only by the right of the first occupier, which it holds from its members.

The right of the first occupier, though more real than the right of the strongest, becomes a real right only when the right of property has already been established. Every man has naturally a right to everything he needs; but the positive act which makes him proprietor of one thing excludes him from everything else. Having his share, he ought to keep to it, and can have no further right against the community. This is why the right of the first occupier, which in the state of nature is so weak, claims the respect of every man in civil society. In this right we are respecting not so much what belongs to another as what does not belong to ourselves.

In general, to establish the right of the first occupier over a plot of ground, the following conditions are necessary: first, the land must not yet be inhabited; secondly, a man must occupy only the amount he needs for his subsistence; and, in the third place, possession must be taken, not by an empty ceremony, but by labour and cultivation, the only sign of proprietorship that should be respected by others, in default of a legal title.

In granting the right of first occupancy to necessity and labour, are we not really stretching it as far as it can go? Is it possible to leave such a right unlimited? Is it to be enough to set foot on a plot of common ground, in order to be able to call yourself at once the master of it? Is it to be enough that a man has the strength to expel others for a moment, in order to establish his right to prevent them from ever returning? How can a man or a people seize an immense territory and keep it from the rest of the world except by a punishable usurpation, since all others are being robbed, by such an act, of the place of habitation and the means of subsistence which nature gave them in common? When Nuñez Balboa, standing on the sea-shore, took possession of the South Seas and the whole of South America in the name of the crown of Castille, was that enough to dispossess all their actual inhabitants, and to shut out from them all the princes of the world? On such a showing, these ceremonies are idly multiplied, and the Catholic King need only take possession all at once, from his apartment, of the whole universe, merely making a subsequent reservation about what was already in the possession of other princes.

We can imagine how the lands of individuals, where they were contiguous and came to be united, became the public territory, and how the right of Sovereignty, extending from the subjects over the lands they held, became at once real and personal. The possessors were thus made more dependent, and the forces at their command used to guarantee their fidelity. The advantage of this does not seem to have been felt by ancient monarchs, who called themselves King of the Persians, Scythians, or Macedonians, and seemed to regard themselves more as rulers of men than as masters of a country. Those of the present day more cleverly call themselves Kings of France, Spain, England, etc.: thus holding the land, they are quite confident of holding the inhabitants.

The peculiar fact about this alienation is that, in taking over the goods of individuals, the community, so far from despoiling them, only assures them legitimate possession, and changes usurpation into a true right and enjoyment into proprietorship. Thus the possessors, being regarded as depositaries of the public good, and having their rights respected by all the members of the State and maintained against foreign aggression by all its forces, have, by a cession which benefits both the public and still more themselves, acquired, so to speak, all that they gave up. This paradox may easily be explained by the distinction between the rights which the Sovereign and the proprietor have over the same estate, as we shall see later on.

It may also happen that men begin to unite one with another before they possess anything, and that, subsequently occupying a tract of country which is enough for all, they enjoy it in common, or share it out among themselves, either equally or according to a scale fixed by the Sovereign. However the acquisition be made, the right which each individual has to his own estate is always subordinate to the right which the community has over all: without this, there would be neither stability in the social tie, nor real force in the exercise of Sovereignty.

I shall end this chapter and this book by remarking on a fact on which the whole social system should rest: i.e. that, instead of destroying natural inequality, the fundamental compact substitutes, for such physical inequality as nature may have set up between men, an equality that is moral and legitimate, and that men, who may be unequal in strength or intelligence, become every one equal by convention and legal right.

BOOK II

CHAPTER I

THAT SOVEREIGNTY IS INALIENABLE

The first and most important deduction from the principles we have so far laid down is that the general will alone can direct the State according to the object for which it was instituted, i.e. the common good: for if the clashing of particular interests made the establishment of societies necessary, the agreement of these very interests made it possible. The common element in these different interests is what forms the social tie; and, were there no point of agreement between them all, no society could exist. It is solely on the basis of this common interest that every society should be governed.

I hold then that Sovereignty, being nothing less than the exercise of the general will, can never be alienated, and that the Sovereign, who is no less than a collective being, cannot be represented except by himself: the power indeed may be transmitted, but not the will.

In reality, if it is not impossible for a particular will to agree on some point with the general will, it is at least impossible for the agreement to be lasting and constant; for the particular will tends, by its very nature, to partiality, while the general will tends to equality. It is even more impossible to have any guarantee of this agreement; for even if it should always exist, it would be the effect not of art, but of chance. The Sovereign may indeed say: "I now will actually what this man wills, or at least what he says he wills"; but it cannot say: "What he wills tomorrow, I too shall will" because it is absurd for the will to bind itself for the future, nor is it incumbent on any will to consent to anything that is not for the good of the being who wills. If then the people promises simply to obey, by that very act it dissolves itself and loses what makes it a people; the moment a master exists, there is no longer a Sovereign, and from that moment the body politic has ceased to exist.

This does not mean that the commands of the rulers cannot pass for general wills, so long as the Sovereign, being free to oppose them, offers no opposition. In such a case, universal silence is taken to imply the consent of the people. This will be explained later on.

CHAPTER II

THAT SOVEREIGNTY IS INDIVISIBLE

Sovereignty, for the same reason as makes it inalienable, is indivisible; for will either is, or is not, general; it is the will either of the body of the people, or only of a part of it. In the first case, the will, when declared, is an act of Sovereignty and constitutes law: in the second, it is merely a particular will, or act of magistracy — at the most a decree.

But our political theorists, unable to divide Sovereignty in principle, divide it according to its object: into force and will;

into legislative power and executive power; into rights of taxation, justice and war; into internal administration and power of foreign treaty. Sometimes they confuse all these sections, and sometimes they distinguish them; they turn the Sovereign into a fantastic being composed of several connected pieces: it is as if they were making man of several bodies, one with eyes, one with arms, another with feet, and each with nothing besides. We are told that the jugglers of Japan dismember a child before the eyes of the spectators; then they throw all the members into the air one after another, and the child falls down alive and whole. The conjuring tricks of our political theorists are very like that; they first dismember the body politic by an illusion worthy of a fair, and then join it together again we know not how.

This error is due to a lack of exact notions concerning the Sovereign authority, and to taking for parts of it what are only emanations from it. Thus, for example, the acts of declaring war and making peace have been regarded as acts of Sovereignty; but this is not the case, as these acts do not constitute law, but merely the application of a law, a particular act which decides how the law applies, as we shall see clearly when the idea attached to the word law has been defined.

If we examined the other divisions in the same manner, we should find that, whenever Sovereignty seems to be divided, there is an illusion: the rights which are taken as being part of Sovereignty are really all subordinate, and always imply supreme wills of which they only sanction the execution.

It would be impossible to estimate the obscurity this lack of exactness has thrown over the decisions of writers who have dealt with political right, when they have used the principles laid down by them to pass judgment on the respective rights of kings and peoples. Every one can see, in Chapters III and IV of the First Book of Grotius, how the learned man and his translator, Barbeyrac, entangle and tie themselves up in their own sophistries, for fear of saying too little or too much of what they think, and so offending the interests they have to conciliate. Grotius, a refugee in France, ill-content with his own country, and desirous of paying his court to Louis XIII, to whom his book is dedicated, spares no pains to rob the peoples of all their rights and invest kings with them by every conceivable artifice. This would also have been much to the taste of Barbeyrac, who dedicated his translation to George I of England. But unfortunately the expulsion of James II, which he called his "abdication," compelled him to use all reserve, to shuffle and to tergiversate, in order to avoid making William out a usurper. If these two writers had adopted the true principles, all difficulties would have been removed, and they would have been always consistent; but it would have been a sad truth for them to tell, and would have paid court for them to no one save the people. Moreover, truth is no road to fortune, and the people dispenses neither ambassadorships, nor professorships, nor pensions.

CHAPTER III

WHETHER THE GENERAL WILL IS FALLIBLE

It follows from what has gone before that the general will is always right and tends to the public advantage; but it does not follow that the deliberations of the people are always equally correct. Our will is always for our own good, but we do not always see what that is; the people is never corrupted, but it is often deceived, and on such occasions only does it seem to will what is bad.

There is often a great deal of difference between the will of all and the general will; the latter considers only the common interest, while the former takes private interest into account, and is no more than a sum of particular wills: but take away from these same wills the pluses and minuses that cancel one another, and the general will remains as the sum of the differences.

If, when the people, being furnished with adequate information, held its deliberations, the citizens had no communication one with another, the grand total of the small differences would always give the general will, and the decision would always be good. But when factions arise, and partial associations are formed at the expense of the great association, the will of each of these associations becomes general in relation to its members, while it remains particular in relation to the State: it may then be said that there are no longer as many votes as there are men, but only as many as there are associations. The differences become less numerous and give a less general result. Lastly, when one of these associations is so great as to prevail over all the rest, the result is no longer a sum of small differences, but a single difference; in this case there is no longer a general will, and the opinion which prevails is purely particular.

It is therefore essential, if the general will is to be able to express itself, that there should be no partial society within the State, and that each citizen should think only his own thoughts: which was indeed the sublime and unique system established by the great Lycurgus.¹ But if there are partial societies, it is best to have as many as possible and to prevent them from being unequal, as was done by Solon, Numa and Servius.² These precautions are the only ones that can guarantee that the general will shall be always enlightened, and that the people shall in no way deceive itself.

VOLTAIRE

(1694-1778)

François Arouet, who later adopted the literary name of Voltaire, was the son of a notary. He received his first instruction from his godfather, the Abbé de Châteauneuf, an ecclesiastic with rather flexible morals. At ten he attended the Jesuit college of Louis-le-Grand, where he immediately attracted attention by his brilliance and wit. After leaving college he began to study law; but finding himself disinclined to serious effort he at length obtained the position of secretary to the Marquis de Châteauneuf, who was setting out as ambassador to the Netherlands. On returning to France, Voltaire took up the writing of satires, one of which cost him a term in the Bastille. During this time he had opportunity for mature reflection, and in the six years that followed his release from prison (1718-1724) he finished a tragedy (Œdipe) and began the Henriade, an epic poem. Unfortunately a quarrel with a member of the nobility resulted in his returning to the Bastille for five months. After his release he departed for England, where for three years he made a study of English literature and thought, then chiefly dominated by Shaftesbury, Locke, Newton, and Bacon. When he returned to France in 1729 he applied himself earnestly to writing. He wrote tragedies, printed Charles XII, began The Age of Louis XIV, and published his Philosophical Letters on the English. In 1734 the Letters were suppressed, and Voltaire retired to Cirey, where for ten years he continued his writing and study. Returning at length to Paris, he became immediately a member of the Academy, royal historiographer, official poet, and gentleman of the chamber. Unable to agree with Mme. de Pompadour, however, Voltaire soon left the court, and, always working and writing, lived independently until 1749. At this time, because of considerable opposition in France to the freedom of his utterances, he found it wise to accept the invitation of Frederick the Great to join his court. Here too Voltaire found that royal favor was all too dearly purchased, and in 1753 he left Prussia to establish himself in a private residence at Ferney, near Geneva. So far Voltaire had been occupied principally with literature. Attracted, like Boileau, by the symmetry and order of the classicists, he was less bold than Boileau, for he was not fully acquainted with antiquity. In his tragedies he exhibits his fervent admiration of Racine and of Shakespeare; but he was, on the whole, considerably lacking in dramatic genius. The tragedies themselves are less entertaining than the critical dissertations which accompanied them.

The achievements for which Voltaire is chiefly remembered belong to his life at Ferney. Assailing nearly all the established ideas of his day, with a philosophy above all practical in purpose, and often with a rather superficial knowledge of the basic problems involved, he sought truths that would be useful to mankind. In many ways Voltaire was the creator of modern political journalism. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that he possessed one of the most lively and penetrating minds that the world has ever known. Unfortunately his tendency toward chicanery and malice was a defect which deprives him of a place among the unquestionably great. But it is certain that he exerted more influence on contemporary thought than any other man of his day, and there are few who do not feel that the world owes to him a large share of its feeling for liberty and justice.

The following selections, written in 1776, were translated by the Rt. Hon. John Morley in The Works of Voltaire, The St. Hubert Guild, New York, 1901.

THE IGNORANT PHILOSOPHER

I. THE FIRST DOUBT

Who art thou? From whence dost thou come? What is thy employment? What will become of thee? These are questions that should be put to every being in the universe, but to which no one replies. I ask of plants by what virtue they grow, and how the same earth produces such a diversity of fruits. These insensible and mute beings, though enriched with a divine faculty, leave me to my own ignorance and to vain conjectures.

I interrogate that herd of different animals, all which have the power of motion and communication, who enjoy the same sensations as myself, whose passions are accompanied with an extent of ideas and memory. They are still more ignorant than myself what they are, wherefore they exist, and what they shall become.

I suspect, I have even some reason to believe that the planets, the innumerable suns which replenish space, are peopled with sensible and thinking people; but an eternal barrier separates us, and no inhabitant of the other globes ever communed with us.

The prior, in "Nature Displayed," says to the knight, that the stars were made for the earth, and the earth as well as animals for man. But as the little globe of earth revolves with the other planets round the sun; as the regular and proportionate motions of the stars may eternally subsist without men; as there are in our little planet an infinitely greater number of animals than human beings; I imagine that the prior was actuated by too great a share of self-love, in flattering himself that everything had been made for him. I find that man in his lifetime will be devoured by every kind of animal, if he be defenseless, and that they all devour him after his death. Wherefore I have had some difficulty in conceiving that the prior and the knight were the sovereigns of nature. A slave to everything that surrounds me, instead of being a king; chained to a single point, and environed with immensity; I will begin by searching into myself.

II. OUR WEAKNESS

I am a weak animal; at my birth I have neither strength, knowledge, nor instinct; I cannot even crawl to my mother's breast, like every quadruped; I only acquire a few ideas, as I acquire a little strength, and as my organs begin to unfold themselves. The strength increases in me, till such time as having attained my full growth it daily decreases. This power of conceiving ideas increases in the same manner during its term, and afterward by degrees insensibly vanishes.

What is that mechanism which momentarily increases the strength of my members as far as prescribed boundaries? I am ignorant of it; and those who have passed their whole lives in the research know no more than myself.

What is that other power, which conveys images into my brain, and which preserves them in my memory? Those who are paid for knowing have made only fruitless inquiries; we are all in the same state of ignorance with regard to the first principles of our infant state.

III. HOW AM I TO THINK?

Have the books which have been written for these two thousand years taught me anything? We have sometimes a desire of knowing in what manner we think, though we have seldom any desire of knowing how we digest, how we walk. I have questioned my reason, and asked what it is. This question has always confounded me.

I have endeavored to discover by it, if the springs that make me digest, which make me walk, are those whereby I receive ideas. I never could conceive how and wherefore these ideas fled when my body languished with hunger, and how they were renovated after I had eaten.

I discovered such a wide difference between thought and nourishment, without which I should not think, that I believed there was a substance in me that reasoned, and another substance that digested. Nevertheless, by constantly endeavoring to convince myself that we are two, I materially felt that I was only one; and this contradiction gave me infinite pain.

I have asked some of my own likenesses who cultivate the earth, our common mother, with great industry, if they felt that they were two; if they had discovered by their philosophy that they possessed within them an immortal substance, and nevertheless formed of nothing, existing without extent, acting upon their nerves, without touching them, sent expressly into them six weeks after their conception? They thought that I was jesting, and pursued the cultivation of their land without making me a reply.

IV. IS IT NECESSARY FOR ME TO KNOW?

Finding then that a prodigious number of men had not even the slightest idea of the difficulties that disturbed me, and had no doubts of what is taught in schools, of being in general, matter and spirit, etc., finding that they often ridiculed my desire of being acquainted with these things; I suspected that it was not in the least necessary that we should know them; I imagined that nature has given to every being a portion that is proper for him; and I thought those things which we could not attain did not belong to us. But, notwithstanding this despair, I cannot divest myself of a desire of being instructed; and my baffled curiosity is ever insatiable.

VI. BEASTS

Man being supposed to have continually possessed ideas, perceptions, and conceptions, it naturally follows, that beasts were likewise always in possession of them; for it is incontestable that a hunting dog has the idea of the master he obeys, and of the game that he brings him. It is evident that he has memory, and that he combines some ideas. Thus then if the thought of man be the essence of his soul, that of the dog is the essence of his soul, and if man had always ideas, animals must necessarily have had them also. To remove this difficulty, the manufacturer of whirlwinds and chamfered matter dared to say, that beasts were pure machines, who sought for food without appetite, who had constantly had the organs of sensation without ever having the least sensation, who cried without pain, who testified joy without pleasure, who possessed a brain incapable of receiving the slightest idea, and who were therefore a perpetual contradiction.

VIII. SUBSTANCE

As we can have no notion, but by experience, it is not impossible that we can never know what matter is. We touch, we see the properties of this substance; but this very expression "substance which is beneath," sufficiently acquaints us that this thing beneath will ever be unknown to us; whatever we may discover of its appearance, there will always remain this beneath to discover. For the same reason, we can never know by ourselves what is spirit. It is a word which usually signifies breath, and by which we endeavor to express vaguely and grossly that which gives us thoughts. But when, even by a prodigy, which is not to be supposed, we should acquire some slight idea of the substance of this spirit, we should be no farther advanced; and we could never guess how this substance received sentiments and thoughts. We know very well that we have some small intellectual faculty; and how do we obtain it? This is a secret of nature, which she has not divulged to any mortal.

IX. NARROW LIMITS

Our intellects are very confined as well as the strength of our body. Some men are more robust than others; there are also Herculean minds with respect to thought; but, at the bottom, this superiority is a very trivial thing. One can lift ten times as much matter as myself; another can do in his head, and without paper, a division of fifteen figures, whilst I can divide three or four only with much difficulty; here then is the extent of that vaunted strength; its limits are very confined; and therefore in games of combination, no man, after having trained himself with great application and long practice, will, with all his efforts, get beyond that degree of perfection allotted him: this is the goal of his intellect. It is absolutely necessary that it should be so; otherwise we should gradually go on to infinity.

X. IMPOSSIBLE DISCOVERIES

In this narrow circle by which we are circumscribed, let us see of what we are condemned to be ignorant, and of what we gain a little knowledge. We have already found that no first resource, no first principle, can be traced by us.

Why does my arm obey my will? We are so accustomed to this incomprehensible phenomenon that very few pay attention to it; and when we want to trace the cause of so common an effect, we find that there is infinity between our will and the obedience of our limb; that is to say, there is no proportion between them, no reason, no apparent cause; and we feel that we might think to eternity, without being able to discover the least glimpse of probability.

XI. THE FOUNDATION OF DESPAIR

Thus stopped at the very first onset, and vainly relying upon ourselves, we are dismayed from seeking after ourselves, as we can discover ourselves. To ourselves we are inexplicable.

We know pretty nearly, with the assistance of triangles, that the sun and earth are about thirty millions of geometrical miles distant; but what is the sun? Why does it turn upon its axis? Why in one sense more than another? Why do Saturn and we revolve round this planet sooner from west to east than from east to west? This question will not only ever remain unsatisfied, but we shall never discover the least possibility to devise a physical cause for it. Wherefore? Because the first knot of this difficulty is in the principle of things.

It is the same with respect to what acts within us, as to what actuates the immense spaces of nature. There is in the arrangement of the planets, and in the formation of a handworm, and of man, a first principle, the avenue to which must necessarily be barred against us. For if we could be acquainted with the cause of our first origin, we should be its masters, we should be gods. Let us illustrate this idea, and see if it be just.

Suppose that we found, in effect, the cause of our sensations, of our thoughts, and our motions, as we have only discovered in the planets the reason of eclipses and of the different phases of the moon and Venus; it is evident we could then foretell our sensations, our thoughts, and our desires resulting from these sensations, as we predict the phases and the eclipses. Being then acquainted with what would happen tomorrow within us, we should clearly see by the play of this machine, whether we should be affected in a fatal or auspicious manner. We have, it is agreed, a will that directs our interior motions in various circumstances. For example, I find myself disposed to wrath; my reflection and will suppress its growing exhibition; I shall see if I know my first principles, all the affections to which I am disposed for tomorrow, all the successive ideas that wait for me; I could have the same power over this succession of ideas and sentiments as I sometimes exert over actual sentiments and thoughts, which I divert and repress. I should find myself precisely in the same position as every man who can retard and accelerate, according to his will, the motion of a watch, a ship, or any other well known machine.

Being master of the ideas that are destined for me tomorrow, I should be also of those for the following day, and even powerful over myself, I should be the God of myself. I am very sensible that this state is incompatible with my nature; it is therefore impossible that I can know anything of the first principle which makes me think and act.

XII. DOUBT

Is that which is impossible for my weak, limited nature of so short duration, equally impossible in other globes, in other species of beings? Are there any of superior intelligence, masters of all their ideas, who think and feel all that they choose? I know nothing of the matter; I am only acquainted with my own weakness; I have no idea of the powers of others.

BOILEAU

(1636-1711)

Nicolas Boileau-Despréaux, eminent French poet and critic, was the son of Gilles Boileau, registrar of the great chamber of the French Parliament. He was born in Paris. His education was intended to prepare him for the learned professions, but he never followed any other occupation than that of an author. He was well acquainted with the chief literary men of his day and was especially well-known to Racine and La Fontaine. As time went on he produced a number of satires and epistles, distinguished for purity of style and elegance of versification. He was appointed historiographer conjointly with Racine in 1684 and was made a member of the Academy in the same year. His best known works are The Reading-Stand (1674) and The Art of Poetry (1674), the latter of which formed the basis of Pope's Essay on Criticism. His influence on French literature was salutary, for he had excellent critical sense and the courage and literary ability to command the public ear. Boileau is the most famous expositor of the theories of the classical school in France.

The following translation was made by William Soame, revised by Dryden, in the Works of Dryden, ed. Scott-Saintsbury, Vol. XV.

THE ART OF POETRY

CANTO III

TRAGEDY

There's not a monster bred beneath the sky,
But, well-disposed by art, may please the eye:
A curious workman by his skill divine,
From an ill object makes a good design.
Thus to delight us, Tragedy, in tears
For Ædipus,¹ provokes our hopes and fears;

For parricide Orestes² asks relief,
And, to increase our pleasure, causes grief.
You, then, that in this noble art would rise,
Come, and in lofty verse dispute the prize.
Would you upon the stage acquire renown,
And for your judges summon all the town?
Would you your works for ever should remain,
And after ages past be sought again?
In all you write, observe with care and art
To move the passions, and incline the heart.
If, in a laboured act, the pleasing rage
Cannot our hopes and fears by turns engage,

¹ King of Thebes, hero of Sophocles's famous drama Ædipus Tyrannus. He was fated to kill his father and marry his mother.

² A character in Æschylus's Trojan trilogy, who killed his mother Clytemnestra in revenge for the death of his father Agamemnon.

Nor in our mind a feeling pity raise,
 In vain with learned scenes you fill your plays:
 Your cold discourse can never move the
 mind
 Of a stern critic, naturally unkind,
 Who, justly tired with your pedantic flight,
 Or falls asleep, or censures all you write.
 The secret is, attention first to gain;
 To move our minds, and then to entertain; 10
 That, from the very opening of the scenes,
 The first may show us what the author means.
 I'm tired to see an actor on the stage,
 That knows not whether he's to laugh or 15
 rage;
 Who, an intrigue unravelling in vain,
 Instead of pleasing keeps my mind in pain.
 I'd rather much the nauseous dunce should say
 Downright, my name is Hector in the play;
 Than with a mass of miracles, ill-joined,
 Confound my ears, and not instruct my
 mind.
 The subject's never soon enough exprest; 25
 Your place of action must be fixed, and rest.
 A Spanish poet¹ may with good event
 In one day's space whole ages represent;
 There oft the hero of a wandering stage 30
 Begins a child, and ends the play of age:
 But we, that are by reason's rules confined,
 Will, that with art the poem be designed;
 That unity of action, time, and place,² 35
 Keep the stage full, and all our labours
 grace.
 Write not what cannot be with ease conceived;
 Some truths may be too strong to be be- 40
 lieved.
 A foolish wonder cannot entertain;
 My mind's not moved if your discourse be vain.
 You may relate what would offend the eye: 45
 Seeing, indeed, would better satisfy;
 But there are objects that a curious art
 Hides from the eyes, yet offers to the heart.

The mind is most agreeably surprised,
 When a well-woven subject, long disguised,
 You on a sudden artfully unfold,
 And give the whole another face and
 5 mould.
 At first the Tragedy was void of art;
 A song, where each man danced and sung
 his part,
 And of god Bacchus roaring out the praise,
 Sought a good vintage for their jolly days:
 Then wine and joy were seen in each man's
 eyes,
 And a fat goat was the best singer's prize.
 Thespis³ was first, who, all besmeared with lee,
 Began this pleasure for posterity:
 And with his carted actors, and a song,
 Amused the people as he passed along.
 Next Æschylus the different persons 20 placed,
 And with a better mask his players graced:
 Upon a theatre his verse expressed,
 And showed his hero with a buskin dressed.
 Then Sophocles, the genius of his age, Increased the pomp and beauty of the stage,
 Engaged the chorus song in every part,
 And polished rugged verse by rules of art:
 He in the Greek did those perfections gain,
 Which the weak Latin never could attain. 30
 Our pious fathers, in their priest-rid age,
 As impious and profane, abhorred the stage:
 A troop of silly pilgrims, as 'tis said,
 Foolishly zealous, scandalously played,
 35 Instead of heroes, and of love's complaints,
 The angels, God, the Virgin, and the saints.⁴
 At last, right Reason did his laws reveal,
 And showed the folly of their ill-placed zeal,
 Silenced those nonconformists of the age,
 And raised the lawful heroes of the stage:
 Only the Athenian mask was laid aside,
 And chorus by the music was supplied.
 Ingenious love, inventive in new arts,
 Mingled in plays, and quickly touched our hearts:
 This passion never could resistance find,

² The classical measure of dramatic form.

³ Father of Greek tragedy, whose alteration of the drama, very simple but very important, consisted of the introduction of an actor, for the sake of giving rest to the chorus.

⁴ This is of course a reference to the mediæval miracle and mystery plays.

But knows the shortest passage to the mind.
 Paint then, I'm pleased my hero be in love;
 But let him not like a tame shepherd move; 5
 Let not Achilles be like Thyrsis ¹ seen,
 Or for a Cyrus show an Artamen ²;
 That struggling oft, his passions we may find,
 The frailty, not the virtue of his mind. 10
 Of romance heroes shun the low design;
 Yet to great hearts some human frailties join:
 Achilles must with Homer's heat engage;
 For an affront I'm pleased to see him rage. 15
 Those little failings in your hero's heart
 Show that of man and nature he has part.
 To leave known rules you cannot be allowed;
 Make Agamemnon covetous and proud, 20
 Æneas in religious rites austere.
 Keep to each man his proper character.
 Of countries and of times the humours know;
 From different climates different customs 25
 grow:
 And strive to shun their fault, who vainly dress
 An antique hero like some modern ass;
 Who make old Romans like our English 30
 move,
 Show Cato sparkish, or make Brutus love.
 In a romance those errors are excused:
 There 'tis enough that, reading, we're amused:
 Rules too severe would there be useless found;
 But the strict scene must have a juster bound;
 Exact decorum we must always find.
 If, then, you form some hero in your mind,
 Be sure your image with itself agree;
 For what he first appears, he still must be.
 Affected wits will naturally incline
 To paint their figures by their own design; 45
 Your bully poets, bully heroes write;
 Chapman in Bussy D'Ambois ³ took delight,

And thought perfection was to huff and fight.
 Wise nature by variety does please;
 Clothe differing passions in a differing dress. 5
 Bold anger, in rough haughty words appears;
 Sorrow is humble, and dissolves in tears.
 Make not your Hecuba with fury rage,
 And show a ranting grief upon the stage; 10
 Or tell in vain how the rough Tanais ⁴ bore
 His sevenfold waters to the Euxine shore:
 These swoln expressions, this affected noise,
 Shows like some pedant that declaims to boys. 15
 In sorrow you must softer methods keep;
 And, to excite our tears, yourself must weep.
 Those noisy words with which ill plays about,
 Come not from hearts that are in sadness drowned.
 The theatre for a young poet's rhymes
 Is a bold venture in our knowing times: 25
 An author cannot easily purchase fame;
 Critics are always apt to hiss, and blame:
 You may be judged by every ass in town,
 The privilege is bought for half-a-crown.
 To please, you must a hundred changes try;
 Sometimes be humble, then must soar on high;
 In noble thoughts must everywhere 35
 abound,
 Be easy, pleasant, solid, and profound;
 To these you must surprising touches join,
 And show us a new wonder in each line;
 That all, in a just method well-designed,
 40 May leave a strong impression in the mind.
 These are the arts that tragedy maintain.

THE EPIC

But the Heroic claims a loftier strain.
 In the narration of some great design,
 Invention, art, and fable, all must join:

² Don't mix ancient characters with characters from mediæval romance.

³ A piece noted for its bombast.

⁴ God of the river of that name — also known as the River Don. It traverses southeastern Russia, Euxine refers to the Black Sea.

Here fiction must employ its utmost grace;
All must assume a body, mind, and face:
Each virtue a divinity is seen;
Prudence is Pallas; Beauty, Paphos'
queen.¹

'Tis not a cloud from whence swift lightnings fly,
But Jupiter, that thunders from the sky;
Nor a rough storm that gives the sailor pain,
But angry Neptune plowing up the main; 10
Echo's ² no more an empty airy sound,
But a fair nymph that weeps her lover drowned.

Thus in the endless treasure of his mind,
The poet does a thousand figures find;
Around the work his ornaments he pours,
And strows with lavish hand his opening flowers.

'Tis not a wonder if a tempest bore
The Trojan fleet against the Libyan 20
shore;

From faithless fortune this is no surprise,
For every day 'tis common to our eyes:
But angry Juno, that she might destroy,
And overwhelm the rest of ruined Troy;
That Æolus, with the fierce goddess
joined,

Opened the hollow prisons of the wind;
Till angry Neptune, looking o'er the main,
Rebukes the tempest, calms the waves 30
again,

Their vessels from the dangerous quick-sands steers.

These are the springs that move our hopes and fears:

Without these ornaments before our eyes,
The unsinewed poem languishes and dies:
Your poet in his art will always fail,
And tell you but a dull insipid tale.
In vain have our mistaken authors tried
To lay these ancient ornaments aside, Thinking our God, and prophets that he sent,

¹ Venus.

² A nymph who aroused the jealousy of Juno. She was punished by being deprived of the power of speech so that she could only repeat what was said to her. She fell in love with Narcissus, and, being scorned by him, pined away until nothing remained of her but her voice.

³ Ashtaroth was the Phœnician and Canaanite goddess of fertility and reproduction, worshipped from time to time by the Israelites. Bel was a deity in the Babylonian theological system — God of the Earth.

⁴ This refers to Godfrey of Bouillon, illustrious leader of the first crusade. He was the hero of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. Tancred and Armida are other prominent figures in the Jerusalem Delivered.

⁵ A god of the Romans. He was represented with two, and sometimes four heads, to indicate his ability to see in all directions in time and space. This peculiarity has made him very valuable in rhetorical ornament.

Might act like those the poet did invent,
To fright poor readers in each line with hell,
And talk of Satan, Ashtaroth, and Bel.³
The mysteries which Christians must 5 believe

Disdain such shifting pageants to receive:
The gospel offers nothing to our thoughts
But penitence, or punishment for faults;
And mingling falsehoods with these mysteries

Would make our sacred truths appear like lies.

Besides, what pleasure can it be to hear
The howlings of repining Lucifer,
15 Whose rage at your imagined hero flies,
And oft with God himself disputes the prize?

Tasso, you'll say, has done it with applause: —

It is not here I mean to judge his cause:
Yet though our age has so extolled his
name,

His works had never gained immortal
fame,

25 If holy Godfrey ⁴ in his ecstasies

Had only conquered Satan on his knees;
If Tancred and Armida's pleasing form
Did not his melancholy theme adorn.

'Tis not, that Christian poems ought to be 30 Filled with the fictions of idolatry;

But, in a common subject, to reject
The gods, and heathen ornaments neglect;
To banish Tritons, who the seas invade,
To take Pan's whistle, or the Fates de-
35 grade,

To hinder Charon in his leaky boat
To pass the shepherd with the man of note,
Is with vain scruples to disturb your mind,
And search perfection you can never find:

40 As well they may forbid us to present
Prudence or Justice for an ornament,
To paint old Janus ⁵ with his front of brass,

And take from Time his scythe, his wings,
 and glass,
 And everywhere, as 'twere idolatry,
 Banish descriptions from our poetry.
 Leave them their pious follies to pursue;
 But let our reason such vain fears subdue:
 And let us not, amongst our vanities,
 Of the true God create a god of lies.
 In fable we a thousand pleasures see,
 And the smooth names seem made for poetry;
 As Hector, Alexander, Helen, Phyllis,
 Ulysses, Agamemnon, and Achilles:
 In such a crowd, the poet were to blame
 To choose King Chilperic for his hero's
 name.
 Sometimes the name, being well or ill applied,
 Will the whole fortune of your work decide.
 Would you your reader never should be tired,
 Choose some great hero, fit to be admired,
 In courage signal, and in virtue bright;
 Let even his very failings give delight;
 Let his great actions our attention bind,
 Like Cæsar, or like Scipio, frame his
 mind,
 And not like Ædipus his perjured race;
 A common conqueror is a theme too base.
 Choose not your tale of accidents too full;
 Too much variety may make it dull:
 Achilles' rage alone, when wrought with
 skill,
 Abundantly does a whole Iliad fill.
 Be your narrations lively, short, and smart;
 In your descriptions show your noblest
 art:
 There 'tis your poetry may be employed.
 Yet you must trivial accidents avoid,
 Nor imitate that fool, who, to describe
 The wondrous marches of the chosen tribe,
 Placed on the sides, to see their armies
 pass,
 The fishes staring through the liquid
 glass;
 Described a child, who, with his little
 hand,
 Picked up the shining pebbles from the sand.

Such objects are too mean to stay our
 sight;
 Allow your work a just and nobler flight.
 Be your beginning plain; and take good heed
 Too soon you mount not on the airy steed;
 Nor tell your reader, in a thundering verse,
 "I sing the conqueror of the universe."
 What can an author after this produce?
 The labouring mountain must bring forth
 a mouse.
 Much better are we pleased with his address,
 Who, without making such vast promises,
 Says, in an easier style and plainer sense,
 "I sing the combats of that pious prince,
 Who from the Phrygian coasts his armies
 bore,
 And landed first on the Lavinian shore."
 His opening muse sets not the world on fire,
 And yet performs more than we can require:
 Quickly you'll hear him celebrate the fame,
 And future glory of the Roman name;
 Of Styx and Acheron describe the floods,
 And Cæsar's wandering in the Elysian
 woods;
 With figures numberless his story grace,
 And everything in beauteous colours trace.
 At once you may be pleasing and sublime:
 I hate a heavy melancholy rhyme:
 I'd rather read Orlando's comic tale,
 Than a dull author always stiff and stale,
 Who thinks himself dishonoured in his style,
 If on his works the Graces do but smile.
 'Tis said that Homer, matchless in his art,
 Stole Venus' girdle to engage the heart:
 His works indeed vast treasures do unfold,
 And whatsoe'er he touches turns to gold:
 All in his hands new beauty does acquire;
 He always pleases, and can never tire.
 A happy warmth he everywhere may boast;
 Nor is he in too long digressions lost:
 His verses without rule a method find,
 And of themselves appear in order joined;
 All without trouble answers his intent;
 Each syllable is tending to the event.
 Let his example your endeavours raise;
 To love his writings is a kind of praise.

A poem, where we all perfections find,
Is not the work of a fantastic mind;
There must be care, and time, and skill,
and pains;

Not the first heat of inexperienced brains.
Yet sometimes artless poets, when the rage
Of a warm fancy does their minds engage, Puffed with vain pride, presume they understand,

And boldly take the trumpet in their hand: 10
Their fustian muse each accident con-founds;

Nor can she fly, but rise by leaps and bounds,

Till, their small stock of learning quickly 15 spent,

Their poem dies for want of nourishment.
In vain mankind the hot-brained fool
decries,

No branding censures can unveil his eyes; 20
With impudence the laurel they invade,
Resolved to like the monsters they have made.

Virgil, compared to them, is flat and dry;
And Homer understood not poetry:

Against their merit if this age rebel,
To future times for justice they appeal.
But waiting till mankind shall do them right,

And bring their works triumphantly to 30
light,

Neglected heaps we in bye-corners lay,
Where they become to worms and moths
a prey.

Forgot, in dust and cobwebs let them rest. 35
Whilst we return from whence we first digrest.

The great success which tragic writers
found,

In Athens first the comedy renowned. 40
The abusive Grecian¹ there, by pleasing ways,

Dispersed his natural malice in his plays:
Wisdom and virtue, honour, wit, and
sense,

Were subject to buffooning insolence:
Poets were publicly approved, and sought,
That vice extolled, and virtue set at nought;

A Socrates himself, in that loose age,

Was made the pastime of a scoffing stage.
At last the public took in hand the cause,
And cured this madness by the power of
laws;

5 Forbade at any time, or any place,
To name the person, or describe the face.

The stage its ancient fury thus let fall,
And comedy diverted without gall:

By mild reproofs recovered minds diseased,

And, sparing persons, innocently pleased.
Each one was nicely shown in this new
glass,

15 And smiled to think he was not meant the ass:

A miser oft would laugh at first, to find
A faithful draught of his own sordid mind;
And fops were with such care and cunning writ,

They liked the piece for which themselves
did sit.

You, then, that would the comic laurels
wear,

25 To study nature be your only care.

Whoe'er knows man, and by a curious art
Discerns the hidden secrets of the heart;
He who observes, and naturally can paint
The jealous fool, the fawning sycophant,

A sober wit, an enterprising ass,
A humorous Otter, or a Hudibras,² —
May safely in those noble lists engage,
And make them act and speak upon the stage.

35 Strive to be natural in all you write,
And paint with colours that may please the sight.

Nature in various figures does abound,
And in each mind are different humours
found; 40

A glance, a touch, discovers to the wise,
But every man has not discerning eyes.
All-changing time does also change the
mind,

45 And different ages different pleasures find;
Youth, hot and furious, cannot brook
delay,

By flattering vice is easily led away;
Vain in discourse, inconstant in desire,

50 In censure, rash; in pleasure, all on fire.

¹ Aristophanes.

² Otter is a female character in Ben Jonson's The Silent Woman. Hudibras is the hero of Butler's famous satirical poem on the Puritans.

The manly age does steadier thoughts enjoy;
 Power and Ambition do his soul employ;
 Against the turns of fate he sets his mind;
 And by the past the future hopes to find.
 Decrepit age, still adding to his stores,
 For others heaps the treasure he adores;
 In all his actions keeps a frozen pace;
 Past times extols, the present to debase:
 Incapable of pleasures youth abuse,
 In others blames what age does him refuse.
 Your actors must by reason be controlled;
 Let young men speak like young, old men like old.
 Observe the town, and study well the court;
 For thither various characters resort.
 Thus 'twas great Jonson purchases his renown,
 And in his art had borne away the crown,
 If, less desirous of the people's praise,
 He had not with low farce debased his
 plays;
 Mixing dull buffoonery with wit refined,
 And Harlequin with noble Terence
 joined.
 When in the Fox ¹ I see the tortoise hist,
 I lose the author of the Alchemist.
 The comic wit, born with a smiling air,
 Must tragic grief and pompous verse for-
 bear;
 Yet may he not, as on a market-place,
 With bawdy jests amuse the populace;

With well-bred conversation you must
 please,
 And your intrigue unravelled be with ease;
 5 Your action still should reason's rules
 obey,
 Nor in an empty scene may lose its way.
 Your humble style must sometimes gently rise;
 10 And your discourse sententious be, and
 wise:
 The passions must to nature be confined;
 And scenes to scenes with artful weaving
 joined.
 15 Your wit must not unseasonably play;
 But follow business, never lead the way.
 Observe how Terence does this error shun:
 A careful father chides his amorous son;
 Then see that son, whom no advice can
 20 move,
 Forget those orders, and pursue his love:
 'Tis not a well-drawn picture we discover;
 'Tis a true son, a father, and a lover.
 I like an author that reforms the age,
 25 And keeps the right decorum of the stage;
 That always pleases by just reason's rule:
 But for a tedious droll, a quibbling fool,
 Who with low nauseous bawdry fills his
 plays,
 30 Let him be gone, and on two tressels raise
 Some Smithfield stage, where he may act his pranks,
 And make Jack-Puddings speak to mountebanks.

HAMBURG DRAMATURGY

The Hamburg Dramaturgy (1767-69), a series of dramatic notes made over a period of about two years, was intended to give a running account of the progress of the German drama in Hamburg. This collection of papers constitutes one of the most noteworthy monuments of dramatic criticism in that it shows almost the first true understanding of Aristotle in Europe. Previous to this time critics had attempted to read into Aristotle meanings that would confirm their own theories. Lessing makes a sincere attempt to discover what Aristotle meant. He accepts without question the authority of Aristotle both for the ancient and modern drama, allowing to him the same fundamental correctness in dramatic matters as he would to Euclid in geometry. For Lessing's life, see p. 701.

¹ In the Volpone or "Fox" by Ben Jonson, Sir Politic Would-be disguises himself as a tortoise and is detected on the stage—a device too farcical for the rest of the piece. The Alchemist is another work of Jonson's.

The following translation is that of Helen Zimmern in Selected Prose Works of G. E. Lessing, London, ed. G. Bell & Son, 1913.

On the forty-eighth evening Herr Weiss's tragedy of 'Richard III.' was performed. . . .

This play is unquestionably one of our most important original dramas. It is rich in beauties which sufficiently prove that it would not have been beyond the power of the poet to avoid the faults with which they are intermingled, had he but had sufficient confidence in himself.

Shakespeare had already brought the life and death of the third Richard upon the stage, but Herr Weiss did not recollect this until his own work was already completed. He says: "Although I shall lose much by this comparison, it will at least be found that I have not been guilty of plagiarism. But perhaps it would have been a merit to commit a plagiarism on Shakespeare."

For this end we must suppose such an act to be possible. What has been said of Homer, that it would be easier to deprive Hercules of his club, than him of a verse, can be as truly said of Shakespeare. There is an impress upon the least of his beauties which at once exclaims to all the world: I am Shakespeare's — and woe to the foreign beauty who has the self-confidence to place itself beside it!

Shakespeare must be studied, not plundered. If we have genius, Shakespeare must be to us what the camera obscura is to the landscape-painter. He must look into it diligently to learn how nature reflects herself upon a flat surface, but he must not borrow from it.

Now in Shakespeare's whole play I do not know one single scene, not even a single speech which Herr Weiss could have used as it stands. Even the smallest portions of Shakespeare are cut according to the great measure of his historical plays, and these stand to the tragedies of French taste much as a large fresco stands to a miniature painting intended to adorn a ring. What material can we then take from the former to use in the latter?

Perchance a face, a single figure, at most a little group, which must then be worked out into a whole. In the same manner single Shakespearian thoughts must become entire scenes, and entire scenes whole acts. For rightly to use a giant's sleeve for the dress of a dwarf, we must not employ it as a sleeve but make a whole coat out of it.

If this is done, then the author may feel quite at ease on the score of plagiarism. Few persons will be able to recognise the wool from which the threads have been spun. Those few who comprehend the art will not betray the maker, for they know that a grain of gold may be wrought so skilfully that the value of the form far surpasses the value of the material.

I, for my part, sincerely deplore that our poet recollected Shakespeare's Richard too late. He might have known him and yet remained as original as he now is; he might have used him without a single borrowed thought convicting him.

Now if the same thing had occurred to me, I should at least have afterwards employed Shakespeare's work as a mirror to wipe from my work all those blemishes which my eye had not been able to perceive immediately. How do I know that Herr Weiss has not done this? And why should he not have done this?

May it not be that what I consider blemishes he holds to be none? And is it not very probable that he is more in the right than I am? I am convinced that in most instances the eye of the artist is more penetrating than that of the most keensighted of his observers. Among twenty objections made by the latter, the artist will remember that nineteen of these were made and answered by himself while at work.

Nevertheless he will not be annoyed at hearing them from others also, for he likes his work to be criticised. Whether it be judged profoundly or superficially, justly or unjustly, benevolently or satirically, it is all the same to him. Even the most superficial, the most unjust, the most awkward judgment is of more worth to him than tame admiration. In some form or other he may make use of the former to his advantage; but what is he to do with the latter? He does not like to despise the good honest souls who look up to him as to something extraordinary, and yet he must shrug his shoulders at them. He is not vain, but he is usually proud, and from mere pride he would ten times rather bear an unmerited censure than unmerited praise.

It is notably Richard's character about which I should like to have the poet's explanation. Aristotle would have rejected it unconditionally. Now as far as Aristotle's authority is concerned I could easily get over that point if I could as easily set aside his reasons.

Aristotle assumes that a tragedy must evoke our terror and pity and from this he infers that the hero must be neither a wholly virtuous nor a wholly vicious man, for by the ill-fortunes of neither can this aim be attained.

If I grant this definition, 'Richard III.' is a tragedy that has missed its aim. If I do not grant it, then I no longer know what a tragedy is.

For Richard III. as represented by Herr Weiss is unquestionably the greatest, most loathsome monster that ever trod the stage. I say the stage, for that the earth ever bore such a monster I greatly doubt.

Now what pity can the destruction of such a monster excite in us? But stay, he is not intended to do this, the poet has not designed this; there are other personages in his work whom he has made the objects of our pity.

Now as to terror? Should not this villain arouse the utmost limits of our terror, a man who has filled up the chasm that separated him from the throne with the corpses of those who ought to have been to him the dearest in all the world; a blood-thirsty demon who boasts of his blood-thirstiness and rejoices at his crimes.

Most certainly he awakens our terror,

if we understand by terror amazement at such inconceivable crimes, horror of such wickedness as surpasses our comprehension, if we are to understand by it the shudder that seizes us at the sight of terrible deeds that are executed with glee. Of this terror I experienced my fair share at the performance of 'Richard III.'

But this form of terror is so little one of the aims of tragedy that the old poets sought by all possible means to diminish it whenever their heroes were compelled to commit some great crime. They preferred rather to blame Fate, to make the crime the inevitable curse of an avenging deity, they preferred to change man from a creature of free-will to a machine, rather than to suffer the horrible idea to linger among us that man could by nature be capable of such corruption.

Crébillon¹ is known among the French as the "Terrible." I greatly fear he is so nicknamed more on account of the terror which ought not to be in tragedy, than on account of the legitimate terror which the philosopher reckons as essential to tragedy.

And this ought not to have been named terror at all. The word which Aristotle uses means fear; fear and pity, he says, should be evoked by tragedy, not pity and terror. It is true that terror is a species of fear, it is a sudden overwhelming fear. But this very suddenness, this surprise which is included in the idea of terror, plainly proves that those who here substituted the word terror for fear did not comprehend at all what kind of fear Aristotle meant. . . .

Aristotle says: "Pity demands a person who suffers undeserved calamity and fear requires him to be one of ourselves. The villain is neither the one nor the other; hence his misfortunes can excite neither the one nor the other."

Fear has, as I have said, been interpreted as terror by our modern translators and expositors, and by this substitution they succeed in picking the strangest quarrel imaginable with the philosopher.

One of this herd speaks thus: "It has not been possible to agree about the explanation of terror, and indeed it contains in every respect a link too many which hampers its universality and limits it. If Aristotle understands by his addition 'one of ourselves' merely the similarity of mankind, merely that both the spectator and the actor are human beings, even supposing that their character, worth, and social standing were widely different, this remark was needless since it followed as a matter of course. But if he was of opinion that only virtuous persons, or such as were afflicted by a pardonable fault, could excite terror, then he was in the wrong, for reason and experience are opposed to him. Terror springs incontestably from our feelings of humanity, for every human being is subject to it and every human being is by means of this feeling touched at the adverse fortunes of another man. It is possible that there may be persons who deny this of themselves, but such a denial would be a renunciation of their natural sensibility and hence a mere boast that springs from perverted principles, but no refutation. Now therefore if a dreadful event should unexpectedly befall even a vicious person who has shortly before engaged our attention, we should immediately forget his vices and see in him merely the human being. The mere aspect of human misery in general makes us sad, and the sudden, sad emotions that would be thus evoked, these are terror."

Quite true, only not rightly placed. For what does this prove against Aristotle? Nothing at all. Aristotle does not think of this terror when he speaks of fear which can be excited in us only by the misfortunes of our equals. This terror, which seizes us at the sudden sight of a suffering that threatens another, is a compassionate terror and therefore comprehended under the term of pity. Aristotle would not say pity and fear, if under fear he understood nothing more than a mere modification of compassion.

The author of the 'Letters on the Emotions' says "Pity is a complex emotion, composed out of love for an object and displeasure caused by its misery. The movements by which compassion evinces itself are distinguishable from the simple symptoms of love as well as from those of displeasure, for compassion itself is a mere manifestation. But how varied can this manifestation be! Let us change the one limitation of time in a commiserated misfortune, and compassion will be shown by totally different signs. We feel a compassionate mourning with Electra¹ weeping over her brother's urn, for she thinks the misfortune has taken place and bewails the loss she has sustained. What we feel at the sight of Philoktetes's² suffering is likewise compassion, but of a different nature, because the torments sustained by this virtuous man are present and befall him before our eyes. But when Oedipus³ is terrified at the sudden dénouement of the great secret, when Monime⁴ is alarmed at seeing the jealous Mithridates grow pale, when virtuous Desdemona is afraid on hearing threatening speech from her Othello who was wont to be so tender, what is it we feel then? Always the same compassion; but compassionate terror, compassionate alarm, compassionate fear. The movements are various, but the essence of the emotion is in all cases the same. For as all love is connected with a willingness to put ourselves in the place of the beloved object, so we must share all kinds of suffering with them, which is very expressively termed compassion. Why then should not fright, terror, rage, jealousy, revenge, in fact all forms of unpleasant emotions, even envy not excepted, spring from compassion? We may see hereby how awkwardly the greater part of the art critics have divided tragic passions into terror and compassion. Terror and compassion! Is then theatrical terror no compassion? For whom does the spectator start when Merope¹ draws the dagger upon her own son? Surely not for himself but for Æpytus, whose preservation we so sincerely desire; for the deluded queen who regards him as the murderer of her son. But if we only intend to call compassion the displeasure felt at the present misfortunes of another, it will be needful to distinguish from compassion properly so called, not only terror but all other feelings communicated to us by another person."

These ideas are so correct, so clear, so luminous that it seems to us every one might and ought to have had them. Nevertheless I will not attribute the acute observations of the new philosopher to the ancient one; I am too well acquainted with the merits of the doctrine of mixed sensations enunciated by this modern philosopher and for the true theory of which we are indebted to him alone. But of that which he has explained so excellently Aristotle may have been on the whole sensible, at least it is quite undeniable that Aristotle must either have believed that a tragedy could or should excite nothing but genuine compassion, nothing but displeasure at the present misfortunes of another, which we can hardly suppose, or he must have comprehended under the word compassion all passions in general that can be communicated to us by another.

For it is certainly not Aristotle who has made the division so justly censured of tragic passions into terror and compassion. He has been falsely interpreted, falsely translated. He speaks of pity and fear, not of pity and terror; and his fear is by no means the fear excited in us by misfortune threatening another person. It is the fear which arises for ourselves from the similarity of our position with that of the sufferer; it is the fear that the calamities impending over the sufferers might also befall ourselves; it is the fear that we ourselves might thus become objects of pity. In a word this fear is compassion referred back to ourselves.

Aristotle always requires to be interpreted through himself. Whoever intends to furnish us with a new commentary to his 'Poetics,' which shall distance that of Dacier, him I would advise before all else to read the complete works of the philosopher from beginning to end. He will find explanations of Poetics where he least expects them, most especially must he study the books of Rhetoric and Ethics. Now we imagine that the schoolmen so well versed in the writings of Aristotle would have found these explanations long ago. But his 'Poetics' was the very work of which they took the least notice. Then also they were wanting in other knowledge without which these explanations could not have borne fruit; they were not acquainted either with the theatre or its masterpieces.

The correct explanation of this fear with which Aristotle combines the tragic pity is to be found in the fifth and eighth chapter of the second book of Rhetoric. It would not have been very difficult to have recalled these chapters and yet not one of his expositors seems to have recollected them, at least not one of them has made that use of them which they afford. For even those who without them perceived that this fear could not be compassionate terror might yet have learnt an important fact therefrom, namely, the reason why the Stagyræite added fear to compassion, why fear alone and no other passion, and why not several passions. Of this reason they know nothing, and I should like to hear what answer their own intelligence would suggest to them if they were asked, for instance, why tragedy could not and should not excite in us compassion and admiration as well as compassion and fear?

All this depends on the conception Aristotle had of compassion. It was his opinion that the misfortune that becomes the object of our compassion must necessarily be of such a nature that we can fear it might happen as well to us or ours. Where this fear is not present compassion does not arise. For neither he whom 10 his misfortune has oppressed so heavily that he no longer sees any cause to be afraid of any further ills, nor he who believes himself so fortunate that he cannot comprehend whence any misfortune could befall 15 him, neither the desperate man, nor the arrogant one, is in the habit of feeling compassion for others. Therefore Aristotle explains that which is fearful and that which merits pity by means of one another. 20 All that, he says, is fearful to us, which if it had happened to another, or were to happen to him, would excite our pity; and we find all that worthy of our compassion, which we should fear if it were threatening 25 us. It would not therefore be enough that the unfortunate person who excites our compassion does not deserve his misfortunes; he may have drawn them down upon himself by his own weakness, his 30 tortured innocence or rather his too severely punished guilt would lose its effect upon us, would be incapable of awakening our pity if we saw no possibility that his sufferings might ever befall us. 35 But this possibility arises, and becomes the more probable, if the poet does not make him out to be worse than mankind in general, if he lets him think and act as we should have thought and acted in his 40 position, or at least as we might have thought and acted; in short, if he portrays him as one of ourselves. From similarity arises the fear that our destiny might as easily become like his as we feel ourselves 45 to be like him, and this fear it is which would force compassion to full maturity.

Such was Aristotle's conception of compassion, and only thence can the true reason be deduced why next to compassion he 50 only mentioned fear in his definition of tragedy. It is not that this fear is a passion independent of pity, which might be excited now with pity and now without it in the same way as pity can be excited now with and now without fear. This was Corneille's error, but this was not Aristotle's reason; according to his definition of compassion it of necessity included fear, because nothing could excite our compassion which did not at the same time excite our fear.

Corneille had already written all his plays before he sat down to annotate Aristotle's 'Poetics.' For more than fifty years he had laboured for the stage and after such experience he might unquestionably have given us much valuable information concerning the ancient dramatic code if he had only studied it a little more diligently during the time of his labour. He appears to have done this only in so far as the mechanical rules of dramatic art were concerned. He left essential points disregarded and when he found at the end that he had sinned against Aristotle, which nevertheless he had not wished to do, he endeavoured to absolve himself by means of explanations and caused his pretended master to say things which he never thought.

Corneille had brought martyrs upon the stage and had represented them as the most perfect, blameless beings: he had produced the most loathsome monsters in Prusias, Phocas, and Cleopatra and of both these species Aristotle has maintained they are unsuitable for tragedy, because neither can excite pity nor fear. What does Corneille say to this? How does he manage that neither his own dignity nor the authority of Aristotle has to suffer 40 from such a contradiction?

"We can easily come to terms with Aristotle. We need only presume that he did not mean to maintain that both means, terror and compassion, were required at the same time to effect the purification of our passions, which according to him is the chief aim of tragedy, but that one of these means would be sufficient. We may confirm this explanation from his own 50 works, if we rightly weigh the reasons he gives for the exclusion of such events as he censures in tragedies. He never says this or that is not suited to tragedy because it only excites compassion and no fear, or that such a thing is insupportable because it only excites fear without awakening compassion. On the contrary he rejects them on that account because as he says they neither produce compassion nor fear, and he thus shows us that they displeased him because they lacked both, and that he would not deny them his approval if they effected only one of these."

No. 76

Now this is utterly false. I cannot marvel enough how Dacier who is usually very observant of the distortions that Corneille practised on Aristotle's text for his own ends could overlook this, the greatest of all. True, how could he avoid overlooking it since he never consulted the philosopher's own explanation of compassion? As I have said, what Corneille imagines is utterly false. Aristotle cannot have meant this, or we should have to believe that he could forget his own explanation, we should have to believe he could contradict himself in the most flagrant manner. If, according to his doctrine, the misfortunes of another which we do not fear for ourselves cannot awaken our pity, he could not be satisfied with any tragedy which excites pity alone and no fear, because he deemed such a matter an impossibility; such actions did not exist for him. He believed that events capable of awakening our compassion must at the same time awaken our fear, or rather, by means of this fear, they awaken compassion. Still less could he have conceived the action of a tragedy, which might excite our fear without awakening our compassion, for he was convinced that all which excited fear for ourselves must awaken our compassion too as soon as we saw it threaten or befall others, and this is the case in tragedy, where we see all the evils which we fear happening to others and not to ourselves.

It is true that, when Aristotle speaks of the actions that are not suited to tragedy, he several times uses the expression that they excite neither compassion nor fear, but so much the worse for Corneille if he was misled by this neither, nor. These disjunctive particles do not always express what he makes them express. For if we deny two or more qualities to an object by means of these particles, the existence of the object, notwithstanding that one or the other of the things are wanting to it, depends on whether these things can be separated in nature as we separate them in the abstract and by means of the symbolic expression. For example, if we say of a woman that she is neither handsome nor witty, we certainly mean to say that we should be satisfied if she possessed either of these attributes; for wit and beauty can be separated not only in thought but they are separated in reality. But if we say, this man believes neither in heaven, nor in hell, do we mean to say thereby that we should be satisfied if he believed in one of them, if he only believed in heaven and no hell, or in hell and no heaven? Surely not, for whoever believes the one must needs believe the other; heaven and hell, punishment and reward are relative terms; if the one exists, so does the other. Or to draw an illustration from an allied art, when we say, this picture is good for nothing, it has neither outline nor colour, do we mean to say by this that a good painting could exist with either of the two alone? This is very clear.

But how if the definition that Aristotle gives of compassion were false? How if we could feel compassion with evils and misfortunes that we have in no wise to fear for ourselves?

It is true we do not require the element of fear to feel displeasure at the physical sufferings of a person whom we love. This displeasure arises merely from our perception of the imperfection, as our love arises from the perception of the perfections of the individual, and from this fusion of pleasure and displeasure arises the mixed sensation we call compassion.

But granting this I do not believe that I shall be obliged to forsake Aristotle's cause.

For if we can feel compassion for others without fear for ourselves it remains incontestable that our compassion, strengthened by this fear, becomes far more vivid and intense than it would be without it. Then what hinders us from assuming that the mixed sensation evoked by the physical sufferings of a beloved object can alone be elevated to that height where it deserves to be called affection, by adding to it the element of fear for ourselves?

This was what Aristotle really assumed, he did not regard compassion according to its primary emotions, he regarded it merely as an effect. Without mistaking the former he only denies to the spark the name of flame. Compassionate emotions unaccompanied by fear for ourselves, he designates philanthropy, and he only gives the name of compassion to the stronger emotions of this kind which are connected with fear for ourselves. Now though he maintains that the misfortunes of a villain excite neither our compassion nor our fear, he does not therefore deny that the spectacle could awaken emotion in us. The villain is still a man, a human being who for all his moral imperfections possesses perfections enough to raise the wish in us not to witness his ruin and destruction, and arouses in us an emotion nearly allied to compassion, the elements as it were of compassion. But as I have said Aristotle does not call these emotions allied to compassion, compassion, but philanthropy. He says: "We must not permit a villain to pass from unfortunate to fortunate circumstances, for nothing can be more untragic; it then has nothing of all that it ought to have, it awakens neither philanthropy, pity, nor fear. Neither must it be an utter villain who passes from happy to unhappy conditions. Such an event may indeed excite philanthropy, but neither compassion nor fear." I know of nothing more bald and absurd than the common rendering of the word philanthropy. Its adjective is usually translated into Latin by "hominibus gratum"; into French by "ce qui peut faire quelque plaisir"; and into German by "what may give pleasure" (was Vergnügen machen kann). So far as I can discover, only Goulston appears not to have mistaken the philosopher's meaning; he translated φιλάνθρωπον by "quod humanitatis sensu tangat."¹ For under this meaning of philanthropy is comprehended the feeling that even the misfortunes of a criminal can evoke, it is not joy at his merited punishment that is understood, but the sympathetic feeling of humanity which is awakened in us at the moment of his suffering in spite of our consciousness that his sufferings are nothing but his desert. Herr Curtius indeed would limit these compassionate emotions felt for a suffering villain to a certain species of evils. He says: "Those accidents to the vicious which excite neither pity nor fear in us must be the consequences of their vices; for if they happened to them by chance, or innocently, they still retain in the hearts of the spectators the privileges of humanity which does not deny its compassion to a villain who suffers innocently." But he does not seem sufficiently to have considered this. For, even when the misfortune befalling a villain is the immediate consequence of his crimes, we still cannot help suffering with him at the sight of his punishment.

The author of the 'Letters on the Sensations' says: "Behold yonder multitude that crowds around a condemned criminal. They have heard of all the horrors, the vices he has committed, they have detested his wicked course of life, they have probably hated him himself. Now he is dragged pale and fainting to the terrible scaffold. The people press through the crowd, stand on tiptoe, climb the roofs to see how his features become distorted in death. The verdict is spoken, the hangman approaches, one moment more will decide his destiny. How earnestly do all the hearts now wish him pardoned. What! pardoned? he, the object of their detestation? he, whom a moment before they would themselves have sentenced to death? Whereby has a spark of humanity been rekindled in them? Is it not the close approach of punishment, the sight of the most terrible physical ill that reconciles us again even with this vile wretch and wins him our affection? Without love it would be impossible to have compassion on his fate."

And it is this love, say I, which we can never entirely lose towards our fellow-creatures, which smoulders inextinguishably beneath the ashes by which our stronger emotions are covered, and which only awaits a favourable gust of wind from misfortune, grief and crime to be blown into the flame of compassion; it is this love which Aristotle understands under the name philanthropy. We are right when we comprehend it as included under the name of compassion. But Aristotle was not wrong when he assigned to it a distinct name, to distinguish it from the highest grade of compassionate emotions in which they become affections by the addition of a possible fear for ourselves.

SATIRE

FRENCH

LA BRUYÈRE

(1645-1696)

Jean de la Bruyère was born in Paris of a bourgeois family in 1645. He was educated as a lawyer and later (1673) took a position in the treasury department. Not long afterward he became acquainted with Bossuet, who got him a post as tutor to the grandson of the Duc de Condé. In this position he was well able to observe the characteristics of the life around him. He was a man of independent spirit, and he allowed this spirit to permeate his work — a work which reveals the follies of French courtly life in the seventeenth century with devastating clarity. His Characters, published in 1688, was a sort of elongated appendix to his translation of the Characters of Theophrastus, the pupil of Aristotle. The individual characters are based on observations made from day to day, and are arranged in no particular order except for a general classification. The author painted the portraits of the whole range of society, not in an attempt to depict the foibles of humanity in general but with his eye directly on the society of his own day. If to be talked about is to be a success, the Characters certainly were successful; their irony and boldness set the public by the ears. It has often been said of La Bruyère that there was in his writing all the material of the modern naturalistic novel except for the framework of narrative.

CHARACTERS

THE ABSENT-MINDED MAN

Menalcas comes down stairs, opens his door to go out, and then shuts it: he perceives that he has his night-cap on, and, on looking more closely, he finds that he is only half shaved, that his sword is hung on the right-hand side, that his hose are wrinkled down upon his heels, and that his shirt is outside his breeches.

As he walks down the street he receives a buffet in the stomach or in the face: he has not the remotest idea what it may be until he opens his eyes and, emerging from sleep, he finds himself in front of a long carriage shaft or behind a long building board carried by a workman. We see him colliding with a blind man, getting tangled up in his legs, and both of them falling over backwards.

Many a time he has suddenly come nose to nose with a prince, and looking about him carefully has found that he has time enough only to plaster himself against the wall in order to make way for him.

He searches frantically, he upsets everything, he shouts, he gets into a temper, he calls his servants one after the other: everything is gone, everything is lost. He asks for his gloves when they are on his own hands, like the lady who took occasion to ask for her mask when she had it on her face already. He enters a room at court and walks under a chandelier. His wig catches upon it and remains hanging. All the court see it and laugh: Menalcas sees it and laughs harder than anybody, and casts his eyes over the whole assembly to see whose ears are showing or who has lost his wig.

If he goes out through the city, after he has walked a little way he thinks himself lost; he grows excited; he asks passers-by where he is, and is told exactly the name of his street. He finally goes into his house, and then comes running out again, thinking he has made a mistake.

He comes out of the Palace of Justice, and, finding at the foot of the steps a carriage, he takes it for his own and seats himself in it. The coachman whips up, thinking he is taking his own master home. Menalcas gets out at the gate, crosses the courtyard, mounts the stairs, walks through the ante-chamber, the drawing-room, the study. Everything is familiar: nothing is strange to him. He sits down; he rests himself; he is at home. The master of the house appears. Menalcas arises to receive him; he treats him with great civility; he begs him to be seated, and thinks he is doing the honors of his own house. He talks; he meditates; he resumes conversation. The master of the house is bored, but he lingers on amazed. Menalcas is no less bored, but he does not say what he thinks, that he has to do with a bore, or an idler, who he hopes finally will withdraw. At last when night comes Menalcas is with great difficulty apprised of his mistake.

On another occasion he pays a visit to a lady and, convincing himself that it is he that is receiving her, he seats himself in a chair without the slightest idea of leaving it. It seems to him after a time that the lady is making rather a long visit and begins to expect at every moment that she will get up and leave him to himself. When the visit prolongs itself well into the night and he is growing hungry he finally invites her to have supper. The lady laughs so heartily that she awakes him.

He marries in the morning, forgets it by evening and stays out all night. Some years later he loses his wife; she dies in his arms, and he assists at the obsequies. The next day, when dinner is announced, he asks if his wife is ready and if she has been informed.

At another time he loses at play all the money in his purse; he goes to his study, opens his safe, brings out his money chest, takes from it what he needs, and returns it to the safe. Then he hears a sound of yelping from the safe. Astonished at this prodigy he opens the safe again and bursts into laughter to find that he has locked up his dog instead of his money. When he is playing at trick-track he calls for a drink. It is brought to him as it is his turn to play. He holds the dice-box in one hand and the drink in the other, and, being very thirsty, he downs the dice and almost the dice-box as well and throws the glass of water on the trick-track board, drenching his opponent.

In a bed-chamber where he was familiarly received he spit on the bed and threw his hat on the floor, thinking that he was doing just the opposite.

As he is walking along the bank he asks what time it is. A watch is handed to him and he has hardly received it when he forgets both the time and the watch and throws the timepiece into the water to get it out of his way.

Menalcas is going down the steps of the Louvre and meets another man coming up. "You're the one I'm looking for," he says. He takes him by the hand and makes him walk back down with him. He crosses several courts, goes into the rooms, comes out again, goes one way, and retraces his steps; and at last he happens to look at the man he has been leading about for a quarter of an hour and is astonished that he should be there. He has nothing to say to him; he lets go his hand and turns away. He often asks you a question and is far away before you can answer; or he asks you in passing how your father does, and when you reply that he is very ill he exclaims that he is very glad to hear it. He encounters you on the street; he is delighted to see you, for he was just coming to talk to you about something. Then he looks at your hand. "You have a beautiful ruby there," he says, "is it a balas?" — and he leaves you and continues on his way. So much for the important matter about which he wished to speak with you.

He finds himself in the country and says to someone that he considers him fortunate to have been able to slip away and spend on his country estate the time when the court is being held at Fontainebleau; he passes on and talks variously with other people; then he comes back to the same person and says to him, "No doubt you had a pleasant time at Fontainebleau; you must have had plenty of hunting." Then he begins a story which he forgets to finish; he laughs to himself; he roars out at something that with him passes for cleverness; he replies aloud to his own thoughts, sings between his teeth, whistles, throws himself into a chair, gives a complaining whine, yawns — he thinks he is alone.

When he is at dinner the bread keeps piling up on his plate; it is true his neighbors are going without it as well as without knives and forks, for he cannot refrain from playing with them. There has been invented a great soup ladle to facilitate serving. He takes it, plunges it into his dish, fills it, carries it to his mouth, and cannot get over his astonishment at seeing 15 spattered over his clothing the soup that he thinks he has just swallowed. He forgets to drink all through the dinner, or if he does remember it and finds he has been 20 given too much wine, he dashes half of it into the face of the diner at his right. He drinks the rest tranquilly and cannot understand why everybody bursts out laughing just because he has thrown on the ground the superfluous quantity.

He is taken to Chartres. There he is shown a cloister adorned with works all from the hand of an excellent painter. The monk who explains it speaks of St. Bruno and tells a long tale of the saint's adventure with the canon, and shows it to him in one of the pictures. Menalcas, who during the recital is out of the cloister and far away, at last comes to himself and asks of the monk whether it was Bruno or the canon that was damned.

He finds himself by chance in the company of a young widow; he speaks of the departed husband and asks how he died. The woman, in whom grief was renewed by this remark, weeps, sobs, and goes into all the details of her husband's malady from the beginning of the fever to the death-agony. "Madame," asks Menalcas, who has apparently listened with great attention, "was he the only one you had?"

LA FONTAINE

(1621-1695)

Jean de la Fontaine, poet and dramatist, was born at Château-Thierry, son of a Superintendent of Rivers and Forests. He studied at Reims and at Paris and then returned to his home where he lived at ease with his friends, Pintrel, translator of Seneca, and Maucroix, translator of Plato. In 1654 he published a translation of Terence's Eunuchus. He was presented to Fouquet, the extravagant minister of finance, and received a pension from him. When Fouquet was disgraced (1661-64), La Fontaine wrote his Elegy on the Nymphs of Vaux (Fouquet's palace). Later he was presented to the Duchess of Bouillon for whom he composed his Tales. He published his Fables in 1668, and in 1669 his novel Psyche. In 1684 he was elected a member of the Academy. In addition to his poetry and prose he wrote a few plays.

The Fables alone could have established La Fontaine's position in the literary world. The material comes from the writings of earlier fabulists — Æsop, Babrius, Phædrus, and others. La Fontaine added almost nothing in the way of fact; he disclaimed all intention of originality. His treatment is everything. In his hands the fable becomes a living thing. The metrical form is limpid, flexible, and fitted with exquisite perfection to the variations in thought and mood. The stories themselves are very plain and simple and surprisingly similar to the fables of antiquity; yet they reveal the most penetrating comprehension of the human mind. The animals are natural enough in their outward appearance, but in their mental actions they are men, are universal types. There is nothing new in that; but the startlingly clear analysis of these characters and the direct yet devastating simplicity of the treatment — these are La Fontaine's contributions. The Fables are a combination of poetic sentiment and psychological truth.

The following selections are translated by Elizur Wright in the Longfellow Poets and Poetry of Europe.

FABLES

THE COUNCIL HELD
BY THE RATS

Old Rodilard, a certain cat,
Such havoc of the rats had made,
'Twas difficult to find a rat
With nature's debt unpaid.
The few that did remain,
To leave their holes afraid,
From usual food abstain,
Not eating half their fill.
And wonder no one will,
That one, who made on rats his revel,
With rats passed not for cat, but devil.
Now, on a day, this dread rat-eater,
Who had a wife, went out to meet her;
And while he held his caterwauling,
The unkill'd rats, their chapter calling,
Discussed the point, in grave debate,
How they might shun impending fate.
Their dean, a prudent rat,
Thought best, and better soon than late,
To bell the fatal cat;
That, when he took his hunting-round,
The rats, well cautioned by the sound,
Might hide in safety under ground;
Indeed, he knew no other means.
And all the rest
At once confessed
Their minds were with the dean's.
No better plan, they all believed,
Could possibly have been conceived;
No doubt, the thing would work right well,
If any one would hang the bell.
But, one by one, said every rat,
"I'm not so big a fool as that."
The plan knocked up in this respect,
The council closed without effect.
And many a council I have seen,
Or reverend chapter with its dean,
That, thus resolving wisely,
Fell through like this precisely.

To argue or refute,
Wise counsellors abound;
The man to execute
Is harder to be found.

THE WOLF AND THE DOG

A prowling wolf, whose shaggy skin
(So strict the watch of dogs had been)
Hid little but his bones,
Once met a mastiff dog astray;

A prouder, fatter, sleeker Tray
No human mortal owns.

- Sir Wolf, in famished plight,
Would fain have made a ration
5 Upon his fat relation;
But then he first must fight;
And well the dog seemed able
To save from wolfish table
His carcass snug and tight.
10 So, then, in civil conversation,
The wolf expressed his admiration
Of Tray's fine case. Said Tray, politely,
"Yourself, good Sir, may be as sightly:
Quit but the woods, advised by me;
15 For all your fellows here, I see,
Are shabby wretches, lean and gaunt,
Belike to die of haggard want;
With such a pack, of course it follows,
One fights for every bit he swallows.
20 Come, then, with me, and share
On equal terms our princely fare."
"But what with you
Has one to do?"
Inquires the wolf. "Light work indeed,"
25 Replies the dog; "you only need
To bark a little, now and then,
To chase off duns and beggar-men, —
To fawn on friends that come or go forth,
Your master please, and so forth;
30 For which you have to eat
All sorts of well cooked meat, —
Cold pullets, pigeons, savory messes, —
Besides unnumbered fond caresses."
The wolf, by force of appetite,
35 Accepts the terms outright,
Tears glistening in his eyes.
But, faring on, he spies
A galled spot on the mastiff's neck.
"What's that?" he cries. "Oh, nothing but 40 a speck."
"A speck?" "Ay, ay; 'tis not enough to pain me;
Perhaps the collar's mark by which they chain me."
45 "Chain, — chain you? What! run you not, then,
Just where you please, and when?"
"Not always, Sir; but what of that?"
"Enough for me, to spoil your fat!
50 It ought to be a precious price
Which could to servile chains entice;
For me, I'll shun them, while I've wit."
So ran Sir Wolf, and runneth yet.

SÉVIGNÉ

(1626-1696)

Marie de Rabutin-Chantal was born of distinguished parents. Her father, Celse-Bénigne de Rabutin, was a gallant soldier who was killed in the siege of Rochelle, and her mother, Marie de Coulanges, was daughter of the secretary of State. At the early death of her parents Marie was entrusted first to her paternal grandmother, then to her maternal grandfather, M. de Coulanges, and, upon his death, to her uncle Christophe de Coulanges, Abbé de Livry. This learned man devoted himself wholeheartedly to the cultivation of Marie's natural gifts and gave her an education rarely accorded to women in her day. She was taught Latin, Italian, and Spanish by competent tutors and was given the use of her uncle's extensive library. At eighteen she was presented to the world, a rare combination of beauty, intelligence, and charm. The brilliant marriage arranged for her by her uncle with the rich and handsome Marquis de Sévigné turned out very ill. After neglecting her for seven years, he was killed in a duel and left her a widow with two children, and with her fortune seriously depleted. The young widow was faced with the necessity of disentangling her affairs. Her spirit and determination in this task resulted not only in a fairly satisfactory restoration of her fortune but also in her making for herself an important place in the brilliant court of Louis XIV. Her daughter, to whom the letters printed in this volume are addressed, was married to the Count de Grignan, a wealthy and prominent member of the court, but the count was ordered to Provence as Lieutenant-Governor almost immediately after the marriage, and mother and daughter were separated. The son was a weak and dissipated youth, unable to follow any occupation successfully, and Madame de Sévigné lost much of her fortune in getting him out of difficulties and providing him with a suitable marriage. Such responsibilities, however, gave her little chance to lose interest in life. She continued active and cheerful almost up to the day of her death, at the age of seventy.

Madame de Sévigné's letters are of interest not only because they reveal a clever and attractive woman but also because they show us intimate glimpses of the brilliant and often corrupt society of the French capital in the later seventeenth century. Letters have long been regarded as an important part of the works of great literary men. One needs only to mention the names of St. Paul, Cicero, Petrarch, or, in later years, of Swift, Pope, and Steele, to realize how many of the thoughts that we treasure as the heritage of great minds have come from their correspondence. Madame de Sévigné has won a place in the history of literature by her letters alone. She is regarded by some as the greatest letter-writer the world has ever had.

The following letters come from The Letters of Madame de Sévigné to her Daughter and Friends, edited by Sarah J. Hale, New York, Mason Brothers, 1856.

LETTERS TO MADAME DE GRIGNAN

LETTER V

Paris, Wednesday, March 18, 1671.

I have received two packets at once, which have been delayed for a considerable time. By these I am at length informed from yourself, of your entry into Aix,¹ but you do not mention whether your husband was with you, or in what manner Vardes honored your triumph; but you describe the triumph itself very humorously, as well as the embarrassment you were under, and your many misplaced civilities. I wish that I had been with you; not that I should have done better than yourself, for I have not so good a gift of fixing names upon faces — on the contrary, I daily commit a thousand blunders in that way — but I think I could have been of some assistance to you, at least I should have made courtesies enough. It is true, that such a multiplicity of ceremonies and attentions is very tiresome. You should, nevertheless, endeavor not to be deficient in any of these points, but accommodate yourself, as much as possible, to the customs and the manners of those among whom you are to live.

An event has just taken place, which engrosses the whole conversation of Paris. The king has ordered Monsieur de S— to resign his post, and to quit Paris immediately. Can you guess the reason? For having cheated at play, and won upward of five hundred thousand crowns with false cards! The man who made these cards was examined by the king himself; he denied the fact at first; but, upon his majesty's promising him a pardon, he confessed that he had followed the trade for a long time. It is said that the affair will not stop here, for that there are several houses which he used to furnish with these cards. It was some time before the king could prevail upon himself to disgrace a man of Monsieur de S—'s quality; but as, for several months past, everybody that had played with him had been in a manner ruined, he thought he could not in conscience do less than bring such a scene of villainy to light. S— was so perfectly master of his adversaries' game, that he always made sept et le va upon the queen of spades, because he knew the spades lay all in the other packs. The king as constantly lost one-and-thirty upon clubs, and used to say, clubs never win against spades in this country. This man had given thirty pistoles to Madame de la Vallière's valets de chambre to throw all the cards they had in the house into the river, in the pretense that they were not good, and had introduced his own card-maker. He was first led into this fine way of life by one Pradier, who has since disappeared. Had S— known himself innocent, he would immediately have delivered himself up, and insisted upon taking his trial; but, instead of this, he took the road to Languedoc, as the surest way of the two; many, however, advised him to take a journey to La Trappe,² after such a misfortune.

Madame d'Humières has charged me with a thousand good wishes for you. She is going to Lille, where she will receive as many honors as you did at Aix. Marshal Bellefond, through a pure motive of piety, has settled with his creditors. He has given up to them the principal part of his property, besides half the profits of his post, to complete the payment of the arrears. This is a noble action, and shows that his visits to La Trappe have not been without effect. I went the other day to see the Duchess of Ventadour; she was as handsome as an angel. The Duchess of Nevers came in, with her head dressed very ridiculously. You may believe me, for you know I am an admirer of fashion. Martin had cropped her to the very extremity of the mode.

Your brother is at St. Germain; he divides his time with Ninon, a young actress, and, to crown the whole, Despréaux.³ We lead him a sad life.

LETTER VI

Paris, Friday, April 1, 1671.

I returned yesterday from St. Germain with Madame d'Arpajon. Every one at court inquired after you; among the rest, it will not be amiss, I think, to distinguish the queen, who accosted me, and asked how my daughter was after her affair upon the Rhône. I returned her majesty thanks for the honor she did you in remembering you. She then desired me to tell her in what manner you had like to have been lost; I accordingly gave her an account of your crossing the river in a storm of wind, and that a sudden gust had thrown you under an arch, within an inch of one of the piles, which if you had once touched, all the world could not have saved you. But, says the queen, "Was her husband with her?" "Yes, madam, and the coadjutor too." "Really," said she, "they were greatly to blame." She gave two or three 10 alases! while I was talking to her, and said many obliging things of you. Afterward a number of ladies came in, and among the rest the young Duchess of Ventadour, very fine and very handsome; it was some time 15 before they brought her the divine tabouret¹; "Ah," said I, turning to the grand master, — "why do they not give it to her, she has purchased it dearly enough?"² He was of my opinion. In the midst of a 20 silence in the circle, the queen turned to me, and asked me who my granddaughter was like? "M. de Grignan, madam," replied I. Upon which her majesty exclaimed, "Indeed! I am sorry for it";³ 25 and added, in a low tone of voice, "She had better have resembled her mother or grandmother." So you see how much I am indebted to you in making my court. Marshall Bellefond made me promise to 30 distinguish him from the crowd. I made your compliments to Monsieur and Madame Duras, and to Messieurs de Charôt and Montausier, and tutti quanti, not to forget the dauphin and mademoi- 35 selle, who both talked a great deal to me about you. I likewise saw Madame de Ludre; she accosted me with an excess of civility and kindness that surprised me, and talked in the most affectionate manner 40 of you, when all on a sudden, as I was going to make her a suitable answer, I found she was not attending to me, and saw her fine eyes wandering round the room. I presently perceived it, and those who saw I 45 took notice of it were pleased with me, and could not help laughing.

I have been extremely diverted with our hurly-burly headdresses; some of them looked as if you could have blown them off their shoulders. Ninon⁴ said that La Choiseul⁵ was as like the flaunting hostess of an inn, as one drop of water to another; a most excellent simile! But that Ninon is a dangerous creature; if you only knew how she argues upon religion it would 50 make you shudder. Her zeal to pervert the minds of young people is much the same as that of a certain gentleman of St. Germain, that we saw once at Livri. She says your brother has all the simplicity of the dove, that he is just like his mother; but that Madame de Grignan has all the fire of the family, and has more sense than to be so docile. A certain person would have taken your part, and put her out of conceit with you on that head, but she bid him hold his tongue, and told him that she knew more of the matter than he did. What a depravity of taste! Because she knows you to be handsome and witty, she must needs saddle you with the other qualification, without which, according to her rule, there is no being perfect. I am greatly concerned for the harm she does my son in this point; but do not take any notice of it to him. Madame de la Fayette⁶ and I use all our endeavors to disengage him from so dangerous an attachment. Besides her, he has a little actress, and all the players of the town upon his hands, to whom he gives suppers; in short, he is perfectly infatuated. You know what a joke he makes of Mascaron. I fancy your Minim would suit him. I never read anything more diverting than what you wrote to me about that man; I read it to Monsieur de la Rochefoucault,⁶ who laughed heartily at it. He desires me to tell you, that there is a certain apostle who is running up and down after his rib, which he would fain appropriate to himself, as a part of his goods and chattels; but, unluckily for him, he is not clever at enterprise. I fancy Mellusina is fallen into some pit, we do not hear a single word about her. M. de la Rochefoucault says besides that, if he was only thirty years younger, he should certainly have a great inclination to M. de Grignan's third rib. That part of your letter, where you say he has already had two of his ribs broken, made him laugh heartily; we always wish for some oddity or other to divert you, but we very much doubt whether this has not turned out rather more to your satisfaction than ours. After all, we pity you extremely, in not having the word of God preached in a suitable manner. Ah, that Bourdaloue!¹ his sermon on the Passion was, they say, the most perfect thing of the kind that can be imagined; it was the same he preached last year, but revised and altered with the assistance of some of his friends, that it might be wholly inimitable; how can one love God, if one never hears him properly spoken of? You must really possess a greater portion of grace than others. We went the other day to hear the Abbé Montmort; I never heard a prettier sermon for so young a beginner. I wish you had such a one in the room of your Minim. He made the sign of the cross, and gave out his text; he did not anathematize his audience, he did not load us with abuse; he told us not to be under any apprehensions concerning death, since it was the only passage we had to a glorious resurrection with Jesus Christ. We agreed with him in this, and every one went away contented. He has nothing offensive in his manner; he imitates Monsieur d'Agen without copying him; he has a modest confidence, is learned, and pious. In short, I was highly pleased with him.

LETTER XVI

The Rocks, Sunday, July 12, 1671.

I have received but one letter from you, my dear child, which vexes me; I used generally to have two. It is a bad thing to use one's self to such dear and tender cares as yours; there is no being happy without them. If M. de Grignan's brothers come to you this summer, they will be good company for you. The coadjutor has been a little indisposed, but is now perfectly recovered; he is incredibly lazy, and is the more to blame, as he can write extremely well when he sets about it. He has a great regard for you, and intends visiting you about the middle of August — he can not before. He protests, but I believe it is false, that he has no branch to rest upon, which hinders him from writing, and makes his eyes ache. This is all I know about Seigneur Corbeau. How odd it is of me to tell you all this, when I do not know myself how I stand with him! If you should know anything of the matter, pray inform me. I reflect every hour of the day upon the times when I used to see you always about me, and am perpetually regretting the loss of those happy moments. Not that I can reproach my heart with having been insensible of the pleasure of your company; for I solemnly protest to you, I never looked on you with the indifference or coolness that grows upon long acquaintance; no, I can not reproach myself with that. What I regret is, that I did not see you so constantly as I could now wish I had, but suffered cruel business sometimes to tear me from you. It would be a fine thing to fill my letters with what fills my heart; alas! as you say, we should glide over many thoughts, without seeming to regard them. Here then I rest, and conjure you, if I am at all dear to you, to be particularly careful of your health. Amuse yourself, do not study too much, carry yourself safely through your pregnancy; after that, if M. de Grignan really loves you, and is resolved not to kill you outright, I know what he will do, or rather what he will not do.

Have you cruelty enough not to finish Tacitus?² Can you leave Germanicus in the midst of his conquests? If you really intend to serve him so paltry a trick, let me know where you leave off, and I will finish for you, which is all I can do to serve you at present. We have gone through Tasso,¹ and with a great deal of pleasure; we found beauties in him, that are unknown to those who are only half read in the language. We have begun our morality; it is of much the same nature as Pascal's. Talking of Pascal, I have taken into my head to almost adore those gentlemen, the postillions who are incessantly carrying our letters backward and forward. There is not a day in the week, but they bring one either to you or to me; there is one every day, and every hour of the day, upon the road. Kind-hearted people, how obliging it is of them! What a charming invention is the post, and what a happy effect of Providence is the desire of gain! I sometimes think of writing to them, to show my gratitude; and I believe I should have done it before, had I not remembered that chapter in Pascal, and been afraid that they might have perhaps thought proper to thank me for writing to them, as I thanked them for carrying my letters. Here is a fine digression for you. But to return to our reading. It was without prejudice to *Cleopatra*² that I laid a wager I would read it through; you know how I support my wagers. I often wonder how I could like such ridiculous stuff; I can hardly comprehend it. You may perhaps remember enough of me to know how much a bad style displeases me; that I have some taste for a good one, and that no person is more sensible to the charms of eloquence. I well know how wretched La Calprenède's style is in many places, on account of its long-winded periods, and bad choice of words. I wrote a letter to your brother in that style the other day, which was pleasant enough. However, though I find such glaring faults in Calprenède, though I know how detestable that way of writing is, yet I can not leave it. The beauty of the sentiments, the violence of the passions, and the marvelous success of their redoubtable swords, entices me away like a child; I become a party in all their designs, and if I had not the example of M. de la Rochefoucault and D'Hacqueville to comfort me, I should be ready to hang myself for being guilty of such a weakness. You appear before me, and cry "Shame!" yet still I go on. I shall have great honor in being intrusted by you with the care of preserving you in the abbé's friendship. He loves you tenderly; you are often the subject of our conversation, with your state, your grandeur, and so forth. He would not willingly die without having first taken a trip to Provence, and rendered you some service. I am told, that poor Madame de Montluet is on the point of losing her senses; she has been raving hitherto without once shedding a tear, but now she has a violent fever, and begins to cry. She says she will be damned, since her dear husband is inevitably so. We go on with our chapel. The weather is very hot; but the mornings and evenings are delightful in the woods, and under the shade of the trees before the house. My apartment is extremely cool. I am afraid you suffer from the heat in Provence.

NOVELS

FRENCH

LE SAGE

(1668-1747)

Alain René Le Sage was the son of a lawyer in Vannes. He attended the College of Vannes and later (1692) went to study law and philosophy in Paris, where his attractive social qualities gained him entrance to the most polished and aristocratic circles. In 1694 he was admitted to Parliament, but gave up all public duties to devote himself to literature. His earlier works are largely imitative of Spanish literature, and throughout his literary career he looks toward Spain rather than England for his models.

Le Sage's greatest work, Gil Blas de Santillane, was published 1715-1735, and achieved immediate success. Because of its lively and natural pictures of contemporary life it was translated into all the languages of Europe and became a universal favorite. The structure of the novel is very simple, following the adventures of a young man who travels about serving various masters. Some of the adventures are those of Gil Blas himself; others are told to him by people whom he meets. The author's principal preoccupation was with the depiction of manners; and this he handles with masterly skill. His style is natural, and free almost to the point of negligence — a characteristic far from common in Le Sage's time. The action, racy and full of variety, shifts rapidly from one class of society to another. In form the novel belongs to that earlier stage of development known as the picaresque, a narrative centered about a pícaro, or rogue. Don Quixote is, in structure at least, a picaresque novel, although it does not have a rogue for its hero. So also are Guzman d'Alfarache, The English Rogue, Robinson Crusoe, and, in modern times, the Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, Raffles, and numerous more recent examples of sensational fiction. Some are inclined to see in the origin of this narrative form something of the influence of Apuleius (see p. 334).

The translation of the following selections is that of Tobias Smollett.

GIL BLAS

BOOK III

CHAPTER I

Taking leave of the young barber, with whom I had stayed some time, I joined a merchant of Segovia with four mules, on which he had transported goods to Valladolid, and was returned with them unloaded. We became acquainted on the road; and he conceived such a friendship for me, that he insisted upon my lodging at his house when we arrived at Segovia. There he detained me two days; and when I was ready to set out for Madrid, along with a carrier, he entrusted me with a letter, which he desired I would in person deliver according to the direction, without telling me that it was a recommendation. I did not fail to present it to Signor 5 Mattheo Melendez, a woollen-draper, who lived near the Sun-gate, at the corner of the Trunk-maker's-street; and he no sooner opened it, and read the contents, than he said, with a complaisant air, "Signor Gil 10 Blas, Pedro Pelacio, my correspondent, writes so pressingly in your behalf, that I cannot dispense with your lodging at my house. He moreover entreats me to find a place for you; and I undertake the office 15 with pleasure, being persuaded that I shall find no difficulty in procuring for you a good settlement."

I accepted the offer of Melendez with so much the more joy, as my finances were sensibly diminished: but I did not live long at his expense; for in eight days he gave me to know, that he had recommended me to a gentleman of his acquaintance who wanted a valet de chambre; and that, in all probability, I should be preferred to the post. The gentleman coming in at that moment, "Signor," said Melendez, showing me to him, "this is the young man I mentioned to you. He is a youth of honour and sobriety, and I can answer for his good behaviour as much as for my own." The cavalier, having looked at me attentively, said he liked my countenance, and took me into his service. "He may follow me now," added he, "and I will instruct him in his duty." At these words he bade the merchant good-morrow, and conducted me into the great street just by St. Philip's church, we entered a pretty good house, one wing of which he possessed; and, going up five or six steps of stairs, he introduced me into a chamber, secured by two strong doors, which he opened, and in the first I perceived a small window grated with iron; through this chamber we went into another, where there was a bed and other furniture, more calculated for convenience than show.

If my new master considered me attentively at the house of Melendez, I examined him with great earnestness in my turn. He was a man turned of fifty, seemed to be serious and reserved, though good-natured withal; so that I conceived no bad opinion of him. He put several questions to me about my family; and, being satisfied with my answer, "Gil Blas," said he, "I believe thou art a sensible young fellow, and I am very glad to have such a one in my service. As for thee, thou shalt have no cause to complain: I will give thee six rials¹ a day for victuals, clothes, wages, and all, exclusive of some little perquisites thou mayest enjoy; and I am easily served; for I keep no table, but always dine abroad. All that thou hast to do in a morning is to clean my clothes, and thou shalt be at thy own disposal during the rest of the day: take care only to come back early in the evening, and wait for me at the door. This is all I exact." After having thus prescribed my duty, he took out his purse, and gave me six rials as a beginning to fulfil articles; then going out, he locked the doors himself, and putting the keys in his pocket, "Friend," said he, "don't follow me: go where you please, but be sure to be on the stairs when I return in the evening." So saying, he left me to dispose of myself as I should think proper.

"In good faith, Gil Blas," said I to myself, "thou couldst not have found a better master: what! to light on a man who, for brushing his clothes and helping him to dress of a morning, gives me six rials per day, with liberty to walk and take my diversion, like a scholar during vacation! Egad, this is the happiest of all situations! No wonder that I was so desirous of being at Madrid; I certainly had some supernatural intimation of the happiness that awaited me." I spent the day in strolling about the streets, diverting myself with looking at everything that was new to me, and this gave me sufficient employment. In the evening, after having supped at an eating-house not far from our house, I betook myself to the place whither my master had ordered me to repair, and where he himself arrived three quarters of an hour after me, seemingly well pleased with my punctuality. "Very well," said he, "this is right: I love to see servants attentive to their duty." So saying, he opened the doors of his apartment, and shut them again as soon as we had got in: being in the dark, he took a tinder-box and struck a light, by the help of which, I assisted to undress him. When he was in bed, I lighted by his order a lamp that stood in his chimney, and carried the candle into the ante-chamber, where I went to sleep in a bed without curtains. Next morning he got up between nine and ten o'clock, and, when I had dusted his clothes, counted me six more rials and dismissed me till the evening; after which he went out also, not without locking the doors with great care; so we parted again for the remainder of the day.

Such was our manner of living, which I found very agreeable; and the best joke of all was, I did not know my master's name: Melendez himself was ignorant of it, being only acquainted with him as with a gentleman who came sometimes to his shop, and bought cloth of him as he had occasion for it. Our neighbours could give me no better information; all of them assuring me, that my master was utterly unknown to them, although he had lived two years in the ward. They told me, that he visited nobody in the neighbourhood; and some of them, accustomed to make rash inferences, concluded from thence that he was no better than he should be. They went still farther, suspecting him to be a spy of the king of Portugal, and charitably advertised me of the suspicion, that I might take my measures accordingly. I was disturbed at this advice: and reflected, that if the thing was so, I should run the risk of visiting the prison of Madrid. I could not confide in my innocence, my past misfortunes having taught me to dread justice: for I had found by experience, that, if she does not put the innocent to death, she at least treats them with so little hospitality, that her lodgers are always in a very melancholy situation.

In such a delicate conjuncture I consulted Melendez, who did not know how to advise me; for, if he could not believe that my master was a spy, on the other hand, he had no certain reason to think otherwise; so that I resolved to observe my patron narrowly, and to leave him if I should perceive that he was undoubtedly an enemy to the state; but I thought prudence, and the easiness of my place, required that I should be first perfectly sure of his practices. With this view I began to keep a strict eye over his actions; and in order to sound him, "Sir," said I, one evening, while I undressed him, "one does not know how to live so as to avoid slander: the world is very malicious, and we, among others, are very little obliged to our neighbours. You cannot guess in what manner the malicious creatures talk of us." — "Right, Gil Blas," answered he; "but what can they say of us, child?" — "Ah! truly," I replied, "scandal never wants matter. Virtue herself furnishes food for it. Our neighbours say that we are dangerous people, and deserve to be taken notice of by the government. In a word, you are thought to be a spy for the king of Portugal." While I pronounced these words, I looked hard at my master, as Alexander eyed his physician¹: and, employing all my penetration to discover what effect my report produced in him, I thought I observed an emotion that too well agreed with the conjectures of the neighbourhood; and he fell into a fit of musing, upon which I did not put the most favourable construction; but he soon recovered himself, and said, with an air of tranquillity, "Gil Blas, let our neighbours think as they please, without making our peace depend upon their imaginations; and since we give them no cause to think amiss of us, let their opinion give us no uneasiness."

Upon this he went to bed, and I followed his example, without knowing what to think of the matter. Next day, just as we were going out in the morning, we heard a loud rap at the outward door; my master opened the other, and, looking through the small grate, saw a decent sort of a man at it, who said, "Signor Cavalier, I am an alguazil,² and come hither to tell you that the corregidor would speak with you." — "What does he want with me?" replied my patron. "That I am ignorant of, Signor," said the alguazil: "but if you will take the trouble to go to his house, you will soon know." — "I am his most humble servant," resumed my master, "but have no manner of business with him." So saying, he shut the second door; and having walked up and down for some time, like one alarmed at the discourse of the alguazil, put six rials into my hand, saying, "Gil Blas, thou may'st go out, my friend. I do not intend to go abroad so early, and have no further occasion for thee this morning." These words made me believe that the fear of being apprehended obliged him to stay at home; so that when I left him, in order to see if my suspicions were unjust, I hid myself in a place from whence I could see him if he should come out; and should have had the patience to stay there the whole morning, had he not spared me that trouble. An hour after, I saw him walking in the street with an air of assurance that at first confounded my penetration: but, far from being duped by those appearances, I distrusted them, having no favourable opinion of the man. I looked upon his composure as a piece of affectation, and even imagined that his remaining at home was with a view of securing his gold and jewels: and that, in all probability, he would consult his safety by immediate flight. I did not expect to see him again, and hesitated about going in the evening to give my attendance at the door; so sure I was that he would quit the city instantly, to escape from the danger that threatened him. I did not fail, however, of being there; and, to my utter surprise, my master returned at his usual time, went to bed without showing the least uneasiness, and got up next day with the same tranquillity.

He then handed the letter to the physician and fixed his eyes steadily upon him as he read it, in order that he might perceive any evidence of guilt.

When we had done dressing, somebody knocked at the door; upon which, my master, looking through the grate, perceived the same alguazil who had been there the preceding day, and asked what he wanted. "Open," answered the alguazil, "here is monsieur the corregidor." At this formidable name my blood froze in my veins; for I was cursedly afraid of these gentlemen since I had passed through their hands: and that moment wished to be a hundred leagues from Madrid; but my patron, less afraid than I, opened the door, and received the judge with great respect. "You see," said the corregidor to him, "I do not come to your house with many attendants, being desirous of doing everything with as little noise as possible: and I believe that you deserve this respect, notwithstanding the ugly reports that are spread of you. Tell me, therefore, your name and business at Madrid!" "Signor," replied my master, "I was born in New Castile, and my name is Don Bernard de Castel Blazo; with regard to my business, I divert myself in walking, frequenting shows, and enjoying the agreeable conversation of a few select friends." "Doubtless," said the judge, "you have a great income." "No, Sir," resumed my patron, interrupting him; "I have neither rents, lands, nor house." — "How do you live then?" replied the corregidor. "On that which thou shalt see," said Don Bernard; at the same time, he lifted up a hanging, opened a door which I had not before observed, then another behind that, and carried the judge into a closet, where he showed him a great trunk filled with pieces of gold.

Then he went on: "Signor, you know that the Spaniards are enemies to work: nevertheless, how averse soever they may be to trouble, I may safely say that I excel them all in that particular; having a fund of laziness that renders me incapable of any manner of employment. If I had a mind to dignify my vices, I would call this laziness a philosophical indolence, the work of a mind weaned from everything that is most ardently pursued in life. But I will frankly own that I am constitutionally idle: and so idle, that, if I was under a necessity of working for my livelihood, I believe I should let myself die of hunger. With a view, therefore, to lead a life agreeable to my humour, to free myself from the trouble of managing my estate, and, above all things, to save myself the trouble of a steward, I have converted my whole patrimony, consisting of several considerable inheritances, into ready money. In this trunk are fifty thousand ducats; more than I shall ever have occasion for, was I to live another age; for I don't spend a thousand a-year, and am already turned of fifty. I am not at all afraid of what is to happen; for, thank heaven, I am not addicted to any one of the three things which commonly bring men to ruin; I am not a slave to my stomach, I play only for amusement, and am quite cured of women. So that I am under no apprehension of being ranked in my old age among those voluptuous dotards who purchase the favours of courtizans at an extravagant price."

"What a happy man you are!" said the corregidor, "you are very unjustly suspected of being a spy; that office being very unfit for a person of your character. Proceed, Don Bernard," added he, "continue the life you now lead; and far from disturbing your happiness, I declare myself the guardian of it; I beg the favour of your friendship, and offer you mine in return." — "Ah, Signor!" cried my master, penetrated with these obliging expressions, "I accept the precious offer you make, with equal joy and respect: for in vouchsafing me your friendship, you increase my wealth and crown my felicity." After this conversation, which the alguazil and I overheard at the closet-door, the corregidor took his leave of Don Bernard, who could not enough express his gratitude; while I, to second my master, and assist him in doing the honours of the house, overwhelmed the alguazil with civilities, making a thousand profound bows, though in the bottom of my soul I harboured that disdain and aversion which every man of honour has for one of his occupation.

CHAPTER II

Having waited upon the corregidor to the street, Don Bernard de Castel Blazo returned with expedition to lock his strong box, and all the doors that secured it. Then we went out, both very well satisfied; he in having acquired a powerful friend, and I in being now ensured of my six rials a day. The desire I had to recount this adventure to Melendez made me take the road to his house, which, when I had almost reached, I perceived Captain Rolando.¹ I was confounded at finding him in this place, and could not help shivering at the sight of him! He knew me at once, accosted me very gravely, and preserving still his air of superiority ordered me to follow him. I obeyed with fear and trembling, saying to myself, "Alas! he will doubtless make me pay what I owe him.

Whither will he lead me? perhaps to some subterraneous abode in this city. A plague upon it! if I thought so, I would let him see in a hurry that I have not got the gout in my toes." As I walked behind him, I resolved to take particular notice of the place where he should stop, from which I proposed to scamper off as fast as my legs would carry me, should it seem the least suspicious.

But Rolando soon banished my fear, by going into a noted tavern, whither I followed him, and where he called for the best wine, and bespoke dinner; in the mean time we went into a room by ourselves, where the captain spoke in this manner: — "Thou must be surprised, Gil Blas, to meet thy old commander in this place; and wilt be more so still when thou shalt hear what I am going to relate. The day on which I left thee in our subterranean retreat, and set out for Mansilla with my whole company, in order to dispose of the mules and horses which we had taken the preceding day, it was our fortune to meet the son of the corregidor of Leon in his coach, accompanied by four men on horseback, well armed. We made two of them bite the dust, and the others betake themselves to flight; while the coachman, afraid of his master's life, cried, in a suppliant voice, 'Oh, dear gentlemen! in the name of God, do not kill the only son of the corregidor of Leon.' My people did not at all relent at these words, which, on the contrary, inspired them with fury: 'Gentlemen,' said one among us, 'let not the son of our mortal enemy escape: how many people of our profession hath his father put to death! let us avenge them now, and sacrifice this victim to their manes.' The rest of my men approved of this proposal; and even my lieutenant prepared to act the high-priest in this ceremony: when I stayed his hand, saying, 'Stop, at your peril! Why should we shed blood unnecessarily? Let us be satisfied with the purse of this young man, whom, since he makes no resistance, it would be the utmost barbarity to kill: besides, he is not accountable for the actions of his father, who does no more than his duty in condemning us to death; just as we do ours, in rifling travellers on the highway.'

"My intercession was far from being unserviceable to the corregidor's son, from whom we took nothing but his money; and, having carried off the horses of the two men we had slain, we sold them, together with our own, at Mansilla; then returning to our cavern, which we reached next day before it was light, we were not a little astonished to find the trap-door lifted up; and our surprise redoubled when we saw Leonarda fettered in the kitchen. Being briefly informed by her of what had happened, we wondered how thou couldst outwit us, never having thought thee capable of playing such a clever trick, and we forgave thee on account of the invention. Having untied our cook, and given her orders to dress victuals for us, we went to look after our horses in the stable, where the old negro, who had received no sustenance for four-and-twenty hours, was at the last gasp. We would have given him all the assistance in our power, but he had lost his senses, and was otherwise so low, that notwithstanding our good-will, we left the poor devil in the clutches of death. This did not deprive us of our appetite, which having satisfied with a sumptuous meal, we retired to our several chambers, and slept the rest of the day: when we got up, Leonarda let us know that Domingo was no more, upon which we carried him to the cellar, where thou mayest remember thy bed was, and there performed his funeral obsequies, as if he had enjoyed the honour of being our companion.

"Five or six days after, it happened, that, intending to make an excursion, we, one morning, on the skirts of the wood, fell in with three troops belonging to the holy brotherhood, who seemed waiting in order to attack us. As we perceived only one of the three at first, we despised it, though more numerous than our company, and attacked it accordingly: but while we were engaged with this, the other two, who had found means hitherto to keep themselves concealed, rushed upon us so suddenly, that our valour was of little or no service, and we were under the necessity of yielding to the numbers of our foe. Our lieutenant and two of our men fell on the field, while the two that remained and I were so hemmed in and overpowered, that we were taken prisoners; and while two of their troops conducted us to Leon, the third went and destroyed our retreat, which had been discovered as follows: a peasant of Luceno, crossing the forest in his return home, perceived by accident the trap-door of our cavern lifted up, that very day, on which thou madest thy escape with the lady, and suspecting that it was the place of our abode, had not courage to go in but contented himself with taking a good observation of the place, which the better to mark, he cut off with his knife thin slices of bark from the trees at small distances as he went along, until he had got quite out of the wood; then repairing to Leon, imparted his discovery to the corregidor, who receiving it with so much the more joy, as his son had been robbed by our company, assembled three troops in order to apprehend us, and the peasant was their guide.

"My arrival furnished a show for all the inhabitants of Leon: had I been a Portuguese general made prisoner of war, the people could not have been more eager to see me. 'Behold,' said they, 'behold the famous captain who was the terror of this country; and who, with his two comrades, deserves to have his flesh torn from his bones with red hot pincers.' Being carried before the corregidor, he began to insult me, saying, 'Well, miserable wretch! heaven, wearied with the disorders of thy life, at last resigns thee to my justice.' 'Sir,' replied I, 'if my crimes are manifold, at least I cannot reproach myself with the death of your only son, whose life I preserved, and for which you owe me some acknowledgement.' 'Ah, miscreant!' cried he, 'people of thy character are not entitled to the privileges of honour: and even if I had a mind to save thy life, the duty of my office would not allow me.' Having spoken to me in this manner, he ordered us to be imprisoned in a dungeon, where he did not let my companions linger long; for they went out, in three days, to act their last tragical scene in the marketplace. As for me, I remained three whole weeks in gaol, imagining that my punishment was deferred in order to make it more terrible: and was in expectation of a death altogether new; when the corregidor, ordering me to be brought into his presence, said, 'Listen to thy sentence. Thou art free! Had it not been for thee, my only son would have been murdered on the highway. As a father I was willing to acknowledge this piece of service, but not having it in my power to acquit thee as a judge, I have written to court in thy behalf, solicited thy pardon, and obtained it. Thou mayest go, then, whither thou shalt please: but,' added he, 'take my advice, reflect seriously thy ill-spent life, and from henceforth quit the profession of robbery.'

"I was deeply affected with these words, and took the road to Madrid, resolving to turn over a new leaf, and live honestly in that city. I found my parents were dead, and their effects in the hands of an old relation, who gave me such a faithful account of them as guardians commonly do; all that I have been able to touch being no more than three thousand ducats, which, in all probability, is not above one fourth of what is my due. But what course could I take? I should have gained nothing by going to law; therefore, to avoid idleness, have purchased the place of an alguazil. My brethren, out of decency, would have opposed my admission, had they been acquainted with my story, which luckily they were ignorant of, or pretended to be so, which is the same thing; for in that honourable corps it is the business of every individual to conceal his own exploits; thank Heaven! not one of us can justly reproach his fellow: so that it may be said of the fraternity, the devil may take the best. Nevertheless, my friend," added Rolando, "I will now disclose the bottom of my soul: the profession which I have embraced is not at all to my liking; it requires a behaviour too delicate and mysterious for me; and whatever tricks we practice must be very crafty and secret. Oh, how I regret my old profession! I grant, there is more safety in this new employment; but there was more pleasure in the other, and liberty is my delight. In all likelihood I shall get rid of my office, and set out one morning for the mountains at the source of the River Tagus,¹ where I know there is a retreat inhabited by a numerous company, chiefly of Catalonians² — that is making their eulogium in one word; if thou wilt accompany me, we will go and increase the number of these great men: I shall be second captain in their company, and will, for thy better reception, assure them that I have seen thee ten times engaged by my side; I will extol thy valour to the skies, and say more in thy praise than a general says of an officer whom he wants to promote. I will take care not to mention a word of the trick thou hast played, because it would make them suspicious of thee: the adventure shall therefore be concealed. Well," added he, "art thou ready to follow my fortune? I will wait for thy reply."

"So many men, so many minds," said I to Rolando; "you are born for hardy deeds, and I for a quiet and easy life." — "Oh! I understand you," cried he, interrupting me, "the lady whom love persuaded you to rescue still keeps possession of your heart, and doubtless you lead a happy life with her in Madrid: confess, Signor Gil Blas, that you have taken lodgings for her, and spend together the pistoles which you carried off from the subterranean retreat." I told him that he was mistaken, and that, in order to undeceive him, I would, while we should be at dinner, relate the story of the lady: this I did accordingly, and informed him of all that had happened to me since I had quitted the company. Towards the end of our repast, he resumed the subject of the Catalonians, owned that he was determined to join them, and made a new attempt to engage me in the same resolution; but finding that I was not to be persuaded, he darted a fierce look at me, saying in a very serious tone, "Since thou hast such a grovelling soul as to prefer thy servile condition to the honour of associating with men of courage, I abandon thee to the baseness of thy inclination: but listen to the words I am about to pronounce, and let them remain engraven on thy memory; forget that thou hast met me to-day and never talk of me from henceforth: for if ever I shall hear that thou so much as namest me in conversation — thou knowest me; I will say no more." Having thus expressed himself, he called to pay, discharged the bill, and we got up in order to part.

CHAPTER III

As we went out of the tavern, and were taking leave of one another, my master, happening to pass, saw me, and, I perceived, looked hard at the captain, which made me believe that he was surprised to find me acquainted with such a figure. Certain it is, that the appearance of Rolando could not prepossess people in his favour: for he was a very tall fellow with a long visage and hook-nose; and though not ugly had very much the air of a rank sharper.

I was not deceived in my conjectures; for, in the evening, I found Don Bernard still harping on the captain's figure, and extremely well disposed to believe all the fine things I could have said of him, had not my mouth been shut. "Gil Blas," said he "who is that tall spunger in whose company I saw thee to-day?" I replied, "He is an alguazil"; and thought he would rest satisfied with that answer: but he asked a great many other questions; and as I appeared embarrassed, because I remembered the threats of Rolando, he broke the conversation abruptly, and went to bed. Next morning, when I had done my duty as usual, instead of six rials, he gave me as many ducats; saying, "Hold, my friend, here is what I give thee for having served me hitherto: go, and seek for another place, for I cannot put up with a servant who has such honourable acquaintances." I took it in my head to pretend, in my own justification, that my acquaintance with the alguazil was occasioned by my having prescribed for him while I practised physic at Valladolid.

"Very well," replied my master, "that is an ingenious evasion: but thou shouldst have thought of it last night, and not have been so much disconcerted." "Sir," added I, "I thought it would be imprudent in me to tell it: and that was the cause of my confusion." "Oh! surely," replied he, clapping my shoulders gently, "you have been very prudent; I did not think thou hadst been so cunning. Go, child, I have no farther occasion for thee."

I went instantly to inform Melendez of this piece of bad news, who told me, for my consolation, that he intended to introduce me into a better family: and accordingly a few days after, "Gil Blas, my friend," said he, "you don't know what good news I have to tell you; you are going to enjoy the most agreeable post you could desire; for I will settle you with Don Matthias de Silva, a man of the first quality, and one of those young lords who go under the denomination of beaux: he does me the honour to buy cloth of me, on trust, indeed; but there is nothing to be lost by people of his rank; for they commonly marry rich heiresses, who pay their debts: and even if that should not happen, a tradesman, who understands his business, sells always so dear that he can afford to lose three fourths of his bargain. The steward of Don Matthias is my particular friend. Let us go to him now; he will himself present you to his master; and you may depend upon it he will, for my sake, treat you with uncommon regard."

In our way to the house of Don Matthias, the merchant said, "It will not be amiss, I believe, to give you some information of the character of this steward, whose name is Gregorio Rodriguez. Between you and me, he is a man of no family, who, finding himself born for business, followed the bent of his genius, and enriched himself with the pillage of two families which he served in quality of steward. I assure you he has a great deal of vanity, and loves to see the rest of the servants cringe to him. They must address themselves first to him, when they have the least favour to ask of their master, for, should it happen that they obtain it without his interest, he has always expedients in readiness by which it will either be revoked or rendered ineffectual. Remember this, Gil Blas, in the regulation of your conduct: pay your court to Signor Rodriguez, preferably to your master himself, and do all that lies in your power to please him: his friendship will bestead you much: he will pay your wages punctually; and, if you are dexterous enough to acquire his confidence, he may give you some pretty bone to pick out of the number he has in his possession. Don Matthias is a young lord who minds nothing but his pleasure, and would not for the world inform himself of the state of his own affairs. What a glorious family is that for a steward!"

Arriving at the house, we desired to speak with Signor Rodriguez, who, we were told, was in his own apartment; there we found him with a kind of farmer, who had a blue canvas bag of money in his hand. The steward, who looked more pale and yellow than a love-sick girl in her teens, came towards Melendez with open arms; he, on the other hand, met him in the same manner, and they embraced one another with demonstrations of friendship, in which there was, at least, as much art as nature. Then, my affair coming on the carpet, Rodriguez examined me from head to foot, and told me, in a very polite manner, that I was just such a one as Don Matthias wanted, and that he would with pleasure present me to that lord. Upon which, Melendez letting him know how much he was interested in my behalf, and begging that he would favour me with his protection, committed me to his care, and, after abundance of compliments, withdrew. He was no sooner gone, than Rodriguez said to me, "I will conduct you to my master as soon as I can dispatch this honest countryman." Then, going to the peasant, and taking hold of the bag, "Talego," said he, "let us see if there be just five hundred pistoles here." Having counted the money, and found it right, he gave the farmer a discharge for the sum, and sent him about his business; and, putting the pistoles into the bag again, I addressed himself to me, saying, "This is the right time for us to go to the levee of my master, who commonly rises about noon. It is near the hour, and I suppose he is up."

This was the case; we found Don Matthias in his morning gown, lolling in an easy chair, over an arm of which he had tilted one of his legs, and poised himself by leaning with his body the other way, and rasping tobacco, while he talked to a footman, who for the present did the duty of his valet de chambre. "My lord," said the steward to him, "here is a young man whom I take the liberty to present as one fit to fill the place of the valet whom you dismissed two days ago. Melendez your draper recommends him, assuring me that he is a lad of merit, and I hope your lordship will be very well satisfied with his behaviour." "Enough," answered the young lord, "since you introduce him to me, I receive him into my service with implicit faith, and make him my valet de chambre. So that affair is settled: but, Rodriguez," added he, "let us talk of something else: you are come very opportunely; for I was just going to send for you. I have bad news to tell you, my dear Rodriguez! You must know I had ill luck at play last night. Together with a hundred pistoles which I had about me, I have lost two hundred more on my parole; and you know of what importance it is for people of quality to discharge debts of that sort; it is indeed the only kind which we are obliged, in point of honour, to pay; and we do not give ourselves much concern about the rest; you must, therefore, find two hundred pistoles immediately, and send them to the Countess of Pedrosa." "Sir," said the steward, "it is sooner said than done. Where shall I get that sum to please you? I have not been able to finger one farthing of your tenants', let me threaten as hard as I can; and yet I am obliged to maintain your family in an honourable way, though I sweat blood and water in procuring wherewithal to defray the expense. True, indeed, I have hitherto, thank Heaven! made shift; but I am now reduced to such extremity that I know not what saint in heaven to invoke." "All these harangues are useless," cried Don Matthias, interrupting him, "and you worry me with your reflections.

Don't you imagine, Rodriguez, that I will change my disposition, and divert myself with looking into my own affairs. An agreeable amusement, truly, for a man of pleasure like me!" "Have a little patience," replied the steward; "at the rate you go on, I foresee that you will be rid of that care in a very short time." "You fatigue me," said the young lord in a passion, "you murder me. Give me leave to ruin myself imperceptibly: I tell you I want two hundred pistoles: and I must have them." "I'll go then," said Rodriguez, "and have recourse to the little old man who has already lent you money at high interest." "You may, if you please, have recourse to the devil"; answered Don Matthias, "provided I have the two hundred pistoles; I shall give myself no farther trouble about the matter."

Just as he had pronounced these words in a hasty and discontented manner, the steward went away, and a young man of quality, called Don Antonio Centelles, came in. "What is the matter?" said this last to my master, "thou art cloudy, my friend: I perceive indignation in thy countenance. What can have put you into this bad humour? I'll lay a wager it was the man whom I met going out." "Yes," replied Don Matthias, "it was my steward: every time he comes to speak with me, I suffer for one quarter of an hour, by his talking about my affairs, and saying that I have quite exhausted my finances. Impertinent beast! he cannot say that he loses by me, I am sure." "Why, child," said Don Antonio, "I am in the same condition; having a factor not a whit more reasonable than thy steward. When the rogue, in obedience to my repeated orders, brings money for me, one would think he gave it out of his own pocket. He overwhelms me with reflections. 'Sir,' says he, 'you are undone, your rents are seized.' Upon which I am obliged to cut him short, in order to put an end to his ridiculous discourse." "The misfortune is," said Don Matthias, "we cannot live without these people, who are necessary evils." "They are so," replied Centelles; "but harkee," added he, laughing with all his might, "there is a comical thought come into my head: a most incomparable conception! by which we may convert those scenes which we have with them into mirth; and divert ourselves with that which now gives us so much uneasiness. Let me demand of thy steward all the money thou shalt have occasion for; while thou dost the same by my manager; then they may moralize as they please, we can hear them with great composure: because thy steward will show me thy accounts, and my factor will entertain thee with mine. I shall hear of nothing but thy profusion, and thou wilt see nothing but mine. This will be admirable sport."

A thousand bright strokes succeeded this sally, and mightily diverted the young lords, who conversed together with a great deal of vivacity, until their discourse was interrupted by Gregorio Rodriguez, who returned with a little old man, almost quite bald. Don Antonio would have gone away, saying, "Adieu, Don Matthias, I shall see you by and by: at present, you have, doubtless, some serious affair to discuss with these gentlemen." "Oh! not at all," replied my master, "stay, it is no secret. That discreet old person whom you see is an honest man, who lends me money at the rate of twenty per cent." "How? twenty per cent!" cried Centelles, with an air of astonishment. "Egad, I congratulate thee upon being in such good hands! I am not so kindly dealt with, and may say that I purchase silver at the price of gold; I commonly borrow at the rate of forty in the hundred." "Heavens! what extortion!" exclaimed the old usurer, "do these knaves ever think of another world? I am not at all surprised at the hue and cry raised against people who lend upon interest; it is the exorbitant profit which some exact that ruins our honour and reputation. If all my brethren were like me, we should not be so much reviled: for my sole view in lending is to befriend my fellow-creatures. Ah! if times were as they have been, I would offer you my purse without interest: and truly, in spite of the present scarcity, I can hardly prevail upon myself to take twenty per cent. But, for my part, I believe money has retired again within the bowels of the earth: there is no such thing to be had: for which reason I am obliged to retrench my benevolence.

"How much do you want?" added he, addressing himself to my master. "I must have two hundred pistoles," replied Don Matthias. "Here are four hundred in a bag," said the usurer; "you shall have one half." So saying, he pulled from under his cloak a blue bag, which seemed to me the very same which the peasant Talego had left with the five hundred pistoles, in the hands of Rodriguez. I soon knew what to think of the matter, and found that Melendez had not praised the steward's understanding without cause. The old man, having emptied the bag on the table, began to count the money: my master was inflamed with desire of possession at the sight; and struck with the totality of the sum, said to the usurer, "Signor Descomulgado, I have made a very wise reflection, truly! What a fool I am to borrow no more than what is absolutely necessary to disengage my parole without considering that I have not a penny in my purse! I shall be obliged to have recourse to you to-morrow; therefore to spare you the trouble of coming back, I think it will not be amiss to pocket the whole four hundred." "My lord," said the usurer, "a part of this money was designed for a good licentiate, who has some fat benefices, which he charitably employs in persuading young girls to retire from the world, and in furnishing their retreats. But since you have occasion for the whole sum, it is at your service: all that I desire is sufficient security." "Oh! as for security," said Rodriguez, interrupting him, and taking a paper out of his pocket, "you shall be satisfied: here is an order to be signed by Don Matthias, for five hundred pistoles, upon one of his tenants, called Talego, a rich farmer of Mondejan." "Very well," replied the usurer, "I never make any words." Upon which the steward presented a pen to his master, who, without reading the order, set his name to the bottom, whistling all the while.

This affair being ended, the old man took his leave of my patron, who ran and embraced him, saying, "Till our next meeting, Signor usurer, I am wholly yours:

I don't know why people of your profession are branded with the name of rogues: for my own part, I think you are very necessary and serviceable to society: you are the consolation of a thousand heirs, and the resource of all those lords whose expense exceeds their income." "Thou art in the right," cried Centelles; "usurers are very honest people, whom we never can honour enough; I will, in my turn, embrace this gentleman on account of his twenty per cent." With these words, he approached and hugged the old man; and these two beaux, for their diversion, began to push him backward and forward one to another, like a ball between two tennis-players. After he had been tossed to and fro a good while, they let him go with the steward, who was more deserving than he of their embraces, and of something else also.

Rodriguez and his understrapper being gone, Don Matthias sent the half of his pistoles to the Countess of Pedrosa by the footman who was present, and secured the rest in a long, embroidered, silk purse, which he commonly wore in his pocket. Very well satisfied on seeing himself in cash, he said to Don Antonio, with a gay air, "What shall we do to-day? Let us consult about it." "You speak like a sensible man," replied Centelles; "with all my heart, let us deliberate." While they were considering how to spend the day, two other lords arrived: these were Don Alexo Segiar, and Don Fernando de Gamboa, both of them about the age of my master, that is, between eight-and-twenty and thirty. These four cavaliers at meeting hugged one another so heartily, that one would have thought they had not met for ten years before: then Don Fernando, who was a jovial companion, addressing himself to Don Matthias and Don Antonio, said, "Gentlemen, where do you intend to dine to-day? If you are not engaged, I'll conduct you to a tavern where you shall drink nectar. I supped there last night, and left it only this morning between five and six o'clock." — "Would to Heaven," cried my master, "that I had done the same: in which case, I should not have lost my money."

"As for me," said Centelles, "I treated myself last night with a new diversion; for I love variety in my pleasures, which alone makes life agreeable. A friend of mine carried me to the house of a farmer of the revenue, a gentleman who does his own business together with that of the state. There I saw magnificence and taste, the entertainment being elegant enough. But I was mightily diverted with the ridiculous behaviour of the tax-gatherer himself, who, though the most plebeian of his class, assumed the man of quality; and his wife, though horribly ugly, affected the airs of a beauty, and said a thousand silly things, seasoned with the Biscayan accent, which rendered them still more remarkably foolish. Besides, there were at table, four or five children, with their tutor; so that you may easily conceive how I was diverted with this family supper."

5 "And I, gentlemen," said Don Alexo Segiar, "supped at the house of Arsenia the actress. We were six in all; Arsenia, Florimonda, with a coquette of her acquaintance, the Marquis of Zeneta, Don

10 Juan of Moncada, and your humble servant. We spent the night in drinking and speaking bawdy. Heavens! what pleasure! 'Tis true, indeed, Arsenia and Florimonda have not much genius, but 15 their wantonness supplies the place of wit. They are merry, brisk, romping creatures, and I love them a thousand times better than your precise women of sense."

THE AGE OF ROMANTICISM

To say that the period from the end of the eighteenth century to about 1850 was the age of Romanticism may not be entirely accurate; all ages have shown a certain inclination toward romantic ideas. This particular age, however, is distinguished from its predecessors largely by the increase in emphasis upon the romantic. There seems to be so far no water-tight definition of the romantic, but for our present purposes we may venture the statement that the romantic has to do with that which really is not but which would be highly desirable, as opposed to that which actually is. Already in the eighteenth century, as we have seen, there began to arise a reaction against the tyranny of reason and logic, which were all that remained of the great classical tradition of the seventeenth century. Men had begun to find it unbearable to scrutinize closely their own too manifest limitations. The clarity of Swift and Voltaire, who saw man as a rather inefficient and ridiculous featherless biped, could be borne only by a few fierce and valiant intellects. Inevitably the pendulum of man's attitude toward life swung the other way. Emotional expression, which had been confined to the moulds of classical order, now burst into freedom, and, as might be expected, chiefly into lyricism, the form best suited to representing individual temperament and personal experience. • Again there returned man's confidence, if not in himself, at least in his possibilities. Minds explored the unknown, the strange, the bizarre, not with the unquestioning zeal of the Renaissance, but with a self-conscious, defensive gesture with which they attempted to sweep behind them the unalterable and unhappy facts of life and to step forward into a realm which had little or no contact with reality. Any land or period remote from everyday experience might be seized by the imagination and endowed with all the qualities that seemed most desirable to the writer. The dreamy warmth and mystery of the Orient, the glamour of mediæval chivalry, the idyllic life of the untutored savage, the glories of ancient Greece and Rome — all these had some slight objective reality, but many of our impressions of them today come from their poetic treatment during the age of Romanticism.

This age lies so close to us that an accurate estimate of its values is difficult to make. Some assert that the departure from literal fact had a vicious influence on public morals, that it softened the mind and made people unfit for exact thinking; others maintain that the really great writers of the period merely forsook the lesser for the greater truth, that they soared above the humdrum level of physical fact to purer heights of experience than their severely logical predecessors. Whatever the outcome of the argument, we may say that for the present at least a large part of the civilized world still belongs, in many respects, to this age. The confidence in man's powers which produced modern democratic ideas (whether they have ever been fully put into practice or not) received its chief impetus from the age of Romanticism. So also did the idea of a beneficent, kindly, and harmonious Nature, although something of the sort had often been mentioned before. Altruism and patriotism, two closely kindred sentiments, were qualities particularly exalted during this period. The historical drama and the historical novel abounded in examples of self-immolation for the sacred cause of social justice. • So strong was the emphasis upon the importance of sentiment, as opposed to cerebration, that some have been tempted to call this the age of Feeling, as successor to the age of Reason (seventeenth and eighteenth centuries) and to the age of Enthusiasm (Renaissance).

As it has already been hinted, the greatest literary distinction of this age was its lyrical poetry. The verse of the eighteenth century had been largely satirical or didactic. The nineteenth century produced in nearly every European country at least one lyric poet of the first rank, and in most of them several. The importance accorded to sensibility and imagination, to all subjective experience, and to naturalness of expression contrasts sharply with the objectivity and formality of preceding periods.

Song lyrics appeared in great numbers, keeping pace with the new development in music. Battle poems, historical narratives, nature lyrics, modern versions of old ballads flooded the age with variety and abundance. The drama, in the meantime, was neglected. Faust (p. 801) which is regarded by many as the greatest literary work of the time, although written in dramatic form, was not entirely suitable for stage performance. The same is largely true of the great dramas of Schiller. The stage really comes into its own again only in the Modern Period.

During the age of Romanticism the novel, which had taken form during the eighteenth century, broadened in scope and became more complicated in technique. The rapid growth of the reading public was accompanied by an enormous increase in the production of novels and shorter prose narratives. Meanwhile prose criticism became more genuinely humane and appreciative.

DRAMA

GERMAN

GOETHE

(1749-1832)

The parents of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe were fairly well-to-do members of the middle class in Frankfort who were able to give their son pleasant surroundings and a good education. Very early in life Goethe mastered Italian, French, Latin, and Greek, exhibited a moderate talent in painting and music, and in his late boyhood took up the study of Hebrew. This precocity was accompanied by a great interest in out-door sports, and his physical development was no less remarkable than his mental. At sixteen he went to Leipsic to study law, but turned rather to botany and medicine, began to read enthusiastically Molière, Corneille, and Lessing, and to take part in private theatricals.

Returning to Frankfort after two or three years, Goethe learned of his father's disapproval of his career. After what seemed to him a rather dark interval, he was sent to the University of Strassburg, where he became conspicuous for the diversity of his interests, especially in medicine and in the sciences of optics and electricity. He became acquainted with Herder, whom he deeply respected and admired, and who strongly influenced the direction taken by Goethe's genius. He dived into the study of the Bible, Homer, Shakespeare, and Ossian, and underwent the tempestuous pangs of the Storm and Stress period, reflected in strenuous physical exertion and in the writing of such pieces as Götz von Berlichingen and The Sorrows of Werther (p. 883).

When he was twenty-six Goethe went to live on the estate of the Duke of Weimar as an administrator. The earlier years of his life at Weimar were busy and boisterous; yet he had time for voluminous writing and for serious study. His work in botany and anatomy enabled him to make several definite contributions to scientific knowledge. From 1786 to 1788 he made his famous sojourn in Italy. In 1792 he accompanied the Duke of Weimar when the Prussian army invaded France, and conducted himself with notable courage. The rest of his life he spent chiefly at Weimar.

• Because of his apparent lack of sympathy with the new political and social movements of the day, Goethe has often been regarded as cold and ungenerous. The source of his indifference was more probably his objectivity and his desire for concreteness. Impatient of abstractions, he demanded tangible embodiments of ideas. He saw God in the manifestations of Nature, and held strongly to the doctrine of natural right and natural goodness. He found himself unable to hate anything that was natural, even man's vices, — a quality that may account for the absence from his writings of any apparent attempt at moralizing. His works indicate a strong feeling of the divinity of the entire world.

Goethe's great work is the drama Faust. The Faust legend began as a semi-historical account of a German physician with a reputation for necromancy; it had appeared in various forms in the works of sophisticated authors and belonged as well to the tradition of the common people. Probably Goethe first knew it as a puppet play at Strassburg. Faust's desire to see and know all things, at the sacrifice even of his moral heritage, was undoubtedly what first fascinated Goethe. The tragic struggle as he sees it is in Faust's dissatisfaction with the knowledge simply of isolated phenomena and his overpowering passion to get behind the facts to a comprehensive understanding of the universe. In thinking of this play as representative of the problems and struggles of modern man, one must remember that the plot is laid in the Middle Ages and that the moral values must therefore be rephrased in modern terms. The modern reader sees nothing inherently sinful in the search for knowledge, but to the mediæval man it seemed a transgression of celestial ordinations. The separate incidents of Faust were transformed by the poet into typical adventures of the human soul, as valid for today as for yesterday.

Faust is in two parts. Part I, written in Goethe's earlier years and published in 1808, is in itself a complete dramatic unit. Part II, concerned with Faust's ultimate attempt to redeem his soul through altruistic actions, is philosophical and has little dramatic movement. It was completed in the year of Goethe's death, and is so unlike Part I that one can scarcely imagine it to be from the same pen. The play begins with a "Prologue for the Theater" in which the manager, the poet, and a player present their ideas of what a drama should be. A "Prologue in Heaven" follows, similar in plan to the opening of the Book of Job. The Lord gives Mephistopheles permission to test His servant Faust, saying that, however low he may be brought, he will always retain a consciousness of the right.

The selections are translated by Anna Swanwick in the Dramatic Works of Goethe, London, Bell and Daldy, 1872. For Goethe's poetry, see p. 840.

FAUST

Night. A high vaulted narrow Gothic chamber.

FAUST, restless seated at his desk.

FAUST. I've now alas! Philosophy,
Med'cine and Jurisprudence too,
And to my cost Theology,
With ardent labour studied through.
And here I stand, with all my lore,
Poor fool, no wiser than before.
Master, ay doctor styl'd, indeed,
Already these ten years I lead,
Up, down, across, and to and fro,
My pupils by the nose, and learn,
That we in truth can nothing know!
This in my heart like fire doth burn.
True, I've more wit than all your solemn fools;
Priests, doctors, scribes, magisters of the 20
schools;
Nor doubts, nor scruples torture now my
breast;
No dread of hell or devil mars my rest;
Hence is my heart of every joy bereft;
No faith in knowledge to my soul is left;
No longer doth the hope delude my mind,
By truth to better and convert mankind.
Then I have neither goods, nor treasure,
No worldly honour, rank, or pleasure;
No dog would longer such a life desire!
Hence I've applied to magic, to inquire
Whether the spirit's voice and power to me
May not unveil full many a mystery;
That I no more, the sweat upon my brow, 35
Need speak of things, of which I nothing
know;
That I may recognise the hidden ties
That bind creation's inmost energies;

Her vital powers, her embryo seeds survey,
And fling the trade in empty words away.

Thou full-orb'd moon! Would thou wert gazing now
5 For the last time upon my troubl'd brow!
Beside this desk, at midnight, seated here,
Oft have I watch'd to hail thy soothing beam;
Then, pensive friend, thou cam'st, my soul
10 to cheer;
Shedding o'er books and scrolls thy silv'ry
gleam.
Oh, that I could, in thy beloved light,
Now wander freely on some Alpine height;
15 Could I round mountain caves with spirits ride,
In thy mild radiance o'er the meadows
glide,
And, purg'd from knowledge-fumes, my strength renew,
Bathing my spirit in thy healing dew.

Woe's me! still prison'd in the gloom
Of this abhor'd and musty room,
25 Where heaven's dear light itself doth pass
But dimly through the painted glass.
Girt round with volumes thick with dust,
A prey to worms and mould'ring rust,
And to the high vault's topmost bound,
30 With smoky paper compass'd round;
Boxes in strange confusion hurl'd,
Glasses and antique lumber, blent
With many a curious instrument —
This is thy world! a precious world!

And dost thou ask why heaves thy heart,
With tighten'd pressure in thy breast?
Why the dull ache will not depart,
By which thy life-pulse is oppress'd?

Instead of nature's living sphere,
Created for mankind of old,
Brute skeletons surround thee here,
And dead men's bones in smoke and mould.

Up! Forth into the distant land!
Is not this book of mystery,
By Nostradam's ¹ prophetic hand,
An all-sufficient guide? Thou'lt see
The planetary orbs unroll'd;
When nature doth her thoughts unfold
To thee, thy soul shall rise, and seek Communion high with her to hold,
As spirit doth with spirit speak!
Vain by dull poring to divine
The meaning of each hallow'd sign.
Spirits! I feel you hov'ring near;
Make answer, if my voice ye hear!

(He opens the book and perceives the 20 *sign of Macrococosmos.*²)

Ah! at this spectacle through every
sense,

What sudden ecstasy of joy is flowing!
I feel new rapture, hallow'd and intense,
Through every nerve and vein with ardour glowing.

Was it a god who character'd this scroll,
Which stills my inward tumult; to my
heart,

Wither'd and sick, new rapture doth impart;

And by a mystic impulse, to my soul,
Unveils the working of the wondrous whole.

Am I a God? What light intense!
In these pure symbols I distinctly see,
Nature exert her vital energy.
Now of the wise man's words I learn the sense:

"Unlock'd the realm of spirits lies; —
Thy sense is shut, thy heart is dead!
Scholar, with quenchless ardour, rise,
And bathe thy breast in the morning red!"

(He contemplates the sign.) 45

How all things live and work, and ever
blending,
Weave one vast whole from Being's ample range!

5 How powers celestial, rising and descend-
ing,

Their golden buckets ceaseless interchange!

Their flight on rapture-breathing pinions
winging, 10

From heaven to earth their genial influence bringing,

Through the wide whole their chimes
melodious ringing.

15 A wondrous show! but ah! a show alone!
Where shall I grasp thee, infinite nature,
where? ³

Ye breasts, ye fountains of all life, whereon Hang heaven and earth, from which the blighted soul

Yearneth to draw sweet solace, still ye roll
Your sweet and fost'ring tides — where are ye — where?

25 Ye gush, and must I languish in despair?
(He turns over the leaves of the book impatiently, and perceives the sign *of the Earth-spirit.*⁴)

How differently this sign affects me!
30 Thou,

Spirit of earth, to me art nigher,
My energies are rising higher,
As from new wine I feel a quick'ning glow;
Courage I feel to stem the tide of life,

35 To suffer weal and woe, man's earthly
lot,

When warring tempests rage to share their strife,

And 'midst the crashing wreck to tremble
40 not.

Clouds gather over me —
The moon conceals her light —
The lamp is quench'd!

Vapours are rising! Quiv'ring round my head

¹ Michel de Notre Dame, physician to Henry II of France. He was an astrologer and a mystic, who published in 1555 a book of prophecies.

² The universe, consisting of the four elements (fire, earth, air and water), the world and the stars. The sign was a geometrical figure showing the working of all these parts of the universe.

³ Faust sees all the facts of the interaction of the parts of the universe, and yet he knows no more than ever about the inner truth and significance of it.

⁴ Faust gives up his aspirations to heavenly wisdom and decides to devote himself to the acquisition of knowledge about the whole of human life through complete experience of man and his actions.

Flash the red beams. Down from the vaulted roof
A shuddering horror floats,
And seizes me!
I feel it, spirit, prayer-compell'd, 'tis thou 5
Art hov'ring near.

Unveil thyself!
Ha! How my heart is riven now!
Each sense, with eager palpitation,
Is strain'd to catch some new sensation. 10
I feel my heart surrender'd unto thee!
Thou must! Thou must! Though life should be the fee!

*(He seizes the book, and pronounces mysteriously the sign of the spirit. 15
A ruddy flame flashes up; the spirit appears in the flame.)*

SPIRIT. Who calls on me?

FAUST (turning aside). Appalling shape!

SPIRIT. With might,
Thou hast compell'd me from my sphere,
Long hast thou striv'n to draw me here,
And now —

FAUST. Torture! I cannot bear thy 25
sight.

SPIRIT. To know me thou did'st breathe
a fervent prayer,

To hear my voice, to gaze upon my brow,
Me doth thine earnest adjuration bow — 30
Lo! I am here! — What pitiful despair Grasps thee, the demigod? Where's now the soul's deep cry,

Where is the breast, which in its depths a world conceived,
And bore and cherish'd; which, with
ecstasy,

To rank itself with us, the spirits, heav'd?
Where art thou, Faust? whose voice I heard resound,

Who towards me press'd with energy profound?

Art thou he? Thou, — whom thus my breath can blight,

Whose inmost being trembles with affright, 45
A crush'd and writhing worm!

FAUST. Shall I yield, thing of flame, to
thee?

Faust, and thine equal, I am he!

SPIRIT.

In the currents of life, in action's storm,
I float and I wave

With billowy motion!
Birth and the grave,
A limitless ocean,
A constant weaving
With change still rife,
A restless heaving,
A glowing life,

Thus time's whizzing loom unceasing I ply,
And weave the life-garment of deity.

FAUST. Spirit, whose restless energy doth sweep

The ample world, how near I feel to thee!

SPIRIT. Thou'rt like the spirit whom thou can'st conceive,

Not me! (Vanishes.)

FAUST (deeply moved). Not thee?

Whom then?

I, God's own image!

And not rank with thee! (A knock.)

20 O death! I know it — 'tis my famulus¹ —

My fairest fortune now escapes!

That all these visionary shapes

A soulless groveller should banish thus!

(WAGNER in his dressing-gown and night-cap, a lamp in his hand.)

FAUST turns round reluctantly.

WAGNER. Your pardon, Sir! I heard you here declaim;

30 A Grecian tragedy you doubtless read.

Improvement in this art is now my aim,

For now-a-days it much avails. Indeed

An actor, oft I've heard it said at least,
May give instruction even to a priest.

35 FAUST. Ay, if your priest should be an actor too,

As not improbably may come to pass.

WAGNER. When, in his study pent the whole year through,

40 Man views the world, as through an optic
glass,

On a chance holiday, and scarcely then,

How by persuasion can he govern
men?

FAUST. If feeling prompt not, if it doth not flow

Fresh from the spirit's depths, with strong control

Swaying to rapture every list'ner's soul,

50 Idle your toil; the chase you may forego!
Brood o'er your task! Stray thoughts together glue,

¹ A student assistant who lives with his master and acts somewhat in the capacity of a secretary.

Cook from another's feast your own ragout,

Still prosecute your miserable game,
And fan your paltry ash-heaps into flame!
Thus children's wonder you'll perchance excite,

And apes' applause, if such your appetite:
But that which issues from the heart, alone
Will bend the hearts of others to your own.

WAGNER. But in deliv'ry will the speaker find

Success alone; I still am far behind.

FAUST. A worthy object still pursue!
Be not a hollow tinkling fool!

Good sense, sound reason, judgment true, 15
Find utterance without art or rule;
And when with genuine earnestness you speak,

Then is it needful cunning words to seek?
Your fine harangues, so polish'd in their 20
kind,

Wherein the shreds of human thought ye twist,

Are unrefreshing as the empty wind,
Whistling through wither'd leaves and 25
autumn mist!

WAGNER. Oh Heavens! art is long and life is short!

Still as I prosecute with earnest zeal
The critic's toil, I'm haunted by this 30
thought,

And vague misgivings o'er my spirit steal.
The very means how hardly are they won,
By which we students to the fountains rise!

And then, perchance, ere half his labour's done,

Check'd in his progress, the poor devil dies.

FAUST. Is parchment then the consecrated spring

From which, he thirsteth not, who once hath quaffed?

Oh, if it gush not from the depths within,
Thou hast not won the soul-reviving draught.

WAGNER. Yet surely 'tis delightful to transport

Oneself into the spirit of the past,
To see before us how a wise man thought,
And what a glorious height we've reach'd 50
at last.

FAUST. Ay truly! even to the loftiest star!

A seal'd-up volume, seven-fold seal'd are
To us, my friend, the ages that are pass'd;
And what the spirit of the times men call,
Is merely their own spirit after all,
Wherein, distorted oft, the times are glass'd.

Then truly 'tis a sight to grieve the soul!
At the first glance we fly it in dismay;
A very lumber-room, a rubbish-hole!
At best a sort of mock-heroic play,
With saws pragmatICAL, and maxims sage,
To suit the puppets and their mimic stage.

WAGNER. But then the world and man, his heart and brain!
Touching these things all men would something know.

FAUST. Ay! what 'mong men as knowledge doth obtain!
Who on the child its true name dares bestow?

The few who somewhat of these things have known,

Who their full hearts unguardedly reveal'd,

Nor thoughts, nor feelings, from the mob conceal'd,

Have died on crosses, or in flames been thrown.

Excuse me, 'tis the deep of night, my friend,

We must break off, and for the present end.

WAGNER. I fain would keep awake the whole night through,

35 Thus to converse so learnedly with you.

To-morrow, being Easter-day, I hope

A few more questions you will let me bring.

With zeal I've aim'd at learning's amplest scope;

40 True, I know much, but would know everything. (Exit.)

FAUST (alone). How he alone is ne'er bereft of hope,

Who clings to tasteless trash with zeal untir'd,

45 Who doth, with greedy hand, for treasure grope,

And, finding earthworms, is with joy inspir'd!

And dare a voice of merely human birth,
E'en here, where shapes immortal throng'd, intrude?

Yet ah! thou poorest of the sons of earth,
For once, I e'en to thee feel gratitude.
Despair the power of sense did well-nigh blast,
And thou didst save me ere I sank dis-
may'd;
So giant-like the vision seem'd, so vast,
I felt myself shrink dwarf'd as I survey'd.

I, God's own image, who already hail'd
The mirror of eternal truth unveil'd,
Who, freed already from this toil of clay,
In splendour revell'd and celestial day: —
I, more than cherub, whose unfetter'd soul
With penetrative glance aspir'd to flow
Through nature's veins, and, still creating,
know

The life of gods, — how am I punish'd
now!
One thunder-word hath hurl'd me from the goal!

Spirit! I dare not lift me to thy sphere.
What though my power compell'd thee to appear,
My art was powerless to detain thee here.
In that great moment, rapture fraught,
I felt myself so small, so great;
You thrust me fiercely from the realm of
thought,

Back on humanity's uncertain fate.
Who'll teach me now? What ought I to forego?

Shall I that impulse of the soul obey?
Alas! our very actions as our woe
Alike impede the tenor of our way!

E'en to the noblest by the soul conceiv'd,
Some feelings cling of baser quality;
And when the goods of this world are achiev'd,

Each nobler aim is term'd a cheat, a lie.
Our aspirations, our soul's genuine life,
Grow torpid in the din of worldly strife.

Though youthful phantasy, while hope inspires,
Stretch o'er the infinite her wing sublime,
A narrow compass limits her desires,
When wreck'd our fortunes in the gulph of
time.

In the deep heart of man, care builds her
nest,

O'er sorrows undefin'd she broodeth there,

And, rocking ceaseless, scareth joy and
rest;

Still is she wont some new disguise to wear,
As house, land, wife, or child, or kindred
blood,

As sword or poison'd cup, as fire or flood;
We tremble before ills that ne'er assail,
And what we ne'er shall lose we still bewail.

I rank not with the gods! I feel with dread,

That the mean earthworm I resemble
more,

Which still is crush'd beneath the wanderer's tread,

As in its native dust it loves to bore.

And may not all as worthless dust be priz'd,
That in these hundred shelves confines me
round?

Rubbish, in many a specious form disguis'd,
That in this moth-world doth my being
bound?

Here shall I satisfy my craving soul?

Here must I read in many a pond'rous scroll.

That here and there one mortal hath been
blest,

Self-torture still the portion of the rest? —
Thou hollow skull, what means that grin of thine?

But that thy brain, bewilder'd once, like
mine,

Sought, yearning for the truth, the light of
day,

And in the twilight wander'd far astray?

Ye instruments, forsooth, ye mock at
me, —

With wheel, and cog, and ring, and cylinder,

To nature's portals ye should be the key;

Your wards are intricate, yet fail to stir
Her bolts. Inscrutable in broadest light,
To be unveil'd by force she doth refuse.

What she reveals not to thy mental sight,
Thou wilt not wrest from her with bars and screws.

Old useless furnitures! Ye still are here, Because my sires ye serv'd in times long past!

Old scroll! The smoke of years thou yet
dost wear,

As when yon lamp its sickly ray first cast.

Better have squander'd at an earlier day
 My paltry means, than 'neath its weight to groan!
 Would'st thou possess thy heritage, essay
 By active use to render it thine own.
 What we employ not but impedes our
 way;
 What it brings forth the hour can use
 alone.

But why doth yonder spot attract my sight?
 Is yonder flask a magnet to my gaze?
 Whence this mild radiance, as when Cynthia's light,
 Amid the forest-gloom, around us plays?
 Hail, precious phial! Thee, with rev'rent awe,
 Down from thine old receptacle I draw;
 Science in thee I hail and human art;
 Essence of deadliest powers, refin'd and sure,
 Of soothing anodynes abstraction pure,
 Now in thy master's need thy grace im-
 part!
 I gaze on thee, my pain is lull'd to rest;
 I grasp thee, calm'd the tumult in my
 breast;
 The flood-tide of my spirit ebbs away;
 Onward I'm summon'd o'er a boundless
 main,
 Calm at my feet expands the glassy plain,
 To shores unknown allures a brighter
 day.
 Lo, where a car of fire, on airy pinion,
 Comes floating towards me! I'm prepar'd to fly
 By a new track through ether's wide dominion,
 To distant spheres of pure activity.
 This life intense! This godlike ecstasy?
 Worm that thou art, such rapture can'st thou earn?
 Only resolve with courage stern and high,
 Thy visage from the radiant sun to turn!
 Dare with determin'd will to burst the portals
 Past which in terror others fain would steal;
 Now is the time to testify that mortals
 The calm sublimity of gods can feel.
 To shudder not at yonder dark abyss,

Throng'd with self-torturing fancy's grisly brood;
 Right onward to the yawning gulph to press,
 5 Round whose dark entrance rolls hell's fiery flood;
 With glad resolve to take the fatal leap,
 E'en though thy soul should sink to endless
 sleep?

Pure crystal goblet, forth I draw thee now,
 From out thine antiquated case, where
 thou
 Forgotten hast repos'd for many a year.
 Oft at my father's revels thou didst shine,
 15 Gladd'ning the earnest guests with gen'- rous wine
 As each the other pledg'd with sober cheer.
 The gorgeous brede of figures, quaintly
 20 wrought,
 Which he who quaff'd must first in rhyme
 expound,
 Then drain the goblet at one draught pro-
 found,
 25 Hath nights of boyhood to fond memory brought;
 I to my neighbour shall not reach thee now,
 Nor on thy rich device my cunning show;
 Here is a juice makes drunk without delay;
 30 Its dark brown flood thy crystal round
 doth fill;
 Let this last draught, the product of my
 skill,
 My own free choice, be quaff'd with res-
 35 olute will,
 A solemn greeting to the coming day!
 (He places the goblet to his mouth.)
 (The ringing of bells, and choral voices.)

40 Chorus of ANGELS.

Christ is arisen!
 Mortal, all hail to thee.
 Thou whom mortality,
 Earth's sad reality,
 Held as in prison.

FAUST. What hum melodious, what clear, silv'ry chime,
 Thus draws the goblet from my lips away?
 50 Ye deep-ton'd bells, do ye with voice
 sublime,
 Announce the solemn dawn of Easter-day?

Sweet choir! are ye the hymn of comfort singing,
Which once around the darkness of the grave,
From seraph-voices, in glad triumph ring-
ing,
Of a new covenant assurance gave?

Chorus of WOMEN.

Embalm'd with spices rare,
In sorrow and in gloom,
His faithful followers bare
His body to the tomb.
For their sepulchral rest,
We swath'd the reliques dear;
Ah! vain is now our quest,
Christ is no longer here!

Chorus of ANGELS.

Christ is arisen!
Perfect through earthly ruth,
Radiant with love and truth,
Girt with eternal youth,
He soars from earth's prison.

FAUST. Wherefore, ye tones celestial,
sweet and strong,
Come ye a dweller in the dust to seek?
Ring out your chimes believing crowds among,
I hear the message, but my faith is weak;
From faith her darling, miracle, hath sprung.
I dare not soar aloft to yonder spheres
Whence sound the joyful tidings; yet this strain,
Familiar even from my boyhood's years,
Binds me to earth, as with a mystic chain.
Then would celestial love, with holy kiss,
Come o'er me in the Sabbath's stilly hour, 40
While, fraught with solemn and mysterious power,
Chim'd the deep-sounding bell, and prayer
was bliss;
A yearning impulse, undefin'd yet dear, 45
Drove me to wander on through wood and
field;
With heaving breast and many a burning tear,
I felt with holy joy a world reveal'd.
This Easter hymn announc'd, with joyous pealing,
Gay sports and festive hours in times of old,

And early memories, fraught with child-
like feeling,
From death's dark threshold now my steps withhold.
Oh, still sound on, thou sweet celestial
strain,
Tears now are gushing, — Earth, I'm thine again!

10 Chorus of DISCIPLES.

O'er death itself victorious,
Whom we interr'd in love,
Exalted now and glorious
Is rais'd to realms above.
15 Near the creative spirit
Joys aye-increasing flow.
Ah! we on earth inherit
Disquietude and woe.
He left us here in anguish,
20 His glory we bemoan,
For ah, our spirits languish,
We're comfortless, alone.

Chorus of ANGELS.

25 Christ is arisen,
Redeem'd from decay;
The bonds which imprison
Your souls, rend away!
Praising the Lord with zeal,
By deeds that love reveal,
Like brethren true and leal
Sharing the daily meal,
To all that sorrow feel
Whisp'ring of heaven's weal,
Still is the master near,
Still is he with you here!

Study.

FAUST. MEPHISTOPHELES.

FAUST. A knock? Come in! Who now would break my rest?

MEPHISTOPHELES. 'Tis I!

FAUST. Come in!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Thrice be the words express'd.

FAUST. Then I repeat, Come in!

MEPHISTOPHELES. 'Tis well.

I hope that we shall soon agree!

For now, your fancies to expel,

Here as a youth of high degree

50 I'm come, in gold-lac'd scarlet vest,

And stiff-silk mantle richly dress'd,

A cock's gay feather for a plume,

A long and pointed rapier, too;

And briefly I would counsel you

To don at once the same costume,
And, free from trammels, speed away,
That what life is you may essay.

FAUST. In every garb I needs must feel oppress'd,
My heart to earth's low torturing cares a prey.

Too old I am the trifler's part to play,
Too young, to live by no desire possess'd.
What can the world afford to ease my pain? 10

Renounce! renounce! This the eternal
song

Which in our ears still rings, our whole life long;

Each hour, in murmurs hoarse, repeats the 15
strain.

But to new horror I awake each morn,
And I could weep hot tears, to see the sun
Dawn on another day, whose round forlorn
Accomplishes no wish of mine — not one. 20
Which still, with froward captiousness, impairs

E'en the presentiment of every joy,
While low realities and paltry cares
The spirit's fond imaginings destroy. 25

And then when falls again the veil of
night,

Stretch'd on my couch I languish in despair;

Appalling dreams my troubl'd soul 30
affright;

No soothing rest vouchsaf'd me even there.
The god, who thron'd within my breast resides,

Deep in my inmost soul can stir the 35
springs;

With sovereign sway my energies he guides,
But hath no power to move external things;

And thus my very being I deplore,
Death ardently desire, and life abhor.

MEPHISTOPHELES. And yet, methinks, by most 'twill be confess'd

That death is never quite a welcome guest.

FAUST. Happy the man around whose 45
brow he binds

The bloodstain'd wreath in conquest's dazzling hour;

Or whom, excited by the dance, he finds
Dissolv'd in bliss, in love's delicious bower; 50

Oh that before that lofty spirit's might,
My soul, entranc'd, had sunk to endless
night!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Yet did a certain man, one night, refrain
Of its brown juice the crystal bowl to drain.

FAUST. To play the spy diverts you,
5 then?

MEPHISTOPHELES. I own,
Though not omniscient, much to me is known.

FAUST. If o'er my soul the tone familiar,
stealing,

Drew me from harrowing thought's be-wild'ring maze,

Touching the ling'ring chords of childlike
feeling,

With the sweet harmonies of happier days;
So now I breathe my curse on all that windeth

Its coil of magic influence round the soul,
And with delusive flatt'ry fondly bindeth
The wretched spirit to this dismal hole!
And before all, curs'd be the high opinion
Wherewith the spirit girds itself around!
Of shows delusive curs'd be the dominion,
Within whose mocking sphere our sense is bound!

Accurs'd of lying dreams the treacherous wiles,

The cheat of glory, fame's exalted rage!
Accurs'd as property what each beguiles,

As wife and child, as slave and heritage!
Accurs'd be mammon, when with treasure

He doth to daring deeds incite;
Or when to steep the soul in pleasure,
He spreads the couch of soft delight.

Curs'd be the grape's balsamic juice!
Accurs'd love's dream, of joys the first!

Accurs'd be hope! accurs'd be faith!
And more than all, be patience curs'd!

Chorus of SPIRITS (invisible).

40 Woe! woe!

Thou hast destroy'd

The beautiful world

With violent blow;

'Tis shiver'd! 'tis shatter'd!

The fragments abroad by a demigod scatter'd.

Now we sweep

The wrecks into nothingness!

Fondly we weep

The beauty that's gone!

Thou, 'mongst the sons of earth,

Lofty and mighty one,

Build it once more!

In thine own bosom the lost world restore!

Now with unclouded sense

Enter a new career;
Songs shall salute thine ear,
Ne'er heard before!

MEPHISTOPHELES.

My little ones these spirits be.
Hark! with shrewd intelligence,
How they recommend to thee
Action, and the joys of sense!
In the busy world to dwell,
Fain they would allure thee hence;
Stagnate in this lonely cell,
Sap of life, and powers of sense.

Forbear to trifle longer with your grief,
Which, vulture-like, consumes you in this den.

The worst society is some relief,
You'll feel yourself a man with fellow-men.
Not that I'd thrust you 'mid the vulgar
throng;

Nor do I to the upper ranks belong;
But if through life I may your steps attend,

I will at once engage to be your friend.
I am your comrade; should it suit your need,

Your servant I, your very slave indeed!

FAUST. And how must I requite your service, pray?

MEPHISTOPHELES. There's time enough to think of that!

FAUST. Nay! Nay!

The devil is an egotist I know;
And never for God's sake doth kindness
show.

Let the condition plainly be exprest;
Such a domestic is a dangerous guest.

MEPHISTOPHELES. I'll pledge myself to be your servant here,

Ne'er at your call to slumber or be still;
But when together yonder we appear,
You shall submissively obey my will.

FAUST. But small concern I feel for yonder world,

Hast thou this system into ruin hurl'd,
Another may arise the void to fill.
This earth the fountain whence my pleasures flow,

This sun doth daily shine upon my woe,
And can I but from these divorce my lot,
Then come what may, — to me it matters
not.

Henceforward to this theme I close mine ears,

Whether hereafter we shall hate and love,
And whether, also, in those distant spheres,
There is a depth below or height above.

MEPHISTOPHELES. In this mood you

5 may venture it. But make
The compact, and at once I'll undertake To charm you with mine arts. I'll give you more

Than mortal eye hath e'er beheld before.

10 FAUST. And what, poor devil, hast thou to bestow?

Was mortal spirit, in its high endeavour,
E'er fathom'd by a being such as thou?

Yet food thou hast which satisfieth never,
15 Red gold indeed thou hast, that swiftly flies,

Gliding like restless quicksilver away,
A game, at which none ever win who play,
A damsel, who, while on my breast she lies,

20 To lure a neighbour fondly doth essay;
Thine, too, ambition's bright and godlike
dream,

Baseless and transient as the meteor's
gleam;

25 Show me the fruits that, ere they're pluck'd, decay,

And trees whose verdure buddeth every day.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Such a demand
30 affrights me not; with ease

I can provide you treasures such as these,
But in due course a season will come
round,

When on what's good we may regale in 35 peace.

FAUST. If e'er in indolent repose I'm
found,

Then let my life upon the instant cease!

Can'st thou thy flatt'ring spells around me
40 cast,

And cheat me into self-complacent pride,
Or sweet enjoyment, — Be that hour my
last!

Be this our wager!

45 MEPHISTOPHELES. Done!

FAUST. 'Tis ratified!

If ever to the passing hour I say
"So beautiful thou art! thy flight delay!"
Then round my soul thy fetters throw,
Then to perdition let me go!

Then may the solemn death-bell sound,
Then from thy service thou art free,
The index-hand may cease its round,

And time be never more for me!

MEPHISTOPHELES. We shall remember;
pause, ere 'tis too late.

FAUST. You're authoriz'd to do so if you choose,
My strength I do not rashly overrate.
Since here to be a slave I'm doom'd by fate,

It matters little whether thine or whose.

MEPHISTOPHELES. At your inaugural 10 feast this very day,
I will attend, my duties to commence.
But one thing! — Accidents may happen,
hence

A line or two in writing grant I pray.

FAUST. A writing, pedant, dost demand from me?
Is man, and is man's word to thee unknown?

Is't not enough that by my word alone 20
I pledge my interest in eternity?
Raves not the world in all its streams
along,

And must a promise my career impede?
Yet in our hearts the prejudice is strong,
And who from the delusion would be freed?

How blest within whose bosom truth reigns pure,

No sacrifice will he repent when made!
A formal deed, with seal and signature,
A spectre this from which all shrink afraid.
The word resigns its essence in the pen,
Leather and wax usurp the mast'ry then. —
Spirit of evil! what dost thou require?

Brass, marble, parchment, paper? Shall I use

Style, pen, or graver? Name which you desire,

To me it matters not, you've but to choose! 40

MEPHISTOPHELES. With passion why
so hotly burn,

And thus your eloquence inflame?

The merest scrap will serve our turn,

And with a drop of blood you'll sign your 45
name.

FAUST. If this will satisfy you, well and good!

I'll gratify your whim, howe'er absurd!

MEPHISTOPHELES. A quite peculiar sort 50 of juice is blood!

FAUST. Be not afraid that I shall break my word.

The present scope of all my energy
Is in exact accordance with my vow.
With vain presumption I've aspir'd too
high;

5 I'm on a level but with such as thou;
I am rejected by the great First Cause,
Nature herself doth veil from me her laws;
Rent is the web of thought, my mind
Doth knowledge loathe of every kind.
In depths of sensual pleasure drown'd,
Let us our fiery passions still!
Enwrapp'd in magic's veil profound,
Let wondrous charms our senses thrill!
Plunge we in time's tempestuous flow,
15 Stem we the rolling surge of chance!
There may alternate weal and woe,
Success and failure, as they can,
Mingle and shift in changeful dance,
Excitement is the sphere for man.

20 MEPHISTOPHELES. Nor goal, nor measure is prescrib'd to you.

If you desire to taste of every thing,
To snatch at pleasure while upon the wing,
May your career amuse and profit too.

25 Only fall to and don't be over coy!

FAUST. Harken! The end I aim at is not joy.

I crave excitement, agonizing bliss,
Enamour'd hatred, quickening vexation.
30 Purg'd from the love of knowledge, my vocation,

The scope of all my powers henceforth be this,

To bare my breast to every pang, — to
know

35 In my heart's core all human weal and woe,
To grasp in thought the lofty and the deep,
Men's various fortunes on my breast to heap,

To theirs dilate my individual mind,
And share at length the shipwreck of mankind.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Oh, credit me, who still as ages roll,

45 Have chew'd this bitter fare from year to year,

No mortal, from the cradle to the bier,
Digests the ancient leaven. Know, this
Whole

Doth for the Deity alone subsist!

He in eternal brightness doth exist,

Us unto darkness he hath brought, and
here

Where day and night alternate, is your sphere.

FAUST. But 'tis my will!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Well spoken, I admit!

There is but one thing puzzles me, my friend;

Time's short, art long; methinks 'twere only fit,

That you to friendly counsel should attend. 10

A poet choose as your ally,

Let him thought's wide dominion sweep,

Each good and noble quality,

Upon your honour'd brow to heap;

The lion's magnanimity,

The fleetness of the hind,

The fiery blood of Italy,

The Northern's firm enduring mind.

Let him for you the mystery solve, and show

How to combine high aims with cunning low,

And how, while young desires the heart inflame,

To fall in love according to a plan.

Myself would gladly meet with such a man.

And him I would Sir Microcosm name.

FAUST. What then am I, if I may never hope

The crown of our humanity to gain,

Of all our energies the final scope?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Your own poor self you are, and must remain.

Put on your head a wig with countless locks,

Raise to a cubit's height your learned socks,

To more than now you are you'll ne'er attain.

FAUST. I feel it, I have heap'd upon my 40 brain

The gather'd treasure of man's thought in vain,

And when at length from studious toil I rest,

No power, new-born, springs up within my breast,

A hair's breadth is not added to my height, I am no nearer to the infinite.

MEPHISTOPHELES. These matters, sir, 50 you view, indeed,

Just as by other men they're view'd;

We must more cleverly proceed,

Before life's joys our grasp elude.

The devil! thou hast hands and feet,

And head and heart are also thine;

What I enjoy with relish sweet,

5 Is it on that account less mine?

If for six horses I can pay,

Do I not own their strength and speed?

A proper man I dash away,

As their two dozen legs were mine indeed.

10 Up then, from idle pond'ring free,

And forth into the world with me!

I tell you what; — a speculating wretch,

Is like a brute, on bare, uncultur'd ground,

Driv'n by an evil spirit round and round.

15 While all beyond rich pastures smiling stretch.

FAUST. But how commence?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Why we with speed

Must leave this place of torture; you

20 A precious life of it must lead,

Tiring yourself and pupils too!

Leave it to neighbour Paunch; — withdraw,

Why plague yourself with thrashing straw?

25 The very best of what you know

You dare not to the youngsters show.

One in the passage waits to-day.

FAUST. I'm in no mood to see him now.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Poor lad! He must

30 be tir'd, I trow;

Hopeless he must not go away.

Hand me your cap and gown, I pray;

Now leave it to my wit; — the mask

Will suit me famously, —

35 (He changes his dress.)
I ask

But quarter of an hour; meanwhile equip,

And make all ready for our pleasant trip!

(Exit FAUST.)

MEPHISTOPHELES (in FAUST'S long gown). Reason and Knowledge only thus condemn,

Despise the loftiest attributes of men,

Still let the Prince of lies, without control,

45 With shows, and mocking charms, delude thy soul,

I have thee unconditionally then —

Fate hath endow'd him with an ardent mind,

Which unrestrain'd still presses on for ever,

And whose precipitate and mad endeavour

O'erleaps itself, and leaves earth's joys behind.

Him will I drag along through life's wild waste,

Through scenes of vapid dulness, where at
last

Bewilder'd, he shall falter, and stick
fast;

And, as in mock'ry of his greedy haste,
Viands shall hang his craving lips beyond —

Vainly he'll seek refreshment, anguish-tost,
And were he not the devil's by his bond,
Yet must his soul infallibly be lost!

A STUDENT enters.

STUDENT. But recently I've quitted
home,

Full of devotion am I come,
Attracted hither by the fame
Of one whom all with rev'rence name.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Your courtesy much flatters me!

A man like other men you see;
Pray have you yet applied elsewhere?

STUDENT. I would entreat your friendly care!

I've youthful blood and courage high;
Of gold I bring a fair supply;

My mother scarce would let me go;
But wisdom here I longed to know.

MEPHISTOPHELES. You've hit upon the very place.

STUDENT. And yet my steps I'd fain retrace.

These walls, this melancholy room,
O'erpower me with a sense of gloom.

The space is narrow, nothing green,
No friendly tree is to be seen;

And in these halls, the powers of sense
Forsake me, and intelligence.

MEPHISTOPHELES. It all depends on habit. Thus at first

The infant takes not kindly to the breast,
But soon delighted slakes its eager thirst,

To the maternal bosom fondly prest.
Thus at the breasts of wisdom day by day

With keener relish you'll your thirst allay.
STUDENT. Enraptur'd I upon her neck will fall;

How to attain it, Sir, be pleas'd to show.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Ere further you proceed, just let me know,

What faculty you choose, and what your call.

STUDENT. Profoundly learned I should wish to grow,

What heaven contains I'd comprehend,
O'er earth's wide realm my gaze extend,

Nature and science I desire to know.

MEPHISTOPHELES. You are upon the proper track I find;

Take heed that nothing dissipates your
mind.

STUDENT. My heart and soul are in the chase;

Though to be sure I fain would seize

15 On pleasant summer holidays,

A little liberty and careless ease.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Waste not your time, so fast it flies;

Method will teach you time to win;

20 Hence, my young friend, I would advise,
With college logic to begin.

Then will your mind be so well brac'd,
In Spanish boots so tightly lac'd,

That on 'twill circumspectly creep,

25 Thought's beaten track securely keep,

Nor will it, ignis-fatuus like,

Into the path of error strike.

Then many a day they'll teach you how

The mind's spontaneous acts, till now

30 As eating and as drinking free,

Require a process; — one, two, three!

In truth the subtle web of thought

Is like the weaver's fabric wrought,

One treadle moves a thousand lines,

35 Swift dart the shuttles to and fro,

Unseen the threads unnumber'd flow,

A thousand knots one stroke combines.

Then forward steps your sage to show,

And prove to you it must be so;

40 The first being so, and so the second,

The third and fourth deduc'd we see;

And if there were no first and second,

Nor third nor fourth would ever be.

This, scholars of all countries prize,

45 Yet 'mong themselves no weavers rise.

Who would describe and study aught alive

Seeks first the living spirit thence to drive,

Then are the lifeless fragments in his

50 hand,

There only fails, alas! the spirit-band.

This process, chemists name, in learned thesis

Mocking themselves, Naturæ encheiresis.¹

STUDENT. Your words I cannot fully comprehend.

MEPHISTOPHELES. In a short time you will improve, my friend,
If of scholastic forms you learn the use;
And how by method all things to reduce.

STUDENT. I feel, so doth all this my brain confound,
As if a mill-wheel there were turning round.

MEPHISTOPHELES. And next to this, before aught else you learn,
You must with zeal to metaphysics turn!
There see that you profoundly comprehend,

What doth the limit of man's brain transcend;

For that which is or is not in the head
A sounding phrase will serve you in good stead.

But before all strive this half year
From one fix'd order ne'er to swerve.
Five lectures daily you must hear;
The hour still punctually observe!
Yourself with studious zeal prepare,
And every paragraph o'erlook,
That you may then be quite aware
He never deviates from the book;
Yet write away without cessation,
As at the Holy Ghost's dictation!

STUDENT. This, Sir, a second time you need not say!

Your prudent counsel I appreciate quite;
For, what we've written down in black and white

We can in peace and comfort bear away.

MEPHISTOPHELES. But a profession I entreat you name.

STUDENT. For jurisprudence I've no taste, I own.

MEPHISTOPHELES. To me this branch of science is well known,
And hence I cannot your repugnance blame.

Laws are a fatal heritage, —
Like a disease, an heirloom dread;
Their curse they trail from age to age,
And furtively abroad they spread.
Reason doth nonsense, good doth evil grow;

That thou'rt a grandson is thy woe!
But of the law on man impress'd

By nature's hand, there's ne'er a thought.

STUDENT. You deepen my dislike; how blest

The pupil who by you is taught!

5 To try theology I'm half inclin'd.

MEPHISTOPHELES. I would not lead you willingly astray,

But as regards this science you will find,
'Tis difficult to shun the erring way,
It offers so much poison in disguise,
Which scarce from med'cine you can recognize.

Here too, 'tis best to listen but to one,
And by the master's words to swear alone.

15 To sum up all — To words hold fast!

Then, the safe gate securely pass'd,
You'll reach the fame of certainty at last.

STUDENT. But then some meaning must the words convey.

20 MEPHISTOPHELES. Right! But o'er-anxious thought's of no avail;

For there precisely where ideas fail,
A word comes opportunely into play.

Most admirable weapons words are found,
25 On words a system we securely ground,
In words we can conveniently believe,
For can we of one jot a word bereave.

STUDENT. Your pardon for my impotency;

30 With but one more request I'll trouble you.
Ere I retire, I'll thank you to supply
A pregnant utterance touching med'cine too.

Three years! how brief the appointed tide!

35 The field, heaven knows, is all too wide!

If but a friendly hint be thrown,

'Tis easier then to feel one's way.

MEPHISTOPHELES (aside). I'm weary of this dry pedantic tone,

40 And must again the genuine devil play.

(Aloud.)

Of med'cine you the spirit catch with ease;
The great and little world you study thro',
Then in conclusion, just as heaven may

45 please,

You let things quietly their course pursue;
In vain you range through science's ample space;

Each man learns only that which learn he can;

50 Who knows the passing moment to embrace,

¹ "Nature's encheiresis," i.e., procedure.

He is your proper man.
In person you are tolerably made,
Nor in assurance will you be deficient,
Self-confidence acquire, be not afraid,
The world will then esteem you a proficient.

Learn how to treat the sex, of that be sure;
Their thousand ahs and ohs
The sapient doctor knows,
He from a single point alone can cure.
Assume a decent tone of courteous ease,
You have them then to humour as you
please.

First a diploma must belief infuse,
That you in your profession take the lead; 15
You then at once those easy freedoms use,
For which another many a year must
plead;

Learn how to feel with nice address
The dainty wrist; — and how to press, 20
With furtive glance, the slender waist,
To feel how tightly it is lac'd.

STUDENT. There's sense in that! one sees the how and why.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Grey is, young 25 friend, all theory;
And green of life the golden tree.

STUDENT. I swear it seemeth like a dream to me.

May I some future time repeat my visit, 30
To hear on what your rev'rence grounds your views?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Command my humble service when you choose.

STUDENT. Ere I retire, one boon I must 35 solicit:

Here is my album, do not, Sir, deny
This token of your favour.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Willingly.

(He writes and returns the book.) 40

STUDENT (reads). ERITIS SICUT DEUS, SCIENCES BONUM ET MALUM.¹

(He reverently closes the book and retires.)

MEPHISTOPHELES. Let but this ancient 45
proverb be your rule,
My cousin follow still, the wily snake,
And with your likeness to the gods, poor fool,
Ere long be sure your poor sick heart will 50
quake!

FAUST (enters). Whither away?

MEPHISTOPHELES. 'Tis yours
our course to steer.

The world, both great and small, we'll view;

5 With what delight and profit too,
You'll revel through your gay career!

FAUST. But with my length of beard I also need

The easy manners that insure success;
10 Th' attempt I'm certain never can succeed;

To mingle in the world I want address;
I still have an embarrass'd air, and then
I feel myself so small with other men.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Time, my good friend, will all that's needful give;
Gain self-reliance, and you've learned to live.

FAUST. But how do you propose I start,
I pray?

Your horses, servants, carriages, where are they?

MEPHISTOPHELES. We've but to spread our mantles wide.

They'll serve whereon through air to ride.
No heavy baggage need you take,
When we our bold excursion make.
A little gas which I'll prepare
Lifts us from earth: aloft through air
Lightladen, we shall swiftly steer:
I wish you joy of your new life-career.

[*The next is a roistering scene at Auerbach's wine-cellar in Leipsic. Mephistopheles alternately delights and terrifies the assembly with his magic powers. Then follows a scene in a witch's cavern in which Faust is served with a potion that turns his thoughts to love.
In the next scene Faust sees Margaret and obtains from Mephistopheles a promise to secure her for him.*]

Evening. A neat little room.

MARGARET, braiding and binding up her hair.

MARGARET. I would give something now to know,
Who yonder gentleman could be!
He had a gallant air, I trow,
And doubtless was of high degree!
That from his noble brow I told,
Nor would he else have been so bold. (Exit.)

¹ "Ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil," part of the serpent's promise in Gen. iii. 5.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Come in! tread softly! be discreet!

FAUST (after a pause). Begone and leave me, I entreat!

MEPHISTOPHELES (looking round). Not every maiden is so neat. (Exit.)

FAUST (gazing round). Welcome sweet twilight-gloom which reigns,
Through this dim place of hallow'd rest!
Fond yearning love, inspire my breast,
Feeding on hope's sweet dew thy blissful pains.

What stillness here environs me!
Content and order brood around.

What fulness in this poverty!
In this small cell what bliss profound!

(He throws himself on the leather arm-chair beside the bed.)

Receive me! thou, who hast in thine embrace

Welcom'd in joy and grief the ages flown!
How oft the children of a by-gone race
Have cluster'd round this patriarchal throne!

Haply, she, too, as closed each circling year,

For Christmas gift, with grateful joy possess'd,

Hath with the full round cheek of childhood, here,

Her grandsire's wither'd hand devoutly press'd.

Maiden! I feel thy spirit haunt the place,
Breathing of order and abounding grace.

As with a mother's voice it prompteth thee,

Daily the cover o'er the board to spread,

To strew the crisping sand beneath thy tread.

Dear hand! so godlike in its ministry!

The hut becomes a paradise through thee!

And here! (He raises the bed-curtain.)

How thrills my pulse with strange delight!

Here I could linger hours untold;

Thou Nature! didst in vision bright

The embryo angel here unfold.

Here lay the child, her bosom warm

With life, while steep'd in slumber's dew,

To perfect grace, her godlike form,

With pure and hallow'd weavings grew!

And thou! ah here, what seekest thou?

How is thine inmost being troubl'd now!

What would'st thou here? what makes thy heart so sore

Unhappy Faust! I know thee now no more.

Do I a magic atmosphere inhale?

Erewhile, my passion would not brook delay!

Now in a pure love-dream I melt away.

Are we the sport of every passing gale?

Should she return and enter now,

How would'st thou rue thy guilty flame!

Proud vaunter! thou would'st hide thy brow,

And at her feet sink down with shame.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Quick! quick! below I see her there!

FAUST. Away! I will return no more!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Here is a casket, with a store

Of jewels, which I got elsewhere.

Quick! place it here, her press within,

I swear to you 'twill turn her brain;

Another I had thought to win,

With the rich gems it doth contain,

But child is child, and play is play.

FAUST. I know not — shall I?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Do you ask?

Perchance you would retain the treasure?

If such your wish, why then, I say,

Henceforth absolve me from my task,

Nor longer waste your hours of leisure.

I trust you're not by avarice led!

I rub my hands, I scratch my head, —

(He places the casket in the press and closes the lock.)

But now away, without delay! —

The sweet young creature to your will to bend;

Yet here you are, as cold, my friend,

As to the class-room you would wend,

And metaphysics' form were there,

And physics too, with hoary hair!

Away! — (Exeunt.)

MARGARET (with a lamp). Here 'tis so close, so sultry now,

(She opens the window.)

Yet out of doors 'tis not so warm.

I feel so strange, I know not how —

I wish my mother would come home.

Through me there runs a shuddering —

I'm but a foolish timid thing!

(While undressing herself she begins to sing.)

There was a king in Thule,
True even to the grave.
To whom his dying mistress
A golden beaker gave.

Beyond aught else he priz'd it,
And drain'd its purple draught,
His tears came gushing freely
As often as he quaff'd.

When death he felt approaching,
His cities o'er he told;
And grudg'd his heir no treasure
Except his cup of gold.

Girt round with knightly vassals
At a royal feast sat he,
In yon proud hall ancestral,
In his castle o'er the sea.

Up stood the jovial monarch,
And quaff'd his last life's glow,
Then hurl'd the hallow'd goblet
In the ocean depths below.

He saw it splashing, drinking,
And plunging in the sea;
His eyes meanwhile were sinking,
And never more drank he.

(She opens the press to put away her clothes, and perceives the casket.)

How came this casket here? I cannot guess!

'Tis very strange! I'm sure I lock'd the press.

What can be in it? perh'ps some pledge or other,

Left here for money borrow'd from my mother.

Here by a ribbon hangs a little key;

I have a mind to open it and see!

Heavens! only look! what have we here,

Ne'er saw I such a splendid sight!

Jewels a noble dame might wear,

For some high pageant richly dight.

I wonder how the chain would look on me, And whose the brilliant ornaments may be?

(She puts them on and steps before the glass.)

Were but the ear-rings only mine!

Thus one has quite another air.

What boots it to be young and fair?

It doubtless may be very fine;

But then, alas, none come to woo,
And praise sounds half like pity too.
Gold all doth lure,
Gold doth secure
5 All things. Alas, the poor!

Promenade.

10 FAUST, walking thoughtfully up and down.
To him MEPHISTOPHELES.

MEPHISTOPHELES. By love despis'd!
By Hell's fierce fires I curse,
Would I could make my imprecation worse!

15 FAUST. What ails you, pray? what chafes you now so sore?

A face like that I never saw before!

MEPHISTOPHELES. I'd yield me to the devil instantly,

Did it not happen that myself am he!

20 FAUST. There must be some disorder in your wit!

To rave thus like a madman, is it fit?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Just think! The gems for Margaret brought

25 A burly priest hath made his own! —

A glimpse of them the mother caught,

And 'gan with secret fear to groan.

The woman's scent is keen enough;

Still in the prayer book she doth snuff;

30 Smells everything to ascertain

Whether 'tis holy or profane,

And scented in the jewels rare,

That there was not much blessing there.

"My child," she cries, "ill-gotten good

35 Ensnares the soul, consumes the blood.

With them we'll deck our Lady's shrine,

She'll cheer our soul with bread divine!"

At this poor Gretchen 'gan to pout,

'Tis a gift-horse, at least, she thought,

40 And sure, he godless cannot be,

Who placed them there so cleverly.

A priest the mother then address'd,

Who, when he understood the jest,

Survey'd the treasure with a smile.

Quoth he: "This shows a pious mind,

Who conquers, wins. The Church we find

Hath a good stomach, she, erewhile,

Hath lands and kingdoms swallow'd down,

And never yet a surfeit known.

50 Daughters, the Church alone, with zest,

Can such ill-gotten wealth digest."

FAUST. It is a general custom, too.

Practis'd alike by King and Jew.

MEPHISTOPHELES. With that, clasp, chain, and ring, he swept
As they were mushrooms; and the casket,
Without one word of thanks he kept,
As if of nuts it were a basket.
Reward in heaven he promis'd fair; —
And greatly edified they were.

FAUST. And Gretchen?

MEPHISTOPHELES. In unquiet mood
Knows neither what she would nor should; 10
The trinkets night and day thinks o'er,
On him who brought them dwells still
more.

FAUST. Her sorrow grieves me, I must say.

Another set of jewels bring!

The first, methinks, was no great thing.

MEPHISTOPHELES. All's to my gentleman child's play!

FAUST. Plan all things to achieve my 20
end;

Engage the attention of her friend.

To work! A thorough devil be,
And bring fresh jewels instantly!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Ay, sir! Most 25 I fear there's something wrong about the gladly I'll obey.

(FAUST exit.)

MEPHISTOPHELES. Your doting love-sick fool, with ease,
Merely his lady-love to please,
Sun, moon, stars would puff away. (Exit.)

The Neighbor's House.

MARTHA, alone.

MARTHA. God pardon my dear husband, he

Doth not in truth act well tow'rds me!
Forth in the world abroad to roam,
And leave me widow'd here at home.
And yet his will I ne'er did thwart,
God knows I lov'd him from my heart.

(She weeps.)

Perchance he's dead! — oh, wretched state!
Had I but a certificate!

MARGARET (comes).

MARGARET. Dame Martha!

MARTHA. Gretchen?

MARGARET. Only think! 50

My knees beneath me well-nigh sink!

Within my press I've found to-day

Another case of ebony.

And splendid jewels too there are,
More costly than the former, far.

MARTHA. You must not name it to your mother;

5 It would to shrift, just like the other.

MARGARET. Nay look at them! now only see!

MARTHA (dresses her up). You happy creature!

MARGARET. Woe is me!

I can't in them at church appear,

Nor in the street, nor anywhere.

MARTHA. Come often over here to me,
And put them on quite privately.

15 Walk past the glass an hour or so,

Thus we shall have our pleasure too.

Then suitable occasions we must seize,

As at a feast, to show them by degrees.

A chain at first, then ear-drops, — and your mother

Won't see them, or we'll coin some tale or other.

MARGARET. But who, I wonder, could the caskets bring?

25 I fear there's something wrong about the thing! (A knock.)

Good heavens! can that my mother be?

MARTHA (peering through the blind).

No! 'Tis a stranger gentleman, I see.
30 Come in.

MEPHISTOPHELES (enters).

MEPHISTOPHELES. I've ventur'd to intrude to-day.

35 Ladies, excuse the liberty, I pray.

(He steps back respectfully before MARGARET.)

For Mrs. Martha Schwerdtlein, I inquire.

MARTHA. I'm she, pray what have you
40 to say to me?

MEPHISTOPHELES (aside to her). I know you now, — and therefore will retire;

At present you've distinguished company. 45

Pardon the freedom, Madam, with your
leave,

I will make free to call again at eve.

MARTHA (aloud). Why, child, of all strange things I ever knew!

The stranger for a lady taketh you.

MARGARET. I am in truth of humble
blood;

The gentleman is far too good;
Nor gems nor trinkets are my own.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Oh, 'tis not the mere ornaments alone;
Her glance and mien far more betray.
I am rejoic'd that I may stay.

MARTHA. Your business, Sir? I long to know —

MEPHISTOPHELES. Would I could happier tidings show!

But let me not my errand rue;
Your husband's dead, and greeteth you.

MARTHA. Is dead? True heart! Oh, misery!

My husband dead! Oh, I shall die!

MARGARET. Alas! good Martha! don't despair!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Now listen to the sad affair!

MARGARET. I for this cause should fear 20
to love.

The loss my certain death would prove.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Joy still must sorrow, sorrow joy attend.

MARTHA. Proceed, and tell the story of 25
his end!

[Mephistopheles then elaborates the story of the death of Martha's husband and finally persuades her to meet him and bring with her Margaret to meet Faust.]

Garden.

MARGARET on FAUST'S arm, MARTHA with MEPHISTOPHELES walking up and down.

MARGARET. I feel it, you but spare my 35
ignorance,

To put me to the blush you stoop thus low.
Travellers are ever wont from complaisance,

To make the best of things where'er they 40
go.

My humble prattle surely never can
Have power to entertain so wise a man.

FAUST. One glance, one word of thine doth charm me more,
Than the world's wisdom or the sage's lore. (He kisses her hand.)

MARGARET. Nay! trouble not yourself!
how can you kiss

A hand so very coarse and hard as this!
What work am I not still oblig'd to do!
And then my mother's so exacting too.

(They pass on.)

MARTHA. Thus are you ever wont to travel, pray?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Duty and business urge us on our way.

5 Full many a place indeed we leave with
pain,

At which we're not permitted to remain!

MARTHA. In youth's wild years, with lusty vigour crown'd,

10 'Tis not amiss thus through the world to sweep;

But ah, the evil days at length come round,
And to the grave a bachelor to creep,

No one as yet hath good or pleasant found.

15 MEPHISTOPHELES. The distant prospect fills me with dismay.

MARTHA. Therefore, in time, dear sir, reflect, I pray. (They pass on.)

MARGARET. Still are the absent out of mind, 'tis true!

Politeness is familiar, sir, to you,

But many friends you have, who doubtless are

More sensible than I, and wiser far.

FAUST. My angel, often what doth pass for sense

Is self-conceit and narrowness.

MARGARET. How so?

FAUST. Simplicity and holy innocence, —

30 When will ye learn your hallow'd worth to
know?

Ah, when will meekness and humility,

Kind and all-bounteous nature's loftiest
dower —

MARGARET. Only one little moment think of me,

To think of you I shall have many an hour.

FAUST. You're doubtless much alone?

MARGARET. Why yes, for though
Our household's small, yet I must see to it.
We keep no maid, and I must sew, and knit,

45 And cook and sweep, and hurry to and fro;
And then my mother is so accurate!

Not that for thrift there is such pressing
need,

Than others we might make more show indeed:

50 My father left behind a small estate,
A house and garden just outside the town.
Quiet enough my life has been of late.

My only brother for a soldier's gone;
My little sister's dead; the babe to rear
Occasion'd me some care and fond annoy;
But I would go through all again with joy,
The little darling was to me so dear.

FAUST. An angel, sweet, if it resembled
you!

MARGARET. I reared it up, and soon my face it knew.

Dearly the little creature lov'd me too. 10
After my father's death it saw the day;
We gave my mother up for lost, she lay
In such a wretched plight, and then at length

So very slowly she regain'd her strength. 15
Weak as she was, 'twas vain for her to try Herself to suckle the poor babe, so I
Rear'd it on bread and water all alone.

And thus the child became as 'twere my
own.

Within my arms it stretch'd itself and grew,

And smiling, nestl'd in my bosom too.

FAUST. Doubtless the purest happiness was yours.

MARGARET. Oh yes — but also many weary hours.

Beside my bed at night its cradle stood;
If it but stirr'd, I was at once awake,
One while I was oblig'd to give it food,
Or with me into bed the darling take,
Then, if it would not hush, I had to rise,
And strive with fond caress to still its cries,
Pacing the little chamber to and fro;
And then at dawn to washing I must go,
See to the house affairs, and market too,
And so, from day to day, the whole year
through.

Ah, sir, thus living, it must be confess'd
One's spirits are not always of the best;
But toil gives food and sleep a double zest.

(They pass on.)

MARTHA. Poor women! we are badly off, I own;

A bachelor's conversion's hard, indeed! 45

MEPHISTOPHELES. Madam, with one like you it rests alone,

To tutor me a better course to lead.

MARTHA. But tell me! no one have you ever met?

Has your heart ne'er attach'd itself as yet?

MEPHISTOPHELES. One's own fire-side, and a good wife, we're told

By the old proverb, are worth pearls and gold.

MARTHA. I mean has passion never fir'd your breast?

5 MEPHISTOPHELES. I've everywhere been well receiv'd, I own.

MARTHA. Yet hath your heart no earnest preference known?

MEPHISTOPHELES. With ladies one should ne'er presume to jest.

MARTHA. Ah! you mistake!

MEPHISTOPHELES. I'm sorry I'm so blind!

But this I know — that you are very kind.
(They pass on.)

FAUST. So, little angel, in the garden
when

I enter'd first, you knew me once again?

MARGARET. Did you not see it? I cast down my eyes.

FAUST. And you forgive my boldness, and the guise

Of freedom towards you, as you left the dome,

25 The day I offer'd to escort you home?

MARGARET. I was confus'd, never until that day

Could any one of me aught evil say.

Alas, thought I, he doubtless in your mien,

30 Something unmaidenly or bold hath seen?

It seemed as if it struck him suddenly,

"Here's just a girl with whom one may make free."

Yet I must own that then I scarcely knew 35 What in your favour here began to plead;

Yet I was angry with myself indeed,

That I more angry could not feel with
you.

FAUST. Sweet love!

MARGARET. Just wait!

(She gathers a star-flower and plucks off the leaves one after another.)

FAUST. A nosegay may that be?

MARGARET. No! 'Tis a game.

FAUST. How?

MARGARET. Go! you'll laugh at me.

(She plucks off the leaves and murmurs to herself.)

FAUST. What murmur you?

MARGARET (half aloud). He loves me,
— loves me not.

FAUST. Sweet angel, with thy face of heav'nly bliss!

MARGARET (continues). He loves me,
— loves me not —

(Plucking off the last leaf with fond joy.)
He loves me!

FAUST. Yes!

And this flower-language, darling, let it be,
E'en as a heav'nly oracle to thee!

Know'st thou the meaning of, "He loveth me"? (He seizes both her hands.)

MARGARET. I tremble so!

FAUST. Nay! do not tremble, love!
Oh, let this pressure, let this glance reveal
Feelings, all power of utterance far above;
To give oneself up wholly and to feel

A rapturous joy that must eternal prove!
Eternal! — Yes, its end would be despair.
No end! — It cannot end!

(MARGARET presses his hand; extricates herself, and runs away. He stands a moment in thought, and then follows her.)

MARTHA (approaching). Night's closing.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Yes, we'll presently away.

MARTHA. I would entreat you longer
yet to stay,

But 'tis a wicked place, just here about.

'Tis as the folks had nought to do,

And nothing else to think of too,

But watch their neighbours, who goes in and out;

And scandal's busy still, do what one may.
And our young couple?

MEPHISTOPHELES. They have flown up
there,

Gay butterflies!

MARTHA. He seems to take to her.

MEPHISTOPHELES. And she to him.
'Tis of the world the way.

A Summer-House.

MARGARET runs in, hides behind the door, holds the tip of her finger to her lip, and peeps through the crevice.

MARGARET. He comes!

FAUST. Ah, little rogue, so thou Think'st to provoke me! I have caught thee now! (He kisses her.)

MARGARET (embracing him, and returning the kiss). Dearest of men! I love thee from my heart!

MEPHISTOPHELES (knocks).

FAUST (stamping). Who's there?

MEPHISTOPHELES. A friend!

5 FAUST. A brute!

MEPHISTOPHELES. 'Tis time to part.

MARTHA (comes). Yes, sir, 'tis late.

FAUST. Mayn't I attend you, sweet?

MARGARET. Oh no — my mother would — adieu, adieu!

FAUST. And must I really then take leave of you?

Farewell!

MARTHA. Good-bye!

MARGARET. Ere long again to meet!
(Exeunt FAUST and MEPHISTOPHELES.)

MARGARET. Good heavens! how all things far and near

Must fill his mind, — a man like this!

Abash'd before him I appear,

And say to all things only, yes.

Poor simple child, I cannot see,

What 'tis that he can find in me. (Exit.)

Forest and Cavern.

FAUST, alone.

FAUST. Spirit sublime! Thou gav'st me, gav'st me all

For which I prayed. Not vainly hast thou turn'd

To me thy countenance in flaming fire.

Thou gav'st me glorious nature for my 35 realm,

And also power to feel her and enjoy.

Not merely with a cold and wond'ring
glance,

Thou dost permit me in her depths pro-
40 found,

As in the bosom of a friend to gaze.

Before me thou dost lead her living tribes,

And dost in silent grove, in air and stream 45 Teach me to know my kindred. And when roars

The howling storm-blast through the groaning wood,

Wrenching the giant pine, which in its fall
Sweeps, crushing down, its neighbour

trunks and boughs,

While with the hollow noise the hill re-sounds,

Then thou dost lead me to some shelter'd cave,

Dost there reveal me to myself, and show
Of my own bosom the mysterious depths.
And when, with soothing beam, the moon's pale orb

Full in my view climbs up the pathless
sky,

From crag and vap'rous grove, the silv'ry forms

Of by-gone ages hover, and assuage
The too severe delight of earnest thought.

Oh, that nought perfect is assign'd to man,
I feel, alas! With this exalted joy,

Which lifts me near and nearer to the gods,
Thou gav'st me this companion, unto whom

I needs must cling, though cold and insolent;

He still degrades me to myself, and turns
Thy glorious gifts to nothing, with a breath.

He in my bosom with malicious zeal
For that fair image fans a raging fire;
From craving to enjoyment thus I reel,
And in enjoyment languish for desire.

(MEPHISTOPHELES enters.)

MEPHISTOPHELES. Of this lone life have you not had your fill?

How for so long can it have charms for 30
you?

'Tis well enough to try it if you will;

But then away again to something new!

FAUST. Would you could better occupy your leisure,

Than in disturbing thus my hours of joy.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Well! Well! I'll leave you to yourself with pleasure.

A serious tone you hardly dare employ;
To part from one so crazy, harsh, and 40
cross,

I should not find methinks a grievous loss.
The live-long day, for you I toil and fret.
Ne'er from your worship's face a hint I get,
What pleases you, or what to let alone.

FAUST. Ay truly! that is just the proper tone!

Tires me, forsooth, and would with thanks be paid!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Poor child of clay, 50
without my aid,

How would thy weary days have flown?

Thee of thy foolish whims I've cur'd,

Thy vain imaginations banish'd,
And but for me, be well assur'd,
Thou from this sphere must soon have vanish'd.

5 In rocky cleft and cavern drear
Why like an owl sit moping here?
And wherefore suck, like any toad,
From dripping rocks and moss thy food?
A pleasant pastime! Verily,
10 The doctor cleaveth still to thee.

FAUST. Couldst thou divine what bliss without alloy

From this wild wand'ring in the desert
springs, —

15 Couldst thou but guess the new life-power
it brings,

Thou still wert fiend enough to grudge my joy.

MEPHISTOPHELES. What super-earthly ecstasy! at night,

20 To lie in darkness on the dewy height,
Embracing heaven and earth in rapture
high,

The soul dilating to a deity,

25 With prescient yearnings pierce the core of earth,

Feel in your labouring breast the six-days'
birth,

Enjoy, in proud delight what no one knows,

While your love-rapture o'er creation flows, —

The earthly lost in beatific vision,

And then the lofty intuition —

35 (With a gesture.)
I need not tell you how — to close.

FAUST. Fie on you!

MEPHISTOPHELES. This displeases you?
"For shame!"

40 You are forsooth entitl'd to exclaim.

We to chaste ears it seems must not impart

Thoughts that may dwell unquestion'd in the heart.

45 Well, to be brief, as fit occasions rise,

I grudge you not the joy of specious lies.

But soon 'tis past, the self-deluding vein;

Back to your former course you're driven
again,

And, should it longer hold, your anguish'd
breast

By frenzied horror soon would be possess'd.

Enough of this! Your true love dwells apart,
And every thing to her seems flat and tame.

Alone your cherish'd image fills her heart,
She loves you with an all-devouring flame.
First came your passion with o'erpowering
rush,

Like mountain torrent, fed by melted snow,
Full in her heart you pour'd the sudden
gush,

And now again your stream has ceas'd to flow.

Instead of sitting thron'd midst forests
wild,

Methinks it would become so great a lord,
Fondly to comfort the enamour'd child,
And the young monkey for her love reward.

To her the hours seem miserably long;
She from the window sees the clouds float
by

As o'er the ancient city-walls they fly.

"Were I a bird," so runs her song,

Half through the night and all the day.

One while, indeed, she seemeth gay,

And then with grief her heart is sore;

Fairly outwept seem now her tears,

Anon she tranquil is, or so appears,

And love-sick evermore.

FAUST. Snake! Serpent vile!

MEPHISTOPHELES (aside). Good! If I catch thee with my guile!

FAUST. Vile reprobate! go get thee
hence,

Forbear the lovely girl to name!

Nor in my half-distracted sense,

Kindle anew the smould'ring flame!

MEPHISTOPHELES. How now! She thinks you've taken flight;

It seems, she's partly in the right.

FAUST. I'm near her still — and should
I distant rove,

I'd ne'er forget her, ne'er resign her love;

And all things touch'd by those sweet lips 45
of hers,

Even the very host, my envy stirs.

MEPHISTOPHELES. 'Tis well! I oft have envied you indeed,

The twin-pair, that among the roses feed. 50

FAUST. Pander, avant!

MEPHISTOPHELES. My friend, the while
You rail, excuse me if I smile;

The power which fashion'd youth and maid,

Well understood the noble trade,

Of making also time and place.

5 But hence! — in truth a doleful case!

Your mistress' chamber doth invite,

Not the cold grave's o'ershadowing night.

FAUST. What in her arms the joys of heaven to me?

10 Oh, let me kindle on her gentle breast!

Do I not ever feel her misery?

Wretch that I am, whose spirit knows no
rest,

Inhuman monster, homeless and unblest,

15 Who, like the greedy surge, from rock to rock,

Sweeps down the dread abyss with des-p'rate shock

While she, within her lowly cot, which grac'd

The Alpine slope, beside the waters wild,

Her homely cares in that small world em-brac'd,

Secluded lived, a simple artless child.

25 Was't not enough, in thy delirious whirl

To blast the steadfast rocks, — her quiet cell,

Her too, her peace, to ruin must I hurl!

Dost claim this holocaust, remorseless

30 Hell!

Fiend, help me to cut short the hours of dread!

Let what must happen, happen speedily!

Her direful doom fall crushing on my head,

35 And into ruin let her plunge with me.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Why how again it seethes and glows!

Away, thou fool! Her torment ease!

When such a head no issue sees,

40 It pictures straight the final close.

Long life to him who boldly dares!

A devil's pluck you're wont to show;

As for a devil who despairs,

There's nought so mawkish here below.

MARGARET'S Room.

MARGARET (alone at her spinning wheel).

My heart's oppress'd,

My peace is o'er;

I know no rest,

No, nevermore.

The world's a grave
Where he is not;
And grief is now
My bitter lot.

My wilder'd brain
Is overwrought;
My feeble senses
Are distraught.

My heart's oppress'd,
My peace is o'er;
I know no rest,
No, nevermore.

For him I watch
The live-long day,
For him alone
Abroad I stray.

His lofty step,
His bearing high,
The smile of his lip,
The power of his eye,

His witching words,
Their tones of bliss,
His hand's fond pressure,
And then, his kiss!

My heart's oppress'd,
My peace is o'er,
I know no rest,
No, nevermore.

My bosom aches
To feel him near.
Ah, could I clasp
And fold him here!

In love's fond blisses
Entranc'd I'd lie,
And die on his kisses,
In ecstasy!

MARTHA'S Garden.

MARGARET and FAUST.

MARGARET. Promise me, Henry!

FAUST. What I can!

MARGARET. How is it with religion in your mind?

You are 'tis true a good, kind-hearted man,
But I'm afraid not piously inclin'd.

FAUST. Forbear! I love you darling, you alone!

For those I love, my life I would lay down,
And none would of their faith or church
bereave.

MARGARET. That's not enough, we must ourselves believe.

FAUST. Must we?

MARGARET. Ah, could I but your soul
5 inspire!

You honour not the sacraments, alas!

FAUST. I honour them.

MARGARET. But yet without desire.
'Tis long since you have been to shrift or 10 mass.

Do you believe in God?

FAUST. My love, forbear!
Who dares acknowledge, I in God believe?
Ask priest or sage, the answer you receive 15 Seems but a mockery of the questioner.

MARGARET. Then you do not believe?

FAUST. Sweet one! my meaning do not misconceive!

Him who dare name
20 And yet proclaim,
Yes, I believe?

Who that can feel,
His heart can steel,
To say: I disbelieve?

25 The All-embracer,

All-sustainer,
Doth He not embrace, sustain
Thee, me, himself?

Lifts not the Heaven its dome above?
30 Doth not the firm-set earth beneath us lie?

And, beaming tenderly with looks of love,
Climb not the everlasting stars on high?
Are we not gazing in each other's eyes?

35 Nature's impenetrable agencies,
Are they not thronging on thy heart and
brain,

Viewless, or visible to mortal ken,
Around thee weaving their mysterious
40 reign?

Fill thence thy heart, how large soe'er it be,
And in the feeling when thou'rt wholly
blest,

Then call it what thou wilt, — Bliss!
Heart! Love! God!

I have no name for it — 'tis feeling all.
Name is but sound and smoke
Shrouding the glow of heaven.

MARGARET. All this is doubtless beautiful and true;

50 The priest doth also much the same declare,
Only in somewhat diff'rent language too.

FAUST. Beneath Heaven's genial sunshine, everywhere,
This is the utterance of the human heart;
Each in his language doth the like impart;
Then why not I in mine?

MARGARET. What thus I hear
Sounds plausible, yet I'm not reconcil'd;
There's something wrong about it; much
I fear

That thou art not a Christian.

FAUST. My sweet child!

MARGARET. Alas! it long hath sorely troubl'd me,
To see thee in such odious company.

FAUST. How so?

MARGARET. The man who comes with thee I hate,
Yea, in my spirit's inmost depths abhor;
As his loath'd visage, in my life before,
Nought to my heart e'er gave a pang so great.

FAUST. Fear not, sweet love!

MARGARET. His presence chills my blood.
Towards all beside I have a kindly mood;
Yet, though I yearn to gaze on thee, I feel
At sight of him strange horror o'er me
steal;

That he's a villain my conviction's strong,
May Heaven forgive me if I do him wrong!

FAUST. Yet such strange fellows in the world must be!

MARGARET. I would not live with such an one as he.

If for a moment he but enter here,
He looks around him with a mocking sneer,
And malice ill-conceal'd.

That he can feel no sympathy is clear,
Upon his brow 'tis legibly reveal'd,
That to his heart no living soul is dear.
So blest I feel, abandon'd in thine arms,
So warm and happy, — free from all
alarms,

And still my heart doth close when he comes near.

FAUST. Foreboding angel! prithee check thy fear!

MARGARET. The feeling so o'erpowers
my mind, that when,
Or wheresoe'er, I chance his step to hear,
Methinks almost I cease to love thee then.
Besides, when he is near I ne'er could
pray,

And this it is that eats my heart away;
Thou also, Henry, surely feel'st it so.

FAUST. This is antipathy!

MARGARET. I now must go.

5 FAUST. And may I never then in quiet
rest,

For one brief hour, upon thy gentle
breast?

10 MARGARET. Ah, if I slept alone! The door to-night

I'd leave unbarr'd; but mother's sleep is
light;

And if she should by any chance awake,
Upon the floor I should at once fall dead.

15 FAUST. Sweet angel! there's no cause for dread,

Here is a little phial — if she take
But three drops mingl'd in her drink,
'twill steep

Her nature in a deep and soothing sleep.

MARGARET. What is there I'd not do for thy dear sake:

To her 'twill surely do no injury?

FAUST. Else, my own love, should I thus counsel thee?

MARGARET. Gazing on thee, belov'd, I cannot tell,

What doth my spirit to thy will compel;
So much I have already done for thee,
That more to do there scarce remains for me. (Exit.)

MEPHISTOPHELES (enters).

MEPHISTOPHELES. The monkey! Has she left you then?

FAUST. Have you been spying here
again?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Of all that pass'd
I'm well appriz'd,

40 I heard the doctor catechis'd,
And trust he'll profit by the rede.
The girls show always much concern,
Touching their lover's faith, to learn
Whether it tallies with the creed.

45 If men are pliant there, think they,
Us too, they'll follow and obey.

FAUST. Thou monster! thou canst not perceive

How a true loving soul, like this,
Full of the faith she doth believe
To be the pledge of endless bliss,
Must mourn, her soul with anguish tost,
Thinking the man she loves for ever lost.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Most sensual super-sensualist! a flirt,
 A gipsy, leads thee by the nose!
 FAUST. Abortion vile of fire and dirt!
 MEPHISTOPHELES. In physiognomy strange skill she shows;
 She in my presence feels she knows not how,
 My mask it seems some hidden sense reveals,
 That I'm a genius she must needs allow.
 That I'm the very devil perhaps she feels.
 So then to-night? —
 FAUST. What's that to you?
 MEPHISTOPHELES. I've my amusement in it too!

At the Well.

MARGARET and BESSY, with pitchers.

BESSY. And have you then of Barbara nothing heard?
 MARGARET. I rarely go from home, — no, not a word.
 BESSY. 'Tis true: Sybilla told me so to-day!
 She's play'd the fool at last, I promise you;
 That comes of pride.
 MARGARET. How so?
 BESSY. Why people say
 That when she eats and drinks she feedeth two.
 MARGARET. Alas!
 BESSY. She's rightly served, in sooth.
 How long she hung upon the youth!
 What promenades, what jaunts there were,
 To dancing booth and village fair,
 The first she everywhere must shine,
 He treating her to cakes and wine.
 Of her good looks she was so vain,
 And e'en his presents would retain.
 Sweet words and kisses came anon,
 And then the virgin flower was gone!
 MARGARET. Poor thing!
 BESSY. And do you pity her?
 Why of a night, when at our wheels we sat,
 Abroad our mothers ne'er would let us stir,
 Then with her lover she forsooth must chat,
 Or near the bench, or in the dusky walk,

Thinking the hours too brief for their sweet talk;
 Beshrew me! her proud head she'll have to bow,
 And in white sheet do penance now!
 MARGARET. But he will surely marry her?
 BESSY. Not he!
 He won't be such a fool! a gallant lad
 Like him can roam o'er land and sea,
 Besides, he's off.
 MARGARET. That is not fair!
 BESSY. If she should get him, 'twere almost as bad;
 Her myrtle wreath the boys would tear;
 And then we girls would plague her too,
 Chopp'd straw before her door we'd strew!
 (Exit.)

MARGARET (walking towards home). How stoutly once I could inveigh,
 If a poor maiden went astray!
 Not words enough my tongue could find,
 'Gainst others' sin to speak my mind!
 How black soe'er their fault before,
 I strove to blacken it still more,
 And did myself securely bless.
 Now are the sin, the scandal, mine!
 Yet ah! — what urg'd me to transgress,
 Heaven knows, was good! ah, so divine!

ZWINGER. In the niche of the wall a devotional image of the Mater dolorosa, with flower-pots before it.

MARGARET (putting fresh flowers in the pots).
 MARGARET. Ah, rich in sorrow, thou,
 Stoop thy maternal brow,
 And mark with pitying eye my misery!
 The sword in thy pierc'd heart,
 Thou dost with bitter smart
 Gaze upwards on thy Son's death agony.

To the dear God on high,
 Ascends thy piteous sigh,
 Pleading for his and thy mute misery.
 Ah, who can know
 The torturing woe
 That harrows me, and racks me to the bone.
 How my poor heart, without relief,

Trembles and throbs, its yearning grief
Thou knowest, thou alone!

Ah, wheresoe'er I go,
With woe, with woe, with woe,
My anguish'd breast is aching!
Wretched, alone I keep,
I weep, I weep, I weep,
Alas! my heart is breaking!

The flower-pots at my window
Were wet with tears of mine,
The while I pluck'd these blossoms
At dawn to deck thy shrine!

When early in my chamber
Shone bright the rising morn,
I sat there on my pallet,
My heart with anguish torn.

Help! death and shame are near!
Mother of sorrows, now
Stoop thy maternal brow,
And to thy suppliant turn a gracious ear.

Night. Street before MARGARET'S door.

VALENTINE (soldier, MARGARET'S brother).

VALENTINE. When seated 'mong the jovial crowd
Where merry comrades boasting loud,
Each nam'd with pride his favourite lass,
And in her honour drain'd his glass;
Upon my elbows I would lean,
With easy quiet view the scene,
Nor give my tongue the rein, until
Each swagg'ring blade had talk'd his fill.
Then with a smile my beard I'd stroke;
The while, with brimming glass, I spoke;
"Each to his taste! — but to my mind,
Where in the country will you find,
A maiden, be she ne'er so fair,
Who with my Gretchen can compare?"
Cling! Clang! so rang the jovial sound!
Shouts of assent went circling round;
Pride of her sex is she! — cried some;
Then were the noisy boasters dumb.

And now! — I could uproot my hair,
Or dash my brains out in despair!
Me every scurvy knave may twit,
With stinging jest and taunting sneer!

Like skulking debtor I must sit,
And sweat each casual word to hear!
And though I smash'd them one and all,
Yet them I could not liars call.

5 Who comes this way? who's sneaking here?
If I mistake not, two draw near.
If he be one, have at him; — well I wot
Alive he shall not leave this spot!

10 FAUST, MEPHISTOPHELES.

FAUST. How from yon sacristy, athwart the night,
Its beams the ever-burning taper throws,
While, ever waning, fades the glimm'ring
15 light,
As gath'ring darkness doth around it close!
So night-like gloom doth in my bosom
reign.

20 MEPHISTOPHELES. I'm like a tom-cat
in a thievish vein,
That round the walls doth slyly creep,
And up fire-ladders tall, and steep;
Virtuous withal I feel, with, I confess,
25 A touch of thievish joy and wantonness.
Thus through my limbs already there doth
bound

The glorious advent of Walpurgis night;
After to-morrow it again comes round,
30 What one doth wake for then one knows aright.

FAUST. Meanwhile, the flame which I see glimm'ring there,
Is it the treasure rising in the air?

35 MEPHISTOPHELES. Ere long, I make no doubt, but you
To raise the chest will feel inclin'd;
Erewhile I peep'd within it too,
With lion-dollars 'tis well lin'd.

40 FAUST. And not a trinket? not a ring?
Wherewith my lovely girl to deck?

MEPHISTOPHELES. I saw among them
some such thing,
A string of pearls to grace her neck.

45 FAUST. 'Tis well! I'm always loath to go,

Without some gift my love to show.

MEPHISTOPHELES. Some pleasures grattis to enjoy,
50 Should surely cause you no annoy.
While bright with stars the heavens appear,

I'll sing a masterpiece of art.
A moral song shall charm her ear,
More surely to beguile her heart.

(Sings to the guitar.)

Fair Catherine say,
Why ling'ring stay
At dawn of day
Before your lover's door?
You enter there,
A maid, beware,
Lest forth you fare,
A maiden never more.

Maiden take heed!
Reck well my rede!
Is't done, the deed?
Good night, you poor, poor thing!
The spoiler's lies,
His arts despise,
Nor yield your prize,
Without the marriage ring.

VALENTINE (steps forward). Whom are you luring here? I'll give it you!
Accursed rat-catchers, your strains I'll end!

First, to the devil the guitar I'll send!
Then to the devil with the singer too!

MEPHISTOPHELES. The poor guitar!
'Tis done for now.

VALENTINE. Your skull shall follow next, I trow!

MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUST). Doctor, stand fast! your strength collect!

Be prompt, and do as I direct.

Out with your whisk! keep close, I pray.
I'll parry! do you thrust away!

VALENTINE. Then parry that!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Why not?

VALENTINE. That too!

MEPHISTOPHELES. With ease!

VALENTINE. The devil fights for you!
Why how is this? my hand's already lam'd!

MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUST). Thrust
home!

VALENTINE (falls). Alas!

MEPHISTOPHELES. There! Now the bully's tam'd.

But quick, away! We must at once take wing.

A cry of murder strikes upon the ear.
With the police I know my course to steer,
But with the blood-ban 'tis another thing.

MARTHA (at the window). Without!
without!

MARGARET (at the window). Quick, bring a light!

5 MARTHA (as above). They rail and scuffle, scream and fight!

PEOPLE. One lieth here already dead!

MARTHA (coming out). Where are the murderers? are they fled?

10 MARGARET (coming out). Who lieth
here?

PEOPLE. Thy mother's son.

MARGARET. Almighty Father! I'm undone!

15 VALENTINE. I'm dying! 'Tis a soon-told tale!

And sooner done the deed!

Why, women, do ye weep and wail?

To my last words give heed. (All gather round him.)

20 Gretchen, thou'rt still of tender age,

And, well I wot, not over sage,

Thou dost thy matters ill.

Let this in confidence be said:

25 She who the path of shame doth tread

Should tread it with good will.

MARGARET. My God! what can this mean?

VALENTINE. Abstain,

30 Nor dare God's holy name profane.

What's done, alas, is done and past!

Matters will take their course at last!

By stealth thou dost begin with one,

And more will follow him anon;

35 When to a dozen swells the train,

A common outcast thou'lt remain.

When first the monster shame is born,

Clandestinely she's brought to light,

40 And the mysterious veil of night

Around her head is drawn.

The loathsome birth men fain would slay!

But soon, full grown, she waxes bold,

And though not fairer to behold,

45 With brazen front insults the day.

The more abhorr'd her visage grows,

The more her hideousness she shows!

The time already I discern,

50 When thee all honest men will spurn,

And shun thy hated form to meet,

As when a corpse infects the street.

Thy heart will sink in blank despair,

When they shall look thee in the face!
 A golden chain no more thou'lt wear!
 Nor near the altar take thy place!
 In fair lace collar simply dight
 Thou'lt dance no more with spirits light!
 In darksome corners thou wilt bide,
 Where beggars vile and cripples hide;
 And e'en though God thy crime forgive
 On earth, a thing accurs'd, thou'lt live.

MARTHA. Your parting soul to God 10 commend;

Nor your last breath in slander spend.

VALENTINE. Could I but reach thy wither'd frame,
 Thou wretched beldame, void of shame! 15
 Full measure I might hope to win
 Of pardon then for every sin.

MARGARET. Brother! what agonizing
 pain!

VALENTINE. I tell thee! from vain tears 20 abstain!

'Twas thy dishonour pierc'd my heart;
 Thy fall the fatal death-stab gave.
 Through the death-sleep I now depart
 To God, a soldier true and brave. (Dies.) 25

Cathedral. Service, Organ, and Anthem.

MARGARET amongst a number of people.

EVIL-SPIRIT (behind MARGARET).

EVIL-SPIRIT. How diff'rent, Gretchen, was it once with thee,
 When thou, still full of innocence,
 Cam'st to the altar here,
 And from the small and well-conn'd book
 Did'st lisp thy prayer,
 Half childish sport,
 Half God in thy young heart!
 Gretchen!
 What thoughts are thine?
 What deed of shame
 Lurks in thy sinful heart? 40
 Is thy prayer utter'd for thy mother's soul,
 Who into long, long torment slept through
 thee?

Whose blood is on thy threshold?

— And stirs there not already 'neath thy 45
 heart

Another quick'ning pulse, that even now

Tortures itself and thee
 With its foreboding presence?

MARGARET. Woe! Woe!

Oh, could I free me from the harrowing
 5 thoughts

That 'gainst my will
 Throng my disorder'd brain!

CHORUS

*Dies iræ, dies illa,
 Solvet sæclum in favilla.¹*

(The organ sounds.)

EVIL-SPIRIT. Grim horror seizes thee!
 The trumpet sounds,
 The graves are shaken! 15
 And thy sinful heart,
 From its cold ashy rest
 For torturing flames
 Anew created,

Trembles into life!

MARGARET. Would I were hence!

It is as if the organ
 Chok'd my breath,
 As if the choir

Melted my inmost heart. 25

CHORUS

*Judex ergo cum sedebit,
 Quidquid latet adparebit,
 Nil inultum remanebit.²*

30 MARGARET. I feel oppress'd!
 The pillars of the wall
 Are closing round me!
 And the vaulted roof
 Weighs down upon me! — air!

35 EVIL-SPIRIT. Wouldst hide thee? sin and shame

Remain not hidden.

Air! light!

Woe's thee!

CHORUS

*Quid sum miser tunc dicturus
 Quem patronum rogaturus!
 Cum vix justus sit securus.³*

EVIL-SPIRIT. The glorified their faces turn

Away from thee!

¹ "On that day of wrath the world will disintegrate into ashes."

² "When the judge shall be seated, whatever is hidden will be revealed; nothing will remain unavenged."

³ "Unhappy then, what can I say? What protector may I call upon, when even the righteous tremble?"

Shudder the pure to reach
 Their hands to thee!
 Woe!

CHORUS

Quid sum miser tunc dicturus

MARGARET. Neighbour! your smelling bottle! (She swoons away.)

[At this point intervenes the grotesque interlude of the Walpurgis-Night celebration in the Hartz mountains. Faust and his guide Mephistopheles witness a horrifying pageant of evil forces.]

A gloomy Day. A Plain.

FAUST and MEPHISTOPHELES.

FAUST. In misery! despairing! long wandering pitifully on the face of the earth and now imprison'd! This gentle hapless creature, immur'd in the dungeon as a malefactor and reserved for horrid tortures! That it should come to this! To this! — Perfidious, worthless spirit, and this thou hast concealed from me! — Stand! ay, stand! roll in malicious rage thy fiendish eyes! Stand and brave me with thine insupportable presence! Imprison'd! In hopeless misery! delivered over to the power of evil spirits and the judgment of unpitying humanity! And me, the while, thou wert lulling with tasteless dissipations! — concealing from me her growing anguish, and leaving her to perish without help!

MEPHISTOPHELES. She is not the first.

FAUST. Hound! Execrable monster! Back with him, O thou infinite spirit! back with the reptile into his dog's shape, in which it was his wont to scamper before me at eventide, to roll before the feet of the harmless wanderer, and to fasten on his shoulders when he fell. Change him again into his favourite shape, that he may crouch on his belly before me in the dust, whilst I spurn him with my foot, the reprobate! — Not the first! — Woe! Woe! By no human soul is it conceivable that more than one human creature has ever sunk into a depth of wretchedness like this, or that the first, in her writhing death-agony, should not have atoned in the sight of all-pardoning Heaven, for the guilt of all the rest! The misery of this one pierces me to the very marrow, and harrows up my soul; thou art grinning calmly over the doom of thousands!

MEPHISTOPHELES. Now we are once again at our wit's end, just where the o'erstrained reason of you mortals snaps. Why dost thou seek our fellowship, if thou canst not go through with it? Would'st fly, and art not proof against dizziness? Do we force ourselves on thee, or thou on us?

FAUST. Cease thus to gnash thy ravenous fangs at me! I loathe thee! — Great and glorious spirit, thou who didst vouchsafe to reveal thyself unto me, thou who dost know my very heart and soul, why hast thou linked me with this base associate, who feeds on mischief and revels in destruction?

MEPHISTOPHELES. Hast done?

FAUST. Save her! or woe to thee! The direst of curses on thee for thousands of years!

MEPHISTOPHELES. I cannot loose the bands of the avenger, nor withdraw his bolts. — Save her! — Who was it plunged her into perdition? I or thou?

FAUST (looks wildly around).

MEPHISTOPHELES. Would'st grasp the thunder? Well for you, poor mortals, that 'tis not yours to wield! To smite to atoms the being however innocent, who obstructs his path, such is the tyrant's fashion of relieving himself in difficulties.

FAUST. Convey me thither! She shall be free!

MEPHISTOPHELES. And the danger to which thou dost expose thyself? Know, the guilt of blood, shed by thy hand, lies yet upon the town. Over the place where fell the murdered one, avenging spirits hover and watch for the returning murderer.

FAUST. This too from thee? The death and downfall of a world be on thee, monster! Conduct me thither, I say, and set her free!

MEPHISTOPHELES. I will conduct thee, and what I can do, — hear! Have I all power in heaven and upon earth? I'll cloud the senses of the warder, — do thou possess thyself of the keys and lead her forth with human hand. I will keep watch! The magic steeds are waiting, I bear thee off. Thus much is in my power.

FAUST. Up and away!

Night. An open Plain.

FAUST, MEPHISTOPHELES, rushing along on black horses.

FAUST. What weave they round the Ravenstone?

MEPHISTOPHELES. I know not what they shape and brew.

FAUST. They're soaring, swooping, bending, stooping.

MEPHISTOPHELES. A witches' pack.

FAUST. They charm, they strew.

MEPHISTOPHELES. On! On!

Dungeon.

FAUST, with a bunch of keys and a lamp before a small door.

FAUST. A fear unwonted o'er my spirit falls;

Man's concentrated woe o'erwhelms me here;

She dwells immur'd within these dripping walls:

Her only trespass a delusion dear!

And thou dost linger at the fatal door!

Thou dread'st to look upon her face once more!

On! While thou dalliest, draws her death-hour near.

(He seizes the lock. Singing within.)

My mother, the harlot,

She took me and slew!

My father, the scoundrel,

Hath eaten me too!

My sweet little sister

Hath all my bones laid,

Where soft winds are playing

All in the green shade;

Then became I a wood-bird, and sang on the spray,

Fly away! little bird, fly away! fly away!

FAUST (opening the lock). Ah! she forebodes not that her lover's near,
The clanking chains, the rustling straw to hear.

He enters.

MARGARET (hiding her face in the bed of straw). Woe! woe! they come!

5 oh, bitter 'tis to die!

FAUST (softly). Hush! hush! be still! I come to set thee free.

MARGARET (throwing herself at his feet). If thou art human, feel my misery.

10 FAUST. Thou wilt awake the jailor with thy cry!

(He grasps the chains to unlock them.)

MARGARET (on her knees). Who, executioner, to thee could give 15 O'er me this cruel power?

To bear me off at midnight's solemn hour!

Be merciful, and spare me! let me live!

Is dawn not time enough?

(She stands up.)

20 I'm still so young!

So very young, and must so early die!

Fair was I once, thence hath my ruin sprung.

My love is now afar, he then was nigh;

25 Torn lies the garland, the fair blossoms strew'd.

Oh, do not seize me with a hand so rude!

Spare me! What harm have I e'er done to thee?

30 For mercy let me not in vain implore,

I n'er have seen thee in my life before!

FAUST. Can I endure this bitter agony?

MARGARET. I'm wholly in thy power.

Ah, suffer me

35 But once again to give my babe the breast.

Through the long night I sooth'd it and caress'd;

They took it from me but to give me pain, And now, they say that I my child have 40 slain.

Ah, ne'er shall I be happy, ne'er again.

Then they sing songs about me! How wicked of the throng.

A ballad of the olden time ends so,

45 How came they to apply the song?

FAUST (throwing himself on the ground).

See, at thy feet a lover bendeth low,

To loose the bonds of wretchedness and woe.

MARGARET (throws herself beside him).

Oh, let us kneel and move the saints by prayer!

Look! look! yon stairs below

Under the threshold there,
Hell's flames are all aglow!
Beneath the floor
With hideous noise,
The devils roar!

FAUST (aloud). Gretchen! Gretchen!

MARGARET (listening). That was my lov'd one's voice!

(She springs up, the chains fall.)

Where is he? I have heard him call, I'm free!

I will away, there's none shall hinder
me.

I to his neck will fly,
Upon his bosom lie!

Gretchen, he call'd! on yonder threshold stood.

Through all the howling of Hell's fiery
flood,

The fiends' dark sneers, their devilish scorn above.

I knew the sweet, the blissful tones of love.

FAUST. 'Tis I!

MARGARET. 'Tis thou! Oh, say so once again! (Embracing him.) 25

'Tis he! 'Tis he! where's now the torturing
pain?

Where are the fetters? where the dungeon's gloom?

'Tis thou! 'Tis thou! To save me thou art come!

And I am sav'd! —

Already now the very street I see Where the first time I caught a glimpse of
thee.

And there too is the pleasant garden shade,
Where I and Martha for thy coming stayed.

FAUST (endeavouring to lead her away).

Come! come away!

MARGARET. Oh, still delay!

I love to linger where thou stay'st.
(Caressing him.)

FAUST. Oh, come! for if thou dost not haste,

Our ling'ring we shall both deplore.

MARGARET. What, dearest? can'st thou kiss me now no more!

So short a time away from me, and yet,
Love's fond embrace thou could'st so soon forget!

Why on thy neck so anxious do I feel?
When formerly a perfect heaven of bliss

From thy dear looks and words would o'er me steal.

Ah! with what tenderness thou then did'st kiss!

5 Kiss me!

Or I'll kiss thee! (She embraces him.)

Woe! woe! Thy lips are cold, — are dumb.

Thy love where hast thou left?

10 Who hath me of thy love bereft?

(She turns away from him.)

FAUST. Only take courage! dearest!
prithee, come!

Thee to my heart with tenderness I'll hold,
15 And cherish thee with ardour thousandfold;

I but entreat thee now to follow me!

MARGARET (turning towards him). And art thou he? and art thou really he?

FAUST. 'Tis I! Oh come!

MARGARET. Thou wilt strike off my chain,

And thou wilt take me to thine arms again.
How comes it that thou dost not shrink
from me? —

And dost thou know, love, whom thou would'st set free?

FAUST. Come! come! already night begins to wane.

MARGARET. I sent my mother to her
grave,

I drown'd my child beneath the wave.

Was it not given to thee and me — thee too?

35 'Tis thou thyself! I scarce believe it yet.

Give me thy hand! It is no dream! 'Tis true!

Thine own dear hand! — But how is this?
'Tis wet!

40 Quick, wipe it off! It seems like blood —
Ah me!

Whose blood? what hast thou done? put up thy sword;

I pray thee, do!

45 FAUST. Death is in every word.

Oh, dearest, let the past forgotten be.

MARGARET. Yet must thou linger here in sorrow.

The graves I will describe to thee,
And thou must see to them to-morrow.

Reserve the best place for my mother,
Close at her side inter my brother,
Me at some little distance lay,

But, I entreat thee, not too far away!
And place my little babe on my right
breast.

The little one alone will lie near me! —

Ah 'twas a sweet, a precious joy, of yore
To nestle at thy side so lovingly!

It will be mine no more, ah never more!

I feel as if I forc'd my love on thee,
As if thou still wert thrusting me away;

Yet 'tis thyself, thy fond, kind looks I see. 10

FAUST. If thou dost feel 'tis I, then come, I pray.

MARGARET. What, there? without?

FAUST. Yes, forth in the free air.

MARGARET. Ay, if the grave's without, 15
— If death lurk there!

Hence to the everlasting resting-place,
And not one step beyond! — Thou'rt leaving me?

Oh, Henry! would that I could go with 20
thee!

FAUST. Thou can'st! But will it! open stands the door.

MARGARET. I dare not go! I've nought to hope for more.

What boots it to escape? They lurk for
me.

'Tis wretched still to beg from day to day,
And burthen'd with an evil conscience too!

'Tis wretched in a foreign land to stray,
And they will catch me whatsoe'er I do!

FAUST. But I will ever bear thee company.

MARGARET. Quick! Quick!

Save thy poor child.

Keep to the path

The brook along,

Over the bridge

To the wood beyond,

To the left, where the plank is,

In the pond.

Seize it at once!

It tries to rise,

It struggles yet!

Save it. Oh, save!

FAUST. Collect thy thoughts, one step and thou art free!

MARGARET. Were we but only past the hill!

There sits my mother on a stone.

Over my brain there falls a chill!

There sits my mother on a stone;

Slowly her head moves to and fro.

She winks not, nods not, her head droops
low.

She slumber'd so long, nor wak'd again.

That we might be happy she slumber'd
5 then.

Ah! those were pleasant times!

FAUST.

Alas! since here

Nor argument avails, nor prayer, nor tear,
I'll venture forcibly to bear thee hence!

MARGARET. Loose me! I will not suffer violence!

Withdraw thy murd'rous hand, hold not so fast!

I have done all to please thee in the past.

FAUST. Day dawns! My love! My love!

MARGARET. Yes! day draws near,
The day of judgment, too, will soon appear.

It should have been my bridal! No one tell,

That thy poor Margaret thou hast known too well.

Woe to my garland! Its bloom is o'er!

25 Though not at the dance, we shall meet once more.

The crowd doth gather, in silence it rolls.

The squares, the streets, scarce hold the throng.

30 The staff is broken, — the death-bell tolls, —

They bind and seize me; I'm hurried
along,

To the seat of blood already I'm bound;

35 Quivers each neck as the naked steel

Quivers on mine the blow to deal.

The silence of the grave now broods
around!

FAUST. Would I had ne'er been born!

40 MEPHISTOPHELES (appears without).
Up! or you're lost.

Vain hesitation! Babbling, quaking!

My steeds are shiv'ring. Morn is breaking.

45 MARGARET. What from the floor ascendeth like a ghost?

'Tis he! 'Tis he! Him from my presence
chase!

What is his purpose in this holy place?

50 It is for me he cometh!

FAUST. Thou shalt live!

MARGARET. Judgment of God! To thee my soul I give!

MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUST). Come!
come! I'll leave thee else to share her doom.

MARGARET. Father, I'm thine! Save me! To thee I come,

Angelic hosts! your downy pinions wave,
Encamp around me to protect and save!
Henry, I shudder now to look on thee.

MEPHISTOPHELES. She now is judg'd!
VOICES (from above). Is saved!

MEPHISTOPHELES (to FAUST). Come thou with me!

(Vanishes with FAUST.)

VOICE (from within, dying away).
Henry! Henry!

POETRY

GERMAN

SCHILLER

(1759-1805)

Johann Christoph Friedrich von Schiller was born in Marbach the son of an army surgeon. Although he was sent to the Latin school at Ludwigsburg to prepare for the ministry, he found that he preferred law and, later, medicine. Under the influence of Shakespeare, Rousseau, and Goethe he turned toward literature. In 1777, at the age of eighteen, he began The Robbers, a play of exaggerated sentiment but of real tragic power, on the subject of political tyranny. It attracted wide attention and was censured by the authorities; Schiller was arrested and forbidden to write anything thereafter except what pertained to medicine. He fled to Mannheim, where he remained until 1785, writing a large number of his important plays. Later he went to Leipsic, and then to Weimar, where he became acquainted with Goethe, Herder, and Wieland. He became professor of history at Jena in 1789. In 1794 he published his History of the Thirty Years' War and almost immediately began work on Wallenstein, a tragic trilogy consisting of The Camp of Wallenstein, The Piccolomini, and The Death of Wallenstein. The second and third of these were ably translated by Coleridge. Returning to Weimar in 1799, Schiller was closely associated with Goethe. Here he wrote The Maid of Orleans, Mary Stuart, The Bride of Messina, and various minor pieces. In 1804, the year before his death, he produced William Tell, the most popular of his dramas.

It is significant that Schiller's first conspicuous work, The Robbers, was the direct expression of vital issues of his time; for this play anticipates the tone of nearly all of his dramatic work. The beauty and fine balance of his poems reflect a truly poetic mind, and in themselves, therefore, are not likely to be outlived. Inasmuch as those issues and those ideas with which Schiller was concerned were chiefly the issues and ideas of Europe before the French Revolution, he has not worn as well for the modern world as Goethe has. Schiller gave to that time of political despondency the benefit of his enthusiastic optimism, his noble idealism and high moralizing; however, except that he is an exquisite poet, he has not so much to say to our present civilization as has, for example, Faust, who is, with remarkable completeness, the modern man. Schiller will be enjoyed for the clear broad lines and the enthusiasm of his poetry, its reflective beauty, its deep love of humanity, and its superb representation of one of the most interesting periods in the history of German literature.

Among Schiller's minor works, The Song of the Bell (1800) is easily the most important. The poet celebrates in this poem the three great events in the life of Man: Birth, Marriage, and Death. At each the bell presides. The measure and spirit of each section of the poem reflect the music of the bell on each of these occasions. Compare Schiller's treatment of this theme with that of Poe in The Bells.

The translation is that of Sir Edward Bulwer-Lytton, in Favorile Poems.

THE SONG OF THE BELL

I

Fast, in its prison walls of earth,
Awaits the mould of bakéd clay.
Up, comrades, up, and aid the birth —
THE BELL that shall be born to-day!

But with sweat and with pain
Can we honor obtain,
And prove that we master the art we profess;
5 With Man be the effort, with Heaven the success!

And well an earnest word beseems

The work the earnest hand prepares;
 Its load more light the labor deems,
 When sweet discourse the labor shares.
 So let us duly ponder all

The works our feeble strength achieves, 5
 For mean, in truth, the man we call,
 Who ne'er what he completes conceives.
 And well it stamps our Human Race,
 And hence the gift TO UNDERSTAND,
 That man, within the heart should trace
 Whate'er he fashions with the hand.

II

From the fir the fagot take,
 Keep it, heap it hard and dry,
 That the gathered flame may break
 Through the furnace, wroth and high.
 When the copper within
 Seethes and simmers — the tin,
 Pour quick, that the fluid which feeds the Bell
 May flow in the right course glib and well.

Deep hid within this nether cell,
 What force with fire is moulding thus
 In yonder airy tower shall dwell,
 And witness far and wide of us!
 It shall, in later days, unfailing,
 Rouse many an ear to rapt emotion;
 Its solemn voice, with Sorrow wailing,
 Or choral chiming to Devotion.
 Whatever Fate to Man may bring,
 Whatever weal or woe befall,
 That metal tongue shall backward ring
 The warning moral drawn from all.

III

See the silvery bubbles spring!
 Good! the mass is melting now!
 Let the salts we duly bring
 Purge the flood, and speed the flow.
 From the dross and the scum,
 Pure, the fusion must come;
 For perfect and pure we the metal must 45
 keep,
 That its voice may be perfect, and pure,
 and deep.

That voice, with merry music rife,
 The cherished child shall welcome in;
 What time the rosy dreams of life

In the first slumber's arms begin.
 As yet in Time's dark womb unwarning,
 Repose the days, or foul or fair;
 And watchful o'er that golden morning,
 The Mother-Love's untiring care!

And swift the years like arrows fly —
 No more with girls content to play.
 Bounds the proud Boy upon his way,
 10 Storms through loud life's tumultuous pleasures,
 With pilgrim staff the wide world measures;
 And, wearied with the wish to roam,
 15 Seeks, stranger-like, the Father-Home.

And lo, as some sweet vision breaks
 Out from its native morning skies,
 With rosy shame on downcast cheeks,
 20 The Virgin stands before his eyes,
 A nameless longing seizes him!
 From all his wild companions flown;
 Tears, strange till then, his eyes bedim;
 He wanders all alone.
 25 Blushing, he glides where'er she move;
 Her greeting can transport him;
 To every mead, to deck his love,
 The happy wild-flowers court him!
 Sweet Hope — and tender Longing — ye
 30 The growth of Life's first Age of Gold;
 When the heart, swelling, seems to see
 The gates of heaven unfold;
 Oh, were it ever green! Oh, stay,
 Linger, young Love, Life's blooming May!

IV

Browning o'er, the pipes are simmering,
 Dip this wand of clay within;
 If like glass the wand be glimmering,
 40 Then the casting may begin.
 Brisk, brisk now, and see
 If the fusion flow free;
 If — (happy and welcome indeed were the sign!)
 45 If the hard and the ductile united combine.
 For still where the strong is betrothed to
 the weak,
 And the stern in sweet marriage is blent
 50 with the meek,
 Rings the concord harmonious, both tender and strong:

So heed, oh, heed well, ere forever united,
That the heart to the heart flow in one,
love-delighted;

Illusion is brief, but Repentance is
long!

Lovely, thither are they bringing,
With her virgin wreath, the Bride!
To the love-feast clearly ringing,
Tolls the church-bell far and wide!

With that sweetest holyday,
Must the May of Life depart;
With the cestus loosed, — away
Flies ILLUSION from the heart!

Yet Love must be cherished
Though Passion be mute;
If his blossoms be perished,
They yield to the fruit.

The Husband must enter
The hostile life,
With struggle and strife,
To plant or to watch,
To snare or to snatch,
To pray and importune,
Must wager and venture

And hunt down his fortune!
Then flows in a current the gear and the gain,

And the garner is filled with the gold of
the grain,

Now a yard to the court, now a wing to the centre!

Within sits Another,

The thrifty Housewife;
The mild one, the mother, —
Her home is her life.

In its circle she rules,
And the daughters she schools,
And she cautions the boys,
With a bustling command,
And a diligent hand
Employed she employs;

Gives order to store,
And the much makes the more;

Locks the chest and the wardrobe, with lavender smelling,

And the hum of the spindle goes quick
through the dwelling;

And she hoards in the presses, well polished and full,

The snow of the linen, the shine of the wool;

Still intent upon use, while providing for
show,

And never a rest from her cares doth she
know.

Blithe the Master (where the while
From his roof he sees them smile)

5 Eyes the lands, and counts the gain;
There, the beams projecting far
And the laden storehouse are,
And the granaries bowed beneath
The blessed golden grain;

10 There, in undulating motion,
Wave the cornfields like an ocean.
Proud the boast the proud lips breathe: —
“My house is built upon a rock,
And sees unmoved the stormy shock
15 Of waves that fret below!”
Alas! for never mortal state
Can form perpetual truce with Fate!
Swift are the steps of Woe.

20

V

Now the casting may begin;
See the breach indented there;
Ere we run the fusion in,

25 Halt, — and speed the pious prayer!
Pull the plug out —
See around and about
Through the bow of the handle the smoke rushes red.

30 God help us! — the flaming waves burst from their bed.

What friend is like the might of fire,
When man can watch and wield the ire?

35 Whate'er we shape or work, we owe
Still to that heaven-descended glow.
But dread the heaven-descended glow,
When from their chain its wild wings go,
When where it listeth, wide and wild

40 Sweeps from free Nature's free-born Child,
When the Frantic One fleets,
While no force can withstand,
Through the populous streets
Whirling ghastly the brand; —

45 For the Elements hate

What man's labors create,
And the works of his hand.

Impartially out from the cloud,
Come the dews, the revivers of all;

Avengingly out from the cloud

Come the leaven, the bolt, and the ball!
Hark — a wail from the steeple! — aloud
The bell shrills its voice to the crowd!

Look — look — red as blood
 All on high;
 It is not the daylight that fills with its flood
 The sky!

What a clamor awaking
 Roars up through the street;
 What a hell-vapor breaking
 Rolls on through the street,
 And higher and higher
 Aloft moves the Column of Fire!
 Through the vistas and rows
 Like a whirlwind it goes,
 And the air like the steam from a furnace glows.

Beams are crackling — posts are shrink-
 ing —

Walls are sinking — windows clinking —
 Children crying —
 Mothers flying —

And the beast (the black ruin yet smouldering under)

Yells the howl of its pain and its ghastly wonder!

Hurry and skurry — away — away,
 The face of the night is as clear as day!

As the links in a chain,
 Again and again

Flies the bucket from hand to hand;
 High in arches up-rushing

The engines are gushing;

And down comes the storm with a roar!

And it chases the flames as they soar.

To the grain and the fruits,

Through the rafters and beams,

Through the barns and the garner's it crackles and streams!

As if they would rend up the earth from its roots,

Rush the flames to the sky

Giant-high;

And at length,

Wearied out and despairing, man bows to their strength!

With an idle gaze sees their wrath consume,

And submits to his doom!

Desolate

The place, and dread;

For storms the barren bed.

In the blank voids that cheerful casements were,

Comes to and fro the melancholy air,
 And sits Despair;

And through the ruin, blackening in its shroud
 Peers, as it flits, the melancholy
 cloud.

5 One human look of grief upon the grave
 Of all that Fortune gave,
 The lingerer casts — Then turns him to depart,

10 And grasps the wanderer's staff and mans
 his heart;

Whatever else the element bereaves,

One blessing more than all it reft, it leaves —

15 The faces that he loves! — He counts them o'er,

Not one dear look is missing from that store!

VI

Now clasped the bell within the clay —

The mould the mingled metals fill —

Oh, may it, sparkling into day,

Reward the labor and the skill!

Alas! should it fail,

For the mould may be frail —

And still with our hope must be mingled the fear —

And, ev'n now, while we speak, the mishap may be near!

30 To the dark womb of sacred earth

This labor of our hands is given,

As seeds that wait the second birth

And turn to blessings watched by heaven!

Ah, seeds, how dearer far than they

We bury in the dismal tomb,

Where Hope and Sorrow bend to pray

That suns beyond the realm of day

40 May warm them into bloom!

From the steeple

Tolls the bell,

Deep and heavy,

The death-knell!

45 Guilding with dirge note — solemn, sad,
 and slow,

To the last home earth's weary wanderers
 know,

It is that worshipped wife, —

It is that faithful mother!

Whom the dark Prince of Shadows leads benighted,

From that dear arm where oft she hung delighted.

Far from those blithe companions, born
Of her, and blooming in their morn;
On whom, when couched her heart above, 5
So often looked the Mother-Lovel!

Ah! rent the sweet Home's union-band,

And never, never more to come, —

She dwells within the shadowy land,

Who was the Mother of that Home!

How oft they miss that tender guide,

The care — the watch — the face —

the MOTHER —

And where she sat the babes beside, 15

Sits with unloving looks — ANOTHER!

VII

While the mass is cooling now,

Let the weary labor rest;

Blithe as bird upon the bough,

Each to do as lists him best.

In the cool starry time,

At the sweet vesper-chime,

The workman his task and his travail fore-goes —

It is only the Master that ne'er may repose!

Homeward from the tasks of day,

Through the greenwood's welcome way,

Wends the wanderer, light and cheerly,

To the cottage loved so dearly!

And the eye and ear are meeting,

Now, the slow sheep homeward bleat-
ing, —

Now, the wonted shelter near,

Lowing the lusty-fronted steer;

Creaking now the heavy wain

Reels with the happy harvest grain.

While with many-coloured leaves

Glitters the garland on the sheaves;

For the mower's work is done,

And the young folk's dance begun!

Desert street and quiet mart;

Silence is in the city's heart;

And the social taper lighteth

Each dear face that HOME uniteth;

While the gate the town before

Heavily swings with sullen roar!

Now darkness is spreading;

Now quenched is the light;

But the Burgher, undreading,

Looks safe on the night, —

Which the evil man watches in awe,

For the eye of the Night is the Law!

Bliss-dowered! O daughter of the skies,

Hail, holy ORDER, whose employ

Blends like to like in light and joy, —

Builder of cities, who of old

Called the wild man from waste and wold,

10 And, in his hut thy presence stealing,

Roused each familiar household feeling;

And, best of all the happy ties,

The centre of the social band, —

The instinct of the Fatherland!

United thus, — each helping each,

Brisk work the countless hands forever!

For naught its power to Strength can teach,

Like Emulation and Endeavor!

Thus linked the master with the man,

Each in his rights can each revere,

And while they march in freedom's van,

25 Scorn the lewd rout that dogs the rear!

To freemen labor is renown!

Who works — gives blessings and commands;

Kings glory in the orb and crown —

30 Be ours the glory of our hands.

Long in these walls — long may we greet

Your footfalls, Peace and Concord sweet!

Distant the day, oh, distant far,

When the rude hordes of trampling War

35 Shall scare the silent vale:

And where,

Now the sweet heaven, when day doth leave

The air,

40 Limns its soft rose-hues on the veil of Eve;

Shall the fierce war-brand, tossing in the gale,

From town and hamlet shake the horrent glare!

45

VIII

Now, its destined task fulfilled,

Asunder break the prison-mould;

50 Let the goodly Bell we build

Eye and heart alike behold.

The hammer down heave,

Till the cover it cleave: —

For not till we shatter the wall of its cell
Can we lift from its darkness and bondage
the Bell.

To break the mould, the Master may,
If skilled the hand and ripe the hour;
But woe, when on its fiery way
The metal seeks itself to pour.
Frantic and blind, with thunder-knell,
Exploding from its shattered home, 10
And glaring forth, as from a hell,
Behold the red Destruction come!

When rages strength that has no reason,
There breaks the mould before the season; 15
When numbers burst what bound before,
Woe to the State that thrives no more!
Yea, woe, when in the city's heart,
The latent spark to flame is blown;
And from their thrall the Millions start, 20
No leader but their rage to own!
Discordant howls the warning Bell,
Proclaiming discord wide and far,
And, born but things of peace to tell,
Becomes the ghastliest voice of war: 25
"Freedom! Equality!" to blood,
Rush the roused people at the sound!
Through street, hall, palace, roars the
flood,
And banded murder closes round! 30
The hyena-shapes (that women were!)
Jest with the horrors they survey;
From human breasts the hearts they
tear —
As panthers rend their prey! 35
Naught rests to hallow; — burst the ties
Of Shame's religious, noble awe;
Before the Vice the Virtue flies,
And Universal Crime is Law;
Man fears the lion's kingly tread; 40
Man fears the tiger's fangs of terror;
But Man himself is most to dread,
When mad with social error.
No torch, though lit from Heaven, illumes 45
The Blind! — Why place it in his hand?
It lights not him, — it but consumes
The City and the Land!

IX

Rejoice and laud the prospering skies!
The kernel bursts its husks, — behold

From the dull clay the metal rise,
Pure-shining, as a star of gold!
Rim and crown glitter bright,
Like the sun's flash of light.
5 And even the scutcheon, clear-graven, shall tell
That the art of a master has fashioned the Bell.

Come in, — come in,
My merry men, — we'll form a ring,
The new-born labor christening;
And "CONCORD" we will name her! —
To union may her heartfelt call
In brother-love attune us all!
May she the destined glory win
For which the Master sought to frame
her —
Aloft — (all earth's existence under),
In blue pavilioned heaven afar
To dwell, — the Neighbor of the Thunder,
The Borderer of the Star!
Be hers above a voice to raise
Like those bright hosts in yonder sphere,
Who, while they move, their Maker
praise,
And lead around the wreathéd year.
To solemn and eternal things
We dedicate her lips sublime,
As hourly, calmly, on she swings,
Touching, with every movement,
Time!
35 No pulse — no heart — no feeling hers.
She lends the warning voice to Fate;
And still companions, while she stirs,
The changes of the Human State!
So may she teach us, as her tone,
40 But now so mighty, melts away, —
That earth no life which earth has known
From the last silence can delay.
Slowly now the cords upheave her!
From her earth grave soars the Bell;
Mid the airs of Heaven we leave her,
In the Music-Realm to dwell.
Up — upward — yet raise —
50 She has risen — she sways.
Fair Bell, to our city bode joy and increase;
And oh, may thy first sound be hallowed to PEACE!

GOETHE¹

WANDERER'S NIGHT SONG

Thou that from the heavens art,
 Every pain and sorrow stillest,
 And the doubly wretched heart
 Doubly with refreshment fillest,
 I am weary with contending!
 Why this rapture and unrest?
 Peace descending
 Come, ah, come into my breast!

O'er all the hill-tops
 Is quiet now,
 In all the tree-tops
 Hearest thou
 Hardly a breath
 The birds are asleep in the trees:
 Wait; soon like these
 Thou, too, shalt rest.

HUNTSMAN'S EVENING SONG

In silence sad, from heath to hill
 With rifle slung I glide,
 But thy dear shape it haunts me still,
 It hovers by my side.

Across the brook, and past the mill,
 I watch thee gayly fleet;
 Ah, does one shape, that ne'er is still,
 E'er cross thy fancy, sweet?

'Tis his, who, tortured by unrest,
 Roams ever to and fro,
 Now ranging east, now ranging west,
 Since forced from thee to go.

And yet at times the thought of thee,
 Like moonlight in a dream,
 Doth bring, I know not how, to me
 Content and peace supreme.

PROMETHEUS

Cover thy spacious heavens, Zeus,
 With clouds of mist,
 And like the boy who lops
 The thistles' heads,

Disport with oaks and mountain-peaks;
 Yet thou must leave
 My earth still standing;
 My cottage, too, which was not raised by
 5 thee;
 Leave me my hearth,
 Whose kindly glow
 By thee is envied.

10 I know naught poorer
 Under the sun, than ye gods!
 Ye nourish painfully,
 With sacrifices
 And votive prayers,
 15 Your majesty;
 Ye would e'en starve,
 If children and beggars
 Were not trusting fools.

20 While yet a child,
 And ignorant of life,
 I turned my wandering gaze
 Up toward the sun, as if with him
 There were an ear to hear my wailings,
 25 A heart, like mine,
 To feel compassion for distress.

Who helped me
 Against the Titans' insolence?
 30 Who rescued me
 From slavery?
 Didst thou not do all this thyself,
 My sacred glowing heart?
 And glowedst, young and good,
 35 Deceived with grateful thanks
 To yonder slumbering one?

I honor thee, and why?
 Hast thou e'er lightened the sorrows
 40 Of the heavy laden?
 Hast thou e'er dried up the tears
 Of the anguish-stricken?
 Was I not fashioned to be a man
 By omnipotent Time,
 45 And by eternal Fate,
 Masters of me and thee?

Didst thou e'er fancy
 That life I should learn to hate,

¹ For biographical sketch, see the introduction to Faust, p. 800.

And fly to deserts,
 Because not all
 My blossoming dreams grew ripe?
 Here sit I, forming mortals
 After my image;
 A race resembling me,
 To suffer, to weep,
 To enjoy, to be glad,
 And thee to scorn,
 As I!

•THE ERL-KING

Who rides there so late through the night
 dark and drear?
 The father it is, with his infant so dear;
 He holdeth the boy tightly clasped in his arm,
 He holdeth him safely, he keepeth him
 warm.

"My son, wherefore seek'st thou thy face
 thus to hide?"
 "Look, father, the Erl-King is close by our side!
 Dost see not the Erl-King, with crown and with train?"
 "My son, 'tis the mist rising over the plain."

"Oh come, thou dear infant! oh come thou with me!

Full many a game I will play there with
 thee;
 On my strand, lovely flowers their blossoms
 unfold,
 My mother shall grace thee with garments of gold."

"My father, my father, and dost thou not hear
 The words that the Erl-King now breathes in my ear?"

"Be calm, dearest child, 'tis thy fancy
 deceives;
 'Tis the sad wind that sighs through the withering leaves."

"Wilt go, then, dear infant, wilt go with me there?
 My daughters shall tend thee with sisterly
 care;

My daughters by night their glad festival
 keep,
 They'll dance thee, and rock thee, and sing thee to sleep."

5 "My father, my father, and dost thou not
 see,
 How the Erl-King his daughters has brought here for me?"
 10 "My darling, my darling, I see it aright,
 'Tis the aged gray willows deceiving thy sight."

"I love thee, I'm charmed by thy beauty,
 dear boy!
 15 And if thou'rt unwilling, then force I'll employ."
 "My father, my father, he seizes me fast,
 Full sorely the Erl-King has hurt me at
 last."

20 The father now gallops, with terror half
 wild,
 He grasps in his arms the poor shuddering child:
 25 He reaches his courtyard with toil and dread, —
 The child in his arms he finds motionless, dead.

•MIGNON

"Knowest thou the land where the citron-apples bloom,
 And oranges like gold in leafy bloom,
 35 A gentle wind from deep blue heaven
 blows,
 The myrtle thick, and high the laurel grows?"

"Tis there! 'tis there!
 40 O my true loved one, thou with me must go!

"Knowest thou the house, its porch with pillars tall,
 The rooms do glitter, glitters bright the
 hall,
 And marble statues stand, and look each one:
 What's this, poor child, to thee they've
 done?
 Knowest thou it then?"

'Tis there! 'tis there!
 O my protector, thou with me must go!
 "Knowest thou the hill, the bridge that hangs on clouds,
 The mules in mist grope o'er the torrent
 loud,
 In caves lay coiled the dragon's ancient hood,
 The crag leaps down, and over it the flood:
 Knowest thou it then?
 5 'Tis there! 'tis there!
 Our way runs; O my father, wilt thou go?"

CHAMISSO

(1781-1838)

Adelbert von Chamisso, although famous as a German romantic poet, was French in origin. He was born in the château of Boncourt near Sainte-Menehould. When he was still a child his family moved to Germany, where Chamisso learned the art of porcelain painting. Later he became page to the queen of Prussia, and then (1798) a lieutenant in the Prussian army. Later he taught in the college of Napoleonville in France. He attained some reputation as a naturalist and accompanied Kotzebue on his Arctic explorations (1815-1818). On his return to Europe he became director of the botanical gardens at Berlin, and continued his scientific studies until his death. As a literary figure Chamisso belongs without question to the Romantic school, and yet he took his material not from classical antiquity or the Middle Ages but from the life about him; his political poems show his predominating interest in the industry and society of the Germany of his own day, and there lies in the background of his writing a recognizable tendency toward realism. His most celebrated prose work is The Wonderful History of Peter Schlemihl (1814).

The series of poems Woman's Love and Life (1830) deals with the high points of a woman's life from her first love to the death of her son. All music lovers will remember the earlier poems of the series in the fine musical setting of Robert Schumann. The translation is that of Dr. Alfred Baskerville, in The Poetry of Germany.

WOMAN'S LOVE AND LIFE

1

Since mine eyes beheld him,
 Blind I seem to be;
 Wheresoe'er they wander,
 Him alone they see.
 Round me glows his image,
 In a waking dream,
 From the darkness rising,
 Brighter doth it beam.

All is drear and gloomy
 That around me lies,
 Now my sister's pastimes
 I no longer prize;
 In my chamber rather
 Would I weep alone;
 Since mine eyes beheld him
 Blind methinks I'm grown.

It is true? Oh, I cannot believe it,
 A dream doth my senses enthrall;
 10 Oh, can he have made me so happy,
 And exalted me thus above all?

Meseems as if he had spoken,
 "I am thine, ever faithful and true!"
 15 Meseems — Oh, still am I dreaming,
 It cannot, it cannot be true!

Oh, fain would I, rocked on his bosom,
 In the sleep of eternity lie,
 20 That death were indeed the most blissful,
 In the rapture of weeping to die.

4

Help me, ye sisters,
 25 Kindly to deck me,
 Me, O the happy one, aid me this morn!

Let the light finger
Twine the sweet myrtle's
Blossoming garland, my brow to adorn!

As on the bosom
Of my beloved one,
Wrapt in the bliss of contentment, I lay,
He, with soft longing
In his heart thrilling,
Ever impatiently sighed for to-day.

Aid me, ye sisters,
Aid me to banish
Foolish anxieties, timid, and coy,
That I with sparkling
Eye may receive him,
Him the bright fountain of rapture and
joy.

Do I behold thee,
Thee, my beloved one,
Dost thou, O sun, shed thy beams upon
me?
Let me devoutly,
Let me in meekness
Bend to my lord and my master the knee! 25

Strew, ye fair sisters,
Flowers before him,
Cast budding roses around at his feet!
Joyfully quitting
Now your bright circle,
You, lovely sisters, with sadness I greet.

6

Upon my heart, and upon my breast,

Thou joy of all joys, my sweetest, best!
Bliss, thou art love, O love, thou art bliss,
I've said it, and seal it here with a kiss.
I thought no happiness mine could ex-
5 ceed,
But now I am happy, oh, happy indeed!
She only, who to her bosom hath pressed
The babe who drinketh life at her breast;
'Tis only a mother the joys can know
10 Of love, and real happiness here below.
How I pity man, whose bosom reveals
No joy like that which a mother feels!
Thou look'st on me, with a smile on thy
brow,
15 Thou dear, dear little angel, thou!
Upon my heart, and upon my breast,
Thou joy of all joys, my sweetest, best!

. . . 7

Ah! thy first wound hast thou inflicted 20 now,
But oh! how deep!
Hard-hearted cruel man, now sleepest
thou
Death's long, long sleep.

I gaze upon the void in silent grief,
The world is drear,
I've lived and loved, but now the verdant leaf
30 Of life is sere.

I will retire within my soul's recess,
The veil shall fall,
I'll live with thee and my past happiness,
35 O thou my all!

UHLAND

(1787-1862)

John Ludwig Uhland was born of a family of merchants established in Tübingen. His father was secretary of the university, and the young Uhland was influenced by people interested in literature and learning. At eighteen he entered the university, uncertain what course to pursue. He was drawn toward medicine and theology, but finally decided upon law, in which he had a scholarship. But he did not abandon his interest in poetry; in fact, some of his best pieces date from the beginning of his legal career. Enrolled among the romanticists in literature, Uhland took an active part in the controversies between them and their opponents. Finishing his doctoral thesis in 1810, he went to Paris, where, instead of studying the Napoleonic code, he spent most of his time in the libraries digging out the texts of mediæval chivalric romances, and writing about them and translating them. Upon his return to Germany he accepted a place in the office of the Minister of Justice (1812), and was later (1829) made professor of literature at Tübingen, which position he resigned in 1833 when he became deputy from Stuttgart. In 1839 he returned to his mediæval studies for another nine years. The revolution of 1849 again drew him temporarily into politics, but he soon withdrew to private life.

Like most of the other romanticists, it was from the Middle Ages that Uhland drew his inspiration for the writing of poetry. In his style he is usually more precise and more consciously graceful than the majority of the romantic poets, and it is chiefly because of his charming songs and ballads that his name endures. His frequent use of the ballad form, the perfect simplicity and deep religious sentiment of his verse, and his passionate defense of freedom and liberalism further characterize the works of a poet who, if he was not among those of the first order, came very near to being the first of the second order.

Of the following selections The German's Native Land is taken from The Academic Speaker, J. H. Butler & Co., Philadelphia, 1878; The Castle by the Sea (1810) and The Luck of Edenhall (1834) are translated by Henry W. Longfellow in The Poets and Poetry of Europe.

THE GERMAN'S NATIVE LAND

Know ye the land where, tall and green,
The ancient forest-oaks are seen?
Where the old Rhine-waves sounding run,
And glitter gayly in the sun?
We know the lovely land full well:
'Tis where the free-souled Germans dwell.

Know ye the land where truth is told,
Where the word of man is as good as gold?
The honest land, where love and truth
Bloom on in everlasting youth?
I know that honest land full well:
'Tis where the free-souled Germans dwell.

Know ye the land where each vile song
Is banished from the jovial throng?
The sacred land, where, free from art,
Religion sways the simple heart?
We know that sacred land full well:
'Tis where the free-souled Germans dwell.

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA

Hast thou seen that lordly castle,
That castle by the sea?
Golden and red above it
The clouds float gorgeously.

And fain it would stoop downward
To the mirrored wave below;
And fain it would soar upward
In the evening's crimson glow.

Well have I seen that castle,
That castle by the sea,
And the moon above it standing,
And the mist rise solemnly.

The winds and the waves of ocean,
Had they a merry chime?
Didst thou hear, from those lofty chambers,
5 The harp and the minstrel's rhyme?

The winds and the waves of ocean,
They rested quietly;
But I heard on the gale a sound of wail,
10 And tears came to mine eye.

And sawest thou on the turrets
The king and his royal bride,
And the wave of their crimson mantles,
15 And the golden crown of pride?

Led they not forth, in rapture,
A beauteous maiden there,
Resplendent as the morning sun,
20 Beaming with golden hair?

Well saw I the ancient parents,
Without the crown of pride;
They were moving slow, in weeds of woe;
25 No maiden was by their side!

THE LUCK OF EDENHALL

Of Edenhall the youthful lord
Bids sound the festal trumpet's call;
He rises at the banquet board,
30 And cries, 'mid the drunken revellers all,
"Now bring me the Luck of Edenhall!"

The butler hears the words with pain, —
The house's oldest seneschal, —
35 Takes slow from its silken cloth again
The drinking-glass of crystal tall;
They call it The Luck of Edenhall.

Then said the lord, "This glass to praise,

Fill with red wine from Portugal!"
 The graybeard with trembling hand obeys;
 A purple light shines over all;
 It beams from the Luck of Edenhall.

Then speaks the lord, and waves it light, —
 "This glass of flashing crystal tall
 Gave to my sires the Fountain-Sprite;
 She wrote it, If this glass doth fall,
Farewell then, O Luck of Edenhall!

"Twas right a goblet the fate should be
 Of the joyous race of Edenhall!
 We drink deep draughts right willingly;
 And willingly ring, with merry call,
 Kling! klang! to the Luck of Eden-
 hall!"

First rings it deep, and full, and mild,
 Like to the song of a nightingale;
 Then like the roar of a torrent wild;
 Then mutters, at last, like the thunder's
 fall,
 The glorious Luck of Edenhall.

"For its keeper takes a race of might
 The fragile goblet of crystal tall;
 It has lasted longer than is right;

Kling! klang! — with a harder blow than all
 Will I try the Luck of Edenhall!"

5 As the goblet, ringing, flies apart,
 Suddenly cracks the vaulted hall;
 And through the rift the flames upstart;
 The guests in dust are scattered all
 With the breaking Luck of Edenhall!

10 In storms the foe, with fire and sword!
 He in the night had scaled the wall;
 Slain by the sword lies the youthful lord,
 But holds in his hand the crystal tall,
 15 The shattered Luck of Edenhall.

On the morrow the butler gropes alone,
 The graybeard, in the desert hall;
 He seeks his lord's burnt skeleton;
 20 He seeks in the dismal ruin's fall
 The shards of the Luck of Edenhall.

"The stone wall," saith he, "doth fall
 aside;
 25 Down must the stately columns fall;
 Glass is this earth's Luck and Pride;
 In atoms shall fall this earthly ball,
 One day, like the Luck of Edenhall!"

HEINE

(1797-1856)

Heinrich Heine was born in Düsseldorf of Jewish parents. Aside from the Jewish tradition in which he was brought up, the strongest influence upon his childhood, as well as his later life, was that of French government and education. It was intended that he should become a merchant, and a wealthy uncle in Hamburg enabled him to begin business, but Heine could not content himself with a purely mercantile environment, and in 1819 his uncle arranged that he study law at Bonn. At the university Heine's enthusiasm for law gave way to an interest in literary and historical studies. Schlegel revealed to him the charm of the Orient, and Simrock introduced him to the early literature of Germany. With continually decreasing zeal for the study of law he went to Göttingen, the greatest of German university cities, and in 1821 to Berlin, where he became acquainted with Schleiermacher, Chamisso, Fouqué, and other important figures. His legal studies languished as he composed poetry and endeavored to formulate a philosophy of life under the influence of Hegel, but in 1824 he returned to Göttingen and completed his studies. Realizing the difficulty of having a public career as an orthodox Jew, he was baptized, but he was never an enthusiastic Christian. In accordance with his uncle's wishes he set up as a lawyer in Hamburg, but he still preferred his literary friends to his office. In 1826 he issued his first book of poems and was recognized thenceforth as a writer, not a lawyer. The next year, the year of his journey to England, he enrolled his name among the German lyric poets with his Book of Songs. After a brief period of wandering he settled in Paris; he immersed himself in the brilliant and dissolute life of the capital until his marriage in 1841 to Mathilde Mirat, a gentle-natured, unintelligent woman. By 1848 he was a bedridden invalid; eight years later he died and was buried in Montmartre cemetery.

The light, flashing, facile, and frequently sardonic temper of Heine's verse is more French than German — in fact, it sharply distinguishes him from the other German poets of his time. Yet he always wished to be thought of as a German poet. By reason of his tender melancholy, his study of the popular songs of Germany, and his use of mediæval legends, Heine belongs among the German romanticists; even his devotion to Napoleon and to France was tinged with the spirit of romanticism. But more important to Heine than his lyric power was the cause he championed, of which in his Memoirs he wrote: "It has been the great task of my life to work for a sincere understanding between Germany and France and to upset the plots of the enemies of democracy, who exploit international prejudices and animosities for their own uses." To these ends Heine directed all the intensity of his nature — an intensity by which, incidentally, even relatively casual portions of Heine's verse may almost invariably be recognized.

BOOK OF SONGS

from The Sorrows of Youth

POOR PETER¹

I

Blithe Hans and his Gretë they dancing
come,

Loud laughing for utter gladness,
Poor Peter stands stock-still and dumb,
As pale as chalk for sadness.

Blithe Hans and his Gretë are bridegroom and bride,

In wedding finery flaring.
Poor Peter, gnawing his nails aside,
His workday clothes is wearing.

Poor Peter mutters, as on the pair
He looks with eyes of sorrow:
'If I had not too much good sense, I swear 20
I'd go hang myself to-morrow.'

II

'Deep in my breast there sits a woe,
My breast with sorrow riving,
From where I stay, from where I go
'Twill thrust me, ever driving.

'It drives me to my Love, and sighs,
As though the girl could heal it;
But when I look into her eyes,
Thence I must fly, I feel it.

'I climb the mountain summit bare,
Lone tryst with sorrow keeping;
And when I stand in silence there,
I stand there dumbly weeping.'

III

5 Poor Peter he goes tottering by,
So slowly, deadly pale, and shy.
And when folk see him, as they meet,
They're moved to loiter in the street.

10 The girls will whisper: 'Has this man
Come from his grave?' as they him scan.
Nay, pretty maids, he goes instead
Down in the grave to lay his head.

15 He's lost his Sweetheart; for his case,
Therefore, the grave is the best place,
Where best his lodging find he may,
And sleep until the Judgement Day.

(Translated by John Todhunter in Heine's Book of Songs.)

'PROLOGUE'

There once was a Knight, oh, so dismal and dumb!

25 His cheeks were hollow and haggard;
And sauntering along he would tottering
come,
Bemused with dull dreams, poor lag-
gard.

30 So blocklike he was, so clumsy, so daft,

¹ Lovers of music will remember Schumann's fine musical setting of this series. The deftness of the poet is nowhere so severely tested as in light melancholy pathos.

² The story of the knight who loved a water nymph was a great favorite in the Age of Romanticism. The classic example is Fouqué's Undine. Note also the resemblance between the adventure of the knight here and in Keats's La Belle Dame sans merci.

The flowers and young girls all around him
they laughed,
As by them he stumbled and staggered.

Then out at once all the lights have gone,
Round his poet's den in his house alone
The Knight forlornly gazes.

(Ibid.)

Crept home, in the darkest nook he would hide

From all men, in solitude utter.

There longing he stretched his arms and sighed,

Yet not a word would he mutter.

But when midnight fell on that lonely 10
man,

A marvellous ringing and singing began —
Then — a knock set his heart in a flutter.

And in his Truelove doth silently glide, 15
In her foam-robe's murmuring mazes,
She blooms like a rosebud, she glows like a
bride,

With jewels her white veil blazes.

Her hair around her sheds golden light, 20
Her eyes allure him with might — sweet might —

They sink in each others' embraces.

With passion his Love in his arms he 25 takes,

How kindles this block in the fire!

This pale thing is glowing, the dreamer
awakes,

The shy man grows truly no shyer.

But, still tormenting him roguishly, 30
Her white veil over his head flings she,
With its diamonds like dew on a briar.

To a crystal palace, the waters below,

The Knight is charmed in a twitter.

He marvels, his eyes are bedazzled so,
With all the glamour and glitter.

But his Nymph's white arms are around him tied, 40

The Knight is bridegroom, the Kelpie¹
is bride,

Her damsels play on the zither.

They play and they sing, and they sing so
sweet, 45

And move in the dance's wild mazes;

The Knight's dazed senses have left their seat,

Locked fast in his Love's embraces. —

IN THE MONTH OF MAY

In the sweet marvelous month of May,
When all the buds were springing,
There in my heart among them
New-born I found Love singing.

In the sweet marvelous month of May,
When all the birds were singing,
I told her all the longings
That my fond heart were wringing.

(Ibid.)

ON WINGS OF SONG

On wings of song, Belov'd One,
Away I'll waft thee, to where
I know in the plains of the Ganges
A secret nook most fair.

There sleeps a rich-blossoming garden,
Calm in the still moonlight:
The lotus-flowers are awaiting
Their dearest Sister to-night.

The violets laugh as they prattle,
And gaze on the stars in their spheres;
Odorous legends the roses
Breathe low in each others' ears.

There bound, and stand shyly listening, 35
The gentle timid gazelles;
Afar, from the sacred river,
The waves' deep murmur swells.

There, under the palms reclining,
We'll drink, by the sacred stream, 40
Of love and rest in full measure,
And blissful dreams will we dream.

(Ibid.)

THE PINE-TREE

A Pine-Tree's standing lonely
In the North on a mountain's brow
Nodding, with whitest cover,
Wrapped up by the ice and snow.

He's dreaming of a palm-tree,
Which, far in the Morning Land,
Lonely and silent sorrows
Mid burning rocks and sand.

(Translated by Charles G. Leland in Heine's 5 Book of Songs.)

‘A YOUNG MAN LOVES A MAIDEN

A young man loves a maiden,
Who loves another instead;
That other loves another,
And wins her, and so they are wed.

The maiden is piqued, and to spite him
Goes promptly off to church
With the first good man she falls in with;
The young fellow's left in the lurch.

All this is an old, old story,
Yet somehow always new;
And when you're cast for the hero
Your heart just breaks in two.
(Translated by John Todhunter.)

I DREAMED OF THE FAIREST PRINCESS

I dreamed of the fairest princess seen,
With the palest of tearful faces;
We sat all under the linden green,
Held fast in love's embraces.

"I do not wish thy father's throne,
Nor his sceptre of gold, O dearest,
Nor do I seek his diamond crown,
But thee, and thee only, O fairest!"

"That may not be," said she to me;
"I was laid in my grave too early;
And only by night I come to thee,
Because I love thee so dearly."
(Translated by Charles G. Leland.)

•THE LORELEI¹

I know not what spell is o'er me,
That I am so sad to-day;

An old myth floats before me —
I cannot chase it away.

The cool air darkens, and listen,
How softly flows the Rhine!
The mountain peaks still glisten
Where the evening sunbeams shine.

The fairest maid sits dreaming
In radiant beauty there.
10 Her gold and her jewels are gleaming.
She combeth her golden hair.

With a golden comb she is combing;
A wondrous song sings she.
15 The music quaint in the gloaming
Hath a powerful melody.

It thrills with a passionate yearning
The boatman below in the night.
20 He heeds not the rocky reef's warning,
He gazes alone on the height.

I think that the waters swallowed
The boat and the boatman anon.
25 And this, with her singing unhallowed,
The Lorelei hath done.

(Translated by Emma Lazarus in Poems and Ballads of Heinrich Heine.)

•THE FISHER MAIDEN

30 Thou fairest fisher maiden,
Row thy boat to the land.
Come here and sit beside me,
Whispering, hand in hand.

35 Lay thy head on my bosom,
And have no fear of me;
For carelessly thou trustest
Daily the savage sea.

40 My heart is like the ocean,
With storm and ebb and flow,
And many a pearl lies hidden
Within its depths below.

45 (Ibid.)

THE DOUBLE

The quiet night broods over roof-tree and steeples;

¹ In German legend a siren who haunted the rock of that name on the right bank of the Rhine, about halfway between Bingen and Koblenz. By her beauty and singing she enticed sailors to destruction on the reef of rocks below.

Within this house dwelt my treasure rare.
'Tis long since I left the town and its people,
But the house stands still on the self- 5
same square.

Here stands, too, a man; toward heaven
he gazes,
And he wrings his hands with a wild 10
despair.

I shudder with awe when his face he raises,
For the moonlight shows me mine own self there.

Oh, pale sad creature! my ghost, my double,

Why dost thou ape my passion and
tears,

That haunted me here with such cruel 20
trouble,

So many a night in the olden years?

(Ibid.)

•DU BIST WIE EINE BLUME

Thou seemest like a flower,
So pure and fair and bright;

A melancholy yearning
Steals o'er me at thy sight.

I fain would lay in blessing
My hands upon thy hair,
Imploring God to keep thee,
So bright, and pure, and fair.

(Ibid.)

MAIDEN WITH THE LIPS LIKE ROSEBUDS

Maiden with the lips like rosebuds,
And with eyes both sweet and clear,
15 O my darling little maiden,
In my heart I hold thee here!

Long I find the winter evening,
And I might be with thee there,
20 By thee sitting, with thee chatting
In thy room where comes no care.

To my lips I might be pressing
Rapturously thy small white hand,
25 With my tears that hand bedewing
Tenderly, that small white hand.

FRENCH

BÉRANGER

(1780-1857)

Pierre Jean de Béranger was born in Paris, where until he was nine he lived with his grandfather, a tailor. During the remainder of his childhood he was cared for by his aunt, who gave him a rudimentary education and filled him with patriotic sentiments and ideals. He began writing poetry when he was about sixteen. His talents attracted the attention of Lucien Bonaparte, who took him under his protection. Béranger's first volume of poetry was published in 1815. The poems were well received by the public, but some of the satirical pieces gave offense to the government. Nothing definite was done at this time, but as Béranger continued in his freedom of expression he was sentenced in 1828 to a prison term and a fine. He was an ardent republican, and it is thought that his poetry contributed considerably to the revolution of 1830. In 1833 he brought out a fifth edition of his poems with a memoir of his life. Elected to the Constitutional Assembly in 1848, Béranger declined to serve, and retired instead into the seclusion of a garret, where he felt himself best able to write.

Quite early in his literary career, Béranger dedicated his talent to the common people; and his songs enjoyed a popularity rivalled only by Hugo. The greatest distinction of his writing was his cultivation of the chanson form for contemporary use, — his skillful manipulation of an undertone of sadness that often marks the songs of the common people, and the amusing lyrical devices that represent popular humour. Béranger was not a profound poet in either thought or feeling; but he was seriously, even passionately, devoted to the laborers of France, and was a conscientious and often extraordinarily fine lyrical craftsman. One might find it interesting to compare him with Villon and with Robert Burns.

In connection with the first of the following selections, which was composed in 1813, Louis XVIII is known to have said, "We must pardon many things to the author of Le Roi d'Yvetot." The translation of it used in this volume is that of W. M. Thackeray. The other selections, written in 1823, 1824, and 1829 respectively, are translated by William Young in Béranger: two hundred of his lyrical poems done in English verse, New York, G. P. Putnam, 1850.

THE KING OF YVETOT

There was a king of Yvetot
Of whom renown hath little said,
Who let all thoughts of glory go,
And dawdled half his days in bed;
And every night as night came round,
By Jenny with a nightcap crowned,
Slept very sound:
Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
That's the kind of king for me.

And every day it came to pass
That four lusty meals made he;
And step by step, upon an ass
Rode abroad his realms to see;
And wherever he did stir,
What think you was his escort, sir?
Why, an old cur.
Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
That's the kind of king for me.

If e'er he went into excess,
'Twas from a somewhat lively thirst;
But he who would his subjects bless —
Odd's fish! — must wet his whistle first;
And so from every cask they got
Our king did to himself allot
At least a pot.
Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
That's the kind of king for me.

Neither by force nor false pretence
He sought to make his country great,
And made (O princes, learn from hence)
'Live and let live' his rule of state.
'Twas only when he came to die
That his people who stood by
Were known to cry.
Sing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
That's the kind of king for me.

The portrait of this best of kings
Is extant still upon a sign
That on a village tavern swings,
Famed in the country for good wine.
The people in their Sunday trim,
Filling their glasses to the brim,
Look up to him,
Singing ho, ho, ho! and he, he, he!
That's the sort of king for me.

THE OLD SERGEANT¹

From his dearly loved daughter, who spins
at his side,
All the pain of his wounds the old sergeant would hide;
And, with hand that a bullet half useless
has made,
Rocks the cradle in which his twin grandsons are laid.
Seated tranquilly there at the porch of the cot,
After combats so many such refuge his lot,
'Nay, to live is not all,' he repeats with a sigh,
'O my children, God grant you with honor
to die!'

But what hears he? yes, yes, 'tis the roll of the drum!
A battalion he sees — in the distance they come.

Through his temples, grey-haired, the hot blood is astir —
The old racer responds to the prick of the spur.
But alas! in a moment he mournfully cries,
'Ah! the standard they carry seems strange to these eyes!
Yes, if e'er to avenge your own country
ye fly,

¹ This poem expresses the feeling of regret among the old soldiers who had fought in the Revolution and served under the Empire at the substitution of the white flag of the Bourbons for the tricolor.

O my children, God grant you with honor
to die!

"Who," pursues the old hero, "shall give us anew,
On the banks of the Rhine, at Jemmappes,
at Fleurus,
Peasants such as of yore the Republic
could rear,
Sons who swarmed at her voice to defend her frontier?
Starving, barefooted, deaf to all coward
alarms.
How they marched, keeping step, to seek glory in arms!
To temper our steel the Rhine wave we must try —
O my children, God grant you with honor
to die!

"How they glittered in battle, our uniforms blue,
Though their lustre was tarnished by conquest, 'tis true!
Then how Liberty mixed with the grape-shot we poured
Sceptres broken in pieces, chains snapped by the sword!
Nations then, become queens by those triumphs of ours;
On the brows of our soldiers hung garlands
of flowers;
Happy he who survived not that jubilee
cry!
O my children, God grant you with honor
to die!

"But such worth all too soon by our Chiefs
was obscured;
To ennoble themselves, from the ranks
they are lured:
And with mouths blackened still by the cartridge, prepare,
Basely fawning on tyrants, their homage to swear.
Freedom, too, with her arms has deserted
— they turn

From one throne to another, fresh prizes to earn:
And our tears flow as fast as our glory ran
high;
O my children, God grant you with honor
to die!"

Here his daughter, to soothe him, was fain to break in,
And in notes low and soft, without ceasing
to spin,
Sang the airs now proscribed,¹ that were wont with a start
To awaken all Kings, and chill Royalty's
heart.
"People," softly he murmurs, "ah! would that these songs
Might in turn — for 'tis time — bid you heed to your wrongs!"
Then repeats to the babes who yet slumbering lie,
"O my children, God grant you with honor
to die!"

THE CORONATION OF CHARLES THE SIMPLE²

Frenchmen, to Rheims who thronging
crowd,
Montjoie, St. Denis! shout aloud!
The holy cruse³ with oil once more
Is filled; and, as in days of yore,
Sparrows by hundreds tossed on high⁴
Through the Cathedral joyous fly —
Vain symbols of a broken yoke,
That from the king a smile provoke.
"Be wiser than ourselves"; the people
cry —
"Look well, O birds, look to your liberty!"

Come, since old usages prevail,
From Charles the Third I'll date my tale.
He, Charlemagne's successor, rightly
Was called the Simple, for unknighly
His course through Germany he wended,
No laurels gaining, when it ended.

¹ Prohibited.

² This song had much to do with the second prosecution of Béranger. The satire was directed toward Charles X, whose career was similar in many points to that of Charles III (the Simple).

³ Vessel.

⁴ At the coronation of Charles X the ancient custom of setting flights of birds at liberty was renewed.

Still, crowds his coronation throng:
 Flatterers and birds have sung their
 song —
 "No silly songs of joy!" the people cry —
 "Look well, O birds, look to your liberty!" 5

In tawdry lace bedizzened bravely,
 This king, who gulped down taxes
 gravely,
 Walks 'mid his faithful subjects — 10
 they
 Had, in a less auspicious day,
 To rebel standard all adhered,
 By generous usurper reared.
 Their tongues some hundred millions 15 buy —
 A price for fealty none too high.
 "We're paying for our chains"; the people
 cry —
 "Look well, O birds, look to your 20 liberty!"

At feet of prelates stiff with gold,
 Charles's *Confiteor*¹ is told;
 He's robed, and kissed, and oiled; and 25
 next,
 With hand upon the Holy Text,
 Whilst sacred anthems fill the air,
 Hears his Confessor whisper, "Swear!"
 Rome, here concerned, is nothing loath 30
 To grant release from such an oath.
 "Mark, how they govern us!" the people
 cry —
 "Look well, O birds, look to your liberty!" 35

In belt of Charlemagne arrayed,
 As though just such a roistering blade,
 Charles in the dust now prostrate lies;
 "Rise up, Sir King," a soldier cries.
 "No," quoth the Bishop, "and by Saint 40
 Peter,
 The Church crowns you; with bounty treat her!
 Heaven sends, but 'tis the priests who give; 45
 Long may legitimacy live!"
 "Our ruler's ruled himself"; the people
 cry —
 "Look well, O birds, look to your liberty."

This King, O birds, in wonders dealing,
 Will now the scrofulous be healing:
 But ye, who're all that renders gay
 His weary escort, haste away,
 Or sacrilege² you'll be committing,
 As o'er the altar you are flitting;
 Religion here plants guards — and hers
 Just now are executioners.
 "Your wings we envy you," the people
 cry —
 "Look well, O birds, look to your liberty!"

•THE FOURTEENTH OF JULY•

How the remembrance a poor captive charms!
 I, still a boy, for vengeance heard the
 cry,
 "To the Bastille! To arms! haste, haste to arms!"
 Art, trade, and labor, all their hosts supply.
 Wife, daughter, and mother, in pale groups
 stand round;
 The cannon roar; the rolling drums resound;
 Lo! the Bastille is theirs; victory the mob
 hath crowned!
 The sun pours forth a brilliant ray,
 To welcome in this glorious day.
 Youth and old age, rich, poor, embrace with glee;
 A thousand exploits female tongues
 repeat;
 A soldier passing, clad in blue, they see,
 And him as hero hands and voices greet.
 Harsh on mine ear the kingly titles break;
 Now Lafayette their darling theme they make:
 France has her freedom gained; my reason is awake!
 The sun pours forth a brilliant ray,
 To welcome in this glorious day.

An old man on the morrow, grave and
 wise,
 Guided my steps o'er ruins vast and drear:

¹ A form of prayer in which public confession of sins is made: — from its opening word in Latin.

² Until after the July (1830) Revolution there was a severe law against sacrilege.

³ This poem celebrates the fall of the Bastille, July 14, 1789. On the fortieth anniversary of this event the poet was himself in prison because of some of his political satires.

"My son," quoth he, "a slavish people's cries
 Enslaving despots oft have stifled here.
 But they, their crowd of captives safe to
 keep,
 Beneath each tower dug out the earth so deep
 That this, their ancient fort, one shock could level sweep.
 The sun poured forth a brilliant ray, 10
 To welcome in that glorious day.
 "Ancient and holy rebel, Freedom here,
 Grasping for arms the chains our grand-sires wore,
 Triumphant, bids Equality appear,
 Who comes, from Heaven descending as of yore.
 Sisters are they: their lightnings hiss and glow;
 Against the Court now thunders Mira-beau¹;
 There would his voice to us another Bastille
 show!
 The sun poured forth a brilliant ray, 25
 To welcome in this glorious day.
 "Each nation reaps where'er the seed we sow;
 Monarchs by score of all our movements
 hear!
 Subjects around, of us, are whispering
 low;
 5 Kings raise their hands to touch their crowns, in fear.
 An era teeming with the Rights of Man
 Commences here, and the whole globe shall span;
 God in this wreck marks out for a new world his plan.
 The sun poured forth a brilliant ray,
 To welcome in this glorious day."
 15 Such was the lesson from that veteran learned,
 Thrown in my mind to heedless slumber
 by;
 Now forty years are past, and lo! returned
 To me, in jail, that epoch of July!
 Freedom! my voice they would forbid to sing;
 Yet with thy glory these dull walls shall ring;
 25 Morning athwart my bars her brightest smiles can fling!
 Still shines the sun with brilliant ray,
 To welcome in this glorious day.

LAMARTINE

(1790-1869)

Alphonse Marie Louis Prat de Lamartine was born at Macôn, on the Saône. After going to school at Lyons, he was put in the care of the Pères de la Foi at Belley until 1809. In 1811 he went to Italy, where he spent about two years and fell in love with Graziella, the daughter of a Neapolitan fisherman. She died soon after his return to France. Lamartine filled several diplomatic positions. On his way to become secretary to the French embassy at Florence, he married Miss Marianne Birch, a wealthy Englishwoman. Later he was minister to Greece, but the Revolution of 1830 deprived him of this position. He gradually changed his views, and in 1848 played an important part in the Revolution. Under the provisional government he was Minister of Foreign Affairs and attained such political importance that he became a candidate for the presidency. He was impractical, however, and soon lost all political influence, afterward producing many compositions of mediocre quality. His wife died in 1863. In 1867 the government voted him 20,000 pounds; he died in February, 1869.

Lamartine's earliest works are the Méditations, Nouvelles Méditations, and Harmonies Poétiques et Religieuses. Les Confidences and Raphael are chiefly autobiographical. His best poem is Jocelyn, written in 1836; this was followed in 1838 by The Fall of an Angel, a poem far less successful. He wrote also some inaccurate, though interesting histories: History of the Girondins, History of the Revolution of 1848, and History of the Restoration, and one poor drama, Toussaint L'Ouverture.

Lamartine's Méditations (1820), though largely imitative, restored the ring of great emotion to French literature. The poet had absorbed the spirit of Rousseau (p. 746) and Chateaubriand

(see p. 893), but his intensely personal note and his plaintive sincerity make his work far more than a mere lyrical echo of the past. Some of his later verses partially substitute a happy tone for the old Ossianic melancholy, but, generally speaking, his first Méditations reveal all the features that are most characteristic of his work. Refinement, grace, and harmony of expression, delicacy of sentiment, a fine sense for images and for the melancholy of reminiscence, a rare limpidity of style — these are the qualities for which Lamartine was appreciated in his own day, and though the appeal of most of his verse faded gradually before the vigorous, brilliant advance of the full romantic movement, headed by Victor Hugo, Lamartine still touches the sensitive reader by the sincerity of his emotions and the exaltation of his ideals. He has been called, not without reason, the first of the great romantic poets of France.

The Lake, composed in 1817, and usually considered his best short poem, describes his return to Le Bourget after the death of his mistress, with whom he had previously visited that place. The translations of The Lake and The Butterfly (1823) are by Wilfrid Thorley in Fleurs de Lys, Boston, Houghton Mifflin Co.; To a Flower is translated by Lilian White Spencer, Poet Lore, XXXVI, 1925.

✓THE LAKE

Thus ever drawn toward far shores uncharted,

Into eternal darkness borne away,

May we not ever on Time's sea, un-thwarted,

Cast anchor for a day?

O lake! Now hardly by a year grown older,

And nigh the well-known waves her eyes should greet,

Behold! I sit alone on this same boulder
Thou knewest for her seat.

Thus didst thou murmur in thy rocky haven,

Thus didst thou shatter on its stony
breast;

Thus fell the wind-flung foam on sands
engraven

Where her dear feet had prest.

One ever — rememberest thou? — in silence drifting,

'Twixt deep and sky no sound had echo
save

Afar the rowers dipping oars and lifting
Over thy waters suave.

When all at once a voice that made earth
wonder

From the charmed shore drove all the echoes wide,

And rapt the wave, not fain as I nor fonder,
And with sweet words did chide:

"Stay thou thy flight, O Time! and happy hours

Trail by with laggard feet!

Let all the savor of your delight be ours

5 Of all our days most sweet!

"Too many grieving souls to you are praying;

Nay, leave not these immune;

10 Bear off with thee their sorrows undelaying;

Leave happy souls their boon.

"Nay, but in vain I ask one gracious hour;

15 Time flies and will not hark.

I bid the night abide and dawn doth shower

His splendour down the dark.

20 "Ah! let us love, my Love, for Time is heartless,

Be happy while you may!

Man hath no Heaven and Time's coast is chartless.

He speeds; we pass away!"

Churl Time, and can it be sweet moments cherished,

Wherein love fills our lives with teeming
bliss,

30 Speed far away and be as swiftly perished
As days when sorrow is?

Nay! Ere we go may we not leave sure traces?

35 Nay! Passed forever? Beyond all reprieve?

What Time bestows on us, what Time effaces
He nevermore shall give?

Oh! everlasting night, deep pit unsounded, 5
What dost thou with engulféd days untold?
Speak! Wilt thou yield us back the bliss unbounded
Once ravished from our hold? 10

Oh! lake, mute rocks, caves, leafy woodland shading,
You whom Time spares or clothes with newer sheen,
Keep of this night, fair Nature, keep un-fading
The memory ever green!

In all thy calms and all thy tempests 20
blending,
Fair lake, and in thy forelands' smiling fronts,
In thy dark pines and thy wild cliffs impending
Over thy crystal founts,

In the winds passing, with a trembling
lightness,
Heard in the echoes that thy shores 30
throw far,
Seen in the beams that fall with sheeny whiteness
Wave-borne from the clear star!

Let moaning breezes thro' the rushes gliding,
All perfume stirring thy sweet air above,
All seen or heard or breathéd bear this tiding,
"Hereby they once did love!"

✓THE BUTTERFLY

Coming with the daffodils and dying with the roses,
Wafted by the zephyr's wing athwart
the spaces high,
Lurking in the flower's bloom or e'er its breast uncloses,

Reeling with sweet draughts of scent,
and light and deep blue sky;
Shaking wide its dusty wings and like the breezes breasting
Burdenless and innocent the sky's eternal steep: —
Thus doth fare the butterfly like hope that,
never resting,
Rifies all but cannot quench desire that,
ever questing,
Bears it home to heaven again for lasting joy and deep.

15 •TO A FLOWER (PRESSED IN AN ALBUM)

I do remember. It was by the sea
And southern skies had called me there,
Pure skies that arch forever cloudlessly.
I breathed, beneath a verdant canopy,
The sweetness of mild summer air.

The deep extended, blue and limitless,
To the horizon's utmost bound,
25 And on me from a tree of happiness,
Snowed orange blossoms in a pale caress,
While perfumes mounted from the ground.

You twined about a column; whose prone shaft
Lies near a temple time has felled;
And crowned it with your beauty, as you laughed
On its dull length, delighting there to 35 waft
Balm, in your floating tendrils held.

O flower, that adorned this ruined place,
With none to know or to admire,
40 I gathered to my heart your lovely face
And carried off your delicate white grace,
Whose fragrance I would still respire!

But now, the sky, the temple, and the shore
Have vanished in the faraway.
45 The scent has disappeared that once you
bore;
The page on which you lie holds nothing
more
Than traces of a dear dead day.

HUGO

(1802-1885)

Victor Marie Hugo was the son of an army officer, Sigisbert Hugo, who later rose high in military circles, and Sophie Trebuchet, daughter of a royalist ship-owner in Nantes. Hugo was intended for a military career and accompanied his father on his campaigns against Italy and Spain. His first collected verses (Odes and Ballades, 1822-26), in which he appears as a loyal Catholic and subject of the king, reveal him even at this early age as a skillful versifier. In 1822, having received a pension of 1000 francs from Louis XVIII, he married Adèle Foucher. In the next two years he produced two novels which showed that he had already abandoned the classical tradition for the romantics. In 1830, with Hernani, he announced the departure of drama from the classical tradition. Then followed The King's Amusement (1832), Lucrecia Borgia (1833), Mary Tudor (1833), Angelo (1835), and Ruy Blas (1838). In these Hugo continued his indifference to the dramatic unities, his free treatment of alexandrines, and his juxtaposition of comic and serious scenes; but he retained the declamatory style. Strong in lyric effect and good in certain separate scenes, his dramas were nevertheless lacking in essentially dramatic qualities, and, except for Hernani, never gained great fame on the stage. His novel Notre Dame de Paris, with an elastic framework of a story of striking contrasts, presents the cathedral almost as a hero. The July revolution changed Hugo's political and religious views. In Songs at Twilight (1835), while he remains loyally royalist he voices objections based on social sympathy. Religious doubts appeared in Voices from Within (1837) and in Lights and Shadows (1840). When after the July Revolution Hugo was chosen a member of the Constitutional Assembly, he began as a conservative but soon shifted to the extreme Left; for he had always leaned toward freedom of the people and popular sovereignty. In 1851 his political opinions caused his flight to the Island of Guernsey. Returning in 1870, he published The Legend of the Centuries, an extraordinary succession of pictures representing the progress of man from earliest times to the present. In 1862 appeared Les Misérables, followed four years later by Toilers of the Sea. For the rest of his life he was active in politics, holding offices in the National Assembly and in the Senate, and writing enthusiastically.

•Hugo was the leader of the Romantic movement in France. It is doubtful that any other century has had a writer who could make his own time stand out before his contemporaries in such majestic proportions. He represents both the glories and the excesses of romanticism, — the love of humanity and progress, the poetic thinking, the enthusiasm, the polished poetic style, as well as the enormous egotism, the theatricality, and the disregard of reason. It may be said that Hugo was somewhat too much inclined toward flamboyant rhetoric and unwieldy meditations, but even these defects were concomitants of a genius for magnificent sweeping effects and great panoramic pictures.

After the Battle, written ca. 1860, and Ecstasy (1828), are from the translation of Lilian White Spencer, Poet Lore, XXVI (1925). The Future is translated by Algernon Warren, Poetry Review, VII (1916). The Djinns (1828) is translated by John L. O'Sullivan, The Comprehensive Speaker, ed. Henry T. Coates, the Werner Co., Chicago and New York, 1871, 1894.

AFTER THE BATTLE

My father, of all heroes, kindest,
 Attended by the soldier he loved best (Both for his mighty courage and his height)
 Rode, where the battle had been fought, as
 night
 Fell on the slain, that cumbered all the ground.
 Out of the shadows came a feeble sound.
 A Spaniard of the army put to rout
 Lay by the road, his life blood ebbing out.
 Broken and groaning, on death's very brink,

He whimpered: "Pity me! A drink! A drink!"

My father offered then, to his hussar,
 A gourd that hung beside his saddle bar.

"Poor wounded man! Give this to him," he said.

The soldier bent above the livid head
 Of one, whose mongrel blood had not yet
 tired

Of hate; who clasped a pistol still and fired;

With aim directed on my father's brow;
 And cried: "Die, Enemy, I curse you
 now!"

The ball skimmed close — so close his horse reared — then,
“Give him the drink,” my father said
again.

•ECSTASY

We walked the strand together, night and 5
I;
No sail disturbed the deep, no cloud, the
sky.
My gaze plunged far in infinite mystery
Of wood and hill, and every living thing 10
Appeared to question with faint murmur-
ing
The fires of heaven and the waves of sea.

The voices of these golden stars then cried,
The countless harmonies. Thus, they 15 replied;
With crowns bent downward in a fiery nod;
While those blue waters that no man arrests 20
Spoke with them, curving back their foamy crests;
In one great hail: “Behold the Lord, our God!”

25

THE FUTURE

I

What though the end be nigh, 30
What though life's stream be dry,
Wherefore repine?
Life to the human race
Varies in time and space,
Souls are divine. 35

II

It is your soul that high
Up to the heavenly sky 40
Shortly will soar.
Leaving behind the pain,
Trouble and murm'ring strain,
Free evermore. 45

III

Be like the bird that sings,
Trusting to strength of wings,

Though the twig bend
On which it rests its feet,
Pouring out song so sweet,
Wait for the end.

✓THE DJINNS

Town, tower,
Shore, deep
Where lower
Cliffs steep;
Waves gray,
Where play
Winds gay, —
All sleep.

Hark! a sound,
Far and slight,
Breathes around
On the night:
High and higher
Nigh and nigher,
Like a fire
Roaring bright.

Now on 'tis sweeping
With rattling beat,
Like dwarf imp leaping
In gallop fleet:
He flies, he prances,
In frolic fancies,
On wave-crest dances
With pattering feet.

Hark, the rising swell,
With each nearer burst!
Like the toll of bell
Of a convent cursed;
Like the billowy roar
On a storm-lashed shore, —
Now hushed, now once more
Maddening to its worst.

O God! the deadly sound
Of the Djinns' fearful cry!
Quick, 'neath the spiral round
Of the deep staircase fly!
See, see our lamplight fade!
And of the balustrade
Mounts, mounts the circling shade
Up to the ceiling high!

'Tis the Djinns' wild streaming swarm
 Whistling in their tempest flight;
 Snap the tall yews 'neath the storm,
 Like a pine-flame crackling bright.
 Swift and heavy, lo, their crowd
 Through the heavens rushing loud,
 Like a livid thunder-cloud
 With its bolt of fiery night!

5

Ha! they are on us, close without!
 Shut tight the shelter where we lie!
 With hideous din the monster rout,
 Dragon and vampire, fill the sky!
 The loosened rafter overhead
 Trembles and bends like quivering reed; 15
 Shakes the old door with shuddering dread,
 As from its rusty hinge 'twould fly!

10

Wild cries of hell! voices that howl and shriek!
 The horrid swarm before the tempest tossed —
 O Heaven! — descends my lowly roof to seek:
 Bends the strong wall beneath the furious 25
 host.
 Totters the house, as though, like dry leaf shorn
 From autumn bough and on the mad blast
 borne,
 Up from its deep foundations it were 30 torn
 To join the stormy whirl. Ah! all is lost!

20

30

O Prophet! if thy hand but now
 Save from these foul and hellish things, 35
 A pilgrim at thy shrine I'll bow,
 Laden with pious offerings.
 Bid their hot breath its fiery rain
 Stream on my faithful door in vain, 40
 Vainly upon my blackened pane
 Grate the fierce claws of their dark wings!

35

40

They have passed! — and their wild legion
 Cease to thunder at my door;
 Fleeting through night's rayless re- 45
 gion,
 Hither they return no more.

45

Clanking chains and sounds of woe
 Fill the forests as they go;
 And the tall oaks cower low,
 Bent their flaming flight before.

On! on! the storm of wings
 Bears far the fiery fear,
 Till scarce the breeze now brings
 Dim murmurings to the ear;
 Like locusts' humming hail,
 Or thrash of tiny flail
 Plied by the pattering hail
 On some old roof-tree near.

Fainter now are borne
 Fitful mutterings still;
 As, when Arab horn
 Swells its magic peal,
 Shoreward o'er the deep
 Fairy voices sweep,
 And the infant's sleep
 Golden visions fill.

Each deadly Djinn,
 Dark child of fright,
 Of death and sin,
 Speeds the wild flight.
 Hark, the dull moan,
 Like the deep tone
 Of ocean's groan,
 Afar, by night!

More and more
 Fades it now,
 As on shore
 Ripples flow, —
 As the plaint
 Far and faint
 Of a saint
 Murmured low.

Hark! hist!
 Around,
 I list!
 The bounds
 Of space
 All trace
 Efface
 Of sound.

SPANISH

ESPRONCEDA

(1808-1842)

José de Espronceda was son of a colonel in the Spanish army. He was born in a shepherd's cabin while his parents were on the march with the army. He went to school at Madrid, where he showed early promise of poetic ability. As he approached maturity he conceived an ever-increasing love of liberty and hatred of political tyranny that led him into many plots against the existing government, and caused him to spend a great part of his life either as a prisoner or as a refugee. He took part in the Revolution of 1830 in Paris and in the glorious but unsuccessful attempt to dethrone Ferdinand of Spain. The proclamation of amnesty upon the king's death made it possible for him to return openly to Spain in 1833 and take up a calmer life. His literary reputation grew steadily; and in 1840 the publication of a volume of his poems brought him before the reading public as one of the leading poets of his time. Like many other continental poets of this period, Espronceda was an intense admirer of Byron and shows Byron's influence directly or indirectly in many of his poems. In his passionate devotion to humanity, his strong feeling of revolt mingled with despair and disillusion, he is the chief representative of the Spanish romantic school.

The Hymn to the Sun (1834) is an example of the great body of European poetry inspired by the Ossianic poems of James Macpherson. It is majestic and powerful in expression and superior in effect to the Ossianic Hymn to the Sun, in making no attempt to represent primitive pagan emotions, but aiming rather at an expression of modern reverence for Nature. The translation is that of Ida Farnell in Spanish Prose and Poetry Old and New, Oxford, 1920.

• HYMN TO THE SUN

Hail to thee, Sun! Oh, list and stay thy course!

To thee in ecstasy I make my prayer,
The while my soul, aglow with fire like
thine,

Uplifts her wings and boldly cleaves the
air,

To pay her tribute to thy power divine.

Oh, that this voice of mine in wondrous
wise,

Rending the clouds asunder,

To thee, great Sun, might rise,

Drowning with words sublime the dreaded thunder,

And, in the heavens' blue vault,

Bidding thee in thy mighty journey halt!

Oh, that the inner flame which lights the
mind

Would lend its virtue to my feeble sight,

So that no longer with thy beams made
blind

Mine eager eyes I might undazzled raise,

And on thy radiant face, divinely bright,

Might even dare to rest my constant gaze!

How I have ever loved thee, glorious Sun!

A child, with wondering eyes,

My life but just begun,

How oft I longed to reach thee in the skies;

5 And on what rapture fed

As thy great chariot on its pathway sped!

From where the Orient rears his golden crest,

Whose borders Ocean girds with many a pearl,

E'en to the limits of the shadowy West

The dazzling hem of thy bright garment gleams,

And thou thy shining banner dost un-furl,

And bathest all the world in thy pure streams.

From thy broad brow the light of day thou sendest,

Great source of life and seat,

And of thy calm, majestic disk thou lendest

25 The fertilizing heat,

Amid the spheres on high

Rising triumphant in the azure sky.

Calmly thou scal'st the Zenith's golden
 height,
 In Heaven's high hall enthroned supreme thou reignest,
 And there with living flames and splendour
 5 And wilt thou ever see 10 The ages rise and fall, and yield their place
 Thy fiery steeds thou reinest.
 In never-ending change like restless waves,
 From thence full speedily thy way thou
 That, hurrying o'er the Ocean, crowd and takest,
 break,
 Till down the steep incline
 Recede, then sweep along in their fierce Thy rich and trailing locks of gold thou chase?
 shakest
 Whilst thou, O Sun, triumphant and On Ocean's heaving, tremulous floor of sublime,
 brine;
 15 In lonely splendour dwellest,
 Then in deep, watery bowers
 Eternal witness of the march of time.
 Thy glory dies away,
 And wilt thou unextinguished thus abide,
 And one more day Eternity devours.
 And will thy giant furnace burn for aye,
 Its fierceness unconsumed? Wilt thou, O
 Sun,
 Thus proudly through the heavens go thy
 way,
 What ages, Sun, what ages hast thou seen,
 Thus swallowed by the gulf no plummet
 20 measures,
 What mighty nations, what imperial pride,
 What pomp and splendour, and what heaped up treasures!
 'Fore thee, what were they? Leaves blown 25 far and wide
 From the great forest — withered, light and sear,
 Eddying, all tempest-tossed,
 Till the blast drove them hence, and they 30 were lost.
 And thou, alone from wrath divine exempt,
 Hast seen submerged all the sinful world,
 When driving rains were by Jehovah poured
 On man and beast; the pent up winds were hurled
 O'er heaving seas, and loud the billows roared;
 From rifted cloud the deafening thunder
 40 pealed
 In dreadful menace; and in anguished throes
 The Earth upon her diamond axle swayed;
 O'er hill and plain uprose
 One huge, tumultuous sea — a watery grave?
 Trembled the mighty deep,
 While thou, our lord, as one awake from
 sleep,
 Above the stormy waste didst build thy throne,
 Robed in funeral black,
 With face that darkly gleams,
 Till on new worlds thou sendest healing beams.
 35 Rejoice then, Sun, in this thy strength and youth,
 For, when the dreaded day draws nigh at
 last,
 The day when thou from thy great throne
 wilt fall
 (Loosed from the mighty hands
 Of Him that all commands),
 And in eternity shalt hide thy Ball,
 45 In thousand fragments shattered, wrecked and torn,
 Immersed in seas of fire,
 Thy course accomplished, and thy strength
 outworn,
 50 Then thy pure flame in darkness, of a truth,
 Will wholly cease, thy glory be o'erpast,
 Shrouded for ever by the pall of night,
 No vestige left of thy refulgent light.

(1817-1893)

José Zorrilla was born in Valladolid, where his father had a post in the Royal Chancery. When he was ten years old his parents went to Madrid and he was sent to the Royal School for the Sons of the Noblemen. He read many books by English and French romanticists, and also by the older Spanish writers, and took part in plays by Lope de Vega and Calderón. In 1832 he was sent to the University of Toledo to study law. He took little interest in his law work, preferred the romantic poets and the old Spanish legends and ballads, and soon withdrew from the University and went to Madrid, where he lived in poverty but had time to devote himself exclusively to writing. In 1837 appeared his first volume of poetry, chiefly imitations of Lamartine and Hugo. This volume, although of no special excellence, attracted the principal literary men of the day, including the great poet Espronceda. During the next few years Zorrilla gradually drifted away from the French romantics, and in 1840 published The Songs of a Troubadour, in which he sang of Spain and the Catholic faith, subjects that took far deeper hold on him and on his readers than those on which he had previously written. In 1849 appeared his play Don Juan Tenorio. In 1852 he brought out the famous Granada and in 1867 The Drama of the Soul. His life from 1855 to 1866 was saddened by his enforced absence in Mexico, where he had fled from debts and political difficulties. When he returned he was unexpectedly welcomed on all sides as a great literary man, and from that time was the most popular of Spanish poets, was elected a member of the Academia in 1885, and in 1889 was publicly crowned at Granada with magnificent ceremony. The festivities after his coronation no doubt hastened his death, for he fell ill almost immediately and never recovered.

Zorrilla was a prolific writer. Critics have complained that he wrote too much, too hurriedly; his poetry often exhibits the signs of haste — redundancy, verbosity, and a lack of balance and unevenness of finish. Nevertheless, there is irresistible spirit in his enthusiasm for his country and his religion, and great vivacity and richness of language in his verse; and whoever would reproach Zorrilla that he did not distinguish himself for profundity of thought must remember that he was at least profoundly Spanish, and that he belonged to a time that cared more for intensity of personal feeling and for sympathy with human emotion than for thought.

The following translations are by Ella Crosby-Heath, Poetry Review, XVI, 1925.

SPAIN! I RETURN TO THEE!

Spain! I return to thee!
So far have I fared away
Ne'er hoped I thy skies to see!
If I die not of ecstasy
Ne'er shall I be death's prey!

Oh! let me kiss thy ground
Humbly, on bended knees!
My happy tears abound
And I yield myself to these;
My joy with prayer is crowned!

Spain of my soul! Ne'er has passed
A day when I pleaded not
That God would hold thee fast
In His love; and now, at long last,
Hast thou thy son forgot?

God sent me with all my load¹
Of sorrow afar to weep;

And from over the sea I bestowed
Upon Spain, in my heart hid deep,
A song with each tear that flowed.

5 God! Who knows how in all my sore
Long exile beyond the sea
I hoped to come home, counting o'er
Each slow hour, forsake not me.
Now I tread Spain's soil once more!

10

from ORIENTALES

Fair Christian captive, dry thine eyes,
I prithee, cease to torture me;
15 Look, my Sultana! A paradise,
A second Eden I give to thee.
Here in Granada my palace lies,
Its gardens full of fragrant flowers,
And from its golden fountains rise
20 A hundred jets in sparkling showers.
And in the city, Genil's queen,
I have a fortress, grey and old,

That first amongst all forts shall reign,
 When it thy beauty shall enfold.
 The lands along the river's side
 Are mine, where swiftly Genil flows;
 Such sovereignty, domain so wide 5
 Nor Cordova nor Seville knows.
 There the tall palm tree lifts its head;
 And the bright-flaming pomegranate,
 With the laden fig-tree's blossoms red,
 Crown hill and dale of my estate. 10

And I will give thee velvets rare,
 And perfumes sweet from Araby,
 And scarves from Greece; and thou shalt
 wear 15
 Shawls brought from far Kashmir to thee.
 With many a soft and snowy plume
 Thy lovely brow I will adorn,
 Whiter and softer than the spume
 That on our Eastern seas is borne. 20
 And pearls thy braided hair shall deck,
 And cooling baths the heat eclipse,
 And necklaces shall clasp thy neck,
 And love shall burn upon thy lips. 25

THE TALE OF LOVE

Past is the burning
 Of summer's heat,
 The poplar leaves 30
 Are reddening;

Clean, threshing floor;
 Grain garnered, sweet;
 Ripe fruits await
 The gathering.

Midst the broad leaves
 Of the fertile vine
 Hang ripening grapes
 In clusters thick;
 Those lately black
 Are ruddy as wine;
 Those white and clear
 Are ready to pick.

Oh! murmuring wind,
 On thy soft wings
 That brush dead leaves,
 There come to me
 Of the spirit-world
 Its secret things;
 My soul responds
 To their mystery.

Spirits these are
 Of life and truth;
 Wind, tell me why
 Within me throng
 The memories sweet
 Of vanished youth,
 Lost dreams and hope
 Delayed too long?

ITALIAN

LEOPARDI

(1798-1837)

The life of Giacomo Leopardi, the greatest Italian poet of the nineteenth century, comprises almost exactly the period usually regarded as the Age of Romanticism (1798-1832) in England. His parents were both of noble birth but limited fortunes. Leopardi was educated during his childhood by private tutors, but, being extraordinarily precocious, he began at the age of ten to study independently, and became so devoted to his books that, unfortunately for his health, he neglected the normal occupations of a young boy. The interests of his earlier years were entirely scientific and gave no prophecy of his future achievements in imaginative literature. His poetic imagination was perhaps first stimulated by his work in translating one of the Idylls of Moschus into Italian in 1815. By 1817 Leopardi's attitude toward life had been almost completely altered, partly under the influence of Giordani, an influential man of letters, who helped to confirm him in his change. Leopardi's ill-health prevented his following any of the usual occupations, and the uncertainty of his religious and political views excluded him from appointment to ecclesiastical or government sinecures. His inner revolution left him depressed and hopeless. The great Russian historian Neibuhr procured for him two flattering offers of chairs in great German universities, which he declined because of his health. In spite of obstacles he remained at home under the eye of his father, composing poetry and adjusting himself to life.

In 1822 he was allowed to visit Rome. The visit was not pleasing to him and he was glad to return home in 1823. In 1824 a small volume of his poetry was published. The next year, in Bologna, he was in close touch with a very active group of literary men. In 1827 he went for his health to Florence, and here, as at Bologna, became acquainted with a number of distinguished men of letters, among whom was Manzoni, famous author of The Betrothed. For the next six years, although a hopeless invalid, he managed to produce editions of various classical authors, to carry on his studies, and to compose a surprising amount of lyrical poetry. In 1833 his friends took him to Naples. His health improved slightly and he remained there until his death.

Throughout his career Leopardi felt keenly for the welfare of Italy. The contrast between her condition then and her glorious past inspired his bitterest resentment, and many critics see in his national poems only the unworthy complaints of a sick and disappointed man. Whether or not his dark picture of life is justifiable, one cannot deny that it is conceived with remarkable clarity and clothed in verse of the first quality. Leopardi has been called the Byron of Italy. This name may serve as a convenient catch-word, but Leopardi's tortured protest against the pain of life is connected with the Byronic attitude only in so far as it forms a part of a world-wide tendency during the age of Romanticism.

To Italy (1818) and To Angelo Mai (1820) are translated by Geoffrey L. Bickersteth in The Poems of Leopardi.

TO ITALY

My native land, I do the walls behold,
The arches, columns, statues and deserted
Towers by our forbears builded,
But not the glory, not
The laurel and the weapons that of old
Our fathers bore. Now from thine arm-mour parted,
Unhelmed thy forehead and thy breast 10
unshielded,
How pale thou art! What blood Streams from thy wounds! Oh, blasted with what curse
Do I behold thee, Fairest of the fair!
I cry to Man and God:
Who brought her unto this? To this and worse,
For lo, with fetters both her arms are laden;
So that, unveiled and with dishevelled
hair,
She sits upon the ground, forlorn and sad,
Hiding her face, poor maiden,
Between her knees, and weeps.
Weep on, for well thou mayest, my Italy,
In good days and in bad
Born to subject the nations unto thee.

If, like two living streams, the tears should break
From out thine eyes, yet know
They ne'er could match thy ruin and thy
shame;

Once mistress, whose is now a handmaid's
lot.

Who write of thee or speak,
Remembering thy pride of long ago,
5 But say: she once was great and now is not?

Wherefore, oh wherefore? Where is the old strength,

Where are the arms, the valour, the faithfulness?

Who hath ungirt thy brand?

Who sold thee? What craft or what toil at length

Availed, what strong duress,

15 To strip thee of thy robe and golden crown?

Thou, who so high didst stand,
How fellst thou to such low estate? Or when?

20 Will no one fight for thee? None of thine own

Defend thee? — Arms, bring arms! Alone will I

Do battle, lone on stricken field expire.

25 Grant heaven my blood may then
In all Italian bosoms burn like fire.

Where are thy sons? A sound is borne to me

30 Of arms, of wheels, of voices, of drums.

In foreign lands a bitter

War do thy children wage.

Look, look, Italia. I see, or seem to see,

A wave of horse and infantry that 35 comes

Rushing thro' dust and smoke, and blades that glitter

Like lightning among clouds.

Dost thou not hope? To which side
Victory nods

Darest thou not enquire with tremulous
eyes?

For what cause fight in crowds

Thy young men in yon fields? Ye gods, ye gods:

For another country fight Italia's sons.¹
Oh, wretched he, who fallen in battle
dies,

Not for his native shores and faithful wife
And cherished little ones,

But slain by the foes of others

For others' cause, nor can in dying say:

Dear mother-land, the life

Thou gav'st me, lo, I give thee back this day.

Oh, fortune-favoured and belov'd and
blest

The days of old, when men

To die for their dear country rushed in throngs;

And thou, Thessalian Pass,² which art with new

Honour and praise addressed

In every age, where strove, but strove in vain,

Persia and Fate with a free, gallant few!

Methinks that to the traveller evermore

Thy trees and rocks, thy streams and mountains tell

In murmurous undertone

How in battalions all along that shore

Lay heaped the unconquerable

Corpses devoted to the cause of Greece.

Then, shamed and overthrown,

Fled war-like Xerxes o'er the Hellespont,

A laughing-stock to men till time shall cease;

And up Anthela's hill whereon by dying

Escaped from death the consecrated band,

Simonides³ did mount,

Gazing upon the sky and sea and land.

² Thermopylæ, a mountain pass in Thessaly where Leonidas, in 480 B.C., with a force of three hundred Spartans and seven hundred Thespians, withstood Xerxes's Persian army for several days. They fought until all were slain.

³ A Greek poet who composed an epitaph on the Spartans slain at Thermopylæ.

And, as he gazed, both cheeks bedewed with tears,

His bosom heaving, scarcely stumbling on,
His fingers swept the lyre:

5 Blest and thrice blest are ye,

Who with your bosoms stemmed the hostile spears

For love of her that gave you to the Sun;

Ye, whom Greece worships and all lands admire.

10 What love was that which drew

Your young hearts to the perils of the fray,

Love which deprived death of his bitter
sting?

How was it that to you,

My sons, your last hour seemed a holiday,

So that towards the drear, relentless gate

Ye ran with laughter, as though hurrying

20 Unto a dance or to some banquet splendid?

But Tartarus lay in wait

For you, and the dead water;

Beside you wives and sons no vigil kept,

What time your lives were ended

On that harsh shore; ye died un-kissed, unwept.

Ay, but not unavenged, for Persia's pangs

Were sharp, her grief undying.

Even as a lion among a herd of bulls

Will, look you! leap on one and, leaping, gore

35 Its back with cruel fangs,

Now at its flank, now thigh, with fury flying;

So 'mid the droves of Persians with a roar

Of anger leapt each fiery-hearted Greek.

40 See horses upon horsemen tumbled; see

Chariot and fallen tent

Obstruct the vanquished as to escape they seek,

And of the first to flee

45 Behold the tyrant's self, dishevelled, pale;

See how with blood besprent,

Barbarians' blood, the Grecian heroes
fight,

Cause to the Persians of unending bale,
Till, little by little yielding to their wounds,
One on the other falls. Oh, deathless deed!
While men can speak or write,
Be glory and honour unto you decreed.

Uprooted, seawards hurtling through the gloom,
Quenched in the deep the stars shall hissing 10
 fall,
Or ever we allow
Our hearts to forget to love you.
As to an altar, mothers to your tomb
Shall bring their little ones and show them 15
 all
The fair marks of your blood. Behold I bow
Myself unto the ground,
Ye blessed, and I kiss this earth, these 20
 stones,
Which shall from pole to pole for evermore
Be lauded and renowned.
Ah, would that mine were mingled with your bones,
That this rich soil with my blood too were wet.
But if my doom is different and in war
Forbids me close these aged eyes fulfilling
My country's call, may yet
Ev'n so the unpretentious
Fame of your poet all the ages down,
An but the gods be willing,
Endure as long as shall endure your own.

♣ TO ANGELO MAI¹

Upon his Discovery of the Manuscript of
 Cicero's De Republica

Dauntless Italian, wilt thou never cease
Thus from their tombs to raise
Our ancestors and summon them to speak
To this dead century, on which there weighs
Such leaden lassitude? Why dost thou break
So thunderous, so insistent on our ears,
Voice of our sires of old,

That hast so long been dumb? And wherefore these
So many resurrections? Parchments find
A sudden eloquence; until these years
5 Lay hidden in cloistral mould
The sacred sayings and golden sentences
Of our forefathers. Hath, then, Fate assigned
To thee, O great Italian, a god's own
 strength?
Or met, perchance, in Man her match at length?

In sooth unless by deep design of heaven
It could not be that now,
When most profound our desperate
 lethargy,
At every moment, like a repeated blow,
Our sires should shout afresh. To Italy
Heaven, then, is gracious still; even yet are we
To some Immortal dear:
For, since 'tis now the hour or ne'er again
To whet by use the long corroded might 25 Of the Italian nature, lo we see
That dead men cry so clear
And loud, and that the very soil would fain
Lay bare forgotten heroes to our sight,
30 Asking, my land, if thou e'en yet dost
 please
To play the coward in times so late as these.

35 Of us retain ye still, O glorious souls,
Some hope? Nor have we quite Perished? From you perhaps hath not been ta'en
Foreknowledge of events. Me pitchy
40 night
Engulfs, nor have I any shield from pain;
For dark the future is to me, and all
That I can now discern
Makes hope seem empty. Spirits sublime,
45 a base,
Unhonoured mob inheriteth the homes
Once yours. All words and deeds ye used to call
Noble, your offspring turn

¹ Angelo Mai, librarian of the Vatican, was the outstanding classical scholar of Leopardi's time. The poem celebrates the discovery of a second-century manuscript containing the greater part of six books of Cicero's works. The manuscript was a palimpsest, in which a commentary of St. Augustine on the Psalms was written over the work of Cicero.

To mockery; at your deathless fame no
face
Blushes, no heart feels envy; your old
Rome's
Glory is quenched in sloth, and we have made Unto ourselves a shame that shall not fade.

O heaven-born genius, now when others neglect
Our lofty parentage,
Do thou pay heed thereto — thou, on whom Fate
So kindly breathes, that by thy hand the
age
Returns once more, when from the insatiate
Gulf of forgetfulness, with all their powers
Of buried learning, rose
The ancient spirits divine, with whom conversed Nature, but Nature veiled, whereby they cheered
In Rome and Athens great men's idle
hours.
Oh, times that now repose
Eternally! when still the future nursed
The ruin of Italy, when still appeared Foul sloth contemptible, and when the wind
Blew from this soil sparks unto all mankind.

For when thy sacred ashes¹ were still warm,
Indomitable foe
Of fortune, thou whose proud and anguished spirit
Scorned earth and found relief in hell
below,
In hell: and where's the clime that doth not merit
To be preferred to ours? And thy sweet strings
Still trembled at the touch
Of thy skilled fingers, O disconsolate
Lover.² Alas, of suffering aye was born
Italian song. And yet no sorrow stings
And burdens us so much

As doth this stifling tedium. Blest thy fate
Whose life was tears! For tears too weary-worn
Even as babes were we; and motionless
Above our cradle and grave sits Nothingness.

But thine was life then, star-led mariner,³
Liguria's dauntless child,
When, past the Pillars, past the shores
which heard,
Or seemed to hear, at fall of eve the wild
Waves, as the sun dipped, hiss, thou undeterred
By the wide waste of waters didst discover
The set Sun's rays and skies
Reddening with dawn while night invades
our own;
And by thy voyage and perilous return,
All Nature's obstacles now triumphed over,
Was gained for glorious prize
A great, new land. Ah, but the world, when known,
Grows not, but rather shrinks, the more we learn.
Ocean, rich earth, the sounding atmosphere
To boys far vaster than to the sage appear.

Whither have fled our light-winged phantasies
Of unknown regions haunted
By unknown denizens or of the inn
Where stars are lodged by day, the far enchanted
Couch of the young Aurora and that unseen
Sleep of the largest planet through the
night?
Lo, they have all clean vanished;
Pent in a narrow map the globe is charted;
All things are uniform: discovery Shows but a widening blank. Comes truth to light,
Belov'd imagining: our minds are parted
From thee forever; now no longer lie

The years enthralled beneath thy potent spell;
Fled is the charm that soothed our woes
so well.

Thou wast the while awakening to sweet dreams,
On thee the first sun shone,
Entrancing bard¹ of loves and armoured knights,
Which, in an age than ours less frowned

By fortune, peopled life with feigned delights:

New hope of Italy! O towers, O cells,
O dames, O cavaliers,
O palaces, O gardens! Dreaming of you,
My spirit wanders midst a thousand vain Enchantments. Empty visions, romantic spells,

Strange joys, delicious fears Formed then the stuff of human life: we threw

Them all away: and what doth now remain,

When the green tree is dry? The sole belief,

The certain fact, that all is vain save grief.

O Tasso, Tasso, heaven was then prepar- 30
ing

For thee nought else save wrongs,
For us a poet, sublime as e'er man saw.
O miserable Tasso, thy sweet songs
Availed not to console thee or to thaw
The frost wherewith thine ardent spirit was seared

By hatred and the fell
Envy alike of prince and courtier. Love,
Love, which is life's supreme and last 40
deceit,

Forsook thee. Nothingness to thee appeared

Shade, which was palpable
And real, the world a wilderness. To move 45
Thy torpor tardy honours availed not.

Sweet,
Not bitter, was thine end. 'Tis not a wreath

That one who has known our ills desires,
but death.

5 Come back, come back to us, rise from the dumb

And unrejoicing tomb,
If fain of suffering, O pattern thou
Of woe-begone humanity. The gloom
And crime, which unto thee seemed black 10 enow,

Are blacker far to-day. O poet dear,
Who now for thy distress,
When each man cares for self alone, would
weep?

15 Who would not nowadays call thy mortal
woe

Crazy lamenting, if the great and rare
Be dubbed mere foolishness;

If, tho' no longer envied, genius reap
20 The worse reward of being neglected?

Who,
When men love ledgers more than loftiest rhyme,

Would offer thee the laurel a second time?

25 From thee, unfortunate spirit, till this hour

Man hath arisen not one,
Worthy the name Italian, saving only

30 The war-like Allobrogian.² He alone Matched not his craven age: to him in lonely

Glory was given by God, not by this tired
And sapless land of mine,

35 Male virtue in his heart. Single, unarmed
(Oh, memorable daring!) with his plays
He warred on tyrants. Let weak wills be fired —

Such was his great design — 40 At least in this vain strife where none is harmed,

To learn true warfare. First and alone to raise

The flag was he; none followed, for we lie
45 Deep drowned in sloth and bestial apathy.

Disdainful and defiant he held straight
on

Through all his life unswerving,

¹ Ariosto.

² Vittorio Alfieri (1749-1803), Italian dramatist. Perhaps he was not of sufficient literary genius to be classed with Petrarch, Ariosto and Tasso, but he was interesting to Leopardi as the first modern Italian to preach an Italian national rehabilitation.

And, ere the bad had grown yet worse, he died.	Thus levelling all. O famed discoverer, be
This land, this age, of thee were unde- serving,	Unresting; wake the dead, Since the quick sleep; bid the old heroes
Vittorio mine: let genius be the pride	5 rise
Of other countries, other times, since we	And scourge us with their tongues, until
Lounge thro' existence, led	this vain
By mediocrity; and lo, the wise	And rotting age, revitalised, shall rush
Have sunk, the vulgar mounted, to one	To emulate their deeds, or learn to plane,	10 blush.

RUSSIAN

PUSHKIN

(1799-1837)

Alexander Pushkin, the most important Russian writer of the Age of Romanticism, was born of a noble family in Moscow. His early education, like that of any young nobleman of his day, was mainly French. He attended the Lyceum at Tsarskoe Selo, a suburb of St. Petersburg. His favorite writer during his school days was Voltaire, and his earliest writings were in French instead of Russian.

In 1817 he joined the government service as a Foreign Official. From 1817 to 1820 he was interested chiefly in the writing of amorous verses and in the humorous treatment of Russian tradition, somewhat in the manner of Ariosto (q.v.) but without Ariosto's irony and emotional power. His best work in this period was the verse romance Ruslan and Liudmila (1820).

Unfortunately Pushkin incurred the suspicion of radicalism and was transferred (practically banished) to the Caucasus. This banishment, although it weighed heavily upon his spirit, proved a benefit to literature; for some of his greatest works grew directly or indirectly out of his exile. During this period he learned English and Italian and abandoned Voltaire for Byron, whose influence is seen in The Prisoner of the Caucasus (1822). The verse romance, Eugene Onegin (1828), really the first Russian novel, grew out of an idea which Pushkin got from Byron's Beppo. It would be easy to misrepresent the importance of Pushkin's debt, however, for he was by no means an imitator of Byron; rather, Pushkin found in Byron the key to himself.

Upon Pushkin's return from exile (1824) Byron yielded in his estimation to Shakespeare, the study of whom inspired Boris Godunov (1831), usually considered his masterpiece. Later, Pushkin devoted himself to history and to subjects of Russian country life. His short stories, close, moving studies of the rural population, anticipated Gogol. It is characteristic of Pushkin as a literary artist that his prose should be no less notable than his poetry. His work is marked throughout by a fine interweaving of pathos and humor, somewhat in the manner of Byron and the Italian writers, and by a rare combination of excellent craftsmanship and accurate poetic vision. It is likely that Russia owes to him also, more than to anyone else, the sloughing off of theatricality and pompousness from the language of literature.

The Battle of Poltava (ca. 1828) describes the defeat of Charles XII of Sweden by Peter the Great of Russia, whose victory marks the fall of Charles and the rise of Russia to power. The translation is that of the Rev. C. T. Wilson, M.A., in Russian Lyrics in English Verse, London, Trübner & Co., 1878.

THE BATTLE OF POLTAVA¹

I

The east is glowing with the dawn of 15	Rises in circles towards the listening
day!	sky,

But — hark! — far sounds the cannon's
thund'rous roar,

Booming o'er hill and plain; the curling smoke

¹ The battle took place in the neighborhood of the town of Poltava (Pultowa), in Russia, on the 27th of June, 1709.

And, midway, meets the morning's golden beam.

Each regiment its ranks has firmly closed;
Sharp-shooters, scattered mid the bushes,
lie;

The balls begin to roll with whistling sound,

And, fixed on muskets, stand the bayonets.
Those favourite sons of victory — the Swedes —

Burst through the earthworks' fire-en-circled mounds;

The horsemen, like the surging tide, sweep on;

With heavy tread the infantry bring up
The rear, and, full of stubborn energy,
Encourage each to more impetuous course.

On ev'ry side the battle's gory field
Rings, and flashes, in the murderous strife;
Yet is it to the keen observer clear
That war's grim fortune is already ours.

By the thick storm of bullets fiercely checked,

The foe, in heaps confused, bestrews the ground;

Rosen retires, the fight abandoning,
And Schlippenbach surrenders to our arms.
The Swedes, file after file, in death borne down,

The glory of their banners fades at length;
And — thanks be to the God of battles given —

Our every step is sealed by victory.

II

But, suddenly, a clarion voice rings out
From higher ground, and Peter, shouting,
cries,

"On, on, brave men! with God's help for your guide!"

And, by a group of valiant warriors girt,
From out his sheltering tent he cometh forth;

His eyes are sparkling mid the battle's
rage,

His countenance is turned every way,
His rapid movements bear him gloriously,
And he is like the incarnate wrath of God.

His horse is brought, led up for him to mount,

A steed most fiery, yet most docile, too;
Who scents the din of battle from afar,

And rolling round his eyeballs full of fire,
He gallops through the dust of furious
strife,

Proud of his mighty master, and himself.

5 The noon approaches: heat oppresses
all:

The battle, like tired ploughman, rests a while;

The Cossacks gallop wildly here and there;

10 The troops, refreshed, dress up their ranks
once more,

The martial music ceases from its strain,
And angry cannons, posted on the heights,
Have stopped their hungry roaring, and are dumb.

Then swiftly rolls across the lengthened
plain

One deafening shout — one mighty deep "Hurrah!"

20 The troops of their commander have caught sight.

III

25 And he, before their ranks, now passes
on,

Full of rejoicing, as the god of war:

He, with his look, devours the field of
fight;

Attending him, there moves a circling
crowd

Of nestlings, reared in Peter's own bright
nest:

They, who through all the changes of the 35 world,

They, who through hardships born in peace, and war,

Have proved themselves his comrades,
and his sons.

These were such heroes, as Sheremetef,
And Bruce, and Bauer, and Repnin's
noble form,

And he, the mighty, and all-favoured,
Prince,

45 Of lowly birth, yet fortune's darling child!

IV

But, see! where, borne before the serried ranks

Of his brave soldiers — his companions

In arms — by faithful followers upheld,

Upon a litter, pale and motionless,

Appears the wounded monarch, Swedish Charles.

His men, of stamp heroic, march behind;
His brow was furrowed, as by deepest
thought,

His features were impressed by frequent change

Of strange emotions, and solicitude:

'Tis said that he, a prey to doubtful mind,

Looked on the approaching fight unwill- 10
ingly;

Till, suddenly, with feeble wave of hand,
He moved his troops against the Russian
host.

And, now, the Imperial soldiers, marching on,

Have met their foemen in the battle's 20
smoke.

Again Poltava's furious fight begins;
Wall after wall of living men are crushed,
Mown down by bayonets. Like some dark
cloud,

Moving across the sky, the cavalry
Rush on, and furrows make in hostile
ranks;

The swords clash hand to hand in raging
strife,

Thick heaps of corpses upon heaps are piled,

Balls leap along, and tear up the hard
ground,

Hissing in the warm blood of dying men,
Swede, and Russian: spears fly, the roll of drums

Is beating, there are hurrying, cries, and 5 groans,

The roar of cannon, and the wail of pain,
And death, and hell, their victims swallow up.

VI

Hurrah! hurrah! the Swedes are giving
way;

One more attack, and soon the foe will 15 fly.

Again, like whirlwind rush the cavalry,
Their swords are blunted by the blood they
shed;

And the whole plain is by the fallen strewn,
Like to black locusts, by rude peasants
slain.

Peter, most proud and happy, keeps the feast,

His eye is beaming with full sense of joy,
25 And splendid is the banquet he prepares.

Amid the loud rejoicings of his host,
Within his tent, he welcomes to his board
His own brave warriors, and his prison-30 ers;

Speaking in words of courtesy to these,
He drinks to all, "Good health," and frankly owns

Them as his masters in the art of war.

LERMONTOV

(1814-1841)

Michael Lermontov was born in Moscow and attended school there during his childhood. At seventeen he was sent to the Guards' School in St. Petersburg to be prepared for a military career, and upon his graduation was given a commission in a Hussar regiment. His military career was interrupted by banishment resulting from verses written upon the death of Pushkin. He was sent to the Caucasus for active military service, but in a short time he was pardoned and returned to the Guards. Because of a duel he was again exiled to the Caucasus. At the same time he was doing much writing and so building up a reputation both as a fighter and as a poet. By 1838 his reputation as a writer inspired his friends to arrange for him a visit to St. Petersburg. He remained there but a short time before he returned to his regiment in the Caucasus. A few months after his return in 1841 he was killed in a duel.

Lermontov is considered one of the greatest of Russia's romantic poets. Living a little later than Pushkin, he was influenced as much by the post-Byronic poets, especially Lamartine, as he was by Byron.

The poems which follow were written between 1828 and 1841 and are here given in the translation of C. T. Wilson, Russian Lyrics in English Verse, London, Trübner and Co., 1878.

•THE PRISONER

"Open the gates, that I once more be free,
Give back the brightness of the day to me,
Give back the maiden, whom I once have loved,
Give back the steed, whose swiftness I have proved.
The tender maiden, with the soft dark
eyes,
Most fondly will I love, most dearly prize;
Upon the horse's saddle borne on high,
Like the simoom,¹ I will o'er deserts fly.

"The prison-window's high above the floor,
The lock hangs heavy on the prison-door,
The dark-eyed maid remains far, far,
away,
Amid the splendours of the harem gay;
The swiftly-footed steed is in the fields,
With the full liberty which freedom yields,
Playfully roaming o'er the ground at ease,
His mane, and tail, are floating on the breeze.

"Alone am I; the darkling walls look down Upon me, joyless, with their cold, stern, frown;
When lurid night succeedeth unto day,
The lamp burns dimly with its flickering
ray:
All, all, is silence — not a sound is stirred,
Only the footsteps echoing are heard
Of tacit sentinel, which, to and fro,
Through the night's stillness loudly pacing
go."

•THE DESERTER

A Legend of the Hills

Swifter than deer, by eager hounds pursued;
More frightened than by eagle coursed the hare,
Harun, in panic, quits the battle field,
Where ran in gory streams Circassia's²
blood.
His father, and his brothers twain, lie
there,
Victims to honour, and to liberty,

Whose severed heads are trampled in the dust

By barbarous foes, not knowing how to spare,

5 Their gaping wounds for vengeance crying
loud.

Harun, his duty in his shame forgot,
Has in the melée, all-confusing, lost
His musket, and his turban — and he runs.

10 Darksome night has fall'n, and the thick'ning mists,

Robbing the dusky plains, have covered all
The landscape with their own white winding-sheet.

15 From eastward comes depressing scent of cold,

And o'er the plains, whereon the Prophet³ dwelt,

In brightness rises full the golden moon.

20 From travel faint — tortured by pain,
and thirst,

And wiping from his forehead blood, and sweat,

Looking around, amid encircling hills,

25 His native village he, well-knowing, sees:
He steals along unnoticed, and unknown,
While all around reigns quiet solitude.

From desperate tide of battle freed, he Alone has come, unwounded, and unhurt,
And to the hut familiar hurries on.

30 There gleams a light: the master is at
home:

And, calling all his forces to his aid,
Harun the threshold crosses with a bound.

Selim was formerly his bosom-friend,
But, now, at first scarce recognises him.
Stretched on his couch, in painful agony,
He dying lay — no murmur crossed his lips:

40 "All-mighty Allah is — all-merciful —
His angels guard thee still for future fame!
What news, my friend, bring'st thou?"
so Selim asks —

His drooping eyeballs lifted up again;

45 And as his look brightens with fire of hope, Raises himself, and the grim warrior's
blood

Is warmed anew in this his latest hour.

"Two days we fought together in the pass,"

50 Harun replies. "My father fell in death,

¹ A hot dry dust-laden wind in the deserts of Arabia or Syria.

² A region in the Russian Caucasus.

³ Mohammed.

My brothers with him; I alone escaped,
 Like hunted beast, into the wilderness;
 With feet all bloody from the toilsome road,
 By thorny briars torn, and cut with stones, 5
 I fled by paths, unknown to mortal men,
 Frequented by the wild boar, and the wolf.
 Circassia's fallen; Russians are everywhere.

Oh, take me in, old friend, to thy embrace; 10
 The Prophet evermore shall bless thee; I
 Be grateful to thee till my day of death."

Answers, indignantly, the dying man:
 "Away — depart — thou despicable one!
 Nor aid, nor blessing — neither hearth, nor 15 home —

Shall coward be allowed with me to share."
 Filled with deep shame, and, eke, with sorrow filled,

Free from all anger, bearing his reproach, 20
 Harun, again, in solemn silence bowed,
 The threshold leaves, friendly to him no
 more.

And, now, another hut meeting his
 eyes, 25
 He stopped suddenly.

The fleeting dreams of early days gone
 by
 Rush swiftly back to mind, and memory,
 His cold brow warming as with kiss of 30
 love,
 Sweetness, and brightness, filling all his soul.

In the dark gloom of overhanging night
 He thought he saw fair eyes' caressing 35
 look

On him, calling him to draw near again;
 And thus he whispers to himself: "Beloved!

She only lives — she only breathes — 40
 for me."

And when in act to enter, hears her sing
 A song he once had loved to listen to,
 Then paler turns he than the pallid moon.

THE MAIDEN'S SONG

"The moon is floating in the sky,
 Brightest radiance throwing;
 The warrior-youth is hurrying by, 50
 To fields of glory going.

The ranks to join he hastens on,
 With sword, and musket, laden;
 When, parted from her much-loved one,
 With spirit sings the maiden.

"Thy prayers, dear youth, to eastward
 be!

From Kismet¹ aid be granted!
 Serve thou the Prophet faithfully!
 With glory grow enchanted!

He who does his friends forego,
 His life's not worth preserving;
 Who does not boldly front the foe
 Of death is well-deserving.

Will come no freshness from the rain
 Upon his body aching;
 From beasts he will no notice gain,
 His bones to burial taking.

No man upon the hills such shame
 Will, sure, be found outliving;
 No more to one, with coward's name,
 Shall maid her love be giving."

With head bent low, and quickly-pacing step,
 Harun flies swiftly from the hut away,
 From time to time a big tear, rolling down
 From drooping eyelids, falls upon his
 breast:

But, weather-beaten, stained with dust
 and rain,
 He sees before him his own well-known
 home.

With hope still buoying upon his fainting
 soul,
 Harun knocks softly at the window-sill.
 Surely, full surely, in this lowly cot
 Are heartfelt prayers for ever breathed for him.

The mother old her son's return awaits,
 But waits him not alone, and by himself.
 45 "Open the door, mother, 'tis I am come,
 Your own Harun, your youngest, dearest son,

Running the gauntlet of the Russian blows,
 I come to thee."

"Com'st thou alone?"
 "Alone!"

¹ Fate, destiny, a term used by Mohammedans to express man's lot in life, with all its incidents and details.

The mother, in the morning, saw her son's son's

Dead body lie, and coldly turned away;
And no one took the corpse, despised by

5 all,

To the near grave-yard, to be buried there.

The blood from deep wound thickly welling
out

Was lapped by greedy dogs, barking aloud.

The merry children in the village played.

And, naught regarding, revelled all about.

In the recorded page of liberty

The story sad of the deserter lived.

15 His guilty spirit, cowed with horrid fear,
From the near presence of the Prophet shrank;

And over Eastern mountains wandering.

His ghost to this day is by many seen;

And at the window, towards the early morn.

Knocks at the hut, and for admittance
craves:

But as he hears words read from the 25 Koran,

He flies into the shadows of the mist.

As, erst, he flew from the death-dealing sword.

CRITICISM

GERMAN

SCHLEGEL

(1767-1845)

August Wilhelm Schlegel was born at Hanover, the son of a well-known German divine, Johann Adolf Schlegel. He studied at the University of Göttingen and later (1797) became professor of Greek and Latin at Jena. About 1798 he and his brother founded the Athenæum, a periodical devoted to the principles of the romantic school of writers. He was a careful student of Shakespeare and published (1798-1810) a complete translation of Shakespeare's works in eleven volumes. From 1802 to 1805 he lived in Berlin. Here he became acquainted with Madame de Staël,¹ who engaged him to accompany her as instructor for herself and her children. This association with Madame de Staël extended over a number of years and exercised a strong influence upon her literary style. Schlegel is perhaps best known to English readers for his lectures on Shakespeare, which form a part of a series delivered in 1808. He served as secretary to Bernadotte, Crown Prince of Sweden, from 1813 to 1814. In 1819 he became professor of history at Bonn and took up the study of Sanskrit, which enabled him to make a number of significant contributions to Oriental studies.

The following translation is that of John Black in Lectures on Dramatic Art by August Wilhelm Schlegel, London, George Bell and Sons, 1909.

LECTURE XXV

Criticisms on Shakspeare's Tragedies

Romeo and Juliet, and Othello, differ from most of the pieces which we have hitherto examined, neither in the ingredients of the composition, nor in the manner of treating them: it is merely the direction of the whole that gives them the stamp of Tragedy. Romeo and Juliet is a picture of love and its pitiable fate, in a world whose atmosphere is too sharp for this the tenderest blossom of human life. Two beings created for each other feel mutual love at the first glance; every consideration disappears before the irresistible impulse to live in one another; under circumstances hostile in the highest degree to their union, they unite themselves by a secret marriage, relying simply on the protection of an invisible power. Untoward incidents following in rapid succession, their heroic constancy is within a few days put to the proof, till, forcibly separated from each other, by a voluntary death they are united in the grave to meet again in another world. All this is to be found in the beautiful story which Shakspeare has not invented, and which, however simply told, will always excite a tender sympathy: but it was reserved for Shakspeare to join in one ideal picture purity of heart with warmth of imagination; sweetness and dignity of manners with passionate intensity of feeling. Under his handling, it has become a glorious song of praise on that inexpressible feeling which ennobles the soul and gives to it its highest sublimity, and which elevates even the senses into soul, while at the same time it is a melancholy elegy on its inherent and imparted frailty; it is at once the apotheosis and the obsequies of love. It appears here a heavenly spark, that, as it descends to the earth, is converted into the lightning flash, which almost in the same moment sets on fire and consumes the mortal being on whom it lights. All that is most intoxicating in the odour of a southern spring, — all that is languishing in the song of the nightingale, or voluptuous in the first opening of the rose, all alike breathe forth from this poem. But even more rapidly than the earliest blossoms of youth and beauty decay, does it from the first timidly-bold declaration and modest return of love hurry on to the most unlimited passion, to an irrevocable union; and then hastens, amidst alternating storms of rapture and despair, to the fate of the two lovers, who yet appear enviable in their hard lot, for their love survives them, and by their death they have obtained an endless triumph over every separating power. The sweetest and the bitterest love and hatred, festive rejoicings and dark forebodings, tender embraces and sepulchral horrors, the fulness of life and self-annihilation, are here all brought close to each other; and yet these contrasts are so blended into a unity of impression, that the echo which the whole leaves behind in the mind resembles a single but endless sigh.

The excellent dramatic arrangement, the significance of every character in its place, the judicious selection of all the circumstances, even the most minute, have already been dwelt upon in detail. I shall only request attention to a trait which may serve for an example of the distance to which Shakspeare goes back to lay the preparatory foundation. The most striking and perhaps incredible circumstance in the whole story is the liquor given by the Monk to Julia, by which she for a number of hours not merely sleeps, but fully resembles a corpse, without however receiving the least injury. How does the poet dispose us to believe that Father Lorenzo possesses such a secret? — At his first appearance he exhibits him in a garden, where he is collecting herbs and descanting on their wonderful virtues. The discourse of the pious old man is full of deep meaning: he sees everywhere in nature emblems of the moral world; the same wisdom with which he looks through her has also made him master of the human heart. In this manner a circumstance of an ungrateful appearance has become the source of a great beauty.

If Romeo and Juliet shines with the colours of the dawn of morning, but a dawn whose purple clouds already announce the thunder of a sultry day, Othello is, on the other hand, a strongly shaded picture: we might call it a tragical Rembrandt. What a fortunate mistake that the Moor (under which name in the original novel, a baptized Saracen of the Northern coast of Africa was unquestionably meant), has been made by Shakspeare in every respect a negro! We recognize in Othello the wild nature of that glowing zone which generates the most ravenous beasts of prey and the most deadly poisons, tamed only in appearance by the desire of fame, by foreign laws of honour, and by nobler and milder manners. His jealousy is not the jealousy of the heart, which is compatible with the tenderest feeling and adoration of the beloved object; it is of that sensual kind which, in burning climes, has given birth to the disgraceful confinement of women and many other unnatural usages. A drop of this poison flows in his veins, and sets his whole blood in the wildest ferment. The Moor seems noble, frank, confiding, grateful for the love shown him; and he is all this, and, moreover, a hero who spurns danger, a worthy leader of an army, a faithful servant of the state; but the mere physical force of passion puts to flight in one moment all his acquired and mere habitual virtues, and gives the upper hand to the savage over the moral man. This tyranny of the blood over the will betrays itself even in the expression of his desire of revenge upon Cassio. In his repentance, a genuine tenderness for his murdered wife, and in the presence of the damning evidence of his deed, the painful feeling of annihilated honour at last bursts forth; and in the midst of these painful emotions he assails himself with the rage wherewith a despot punishes a runaway slave. He suffers as a double man; at once in the higher and the lower sphere into which his being was divided. — While the Moor bears the nightly colour of suspicion and deceit only on his visage, Iago is black within. He haunts Othello like his evil genius, and, with his light (and therefore the more dangerous) insinuations, he leaves him no rest, it is as if by means of an unfortunate affinity, founded however in nature, this influence was by necessity more powerful over him than the voice of his good angel Desdemona. A more artful villain than this Iago was never portrayed; he spreads his nets with a skill which nothing can escape. The repugnance inspired by his aims becomes tolerable from the attention of the spectators being directed to his means: these furnish endless employment to the understanding. Cool, discontented, and morose, arrogant where he dare be so, but humble and insinuating when it suits his purposes, he is a complete master in the art of dissimulation; accessible only to selfish emotions, he is thoroughly skilled in rousing the passions of others, and of availing himself of every opening which they give him: he is as excellent an observer of men as any one can be who is unacquainted with higher motives of action from his own experience, there is always some truth in his malicious observations on them. He does not merely pretend an obdurate incredulity as to the virtue of women, he actually entertains it; and this, too, falls in with his whole way of thinking, and makes him the more fit for the execution of his purpose. As in everything he sees merely the hateful side, he dissolves in the rudest manner the charm which the imagination casts over the relation between the two sexes: he does so for the purpose of revolting Othello's senses, whose heart otherwise might easily have convinced him of Desdemona's innocence. This must serve as an excuse for the numerous expressions in the speeches of Iago from which modesty shrinks. If Shakspeare had written in our days he would not perhaps have dared to hazard them; and yet this must certainly have greatly injured the truth of his picture. Desdemona is a sacrifice without blemish. She is not, it is true, a high ideal representation of sweetness and enthusiastic passion like Juliet; full of simplicity, softness, and humility, and so innocent, that she can hardly form to herself an idea of the possibility of infidelity, she seems calculated to make the most yielding and tenderest of wives. The female propensity wholly to resign itself to a foreign destiny has led her into the only fault of her life, that of marrying without her father's consent. Her choice seems wrong; and yet she has been gained over to Othello by that which induces the female to honour in man her protector and guide, — admiration of his determined heroism, and compassion for the sufferings which he had undergone. With great art it is so contrived that, from the very circumstance that the possibility of a suspicion of her own purity of motive never once enters her mind, she is the less reserved in her solicitations for Cassio, and thereby does but heighten more and more the jealousy of Othello. To throw out still more clearly the angelic purity of Desdemona, Shakspeare has in Emilia associated with her a companion of doubtful virtue. From the sinful levity of this woman it is also conceivable that she should not confess the abstraction of the handkerchief when Othello violently demands it back: this would otherwise be the circumstance in the whole piece the most difficult to justify. Cassio is portrayed exactly as he ought to be to excite suspicion without actual guilt, — amiable and nobly disposed, but easily seduced. The public events of the first two acts show us Othello in his most glorious aspect, as the support of Venice and the terror of the Turks: they serve to withdraw the story from the mere domestic circle, just as this is done in Romeo and Juliet by the dissensions between the houses of Montague and Capulet. No eloquence is capable of painting the overwhelming force of the catastrophe in Othello, — the pressure of feelings which measure out in a moment the abysses of eternity.

Hamlet is singular in its kind: a tragedy of thought inspired by continual and never-satisfied meditation on human destiny and the dark perplexity of the events of this world, and calculated to call forth the very same meditation in the minds of the spectators. This enigmatical work resembles those irrational equations in which a fraction of unknown magnitude always remains, that will in no way admit of solution. Much has been said, much written, on this piece, and yet no thinking head who expresses himself anew on it will (in his view of the connexion and the signification of all the parts) entirely coincide with his predecessors. What naturally most astonishes us, is the fact that with such hidden purposes, with a foundation laid in such unfathomable depth, the whole should, at a first view, exhibit an extremely popular appearance. The dread appearance of the Ghost takes possession of the mind and the imagination almost at the very commencement; then the play within the play, in which, as in a glass, we see reflected the crime, whose fruitlessly attempted punishment constitutes the subject-matter of the piece; the alarm with which it fills the King; Hamlet's pretended and Ophelia's real madness; her death and burial; the meeting of Hamlet and Laertes at her grave; their combat, and the grand determination; lastly, the appearance of the young hero Fortinbras, who, with warlike pomp, pays the last honours to an extinct family of kings; the interspersions of comic characteristic scenes with Polonius, the courtiers, and the grave-diggers, which have all of them their signification, — all this fills the stage with an animated and varied movement. The only circumstance from which this piece might be judged to be less theatrical than other tragedies of Shakspeare is, that in the last scenes the main action either stands still or appears to retrograde. This, however, was inevitable, and lay in the nature of the subject. The whole is intended to show that a calculating consideration, which exhausts all the relations and possible consequences of a deed, must cripple the power of acting; as Hamlet himself expresses it: —

And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought;
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard, their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action.

With respect to Hamlet's character: I cannot, as I understand the poet's views, pronounce altogether so favourable a sentence upon it as Goethe does. He is, it is true, of a highly cultivated mind, a prince of royal manners, endowed with the finest sense of propriety, susceptible of noble ambition, and open in the highest degree to an enthusiastic admiration of that excellence in others of which he himself is deficient. He acts the part of madness with unrivalled power, convincing the persons who are sent to examine into his supposed loss of reason, merely by telling them unwelcome truths, and rallying them with the most caustic wit. But in the resolutions which he so often embraces and always leaves unexecuted, his weakness is too apparent: he does himself only justice when he implies that there is no greater dissimilarity than between himself and Hercules. He is not solely impelled by necessity to artifice and dissimulation, he has a natural inclination for crooked ways; he is a hypocrite towards himself; his far-fetched scruples are often mere pretexts to cover his want of determination: thoughts, as he says on a different occasion, which have

— but one part wisdom
And ever three parts coward. —

He has been chiefly condemned both for his harshness in repulsing the love of Ophelia, which he himself had cherished, and for his insensibility at her death. But he is too much overwhelmed with his own sorrow to have any compassion to spare for others; besides his outward indifference gives us by no means the measure of his internal perturbation. On the other hand, we evidently perceive in him a malicious joy, when he has succeeded in getting rid of his enemies, more through necessity and accident, which alone are able to impel him to quick and decisive measures, than by the merit of his own courage, as he himself confesses after the murder of Polonius, and with respect to Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. Hamlet has no firm belief either in himself or in anything else: from expressions of religious confidence he passes over to sceptical doubts; he believes in the Ghost of his father as long as he sees it, but, as soon as it has disappeared, it appears to him almost in the light of a deception. He has even gone so far as to say, "there is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so"; with him the poet loses himself here in labyrinths of thought, in which neither end nor beginning is discoverable. The stars themselves, from the course of events, afford no answer to the question so urgently proposed to them. A voice from another world, commissioned, it would appear, by heaven, demands vengeance for a monstrous enormity, and the demand remains without effect; the criminals are at last punished, but, as it were, by an accidental blow, and not in the solemn way requisite to convey to the world a warning example of justice; irresolute foresight, cunning treachery, and impetuous rage, hurry on to a common destruction; the less guilty and the innocent are equally involved in the general ruin. The destiny of humanity is there exhibited as a gigantic Sphinx, which threatens to precipitate into the abyss of scepticism all who are unable to solve her dreadful enigmas.

As one example of the many niceties of Shakspeare which have never been understood, I may allude to the style in which the player's speech about Hecuba is conceived. It has been the subject of much controversy among the commentators, whether this was borrowed by Shakspeare from himself or from another, and whether, in the praise of the piece of which it is supposed to be a part, he was speaking seriously, or merely meant to ridicule the tragical bombast of his contemporaries. It seems never to have occurred to them that this speech must not be judged of by itself, but in connexion with the place where it is introduced. To distinguish it in the play itself as dramatic poetry, it was necessary that it should rise above the dignified poetry of the former in the same proportion that generally theatrical elevation soars above simple nature. Hence Shakspeare has composed the play in Hamlet altogether in sententious rhymes full of antitheses. But this solemn and measured tone did not suit a speech in which violent emotion ought to prevail, and the poet had no other expedient than the one of which he made choice: overcharging the pathos. The language of the speech in question is certainly falsely emphatical; but yet this fault is so mixed up with true grandeur, that a player practised in artificially calling forth in himself the emotion he is imitating may certainly be carried away by it. Besides, it will hardly be believed that Shakspeare knew so little of his art, as not to be aware that a tragedy in which Æneas had to make a lengthy epic relation of a transaction that happened so long before as the destruction of Troy could neither be dramatical nor theatrical.

Of Macbeth I have already spoken once in passing, and who could exhaust the praises of this sublime work? Since The Eumenides of Æschylus, nothing so grand and terrible has ever been written. The witches are not, it is true, divine Eumenides, and are not intended to be: they are ignoble and vulgar instruments of hell. A German poet, therefore, very ill understood their meaning, when he transformed them into mongrel beings, a mixture of fates, furies, and enchantresses, and clothed them with tragic dignity. Let no man venture to lay hand on Shakspeare's works thinking to improve anything essential: he will be sure to punish himself. The bad is radically odious, and to endeavour in any manner to ennoble it is to violate the laws of propriety. Hence, in my opinion, Dante, and even Tasso, have been much more successful in their portraiture of dæmons than Milton. Whether the age of Shakspeare still believed in ghosts and witches is a matter of perfect indifference for the justification of the use which in Hamlet and Macbeth he has made of pre-existing traditions. No superstition can be widely diffused without having a foundation in human nature: on this the poet builds; he calls up from their hidden abysses that dread of the unknown, that presage of a dark side of nature, and a world of spirits, which philosophy now imagines it has altogether exploded. In this manner he is in some degree both the portrayer and the philosopher of superstition; that is, not the philosopher who denies and turns it into ridicule, but, what is still more difficult, who distinctly exhibits its origin in apparently irrational and yet natural opinions. But when he ventures to make arbitrary changes in these popular traditions, he altogether forfeits his right to them, and merely holds up his own idle fancies to our ridicule. Shakspeare's picture of the witches is truly magical: 10 in the short scenes where they enter, he has created for them a peculiar language, which, although composed of the usual elements, still seems to be a collection of formulæ of incantation. The sound of the words, the accumulation of rhymes, and the rhythmus of the verse, form, as it were, the hollow music of a dreary witch-dance. He has been abused for using the names of disgusting objects; but he who 20 fancies the kettle of the witches can be made effective with agreeable aromatics is as wise as those who desire that hell should sincerely and honestly give good advice. These repulsive things, from 25 which the imagination shrinks, are here emblems of the hostile powers which operate in nature; and the repugnance of our senses is outweighed by the mental horror. With one another the witches 30 discourse like women of the very lowest class; for this was the class to which witches were ordinarily supposed to belong: when, however, they address Macbeth they assume a loftier tone: their 35 predictions, which they either themselves pronounce, or allow their apparitions to deliver, have all the obscure brevity, the majestic solemnity of oracles.

We here see that the witches are merely 40 instruments; they are governed by an invisible spirit, or the operation of such great and dreadful events would be above their sphere. With what intent did Shakspeare assign the same place to them in 45 his play, which they occupy in the history of Macbeth as related in the old chronicles? A monstrous crime is committed: Duncan, a venerable old man, and the best of kings, is, in defenceless sleep, 50 under the hospitable roof, murdered by his subject, whom he has loaded with honours and rewards. Natural motives alone seem inadequate, or the perpetrator must have been portrayed as a hardened villain. Shakspeare wished to exhibit a more sublime picture: an ambitious but noble hero, yielding to a deep-laid hellish temptation; and in whom all the crimes to which, in order to secure the fruits of his first crime, he is impelled by necessity, cannot altogether eradicate the stamp of native heroism. He has, therefore, given a threefold division to the guilt of that crime. The first idea comes from that being whose whole activity is guided by a lust of wickedness. The weird sisters surprise Macbeth in the moment of intoxication of victory, when his love of glory has been gratified; they cheat his eyes by exhibiting to him as the work of fate what in reality can only be accomplished by his own deed, and gain credence for all their words by the immediate fulfilment of the first prediction. The opportunity of murdering the King immediately offers; the wife of Macbeth conjures him not to let it slip; she urges him on with a fiery eloquence, which has at command all those sophisms that serve to throw a false splendour over crime. Little more than the mere execution falls to the share of Macbeth; he is driven into it, as it were, in a tumult of fascination. Repentance immediately follows, nay, even precedes the deed, and the stings of conscience leave him rest neither night nor day. But he is now fairly entangled in the snares of hell; truly frightful is it to behold that same Macbeth, who once as a warrior could spurn at death, now that he dreads the prospect of the life to come, clinging with growing anxiety to his earthly existence the more miserable it becomes, and pitilessly removing out of the way whatever to his dark and suspicious mind seems to threaten danger. However much we may 55 may abhor his actions, we cannot altogether refuse to compassionate the state of his mind; we lament the ruin of so many noble qualities, and even in his last defence we are compelled to admire the struggle of a brave will with a cowardly conscience. We might believe that we witness in this tragedy the over-ruling destiny of the ancients represented in perfect accordance with their ideas: the whole originates in a supernatural influence, to which the subsequent events seem inevitably linked. Moreover, we even find here the same ambiguous oracles which, by their literal fulfilment, deceive those who confide in them. Yet it may be easily shown that the poet has, in his work, displayed more enlightened views. He wishes to show that the conflict of good and evil in this world can only take place by the permission of Providence, which converts the curse that individual mortals draw down on their heads into a blessing to others. An accurate scale is followed in the retaliation. Lady Macbeth, who of all the human participators in the king's murder is the most guilty, is thrown by the terrors of her conscience into a state of incurable bodily and mental disease; she dies, unlamented by her husband, with all the symptoms of reprobation. Macbeth is still found worthy to die the death of a hero on the field of battle. The noble Macduff is allowed the satisfaction of saving his country by punishing with his own hand the tyrant who had murdered his wife and children. Banquo, by an early death, atones for the ambitious curiosity which prompted the wish to know his glorious descendants, as he thereby has roused Macbeth's jealousy; but he preserved his mind pure from the evil suggestions of the witches: his name is blessed in his race, destined to enjoy a long succession of ages that royal dignity which Macbeth could only hold for his own life. In the progress of the action, this piece is altogether the reverse of Hamlet: it strides forward with amazing rapidity, from the first catastrophe (for Duncan's murder may be called a catastrophe) to the last. "Thought, and done!" is the general motto; for as Macbeth says,

The flighty purpose never is o'ertook,
Unless the deed go with it.

In every feature we see an energetic heroic age, in the hardy North which steels every nerve. The precise duration of the action cannot be ascertained, — years perhaps, according to the story; but we know that to the imagination the most crowded time appears always the shortest. Here we can hardly conceive how so very much could ever have been compressed into so narrow a space; not merely external events, — the very inmost recesses in the minds of the dramatic personages are laid open to us. It is as if the drags were taken from the wheels of time, and they rolled along without interruption in their descent. Nothing can equal this picture in its power to excite terror. We need only allude to the circumstances attending the murder of Duncan, the dagger that hovers before the eyes of Macbeth, the vision of Banquo at the feast, the madness of Lady Macbeth; what can possibly be said on the subject that will not rather weaken the impression they naturally leave? Such scenes stand alone, and are to be found only in this poet; otherwise the tragic muse might exchange her mask for the head of Medusa.

I wish merely to point out as a secondary circumstance the prudent dexterity of Shakspeare, who could still contrive to flatter a king by a work in every part of whose plan nevertheless the poetical views are evident. James the First drew his lineage from Banquo; he was the first who united the threefold sceptre of England, Scotland, and Ireland: this is foreshown in the magical vision, when a long series of glorious successors is promised to Banquo. Even the gift of the English kings to heal certain maladies by the touch, which James pretended to have inherited from Edward the Confessor, and on which he set a great value, is brought in very naturally. — With such occasional matters we may well allow ourselves to be pleased without fearing from them any danger to poetry: by similar allusions Æschylus endeavoured to recommend the Areopagus to his fellow-citizens, and Sophocles to celebrate the glory of Athens.

As in Macbeth terror reaches its utmost height, in King Lear the science of compassion is exhausted. The principal characters here are not those who act, but those who suffer. We have not in this, as in most tragedies, the picture of a calamity in which the sudden blows of fate seem still to honour the head which they strike, and where the loss is always accompanied by some flattering consolation in the memory of the former possession; but a fall from the highest elevation into the deepest abyss of misery, where humanity is stripped of all external and internal advantages, and given up a prey to naked helplessness. The threefold dignity of a king, an old man, and a father, is dishonoured by the cruel ingratitude of his unnatural daughters; the old Lear, who out of a foolish tenderness has given away everything, is driven out to the world a wandering beggar; the childish imbecility to which he was fast advancing changes into the wildest insanity, and, when he is rescued from the disgraceful destitution to which he was abandoned, it is too late: the kind consolations of filial care and attention and of true friendship are now lost on him; his bodily and mental powers are destroyed beyond all hope of recovery, and all that now remains to him of life is the capability of loving and suffering beyond measure. What a picture we have in the meeting of Lear and Edgar in a tempestuous night and in a wretched hovel! The youthful Edgar has, by the wicked arts of his brother, and through his father's blindness, fallen, as the old Lear, from the rank to which his birth entitled him; and, as the only means of escaping further persecution, is reduced to assume the disguise of a beggar tormented by evil spirits. The King's fool, notwithstanding the voluntary degradation which is implied in his situation, is, after Kent, Lear's most faithful associate, his wisest counsellor. This good-hearted fool clothes reason with the livery of his motley garb; the high-born beggar acts the part of insanity; and both, were they even in reality what they seem, would still be enviable in comparison with the King, who, feels that the violence of his grief threatens to overpower his reason. The meeting of Edgar with the blinded Gloucester is equally heart-rending; nothing can be more affecting than to see the ejected son become the father's guide, and the good angel, who, under the disguise of insanity, saves him by an ingenious and pious fraud from the horror and despair of self-murder. But who can possibly enumerate all the different combinations and situations by which our minds are here as it were stormed by the poet? Respecting the structure of the whole I will only make one observation. The story of Lear and his daughters was left by Shakspeare exactly as he found it in a fabulous tradition, with all the features characteristic of the simplicity of old times. But in that tradition there is not the slightest trace of the story of Gloucester and his sons, which was derived by Shakspeare from another source. The incorporation of the two stories has been censured as destructive of the unity of action. But whatever contributes to the intrigue or the dénouement must always possess unity. And with what ingenuity and skill are the two main parts of the composition dovetailed into one another! The pity felt by Gloucester for the fate of Lear becomes the means which enables his son Edmund to effect his complete destruction, and affords the outcast Edgar an opportunity of being the saviour of his father. On the other hand, Edmund is active in the cause of Regan and Goneril, and the criminal passion which they both entertain for him induces them to execute justice on each other and on themselves. The laws of the drama have therefore been sufficiently complied with; but that is the least: it is the very combination which constitutes the sublime beauty of the work. The two cases resemble each other in the main: an infatuated father is blind towards his well-disposed child, and the unnatural children, whom he prefers, requite him by the ruin of all his happiness. But all the circumstances are so different, that these stories, while they each make a correspondent impression on the heart, form a complete contrast for the imagination. Were Lear alone to suffer from his daughters, the impression would be limited to the powerful compassion felt by us for his private misfortune. But two such unheard-of examples taking place at the same time have the appearance of a great commotion in the moral world: the picture becomes gigantic, and fills us with such alarm as we should entertain at the idea that the heavenly bodies might one day fall from their appointed orbits. To save in some degree the honour of human nature, Shakspeare never wishes his spectators to forget that the story takes place in a dreary and barbarous age: he lays particular stress on the circumstance that the Britons of that day were still heathens, although he has not made all the remaining circumstances to coincide learnedly with the time which he has chosen. From this point of view we must judge of many coarsenesses in expression and manners; for instance, the immodest manner in which Gloster acknowledges his bastard, Kent's quarrel with the Steward, and more especially the cruelty personally inflicted on Gloster by the Duke of Cornwall. Even the virtue of the honest Kent bears the stamp of an iron age, in which the good and the bad display the same uncontrollable energy. Great qualities have not been superfluously assigned to the King; the poet could command our sympathy for his situation, without concealing what he had done to bring himself into it. Lear is choleric, overbearing, and almost childish from age, when he drives out his youngest daughter because she will not join in the hypocritical exaggerations of her sisters. But he has a warm and affectionate heart, which is susceptible of the most fervent gratitude; and even rays of a high and kingly disposition burst forth from the eclipse of his understanding. Of Cordelia's heavenly beauty of soul, painted in so few words, I will not venture to speak; she can only be named in the same breath with Antigone. Her death has been thought too cruel; and in England the piece is in acting so far altered that she remains victorious and happy. I must own, I cannot conceive what ideas of art and dramatic connexion those persons have who suppose that we can at pleasure tack a double conclusion to a tragedy; a melancholy one for hard-hearted spectators, and a happy one for souls of a softer mould. After surviving so many sufferings, Lear can only die; and what more truly tragic end for him than to die from grief for the death of Cordelia? and if he is also to be saved and to pass the remainder of his days in happiness, the whole loses its signification. According to Shakspeare's plan the guilty, it is true, are all punished, for wickedness destroys itself; but the virtues that would bring help and succour are everywhere too late, or overmatched by the cunning activity of malice. The persons of this drama have only such a faint belief in Providence as heathens may be supposed to have; and the poet here wishes to show us that this belief requires a wider range than the dark pilgrimage on earth to be established in full extent.

PROSE NARRATIVE

GERMAN

GOETHE

One of the prominent features of the Age of Romanticism was its sentimental melancholy. The Sorrows of Werther (1774) is perhaps the most famous of the many pieces inspired by this passion; it is also one of the best. So popular did Werther become that young men all over Europe cultivated ineradicable sorrows, and the gloomy brow and drooping eye became an almost indispensable part of social equipment. The situation in Werther is that Charlotte, beloved by Werther, marries Albert. Werther continues to love Charlotte and also admires and respects Albert. He becomes a member of the family circle, but even this solace is a torture to him, a torture which he hugs to his bosom with painful ecstasy. Like many other eighteenth-century novels, Werther is written in the form of a series of letters. For Goethe's life, see p. 800.

The translation is that of R. Dillon Boylan, in Novels and Tales by Goethe, London, G. Bell and Sons, 1911.

THE SORROWS OF WERTHER

July 24th.

You insist so much on my not neglecting my drawing, that it would be as well for me to say nothing as to confess how little I have lately done.

I never felt happier; I never understood nature better, even down to the veriest stem, or smallest blade of grass; and yet I am unable to express myself; my powers of execution are so weak, everything seems to swim and float before me, so that I cannot make a clear, bold outline; but I fancy I should succeed better if I had some clay or wax to model. I shall try, if this state of mind continues much longer, and will take to modelling, if I only knead dough.

I have commenced Charlotte's portrait three times, and have as often disgraced myself. This is the more annoying, as I was formerly very happy in taking likenesses. I have since sketched her profile, and must content myself with that.

July 25th.

Yes, dear Charlotte! I will order and arrange everything. Only give me more commissions, — the more the better. One thing, however, I must request. Use no more writing-sand with the dear notes you send me. To-day I raised your letter hastily to my lips, and it set my teeth on edge.

July 26th.

I have often determined not to see her so frequently. But who could keep such a resolution? Every day I am exposed to the temptation, and promise, faithfully, that to-morrow I will stay really away; but, when to-morrow comes, I find some irresistible reason for seeing her; and, before I can account for it, I am with her again. Either she has said on the previous evening, "You will be sure to call to-morrow!" — and who could stay away then? — or she gives me some commission, and I find it essential to take her the answer in person; or the day is fine and I walk to Walheim, and when I am there it is only half a league further to her. I am within the charmed atmosphere, and soon find myself at her side. My grandmother used to tell us a story of a mountain of loadstone. When any vessels came near it, they were deprived instantly of their ironwork, the nails flew to the mountain, and the unhappy crew perished amongst the disjointed planks.

July 30th.

Albert is arrived and I must take my departure. Were he the best and noblest of men and I in every respect his inferior, I could not endure to see him in possession of such a perfect being. Possession! — enough, Wilhelm; her betrothed is here! A fine worthy fellow, whom one cannot help liking. Fortunately I was not present at their meeting. It would have broken my heart! And he is so considerate; he has not given Charlotte one kiss in my presence. Heaven reward him for it! I must love him for the respect with which he treats her. He shows a regard for me, but for this I suspect I am more indebted to Charlotte than to his own fancy for me. Women have a delicate tact in such matters; and it should be so. They cannot always succeed in keeping two rivals on terms with each other; but when they do, they are the only gainers.

I cannot help esteeming Albert. The coolness of his temper contrasts strongly with the impetuosity of mine, which I cannot conceal. He has a great deal of feeling, and is fully sensible of the treasure he possesses in Charlotte. He is free from ill-humour, which you know is the fault I detest most.

He regards me as a man of sense, and my attachment to Charlotte, and the interest I take in all that concerns her, augment his triumph and his love. I shall not inquire whether he may not at times tease her with some little jealousies, as I know that, were I in his place, I should not be entirely free from such sensations.

But be that as it may, my pleasure with Charlotte is over. Call it folly, or infatuation, what signifies a name? The thing speaks for itself. Before Albert came, I knew all that I know now. I knew I could make no pretensions to her, nor did I offer any; that is, as far as it was possible in the presence of so much loveliness, not to pant for its enjoyment. And now, behold me, like a silly fellow, staring with astonishment when another comes in and deprives me of my love.

I bite my lips and feel infinite scorn for those who tell me to be resigned, because there is no help for it. Let me escape from the yoke of such silly subterfuges! I ramble through the woods, and when I return to Charlotte, and find Albert sitting by her side in the summer-house in the garden, I am unable to bear it; behave like a fool; and commit a thousand extravagancies. "For Heaven's sake," said Charlotte to-day, "let us have no more scenes like those of last night. You terrify me when you are so violent." Between ourselves, I am always away now when he visits her, and I feel delighted when I find her alone.

August 8th.

Believe me, dear Wilhelm, I did not allude to you when I spoke so severely of those who advise resignation to inevitable fate. I did not think it possible for you to indulge such a sentiment. But in fact you are right. I only suggest one objection. In this world one is seldom reduced to make a selection between two alternatives. There are as many varieties of conduct and opinion as there are turns of feature between an aquiline nose and a flat one.

You will, therefore, permit me to concede your entire argument, and yet contrive means to escape your dilemma.

Your position is this: "Either you have hopes of obtaining Charlotte, or you have none. Well, in the first case, pursue your course, and press on to the fulfilment of your wishes. In the second, be a man, and shake off a miserable passion, which will enervate and destroy you." My dear friend, this is well and easily said.

But would you require a wretched being, whose life is slowly wasting under a lingering disease, to despatch himself at once by the stroke of a dagger? Does not the very disorder which consumes his strength deprive him of the courage to effect his deliverance?

You may answer me, if you please, with a similar analogy. "Who would not prefer the amputation of an arm to the perilling of life by doubt and procrastination?" But I know not if I am right, and let us leave these comparisons.

Enough! — There are moments, Wilhelm, when I could rise up and shake it all off, and when, if I only knew where to go, I could fly from this place.

The same evening.

My diary, which I have for some time 5 neglected, came before me to-day, and I am amazed to see how deliberately I have entangled myself step by step. To have seen my position so clearly, and yet to have acted so like a child! Even still I 10 behold the result plainly, and yet have no thought of acting with greater prudence.

August 10th.

If I were not a fool, I could spend the 15 happiest and most delightful life here. So many agreeable circumstances, and of a kind to ensure a worthy man's happiness, are seldom united. Alas! I feel it too sensibly — the heart alone makes our 20 happiness. To be admitted into this most charming family, to be loved by the father as a son, by the children as a father, and by Charlotte! — then the noble Albert, who never disturbs my happiness by any 25 appearance of ill-humour, receiving me with the heartiest affection, and loving me next to Charlotte, better than all the world! Wilhelm, you would be delighted to hear us in our rambles and conver- 30 sations about Charlotte; nothing in the world can be more absurd than our connection, and yet the thought of it often moves me to tears.

He tells me sometimes of her excellent 35 mother — how upon her death-bed she had committed her house and children to Charlotte, and had given Charlotte herself in charge to him — how since that time a new spirit had taken possession of her — 40 how in care and anxiety for their welfare she became a real mother to them — how every moment of her time was devoted to some labour of love in their behalf — and yet her mirth and cheerfulness had never forsaken her. I walk by his side, pluck 45 flowers by the way, arrange them carefully into a nosegay, then fling them into the first stream I pass, and watch them as they float gently away. I forget whether I 50 told you that Albert is to remain here. He has received a government appointment, with a very good salary, and I understand he is in high favour at court. I have met few persons so punctual and methodical in business.

August 12th.

Certainly Albert is the best fellow in the world. I had a strange scene with him yesterday. I went to take leave of him, for I took it into my head to spend a few 5 days in these mountains, from whence I now write to you. As I was walking up and down his room, my eye fell upon his pistols. "Lend me those pistols," said I, "for my 10 journey." "By all means," he replied, "if you will take the trouble to load them, for they only hang there for form." I took down one of them, and he continued: "Ever since I was near suffering for my 15 extreme caution, I have had nothing to do with such things." I was curious to hear the story. "I was staying," said he, "some three months ago, at a friend's house in the country. I had a brace of 20 pistols with me unloaded, and I slept without any anxiety. One rainy afternoon I was sitting by myself, doing nothing, when it occurred to me — I do not know how — that the house might be attacked — that we might require the pistols — 25 that we might — in short, you know how we go on fancying, when we have nothing better to do. I gave the pistols to the servant to clean and load. He was playing with the maid, and trying to frighten her, 30 when the pistol went off — God knows how! — the ramrod was in the barrel, and it went straight through her right hand, and shattered the thumb. I had to endure all the lamentation and the surgeon's 35 bill to pay; so since that time I have kept all my weapons unloaded. But, my dear friend, what is the use of prudence? We can never be on our guard against all possible dangers. However," — now you 40 must know I can tolerate all men till they come to "however," for it is self-evident that every universal rule must have its exceptions. But he is so exceedingly accurate, that if he only fancies he has said 45 a word too precipitate, or too general, or only half true, he never ceases to qualify, to modify, and extenuate, till at last he appears to have said nothing at all. Upon this occasion Albert was deeply immersed in his subject; I ceased to hear him, and became lost in reverie. With a sudden motion I pointed the mouth of the pistol to my forehead, over the right eye. "What do you mean?" cried Albert, turning back the pistol. "It is not loaded," said I. "And even if not," he answered with impatience, "what can you mean? I cannot comprehend how a man can be so mad as to shoot himself, and the bare idea of it shocks me."

"But why should any one," said I, "in speaking of an action, venture to pronounce it mad, or wise, or good, or bad? What is the meaning of all this? Have you carefully studied the secret motives of our actions? Do you understand — can you explain the causes which occasion them, and make them inevitable? If you can, you will be less hasty with your decision."

"But you will allow," said Albert, "that some actions are criminal, let them spring from whatever motives they may." I 25 granted it, and shrugged my shoulders.

"But still, my good friend," I continued, "there are some exceptions here too. Theft is a crime, but the man who commits it from extreme poverty, with no design but to save his family from perishing, is he an object of pity or of punishment? Who shall throw the first stone at a husband, who, in the heat of just resentment, sacrifices his faithless wife and her perfidious seducer? or at the young maiden, who in her weak hour of rapture, forgets herself in the impetuous joys of love? Even our laws, cold and cruel as they are, relent in such cases, and withhold their punishment."

"That is quite another thing," said Albert; "because a man under the influence of violent passion loses all power of reflection, and is regarded as intoxicated or insane."

"Oh! you people of sound understandings," I replied, smiling, "are ever ready to exclaim, 'Extravagance and madness, and intoxication!' You moral men are so calm and so subdued! You abhor the drunken man, and detest the extravagant; you pass by like the Levite, and thank God, like the Pharisee, that you are not like one of them. I have been more than once intoxicated, my passions have always bordered on extravagance; I am not ashamed to confess it, for I have learnt, by my own experience, that all extraordinary men, who have accomplished great and astonishing actions, have ever been decryd by the world as drunken or insane. And in private life, too, is it not intolerable that no one can undertake the execution of a noble or generous deed, without giving rise to the exclamation that the doer is intoxicated or mad? Shame upon you, ye sages!"

"This is another of your extravagant humours," said Albert; "you always exaggerate a case, and in this matter you are undoubtedly wrong, for we were speaking of suicide, which you compare with great actions, when it is impossible to regard it as anything but a weakness. It is much easier to die than to bear a life of misery with fortitude."

I was on the point of breaking off the conversation, for nothing puts me so completely out of patience as the utterance of a wretched common-place, when I am talking from my inmost heart. However, I composed myself, for I had often heard the same observation with sufficient vexation, and I answered him, therefore, with a little warmth: "You call this a weakness — beware of being led astray by appearances. When a nation which has long groaned under the intolerable yoke of a tyrant rises at last and throws off its chains, — do you call that weakness? The man who, to rescue his house from the flames, finds his physical strength redoubled, so that he lifts burdens with ease, which in the absence of excitement he could scarcely move; he who under the rage of an insult attacks and puts to flight half a score of his enemies — are such persons to be called weak? My good friend, if resistance be strength, how can the highest degree of resistance be a weakness?"

Albert looked steadfastly at me, and said, "Pray forgive me, but I do not see that the examples you have adduced bear any relation to the question." "Very likely," I answered, "for I have often been told that my style of illustration borders a little on the absurd. But let us see if we cannot place the matter in another point of view, by inquiring what can be a man's state of mind, who resolves to free himself from the burden of life — a burden often so pleasant to bear, — for we cannot otherwise reason fairly upon the subject."

"Human nature," I continued, "has its limits. It is able to endure a certain degree of joy, sorrow, and pain, but becomes annihilated as soon as this measure is exceeded. The question, therefore, is, not whether a man is strong or weak, but whether he is able to endure the measure of his sufferings? The suffering may be moral or physical; and in my opinion it is just as absurd to call a man a coward who destroys himself as to call a man a coward who dies of a malignant fever."

"Paradox, all paradox!" exclaimed Albert. "Not so paradoxical as you imagine," I replied. "You allow that we designate a disease as mortal, when nature is so severely attacked, and her strength so far exhausted, that she cannot possibly recover her former condition, under any change that may take place."

"Now, my good friend, apply this to the mind; observe a man in his natural isolated condition, consider how ideas work, and how impressions fasten upon him, till at length a violent passion seizes him, destroying all his powers of calm reflection, and provoking his utter ruin."

"It is in vain that a man of sound mind and cool temper understands the condition of such a wretched being, in vain he counsels him! He can no more communicate his own wisdom to him than a healthy man can instil his strength into the invalid, by whose bed-side he is seated."

Albert thought this too general. I reminded him of a girl who had drowned herself a short time previously, and I related her history.

She was a good creature, who had grown up in the narrow sphere of household industry and weekly-appointed labour; one who knew no pleasure beyond indulging in a walk on Sundays, arrayed in her best attire, accompanied by her friends, or perhaps joining in the dance now and then at some festival, and chatting away her spare hours with a neighbour, discussing the scandal or the quarrels of the village — trifles sufficient to occupy her heart. At length the warmth of her nature is influenced by certain new and unknown wishes. Inflamed by the flatteries of men, her former pleasures become by degrees insipid, till at length she meets with a youth to whom she is attracted by an indescribable feeling: upon him she now rests all her hopes; she forgets the world around her; she sees, hears, desires nothing but him, and him only. He alone occupies all her thoughts. Uncorrupted by the idle indulgence of an enervating vanity, her affection moving steadily towards its object, she hopes to become his, and to realise in an everlasting union with him all that happiness which she sought, all that bliss for which she longed. His repeated promises confirm her hopes; embraces and endearments, which increase the ardour of her desires, overmaster her soul. She floats in a dim delusive anticipation of her happiness, and her feelings become excited to their utmost tension. She stretches out her arms finally to embrace the object of all her wishes — and her lover forsakes her. Stunned and bewildered, she stands upon a precipice. All is darkness around her. No prospect, no hope, no consolation — forsaken by him in whom her existence was centred! She sees nothing of the wide world before her, thinks nothing of the many individuals who might supply the void in her heart; she feels herself deserted, forsaken by the world; and blinded and impelled by the agony which wrings her soul, she plunges into the deep, to end her sufferings in the broad embrace of death. See here, Albert, the history of thousands, and tell me, is not this a case of physical infirmity? Nature has no way to escape from the labyrinth, her powers are exhausted, she can contend no longer, and the poor soul must die.

Shame upon him who can look on calmly and exclaim, "The foolish girl! she should have waited; she should have allowed time to wear off the impression; her despair would have been softened, and she would have found another lover to comfort her." One might as well say, "The fool, to die of a fever! — why did he not wait till his strength was restored, till his blood became calm? — all would then have gone well, and he would have been alive now."

Albert, who could not see the justice of the comparison, offered some further objections, and, amongst others, urged that I had taken the case of a mere ignorant girl. But how any man of sense, of more enlarged views and experience, could be excused, he was unable to comprehend. "My friend," I exclaimed, "man is but man, and whatever be the extent of his reasoning powers, they are of little avail when passion rages within, and he feels himself confined by the narrow limits of nature. It were better, then — But we will talk of this some other time," I said, and caught up my hat. Alas! my heart was full; and we parted without conviction on either side. How rarely in this world do men understand each other!

August 15th.

There can be no doubt that in this world nothing is so indispensable as love. I observe that Charlotte could not lose me without a pang, and the very children have but one wish; that is, that I should visit them again to-morrow. I went this afternoon to tune Charlotte's piano. But I could not do it, for the little ones insisted on my telling them a story; and Charlotte herself urged me to satisfy them. I waited upon them at tea, and they are now as fully contented with me as with Charlotte, and I told them my very best tale of the princess who was waited upon by dwarfs. I improve myself by this exercise, and am quite surprised at the impression my stories create. If I sometimes invent an incident which I forget upon the next narration, they remind me directly that the story was different before; so that I now endeavour to relate with exactness the same anecdote in the same monotonous tone, which never changes. I find by this how much an author injures his works by altering them, even though they be improved in a poetical point of view. The first impression is readily received. We are so constituted, that we believe the most incredible things, and once they are engraved upon the memory, woe to him who would endeavour to efface them.

August 18th.

Must it ever be thus — that the source of our happiness must also be the fountain of our misery? The full and ardent sentiment which animated my heart with the love of nature, overwhelming me with a torrent of delight, and which brought all paradise before me, has now become an insupportable torment — a demon which perpetually pursues and harrasses me. When in bye-gone days I gazed from these rocks upon yonder mountains across the river, and upon the green flowery valley before me, and saw all nature budding and bursting around — the hills clothed from foot to peak with tall, thick forest trees — the valleys in all their varied windings, shaded with the loveliest woods, and the soft river gliding along amongst the lispings reeds, mirroring the beautiful clouds which the soft evening breeze wafted across the sky, — when I heard the groves about me melodious with the music of birds, and saw the million swarms of insects dancing in the last golden beams of the sun, whose setting rays awoke the humming beetles from their grassy beds, whilst the subdued tumult around directed my attention to the ground, and I there observed the arid rock compelled to yield nutriment to the dry moss, whilst the heath flourished upon the barren sands below me, — all this displayed to me the inner warmth which animates all nature, and filled and glowed within my heart. I felt myself exalted by this overflowing fullness to the perception of the Godhead, and the glorious forms of an infinite universe became visible to my soul! Stupendous mountains encompassed me, abysses yawned at my feet, and cataracts fell headlong down before me; impetuous rivers rolled through the plain, and rocks and mountains resounded from afar. In the depths of the earth I saw innumerable powers in motion, and multiplying to infinity, whilst upon its surface, and beneath the heavens, there teemed ten thousand varieties of living creatures. Everything around is alive with an infinite number of forms, while mankind fly for security to their petty houses, from the shelter of which they rule in their imaginations over the wide-extended universe. Poor fool! in whose petty estimation all things are little. From the inaccessible mountains, across the desert which no mortal foot has trod, far as the confines of the unknown ocean, breathes the spirit of the eternal Creator, and every atom to which he has given existence finds favour in his sight. Ah, how often at that time has the flight of a bird, soaring above my head, inspired me with the desire of being transported to the shores of the immeasurable waters, there to quaff the pleasures of life from the foaming goblet of the Infinite; and, to partake, if but for a moment, even with the confined powers of my soul, the beatitude of that Creator, who accomplishes all things in himself, and through himself.

My dear friend, the bare recollection of those hours still consoles me. Even this effort to recall those ineffable sensations, and give them utterance, exalts my soul above itself, and makes me doubly feel the intensity of my present anguish.

It is as if a curtain had been drawn from before my eyes; and, instead of prospects of eternal life, the abyss of an ever open grave yawned before me. Can we say of anything that it exists when all passes away — when time, with the speed of a storm, carries all things onward — and our transitory existence, hurried along by the torrent, is either swallowed up by the waves or dashed against the rocks. There is not a moment but preys upon you, and upon all around you — not a moment in which you do not yourself become a destroyer. The most innocent walk deprives of life thousands of poor insects; one step destroys the fabric of the industrious ant, and converts a little world into chaos. No; it is not the great and rare calamities of the world, the floods which sweep away whole villages, the earthquakes which swallow up our towns, that affect me. My heart is wasted by the thought of that destructive power which lies concealed in every part of universal nature. Nature has formed nothing that does not consume itself, and every object near it; so that, surrounded by earth and air, and all the active powers, I wander on my way with aching heart, and the universe is to me a fearful monster, for ever devouring its own offspring.

August 21st.

In vain do I stretch out my arms towards her when I awaken in the morning from my weary slumbers. In vain do I seek for her at night in my bed, when some innocent dream has happily deceived me, and placed her near me in the fields, when I have seized her hand and covered it with countless kisses. And when I feel for her in the half confusion of sleep, with the happy sense that she is near me, tears flow from my oppressed heart, and bereft of all comfort, I weep over my future woes.

August 22nd.

What a misfortune, Wilhelm! My active spirits have degenerated into contented indolence. I cannot be idle, and yet I am unable to set to work. I cannot think: I have no longer any feeling for the beauties of nature, and books are distasteful to me. Once we give ourselves up, we are totally lost. Many a time and oft I wish I were a common labourer; that, awakening in the morning, I might have but one prospect, one pursuit, one hope, for the day which has dawned. I often envy Albert when I see him buried in a heap of papers and parchments, and I fancy I should be happy were I in his place. Often impressed with this feeling, I have been on the point of writing to you and to the minister, for the appointment at the embassy, which you think I might obtain. I believe I might procure it. The minister has long shown a regard for me, and has frequently urged me to seek employment. It is the business of an hour only. Now and then the fable of the horse recurs to me. Weary of liberty, he suffered himself to be saddled and bridled, and was ridden to death for his pains. I know not what to determine upon. For is not this anxiety for change the consequence of that restless spirit which would pursue me equally in every situation of life?

August 28th.

If my ills would admit of any cure, they would certainly be cured here. This is my birthday, and early in the morning I received a packet from Albert. Upon opening it, I found one of the pink ribands which Charlotte wore in her dress the first time I saw her, and which I had several times asked her to give me. With it were two volumes in duodecimo of Wetstein's Homer, a book I had often wished for, to save me the inconvenience of carrying the large Ernestine edition with me upon my walks. You see how they anticipate my wishes, how well they understand all those little attentions of friendship, so superior to the costly presents of the great, which are humiliating. I kissed the riband a thousand times, and in every breath inhaled the remembrance of those happy and irrevocable days, which filled me with the keenest joy. Such, Wilhelm, is our fate. I do not murmur at it: the flowers of life are but visionary! How many pass away, and leave no trace behind — how few yield any fruit — and the fruit itself, how rarely does it ripen! And yet there are flowers enough! — and, is it not strange, my friend, that we should suffer the little that does really ripen, to rot, decay, and perish unenjoyed? Farewell! It is a glorious summer. I often climb into the trees in Charlotte's orchard and shake down the pears that hang on the highest branches. She stands below, and catches them as they fall.

August 30th.

Unhappy being that I am! Why do I thus deceive myself? What is to come of all this wild, aimless, endless passion? I cannot pray except to her. My imagination sees nothing but her, all surrounding objects are of no account, except as they relate to her. In this dreamy state I enjoy many happy hours, till at length I feel compelled to tear myself away from her. Ah! Wilhelm, to what does not my heart often compel me! When I have spent several hours in her company, till I feel completely absorbed by her figure, her grace, the divine expression of her thoughts, my mind becomes gradually excited to the highest excess, my sight grows dim, my hearing confused, my breathing oppressed as if by the hand of a murderer, and my beating heart seeks to obtain relief for my aching senses. I am sometimes unconscious whether I really exist. If in such moments I find no sympathy, and Charlotte does not allow me to enjoy the melancholy consolation of bathing her hand with my tears, I feel compelled to tear myself from her, when I either wander through the country, climb some precipitous cliff, or force a path through the trackless thicket, where I am lacerated and torn by thorns and briars, and thence I find relief. Sometimes I lie stretched on the ground, overcome with fatigue and dying with thirst; sometimes late in the night, when the moon shines above me, I recline against an aged tree, in some sequestered forest, to rest my weary limbs; when, exhausted and worn, I sleep till break of day. O Wilhelm! the hermit's cell, his sackcloth, and girdle of thorns would be luxury and indulgence compared with what I suffer. Adieu! I see no end to this wretchedness except the grave.

September 3rd.

I must away. Thank you, Wilhelm, for determining my wavering purpose. For a whole fortnight I have thought of leaving her. I must away. She is returned to town, and is at the house of a friend. And then, Albert — yes, I must go.

September 10th.

Oh, what a night, Wilhelm! I can henceforth bear anything. I shall never see her again. Oh, why cannot I fall on your neck, and, with floods of tears and raptures, give utterance to all the passions which distract my heart! Here I sit gasping for breath, and struggling to compose myself. I wait for day, and at sunrise the horses are to be at the door.

And she is sleeping calmly, little suspecting that she has seen me for the last time. I am free. I have had the courage, in an interview of two hours' duration, not to betray my intention. And oh! Wilhelm, what a conversation it was!

Albert had promised to come to Charlotte in the garden, immediately after supper. I was upon the terrace under the tall chestnut-trees, and watched the setting sun, — I saw him sink for the last time beneath this delightful valley and silent stream. I had often visited the same spot with Charlotte, and witnessed that glorious sight, and now — I was walking up and down the very avenue which was so dear to me. A secret sympathy had frequently drawn me thither, before I knew Charlotte, and we were delighted when, in our early acquaintance, we discovered that we each loved the same spot, which is indeed as romantic as any that ever captivated the fancy of an artist.

From beneath the chestnut-trees there is an extensive view. But I remember that I have mentioned all this in a former letter, and have described the tall mass of beech-trees at the end, and how the avenue grows darker and darker as it winds its way among them, till it ends in a gloomy recess which has all the charm of a mysterious solitude. I still remember the strange feeling of melancholy which came over me, the first time I entered that dark retreat, at bright midday. I felt some secret foreboding that it would, one day, be to me the scene of some happiness or misery.

I had spent half an hour struggling between the contending thoughts of going and returning, when I heard them coming up the terrace. I ran to meet them; I trembled as I took her hand and kissed it. As we reached the top of the terrace, the moon rose from behind the wooded hill. We conversed on many subjects, and without perceiving it, we approached the gloomy recess. Charlotte entered and sat down. Albert seated himself beside her; I did the same, but my agitation did not suffer me to remain long seated. I got up and stood before her, then walked backwards and forwards, and sat down again. I was restless and miserable. Charlotte drew our attention to the beautiful effect of the moonlight, which threw a silver hue over the terrace, in front of us beyond the beech-trees. It was a glorious sight, and was rendered more striking by the darkness which surrounded the spot where we were. We remained for some time silent, when Charlotte observed: "Whenever I walk by moonlight, it brings to my remembrance all my beloved and departed friends, and I am filled with thoughts of death and futurity. We shall live again, Werther!" she continued, with a firm but feeling voice; "but shall we know one another again — what do you think, what do you say?"

"Charlotte!" I said, as I took her hand in mine, and my eyes filled with tears, "we shall see each other again — here and hereafter we shall meet again." I could say no more. Why, Wilhelm, should she put this question to me, just at the moment when the fear of our cruel separation filled my heart?

"And oh! do those departed ones know how we are employed here, do they know when we are well and happy, do they know when we recall their memories with the fondest love? In the silent hour of evening the shade of my mother hovers round me; when, seated in the midst of my children, I see them assembled near me as they used to assemble near her! and then I raise my anxious eyes to heaven, and wish she could look down upon us and witness how I fulfil the promise I made to her in her last moments, to be a mother to her children. With what emotion do I then exclaim, 'Pardon, dearest of mothers, pardon me, if I do not adequately supply your place. Alas! I do my utmost; they are clothed and fed, and still better, they are loved and educated. Could you but see, sweet saint! the peace and harmony that dwells amongst us, you would glorify God with the warmest feelings of gratitude, to whom, in your last hour, you addressed such fervent prayers for our happiness.'" Thus did she express herself, but O Wilhelm! who can do justice to her language, how can cold and passionless words convey the heavenly expressions of the spirit? Albert interrupted her gently. "This affects you too deeply, my dear Charlotte: I know your soul dwells on such recollections with intense delight, but I implore" — "O Albert," she continued, "I am sure you do not forget the evenings when we three used to sit at the little round table, when papa was absent, and the little ones had retired. You often had a good book with you, but seldom read it; the conversation of that noble being was preferable to everything — that beautiful, bright, gentle, and yet ever-toiling woman. God alone knows how I have supplicated with tears on my nightly couch that I might be like her."

I threw myself at her feet, and, seizing her hand, bedewed it with a thousand tears. "Charlotte!" I exclaimed, "God's blessing and your mother's spirit are upon you." "Oh! that you had known her," she said, with a warm pressure of the hand; "she was worthy of being known to you." I thought I should have fainted; never had I received praise so flattering. She continued: "And yet she was doomed to die in the flower of her youth, when her youngest child was scarcely six months old. Her illness was but short, but she was calm and resigned — and it was only for her children, especially the youngest, that she felt unhappy. When her end drew nigh, she bade me bring them to her. I obeyed, the younger ones knew nothing of their approaching loss, while the elder ones were quite overcome with grief. They stood around the bed, and she raised her feeble hands to heaven, and prayed over them, then, kissing them in turn, she dismissed them, and said to me, 'Be you a mother to them.' I gave her my hand. 'You are promising much, my child,' she said, 'a mother's fondness, and a mother's care! I have often witnessed, by your tears of gratitude, that you know what is a mother's tenderness; show it to your brothers and sisters, and be dutiful and faithful to your father as a wife: you will be his comfort.' She inquired for him. He had retired to conceal his intolerable anguish — he was heartbroken.

5 "Albert! you were in the room. She heard some one moving, she inquired who it was, and desired you to approach. She surveyed us both with a look of composure and satisfaction expressive of her conviction that we should be happy — happy with one another." Albert fell upon her neck, and kissed her, and exclaimed, "We are so, and we shall be so." Even the composure of Albert was moved, and I 15 was excited beyond expression.

"And such a being," she continued, "was to leave us, Werther! Great God, must we thus part with everything we hold dear in this world? Nobody felt this more acutely than the children; they cried and lamented for a long time afterwards, complaining that black men had carried away their dear mamma."

Charlotte stood up. It aroused me, but I continued sitting, and held her hand. "Let us go," she said; "it grows late." She attempted to withdraw her hand; I held it still. "We shall see each other again," I exclaimed, "we shall recognise each other under every possible change. I am going," I continued, "going willingly, but should I say for ever, perhaps I may not keep my word. Adieu, Charlotte! adieu, Albert; we shall meet again." "Yes, to-morrow, I think," she answered, with a smile. To-morrow! how I felt the word! Ah! she little thought, when she drew her hand away from mine. They walked down the avenue. I stood gazing after them in the moonlight. I threw myself upon the ground, and wept; I then sprang up, and ran out upon the terrace, and saw, under the shade of the lindens, her white dress disappearing near the garden gate. I stretched out my arms, and she vanished.

FRENCH CHATEAUBRIAND

(1768-1848)

François Auguste de Chateaubriand was born at Saint-Malo in Brittany. He was educated at Dol and Rennes in ancient languages and mathematics. It was expected that he would prepare for the church, but in 1786 he entered the army. Visiting the United States in 1791 he became acquainted with Washington, and gathered, as well, the romantic impressions of Indian life which are to be found in his romance Atala. He returned to France in 1792. The failure of the royalist cause, with which he was sympathetic, rendered him an exile in England from 1793 to 1800. During the hardships of this time he composed the famous Genius of Christianity (1798). In 1800 he returned to France and in the next year published his romance Atala. The publication in 1802 of the Genius of Christianity, accompanied by the romance René, placed him at once in the front rank of French writers. In 1806-07 he toured the Mediterranean countries and the Holy Land, with the result that a prose epic, The Martyrs, or the Triumph of the Christian Religion, appeared in 1809. In 1811 he was elected to the French Academy. During the political disturbances from 1814 to 1824 he proved an enthusiastic royalist. In 1820 he was made ambassador to Berlin, and embarked upon some dozen years of political activity, ending with imprisonment because of his loyalty to the exiled Bourbons. His experience in politics, instead of settling the lifelong battle between his royalist and revolutionary sympathies, made him more wayward and inconsistent. His last years were passed in retirement and despondency.

The romance Atala, inspired by the ideal state of the American Indian, is brilliantly illustrative of the romantic tendencies in narrative. The subtitle, "The Loves of Two Savages¹ in the Wilderness," identifies the tale at once with solitude and a natural environment — elements requisite for the perfect romantic setting; and "natural" protagonists are already upon the scene. Chateaubriand, with an artist's eye for color and detail in nature, and with an artist's ear for the marvelous harmonies to be drawn from prose, achieved at times a magnificent, sensuous prose poem. But along with Chateaubriand's magnificence, as with Hugo's, there are serious faults. One of the most striking incongruities in Atala results from the fact that the Indian lovers are represented as typical romantic characters of extremely refined sentiments.

from ATALA

It is a strange fate, my son, that brings us together. I see in you a civilised man turned savage, whom the Great Spirit (I know not to what end) has chosen to civilise. We started upon the race of life from two different points. Thou hast sought rest in my seat, and I have sat in thine. We must needs look upon the world with very different eyes. Which of us has gained or lost the most by the change? That can be known only to the spirits, of whom the least wise has more wisdom than all mankind.

In the next moon of flowers it will be seven times ten snows, and three snows more, since my mother brought me into the world on the shores of the Mississippi. The Spanish had been a short while settled in the bay of Pensacola, but as yet no white man dwelt in Louisiana. Scarce seventeen times since my birth had the leaves fallen, when I marched with my father, the warrior Outalissi, against the Muskogees, a mighty tribe of Florida. We joined our allies the Spaniards, and a battle took place on one of the branches of the Mobile river. Areskwe and the Manitos were against us. The enemy gained the day; my father was killed, and I was wounded in his defence. Oh, why went I not then down to the world of spirits! Then should I have escaped the sorrows that awaited me on earth. The spirits ordered otherwise; I was hurried in the crowd of fugitives to St. Augustine.

In this town, newly built by the Spaniards, I ran the risk of being pressed for the mines in Mexico, when an old Castilian, named Lopez, touched by my youth and innocence, offered me a home and brought me to his sister, with whom he lived, as he was unmarried.

Both grew fond of me, and brought me up with much care, giving me teachers of every kind. But after passing thirty moons at St. Augustine I was seized with dislike to the life of cities. I fell into a rapid decline. I would stand for hours together motionless, gazing at the tops of the distant forest. Sometimes they found me sitting by a stream sadly watching the waves flow by. I pictured to myself the forests through which the waters had passed, and my soul was wholly given to solitude.

Unable to withstand my longing to return to the wilderness, I went one morning to Lopez, clothed in my native dress and carrying my bow and arrows in one hand, and, in the other, my European clothes, which I returned to my kind protector. I fell at his feet in floods of tears. I gave myself hard names; I confessed my ingratitude. 'But still,' I said, 'O my father, thou canst see it thyself; I shall die if I go not back to the life of my own people.' Lopez, struck with amazement, tried to turn me from my plan. He set before me the dangers I would run of falling again into the hands of the Muskogees. But seeing that I was ready to run every risk, he burst into tears and clasped me in his arms. 'Go, child of nature,' he cried, 'take back the independence of man; Lopez will not withhold thee. Were I younger, I would go with thee myself into the wilderness, where I too have sweet memories, and give thee into the arms of thy mother. When thou art in the forest, think sometimes of the old Spaniard who gave thee shelter, and remember that thy first experience of the heart of man was in its favour.' Lopez ended with a prayer to the God of the Christians, whose religion I had refused to adopt, and we parted weeping.

It was not long before I was punished for my ingratitude. My ignorance bewildered me in the woods, and I was taken by a party of Muskogees and Seminoles, as Lopez had foretold. I was known for a Natchez by my dress and by the feathers on my head. They chained me, but lightly because of my youth. Simaghan, the chief, wished to know my name. I answered, 'My name is Chactas, son of Outalissi, son of Miscou, who took more than a hundred scalps from the heroes of the Muskogees.' Simaghan said: 'Chactas, son of Outalissi, son of Miscou, rejoice; you will be burned at the great village.' I answered, 'That is good,' and sang my death-song.

Prisoner though I was, during the first days I could not help admiring my enemies. The Muskogee, and, even more, his ally the Seminole, breathes gaiety, love, and contentment. His bearing is light, his countenance open and serene. He talks much and freely; his language is easy and sweet sounding. Even age cannot rob the Sachem of this joyful simplicity; like the aged birds of our woods, who mingle their carols with the new airs of their young broods.

The women who accompanied the tribe showed a tender pity for my youth, and a kindly curiosity. They asked me about my mother, about the early days of my life — they wished to know whether my cradle of moss had been hung on the flowering branches of the maple, whether the breezes had swung me toward the nests of little birds. There were also a thousand other questions on the state of my heart — they asked me, had I seen a white roe in my dreams, and had the trees of the secret valley counselled me to love. I answered frankly to the mothers, daughters, and wives of the braves. I said to them, 'You are the graces of the day, and night loves you as the dew. Man is born of you, to hang on your breast and on your lips; you know the magic words that put to sleep all pain. Hear what she said to me, who brought me into the world, and whom I shall never see more. She told me that a maiden was a flower full of mystery, found in solitary places.'

These praises pleased the women greatly. They loaded me with all kinds of presents. They brought me nut-milk, maple-sugar, cakes of Indian-corn, bear-hams, beaver-skins, shells to adorn me, and mosses for my bed. They sang, they laughed with me, and shed tears to think that I was to be burned.

One night, when the Muskogees had pitched their camp on the edge of a forest, I was sitting by the campfire with the hunter appointed to guard me. Suddenly I heard the murmur of a garment on the grass, and a woman, half veiled, came and seated herself by my side. Her eyes were full of tears; in the glare of the fire a little crucifix of gold shone on her breast. She had beautiful, regular features. There was in her face an unspeakable look of virtue and passion, irresistibly attractive. To these she added the most gentle grace; an extreme tenderness, joined to a deep sadness, looked from out her eyes. Her smile was heavenly.

I believed her to be the Maiden of Last Love, that maiden whom they send to a captive to charm his latest hours. So thinking, I said to her, stammering and troubled, but not from any fear of death, 'Maiden, thou art worthy of first love — thou wast not made for the last. The beating of a heart soon to cease will answer ill to the beatings of thine own. How can I mingle death with life? Thou wilt make me mourn the light overmuch. May another be more fortunate than I, and may a long embrace unite the tendril with the oak.'

Then the maiden said to me: 'I am not the Maiden of Last Love. Art thou a Christian?'

I replied that I had never forsaken the spirits of my hearth. At these words she started, and said:

'I pity thee for a poor worshipper of images. My mother made me a Christian. They call me Atala, daughter of Simaghan of the golden bracelets, and chief of the warriors of this tribe. We are going to Apalachicola, where thou wilt be burned.' With these words she rose and went away.

Here Chactas was forced to break off his story. Memories pressed in crowds upon his soul. His lightless eyes flooded his withered cheeks with tears, as two springs, hidden in the earth's deep night, betray themselves by the waters they let trickle through the rocks. He went on at last:

O my son, thou seest that Chactas is little wise despite his fame for wisdom. Alas, dear child, men can weep for what they can no longer see. Several days passed. Every evening came the daughter of the sachem and spoke with me. Sleep had fled from my eyes, and Atala was in my heart as the memory of the couch of my fathers.

On the seventeenth day of the march, at the time when the dragon-fly rises from the waters, we entered the great savannah of Alachua. It is ringed with hills which, running one behind the other, bear to the clouds forests of palms, lemon-trees, magnolias, and evergreen oaks. The chief cried a halt, and his tribe camped at the foot of the hills. They put me at some distance, by one of the natural wells so famous in Florida. I was tied at the foot of a tree, and a warrior grudgingly kept guard near me. I had not been there long when Atala appeared, under the balsams of the spring.

'Hunter,' she said to the Muskogee brave, 'if thou wouldst follow the deer, I will keep watch over thy captive.' The warrior leapt for joy at the words of the chief's daughter, darted down the hill, and turned his steps to the plain.

Strange perversity of the heart of man! I, who had so longed to say secret words to her whom I loved already as the sun, now was dumb and ill at ease! I believe that I would rather have been thrown to the alligators of the spring than be left alone with Atala. The desert maiden was as troubled as her captive. We kept a deep silence: the spirits of love had robbed us of our speech. At last Atala, with an effort, said:

'Warrior, thou art chained but lightly. Thou couldst easily escape.'

At these words courage came back to my tongue. I replied, 'Lightly chained, O woman —!' I knew not how to finish. Atala hesitated a moment, and said:

'Fly! Save yourself!' She untied me from the tree. I seized the cord and thrust it into the strange maiden's hand, forcing her pretty fingers to close upon my fetters.

'Take it back, take it back!' I cried.

'Thou art mad,' said Atala with a troubled voice. 'Unhappy man, dost thou not know thou wilt be burned? What canst thou do? Knowest thou that I am the daughter of a mighty chief?'

'Time was,' I answered weeping, 'when I was carried in a beaver-skin on the shoulders of my mother. My father too had a fine lodge, and his deer drank the waters of a thousand streams; but now I wander homeless. When I shall be no more, no friend will strew grass upon my body to guard it from the flies. No one cares for a hapless stranger's corpse.'

These words moved Atala. Her tears fell into the spring. 'Ah,' I went on eagerly, 'if thy heart but spoke as mine does! Is not the wilderness free? Have not the forests many folds wherein to hide us? Do the children of the wigwam need so much to make them happy? O maid, more lovely than the first dream of the bridegroom! O my well-beloved, take courage and follow my steps.' Such were my words. Atala made answer in a tender voice:

'Young friend, thou hast learned the language of the whites. It is easy to deceive an Indian maiden.'

'What!' I cried, 'you call me your young friend! Ah, if a poor slave —'

'Well,' she said, leaning towards me, 'a poor slave —'

I went on with ardour:

'Assure him of your faith with a kiss!'

Atala heard my prayer. As a fawn seems to hang from the rosy flowers of the bindweed that it seizes with its delicate tongue, in the crags of the mountains, so hung I on the lips of my beloved.

Alas, my dear son, how nigh is joy to sorrow. Who could have foretold that the same moment when Atala gave me the first proof of love would be that in which she should destroy my hopes? White hairs of ancient Chactas, what was your surprise when the daughter of the sachem said these words:

'Fair prisoner, I have foolishly yielded to thy desire, but whither will this passion lead us? My religion parts me from thee for ever. O my mother, what hast thou done?' Suddenly Atala was silent, seeking some fatal secret ready to spring from her lips. Her words filled me with despair.

'Well!' I cried, 'I will be cruel, even as thou art. I will not fly. Thou wilt see me in the ring of flame, and hear my flesh seethe in the fire, and thou wilt be filled with gladness.' Atala seized my hand in both her own.

'Poor young worshipper of idols,' she cried, 'you make me grieve for you. Would you have me weep my heart out? Pity it is that I cannot fly with you. Unhappy she that bare thee, Atala. Why dost thou not throw thyself to the alligators of the spring?'

The sun was setting, and the noise of the alligators began to be heard. Atala said to me, 'Let us fly.' I took the daughter of Simaghan to the foot of the hills, where bays of green verdure were formed between head-lands running out into the savannah. Everything in that wilderness was calm and glorious. The swan called from her nest, the woods echoed with the monotonous cry of the quail, the whistle of the parrot, the lowing of the bison, and the neighing of the mares of the Seminoles.

Our walk was almost silent. I stepped by Atala's side; she held the end of the cord I had forced upon her. At times we shed tears, then tried to smile, glanced at the starry heavens, or dropped our gaze to earth. Together we listened to the song of a bird or turned toward the setting sun; hand tenderly pressing hand, hearts fluttering and then at rest; the names of Chactas and of Atala softly repeated at whiles. . . . O first walk of love, strong must be your memory, since, after so many years of sorrow, you yet can move the aged heart of Chactas!

How hard to understand are men when moved by passion. I had left my generous friend Lopez, I had risked all dangers for freedom — in one moment the sight of a woman had changed my desires, my will, my thoughts. Forgetful of my country, of my mother, of my home, and of the frightful death that awaited me, I had become careless of everything but Atala. Without strength to summon to my aid the sense of a man, I had fallen all at once into a sort of childishness, and instead of being able to do anything to escape the ills that awaited me, I had almost need of some one to feed me and put me to sleep.

So after our wanderings in the savannah, it was in vain that Atala, throwing herself at my feet, begged me to leave her. I said that I would return alone to the camp unless she would bind me again to my tree-trunk. She was forced to do what I wanted, hoping to win me over another time.

On the morrow of that day which had decided my fate, the tribe pitched their tents in a valley not far from Cuscowilla, head village of the Seminoles, the tribe which, with the Muskogees, formed the federation of the Crees. The daughter of the land of palms came to me at midnight. She led me into a great forest of pines and again besought me to fly. Not answering, I took her hand in my hand, and I forced that wild doe to wander with me in the forest. The night was delicious. The spirit of night shook his blue tresses, sweet with the scent of pines, and a faint odour of amber from the alligators asleep breathed beneath the tamarinds by the streams. The moon shone amid a flawless blue, and its pearly light fell on the dim edge of the forest. No sound was heard, except a strange far-away music, that filled the depths of the woods; as if the spirit of loneliness breathed in the wide expanse of the wilderness.

Among the trees we saw a youth carrying a torch; he looked like the spirit of spring, threading the woods to reawaken earth. It was a lover, hastening to the tent of his mistress to learn his fate. If the maid puts out the torch she accepts his offered vows; if she veils herself and does not quench it she spurns a husband. The warrior, gliding among the trees, sang in a low voice these words:

'Before the footsteps of day I went upon the mountains, to seek my lonely dove among the oaks of the forest.

'I hung upon her neck a chain of shells: there are three red beads for my love, three violet for my fears, three blue for my hopes.

'Mila has the eyes of an ermine and the soft hair of a rice-field; her mouth is a rosy shell decked with pearls; her breasts are like two young kids without a blemish, born the same day of one mother.

'O may Mila quench this torch! May her lips pour a sweet darkness upon it. I will make her fruitful; the hope of our country shall hang on her abundant breast, and I will smoke the pipe of peace over the cradle of my son.

'O let me go before the footsteps of day upon the peaks of the mountains, to seek my lonely dove among the oaks of the forest.'

So sang the young man, and his voice brought fear into the depth of my soul, and a change over the face of Atala. Our joined hands trembled together, but we were turned from this scene by one no less dangerous for us.

We passed by the grave of a child, a boundary mark between two tribes. They had put it by the wayside so that young women, going to the well, might draw into their breast the soul of the blameless being, and give it back to their nation. We saw young wives who, wishing for the sweets of motherhood, sought, through half-open lips, to gather the soul of the little child which they thought they could see hovering among the flowers. The child's own mother came soon to lay on the grave a sheaf of maize and some white lilies; she spilt some drops of her milk on the ground, and sat down upon the grass, talking to her child in a tender voice.

'Why do I weep thee in thy earthen cradle, O my newly born? When the little bird is grown he must seek his food, and in the desert he needs must find many a bitter berry. Thou, at least, hast not known tears; thy heart, at least, has not been bared to the wasting breath of men. The bud that withers in its sheath passes away with all its sweetness, like thee, O my son, with all thine innocence. Happy are they who die in their cradle, who have known nothing but the kisses and smiles of a mother.'

Overcome as we already were by our own hearts, we were quite overwhelmed by these sights of love and of motherhood, which seemed to follow us among the magic solitudes. I carried Atala in my arms deeper into the forest, and said to her things which I might search for in vain on my lips to-day. The south wind, my son, loses its heat in passing over frozen mountains. Memories of love in the heart of an old man are like the sun's fires, thrown back by the calm face of the moon, when the sun is set and silence lies on the lodges of the forest-dwellers.

What could save Atala? What could hinder her from yielding to nature? Nothing but a miracle, no doubt, and the miracle was sent! The daughter of Simaghan turned to the God of the Christians: she threw herself on the ground, and uttered a burning prayer to her mother and to the queen of virgins. From that moment, René, I formed a wonderful idea of that religion which, in the forest, among all the hardships of life, can fill the unhappy with a thousand gifts — that religion which, setting its power against the flood of the passions, alone is able to withstand them, when all is in their favour — the mystery of woods, the solitude far from men, and the secrecy of shadows. Ah, how divine she seemed to me, the blameless Indian maiden, the innocent Atala, as she knelt before an ancient fallen pine, as at the foot of an altar, offering to her God prayers for her heathen lover. Her eyes lifted to the dome of night, and her cheeks, glistening with tears of faith and love, gave her the beauty of the immortals. Time and again it seemed to me as though she were on the point of taking flight towards heaven; time and again I seemed to see in the rays of the moon, and to hear in the branches of the trees, those spirits whom the God of the Christians sends down to hermits among the rocks when He wishes to recall them to Himself. The thought grieved me, for I feared that Atala had but a short time to spend on earth.

Meantime she shed so many tears, and seemed so full of woe, that I would perhaps have agreed to leave her, when the death-cry sounded in the forest. Four armed men threw themselves upon me. We had been found. The chief of the warriors had given the word to follow us. Atala, like a queen in the pride of her bearing, did not stoop to speak to the warriors; she threw them a haughty glance and went into the presence of Simaghan. She could get nothing from him. They doubled my guards, they put more chains upon me, and they took away my love. Five nights passed, and we saw Apalachicola on the banks of the Chattahoochee river. Then forthwith they crowned me with flowers, painted my face blue and scarlet; they hung beads in my ears and nose, and in my hand they put an instrument of music.

So adorned for sacrifice, I entered Apalachicola, amid the shouts of the crowd. My end was at hand, when on a sudden the noise of a conch was heard, and the chief of the tribe gave the word to assemble.

Thou knowest, son, the torments which the Indians inflict on their prisoners. The Christian missionaries, at risk of their lives, and with untiring charity, had succeeded in making many tribes substitute a milder slavery for the horrors of the stake. The Muskogees had not yet adopted that custom, but a large part of the tribe was in favour of the change. It was to decide this weighty matter that the mico called the sachems together. They led me to the spot where the debate was to be held.

Not far from Apalachicola, on an isolated hillock, rises the council-tent. Three circles of columns formed the graceful structure of the building. The columns were of cypress, polished and carved; they were taller and thicker, but fewer in number as they approached the centre, which was marked by a single pillar. From the top of this, cords of bark were stretched to the tops of the other pillars, and made a covering to the tent like an outspread fan.

On the banks of the river Chattahoochee there was a wild fig-tree consecrated by the worship of the people. The maidens used to wash their garments of bark in that place before hanging them to the wind on the branches of the ancient tree. There they had dug a deep grave. They left the hall of the dead, singing the death-song: each family carried some sacred remains. At the tomb, the relics were laid down, stretched out on couches, each separately wrapped in bear and beaver-skins; the mound was piled above, and on it was planted the tree of weeping and of sleep.

My son, pity mankind! These same Indians, whose customs were so touching, those same women who had shown such a tender interest in me, now asked for my death with loud cries, and whole tribes delayed their departure that they might have the pleasure of seeing a young man suffer the most terrible tortures.

In a valley to the north, at some distance from the great village, there rose a wood of cypresses and firs, called the Grove of Blood. The way to it led by one of those monuments whose origin is unknown, the work of a forgotten people. In the midst of the wood there was a ring where prisoners of war were sacrificed. Thither they led me in triumph, and everything was made ready for my death. They planted the stake of Areskwe. Pines, elms, cypresses fell beneath the hatchet, and the pyre was raised. The onlookers built seats around it with the branches and trunks of the trees. Each one invented a torture — one proposed to scalp me, another to blind me with a red-hot axe. I began my death-song.

'I fear no torments. I am brave, O Muskogees; I set you at nought. I hold you of less account than women. My father, Outalissi, son of Miscou, drank from the skulls of your most mighty warriors. Ye will tear no sigh from my heart.' Provoked by my song, a warrior pierced my arm with an arrow. I said, 'I thank thee, brother.'

Despite the activity of the executioners, the preparations for my death could not be finished before the setting of the sun. The counsel of the medicine-man was asked; he forbade them to trouble the spirits of darkness, and my death was put off till the morrow. But in their haste to enjoy the sight, and to be the sooner ready when the sun should rise, the Indians did not leave the Grove of Blood. They lit large fires, and began to feast and to dance.

Meanwhile they had laid me on my back, and cords were fastened from my neck, arms, and legs to stakes in the ground. Braves lay on each of the cords, so that I could not move unknown to them. The night was far spent. By degrees the songs and dancing stopped. The fires cast only a dull reddish glow, against which I saw now and then the form of an Indian; everything slumbered. As the noise of men became quieter, that of the wilderness increased, and the babel of voices gave place to the complaints of the winds in the forest.

The council assembled. Fifty old men in beaver cloaks took their places on tiers of seats facing the door of the tent. The great chief sat in the midst of them, holding in his hand the pipe of peace, and wearing part of his war-paint. On the right of the old men there were fifty women, in robes of swan's feathers. The war-chiefs, tomahawk in hand and plumes on their heads, and arms and breast smeared with blood, were on the left. At the foot of the central pillar burned the fire of the council. The chief medicine-man, surrounded by the eight guardians of the temple, dressed in long robes and wearing stuffed owls on their heads, threw coco-nut milk on the flame, and offered a sacrifice to the sun. The threefold ranks of old men, squaws, and warriors, the priests, the clouds of incense, the sacrifice, all served to give the council an aspect of solemnity.

I stood bound in the midst of the gathering. The sacrifice ended, the chief spoke, and clearly set forth the reason for the assembly. He threw a blue necklace into the midst as witness of what he had said. Then a sachem of the tribe of the Eagle rose and spoke thus:

'My father the mico, sachems, squaws, braves of the four tribes of the Eagle, the Beaver, the Serpent, and the Terrapin, let us not change the manners of our fathers. Let us burn our prisoners, and not soften our hearts. It is a custom of the whites that is being proposed to you — it can only be bad. Who thinks with me, give a red necklace. I have spoken.'

A woman arose and said: 'My father the Eagle, ye have the wisdom of the fox, and the careful slowness of the terrapin. I would brighten the chain of friendship with you, and we will plant together the tree of peace. But let us change the customs of our fathers in that which is evil. Let us have slaves to dig our fields, and let us no longer hear the shrieks of prisoners, troubling the hearts of those of us who are mothers.'

As the billows of the sea break in a storm, as the dried leaves of autumn are whirled by a hurricane, as the reeds of Mississippi bend and arise again in sudden flood, as a great herd of deer bell in the depths of the forest, so the assembly murmured and was moved. Sachem, 20 braves, squaws, spoke in turn and all together. Interests clashed, opinions were divided, and the council was on the point of breaking up; but in the end the old use remained, and I was condemned to the stake.

Only one thing delayed my torture: the Feast of the Dead or Feast of Souls approached, and it is not their custom to kill any captive during the days devoted to that ceremony. They gave me over to a strict guard, and doubtless the sachems spirited away the daughter of Simaghan, for I saw her no more.

Meantime the tribes from more than 35 three hundred leagues round came in numbers to hold the Feast of Souls. A long shed had been built near by. On the appointed day each family brought forth the remains of the forefathers from their own graves, and hung the bones in order, each family apart, in the Hall of the Ancestors. A tempest had arisen, and the winds, the forest, and the waters murmured outside, while the ancients of many 45 tribes made treaties of peace and friendship over the bones of their fathers.

They held funeral games — races, ball-play, and knucklebones. Two maidens tried to wrest a willow-wand one from the 50 other. Their breasts touched, their hands hovered over the switch, which they lifted above their heads. Their pretty bare feet turned together, their mouths met, and their sweet breaths were mingled; they stooped, and their hair was intertwined; they looked at their mothers, blushing, and the company applauded. The medicine-man invoked Michabou, the spirit of the waters. He told the tale of the wars between the great Hare and Machimanito, the god of evil; of the first man and Athaensic the first woman, thrown out of heaven for having lost their innocence; of the ground red with the blood of brothers; of the wicked Jouskeka murdering the just Tahouistsaron; of the floods that came down at the word of the Great Spirit; of Massou, saved alone in his canoe of bark, and of the crow sent out to seek the land. He told also of beautiful Endaé brought back from the land of souls by the sweet songs of her husband. After these games and stories, they prepared to give their fathers an everlasting burial.

It was the hour when the young Indian mother wakes at midnight with a start, thinking she hears the cry of her first-born asking for sweet nourishment. With my eyes fixed on the sky, where the crescent moon was wandering among the clouds, I thought of my fate. Atala seemed to me a monster of ingratitude, to forsake me in the moment of my death; me, who had given myself to the flames rather than leave her. And even yet I felt that I loved her still, and that I would joyfully die for her.

In the keenest pleasures there is a sting that awakens us, as if in warning to make use of the fleeting moment. In deep distress, on the other hand, a strange heaviness puts us to sleep. Eyes wearied with tears tend naturally to close, and thus, even in our sorrows, the goodness of Providence is felt. In spite of myself, I yielded to the heavy sleep that the miserable sometimes taste. I dreamed that bonds were being loosed. I thought I felt that solace known when, after being straitly bound, a succouring hand re- 50 moves our chains.

This feeling became so strong that it made me raise my eyelids. By the light of the moon, of which one ray pierced the clouds, I saw a tall figure in white, bending over me, and silently untying my bonds. I would have uttered a cry, but a hand, which I knew at once, closed my mouth. Only one cord remained, but it seemed impossible to cut it without awakening the warrior whose body entirely covered it. Atala touched it, the Indian brave half woke and sat up. Atala stood motionless and looked at him; the Indian thought he saw the spirit of the ruins and lay down again, calling on his manito. The cord was cut, I arose, and followed my liberator, who gave me the end of a bow, while she held the other end of it. But what dangers encircled us! Now we nearly stumbled over sleeping Indians, then we were questioned by a sentry, whom Atala answered in a feigned voice. Children cried, hounds bayed. We were hardly outside the hideous place when shouts rang through the forest. The camp was awake, a thousand fires were lit, and we saw Indians with torches, running in all directions. We hastened our steps.

When morning rose on the Appalachian mountains, we were far away. How happy was I, when I found myself once again in the wilds with Atala, with Atala my rescuer, Atala who had given herself to me for ever. Words failed my tongue. I fell on my knees and said to the daughter of Simaghan, 'Men are little worth, but when spirits visit them, then they are indeed nothing. Thou art a spirit, thou hast visited me, and I cannot speak before thee.' Atala held out her hand with a smile.

'I must needs follow thee,' she said,

'seeing that thou wouldst not fly without me. To-night I bribed the medicine-man with gifts. I made the torturers drunk with fire-water, and I owed it to risk my life for thee, because thou hadst given thine for me. Yes, young worshipper of idols,' she added, in a tone that frightened me, 'the sacrifice will be repaid.'

Atala restored me my weapons, which she had been careful to bring, and she bound my wound. As she wiped it with a leaf, her tears fell and moistened the place.

'It is a balm that thou spreadst on my wound,' I said.

'I fear it may rather be a poison,' she replied. She tore one of the garments on her bosom and made of it a bandage, which she fastened with a tress of her hair.

Drunkenness, which lasts long with the Indians and affects them like a kind of disease, doubtless prevented them from following us for the first few days. If they did at length seek us, it may have been towards the setting sun, thinking that we should make for the Mississippi. But we had taken our way towards the star that never moves, guiding our steps by the moss on the tree-stems.

It was not long before we saw that we had gained little by my freedom. The boundless solitudes of the wilderness now stretched before us. Unskilled in the life of the woods, far removed from our right road, and travelling at hazard, what was to become of us? Often looking at Atala, I thought of that ancient tale that Lopez had made me read, of Hagar who was in the desert of Beersheba long ago, when men lived thrice the lifetime of an oak.

•THE POSTMASTER

Who has not cursed postmasters, who has not quarrelled with them? Who, in a moment of anger, has not demanded from them the fatal book in order to record in it unavailing complaints of their extortions, rudeness and unpunctuality? Who does not look upon them as monsters of the human race, equal to the defunct attorneys, or, at least, the brigands of Mouroom!¹ Let us, however, be just; let us place ourselves in their position, and perhaps we shall begin to judge them with more indulgence. What is a postmaster? A veritable martyr of the fourteenth class,² only protected by his rank from blows, and that not always (I appeal to the conscience of my readers). What is the function of this dictator, as Prince Viazemsky jokingly calls him? Is he not an actual galley-slave? He has no rest either day or night. All the vexation accumulated during the course of a wearisome journey the traveler vents upon the postmaster. Should the weather prove intolerable, the road abominable, the driver obstinate, the horses ungovernable — the postmaster is to blame. Entering into his poor abode, the traveler looks upon him as an enemy, and the postmaster is fortunate if he succeeds in soon getting rid of his uninvited guest; but if there should happen to be no horses! . . . Heavens! what volleys of abuse, what threats are showered upon his head! In rain and sleet he is compelled to go out into the courtyard; during times of storm and nipping frost, he is glad to seek shelter in the vestibule, if only to enjoy a minute's repose from the shouting and jostling of incensed travelers.

A general arrives: the trembling postmaster gives him the two last troikas,³ including that intended for the courier. The general drives off without uttering a word of thanks. Five minutes afterwards — a bell! . . . and a courier throws down upon the table before him his order for fresh post-horses! . . . Let us bear all this well in mind, and, instead of anger, our hearts will be filled with sincere compassion. A few words more. During a period of twenty years I have traversed Russia in every direction; I know nearly all the post roads, and I have made the acquaintance of several generations of drivers. There are very few postmasters that I do not know personally, and few with whom I have not had business relations. In the course of time I hope to publish some curious observations that I have noted down during my travels. For the present I will only say that the body of 5 postmasters is presented to the public in a very false light. These much-calumniated officials are generally very peaceful persons, obliging by nature, disposed to be sociable, modest in their pretensions and not too much addicted to the love of money. From their conversation (which traveling gentlemen very unreasonably despise) much may be learnt that is both interesting and instructive. For my own 10 part, I confess that I prefer their talk to that of some official of the sixth class traveling on government business.

It may easily be supposed that I have friends among the honorable body of 20 postmasters. Indeed, the memory of one of them is dear to me. Circumstances once brought us together, and it is of him that I now intend to tell my amiable readers.

In the month of May of the year 1816, I happened to be traveling through the Government of N—, upon a road now destroyed. I then held an inferior rank, and traveled by post stages, paying the fare for two horses. As a consequence, the postmasters treated me with little ceremony, and I often had to take by force what, in my opinion, belonged to me by right. Being young and passionate, I was indignant at the baseness and cowardice of the postmaster, when the latter harnessed to the calèche⁴ of some official noble the horses prepared for me. It was a long time, too, before I could get accustomed to being served out of my turn by a discriminating servant at the governor's dinner. Today the one and the other seem to me to be in the natural order of things. Indeed, what would become of us, if, instead of the generally observed rule: "Let rank honor rank," another were to be brought into use, as for example: "Let mind honor mind?" What disputes would arise! And with whom would the servants begin in serving the dishes? But to return to my story.

The day was hot. About three versts from A——, a drizzling rain came on, and in a few minutes it began to pour down in torrents and I was drenched to the skin. On arriving at the station, my first care was to change my clothes as quickly as possible, my second to ask for some tea.

"Hi! Dounia!" cried the postmaster: "prepare the tea-urn and go and get some cream."

At these words, a young girl of about fourteen years of age appeared from behind the partition, and ran out into the vestibule. Her beauty struck me.

"Is that your daughter?" I inquired of the Postmaster.

"That is my daughter," he replied, with a look of gratified pride; "and she is so sharp and sensible, just like her late mother."

Then he began to register my traveling passport, and I occupied myself with examining the pictures that adorned his humble abode. They illustrated the story of the Prodigal Son. In the first, a venerable old man, in a night-cap and dressing-gown, is taking leave of the restless youth, who is eagerly accepting his blessing and a bag of money. In the next picture, the dissipated life of the young man is depicted in vivid colors: he is represented sitting at a table surrounded by false friends and shameless women. Further on, the ruined youth, in rags and a three-cornered hat, is tending swine and sharing with them their food: on his face is expressed deep grief and repentance. The last picture represented his return to his father: the good old man, in the same night-cap and dressing-gown, runs forward to meet him; the prodigal son falls on his knees; in the distance the cook is killing the fatted calf, and the elder brother is asking the servants the cause of all the rejoicing. Under each picture I read some suitable German verses. All this I have preserved in my memory to the present day, as well as the little pots of balsams, the bed with speckled curtains, and the other objects with which I was then surrounded. I can see at the present moment the host himself, a man of about fifty years of age, fresh and strong, in his long green surtout¹ with three medals on faded ribbons.

I had scarcely settled my account with my old driver, when Dounia returned with the tea-urn. The little coquette saw at the second glance the impression she had produced upon me; she lowered her large blue eyes; I began to talk to her; she answered me without the least timidity, like a girl who has seen the world. I offered her father a glass of punch, to Dounia herself I gave a cup of tea, and then the three of us began to converse together, as if we were old acquaintances.

The horses had long been ready, but I felt reluctant to take leave of the Postmaster and his daughter. At last I bade them good-bye, the father wished me a pleasant journey, the daughter accompanied me to the telega.² In the vestibule I stopped and asked her permission to kiss her; Dounia consented. . . . I can reckon up a great many kisses since that time, but not one which has left behind such a long, such a pleasant recollection.

Several years passed, and circumstances led me to the same road, and to the same places.

"But," thought I, "perhaps the old Postmaster has been changed, and Dounia may already be married."

The thought that one or the other of them might be dead also flashed through my mind, and I approached the station of A—— with a sad presentiment. The horses drew up before the little post-house. On entering the room, I immediately recognized the pictures illustrating the story of the Prodigal Son. The table and the bed stood in the same places as before, but the flowers were no longer on the windowsills, and everything around indicated decay and neglect.

The Postmaster was asleep under his sheepskin pelisse; my arrival awoke him, and he rose up. . . . It was certainly

Simeon Virin, but how aged! While he was preparing to register my traveling passport, I gazed at his gray hairs, the deep wrinkles upon his face, that had not been shaved for a long time, his bent back, and I was astonished to see how three or four years had been able to transform a strong and active individual into a feeble old man.

"Do you recognize me?" I asked him; 10 "we are old acquaintances."

"May be," replied he mournfully; "this is a high road, and many travelers have stopped here."

"Is your Dounia well?" I continued. 15

The old man frowned.

"God knows," he replied.

"Probably she is married?"

The old man pretended not to have heard my question, and went on reading 20 my passport in a low tone. I ceased questioning him and ordered some tea. Curiosity began to torment me, and I hoped that the punch would loosen the tongue of my old acquaintance.

I was not mistaken; the old man did not refuse the proffered glass. I observed that the rum dispelled his mournfulness. At the second glass he began to talk; he remembered me, or appeared as if he 30 remembered me, and I heard from him a story, which at the time, deeply interested and affected me.

"So you knew my Dounia?" he began. "But who did not know her? Ah, Dounia, 35 Dounia! What a girl she was! Everybody who passed this way praised her; nobody had a word to say against her. The ladies used to give her presents — now a handkerchief, now a pair of earrings. 40 The gentlemen used to stop intentionally, as if to dine or to take supper, but in reality only to take a longer look at her. However angry a gentleman might be, in her presence he grew calm and spoke 45 graciously to me. Would you believe it, sir: couriers and Court messengers used to talk to her for half-hours at a stretch. It was she who kept the house; she put everything in order, got everything ready, 50 and looked after everything. And I, like an old fool, could not look at her enough, could not idolize her enough. Did I not love my Dounia? Did I not indulge my child? Was not her life a happy one? But, no, there is no escaping misfortune: 5 there is no evading what has been decreed."

Then he began to tell me his sorrow in detail. Three years before, one winter evening, when the Postmaster was ruling a new book, and his daughter behind the partition was sewing a dress, a troika drove up, and a traveler in a Circassian cap and military cloak, and enveloped in a shawl, entered the room and demanded horses. 15 The horses were all out. On being told this, the traveler raised his voice and whip; but Dounia, accustomed to such scenes, ran out from behind the partition and graciously inquired of the traveler whether he would not like something to eat and drink.

The appearance of Dounia produced the usual effect. The traveler's anger subsided; he consented to wait for horses, 25 and ordered supper. Having taken off his wet shaggy cap, and divested himself of his shawl and cloak, the traveler was seen to be a tall young Hussar with a black moustache. He made himself comfortable with the Postmaster, and began to converse in a pleasant manner with him and his daughter. Supper was served. Meanwhile the horses returned, and the Postmaster ordered them, without being fed, 35 to be harnessed immediately to the traveler's kibitka.¹ But on returning to the room, he found the young man lying almost unconscious on the bench; he had come over faint, his head ached, it was impossible for him to continue his journey. What was to be done? The Postmaster gave up his own bed to him, and it was decided that, if the sick man did not get better, they would send next day to C— 45 for the doctor.

The next day the Hussar was worse. His servant rode to the town for the doctor. Dounia bound round his head a handkerchief steeped in vinegar, and sat with her needlework beside his bed. In the presence of the Postmaster, the sick man sighed and scarcely uttered a word; but he drank two cups of coffee, and, with a sigh, ordered dinner. Dounia did not quit his side. He constantly asked for something to drink, and Dounia gave him a jug of lemonade prepared by herself. The sick man moistened his lips, and each time, on returning the jug, he feebly pressed Dounia's hand in token of gratitude.

About dinner time the doctor arrived. He felt the sick man's pulse, spoke to him in German, and declared in Russian that he only needed rest, and that in about a couple of days he would be able to set out on his journey. The Hussar gave him twenty-five roubles for his visit, and invited him to dinner; the doctor accepted the invitation. They both ate with a good appetite, drank a bottle of wine, and separated very well satisfied with each other.

Another day passed, and the Hussar felt quite himself again. He was extraordinarily lively, joked unceasingly, now with Dounia, now with the Postmaster, whistled tunes, chatted with the travelers, copied their passports into the post-book, and so won upon the worthy Postmaster, that, when the third day arrived, it was with regret that he parted with his amiable guest.

The day was Sunday; Dounia was preparing to go to mass. The Hussar's kibitka stood ready. He took leave of the Postmaster, after having generously recompensed him for his board and lodging, bade farewell to Dounia, and offered to drive her as far as the church, which was situated at the end of the village. Dounia hesitated.

"What are you afraid of?" asked her father. "His Excellency is not a wolf: he won't eat you. Drive with him as far as the church."

Dounia seated herself in the kibitka by the side of the Hussar, the servant sprang upon the box, the driver whistled, and the horses started off at a gallop.

The poor Postmaster could not understand how he could have allowed his Dounia to drive off with the Hussar, how he could have been so blind, and what had become of his senses at that moment. A half-hour had not elapsed, before his heart began to grieve, and anxiety and uneasiness took possession of him to such a degree that he could contain himself no longer, and started off for mass himself. On reaching the church, he saw that the people were already beginning to disperse, but Dounia was neither in the churchyard nor in the porch. He hastened into the church: the priest was leaving the altar, the clerk was extinguishing the candles, two old women were still praying in a corner, but Dounia was not in the church. The poor father was scarcely able to summon up sufficient resolution to ask the clerk if she had been to mass. The clerk replied that she had not. The Postmaster returned home neither alive nor dead. One hope alone remained to him: Dounia, in the thoughtlessness of youth, might have taken it into her head to go on as far as the next station, where her godmother lived. In agonizing agitation he awaited the return of the troika in which he had let her set out. The driver did not return. At last, in the evening, he arrived alone and intoxicated, with the terrible news that Dounia had gone on with the Hussar at the other station.

The old man could not bear his misfortune: he immediately took to that very same bed where, the evening before, the young deceiver had lain. Taking all the circumstances into account, the Postmaster now came to the conclusion that the illness had been a mere pretense. The poor man fell ill with a violent fever; he was removed to C—, and in his place another person was appointed for the time being. The same doctor, who had attended the Hussar, attended him also. He assured the Postmaster that the young man had been perfectly well, and that at the time of his visit he had suspected him of some evil intentions, but that he had kept silent through fear of his whip. Whether the German spoke the truth or only wished to boast of his perspicacity, his communication afforded no consolation to the poor invalid. Scarcely had the latter recovered from his illness, when he asked the Postmaster of C— for two months' leave of absence, and without saying a word to anybody of his intentions, he set out on foot in search of his daughter.

From the traveling passport he found out that Captain Minsky was journeying from Smolensk to St. Petersburg. The *yemshik*¹ who drove him said that Dounia had wept the whole of the way, although she seemed to go of her own free will.

"Perhaps," thought the Postmaster, "I shall bring back home my erring ewe-lamb."

With this thought he reached St. Petersburg, stopped at the barracks of the Ismailovsky Regiment, in the quarters of a retired non-commissioned officer, an old comrade of his, and then began his search. He soon discovered that Captain Minsky was in St. Petersburg, and was living at the Demoutoff Hotel. The Postmaster resolved to call upon him.

Early in the morning he went to Minsky's ante-chamber, and requested that His Excellency might be informed that an old soldier wished to see him. The military servant, who was cleaning a boot on a boot-tree, informed him that his master was still asleep, and that he never received anybody before eleven o'clock. The Postmaster retired and returned at the appointed time. Minsky himself came out to him in his dressing-gown and red skull-cap.

"Well, my friend, what do you want?" he asked.

The old man's heart began to boil, tears started to his eyes, and he was only able to say in a trembling voice:

"Your Excellency! . . . do me the divine favour! . . ."

Minsky glanced quickly at him, grew confused, took him by the hand, led him into his cabinet and locked the door.

"Your Excellency!" continued the old man: "what has fallen from the load is lost; give me back at least my poor Dounia. You have made her your plaything; do not ruin her entirely."

"What is done cannot be undone," said the young man, in the utmost confusion; "I am guilty before you, and am ready to ask your pardon, but do not think that I could forsake Dounia; she shall be happy, I give you my word of honour. Why do you want her? She loves me; she has become disused to her former existence. Neither you nor she will forget what has happened."

Then, pushing something up the old man's sleeve, he opened the door, and the Postmaster, without remembering how, found himself in the street again.

For a long time he stood immovable; at last he observed in the cuff of his sleeve a roll of papers; he drew them out and unrolled several fifty rouble notes. Tears again filled his eyes, tears of indignation! He crushed the notes into a ball, flung them upon the ground, stamped upon them with the heel of his boot, and then walked away. . . . After having gone a few steps, he stopped, reflected, and returned . . . but the notes were no longer there. A well-dressed young man, observing him, ran towards a droshky,² jumped in hurriedly, and cried to the driver: "Go on!"

The Postmaster did not pursue him. He resolved to return home to his station, but before doing so he wished to see his poor Dounia once more. For that purpose, he returned to Minsky's lodgings a couple of days afterwards, but the military servant told him roughly that his master received nobody, pushed him out of the ante-chamber and slammed the door in his face. The Postmaster stood waiting for a long time, then he walked away.

That same day, in the evening, he was walking along the Liteinaia, having been to a service at the Church of the Afflicted. Suddenly a stylish droshky flew past him, and the Postmaster recognized Minsky. The droshky stopped in front of a three-storeyed house, close to the entrance, and the Hussar ran up the steps. A happy thought flashed through the mind of the Postmaster. He returned, and, approaching the coachman:

"Whose house is this, my friend?" asked he. "Doesn't it belong to Minsky?"

"Exactly so," replied the coachman: "what do you want?"

"Well, your master ordered me to carry a letter to his Dounia, and I have forgotten where his Dounia lives."

"She lives here, on the second floor. But you are late with your letter, my friend; he is with her himself just now."

"That doesn't matter," replied the Postmaster, with an inexplicable beating of the heart. "Thanks for your information, but I shall know how to manage my business." And with these words he ascended the staircase.

The door was locked; he rang. There was a painful delay of several seconds. The key rattled, and the door was opened.

"Does Avdotia Simeonovna live here?" he asked.

"Yes," replied a young female servant: "what do you want with her?"

The Postmaster without replying walked into the room.

"You mustn't go in, you mustn't go in!" the servant cried out after him: "Avdotia Simeonovna has visitors."

But the Postmaster, without heeding her, walked straight on. The first two rooms were dark; in the third there was a light. He approached the open door and paused. In the room, which was beautifully furnished, sat Minsky in deep thought. Dounia, attired in the most elegant fashion, was sitting upon the arm of his chair, like a lady rider upon her English saddle. She was gazing tenderly at Minsky, and winding his black curls round her sparkling fingers. Poor Postmaster! Never had his daughter seemed to him so beautiful; he admired her against his will.

"Who is there?" she asked, without raising her head.

He remained silent. Receiving no reply, Dounia raised her head . . . and with a cry she fell upon the carpet. The alarmed Minsky hastened to pick her up, but suddenly catching sight of the old Postmaster in the doorway, he left Dounia and approached him, trembling with rage.

"What do you want?" he said to him, clenching his teeth. "Why do you steal after me everywhere, like a thief? Or do you want to murder me? Be off!" and with a powerful hand he seized the old man by the collar and pushed him down the stairs.

The old man returned to his lodging. His friend advised him to lodge a complaint, but the Postmaster reflected, waved his hand, and resolved to abstain from taking any further steps in the matter. Two days afterwards he left St. Petersburg and returned to his station to resume his duties.

"This is the third year," he concluded, "that I have been living without Dounia, and I have not heard a word about her. Whether she is alive or not — God only knows. So many things happen. She is not the first, nor yet the last, that a traveling scoundrel has seduced, kept for a little while, and then forsaken. There are many such young fools in St. Petersburg, today in satin and velvet, and tomorrow sweeping the streets along with the wretched hangers-on of the dramshops. Sometimes, when I think that Dounia also may come to such an end, then, in spite of myself, I sin and wish her in her grave. . . ."

Such was the story of my friend, the old Postmaster, a story more than once interrupted by tears, which he picturesquely wiped away with the skirt of his coat, like the zealous Terentitch in Dmitrieff's beautiful ballad. These tears were partly induced by the punch, of which he had drunk five glasses during the course of his narrative, but for all that, they produced a deep impression upon my heart. After taking leave of him, it was a long time before I could forget the old Postmaster, and for a long time I thought of poor Dounia. . . .

Passing through the little town of — a short time ago, I remembered my friend. I heard that the station, over which he ruled, had been abolished. To my question: "Is the old Postmaster still alive?" nobody could give me a satisfactory reply. I resolved to pay a visit to the well-known place, and, having hired horses, I set out for the village of N—.

It was in autumn. Gray clouds covered the sky; a cold wind blew across the reaped fields, carrying along with it the red and yellow leaves from the trees that it encountered. I arrived in the village at sunset, and stopped at the little post-house. In the vestibule (where Dounia had once kissed me) a stout woman came out to meet me, and in answer to my questions replied, that the old Postmaster had been dead for about a year, that his house was occupied by a brewer, and that she was the brewer's wife. I began to regret my useless journey, and the seven 10 roubles that I had spent in vain. .

"Of what did he die?" I asked the brewer's wife.

"Of drink, little father," replied she.

"And where is he buried?"

"On the outskirts of the village, near his late wife."

"Could somebody take me to his grave?"

"To be sure! Hi, Vanka¹; you have 20 played with that cat long enough. Take this gentleman to the cemetery, and show him the Postmaster's grave."

At these words a ragged lad, with red hair, and a cast in his eye, ran up to me 25 and immediately began to lead the way towards the burial-ground.

"Did you know the dead man?" I asked him on the road.

"Did I know him! He taught me how 30 to cut blow-pipes. When he came out of the dram-shop (God rest his soul!) we used to run after him and call out: 'Grandfather! grandfather! some nuts!' and he used to throw nuts to us. He always 35 used to play with us."

"And do the travellers remember him?"

"There are very few travellers now; the assessor passes this way sometimes, but he doesn't trouble himself about dead people. 40

Last summer a lady passed through here, and she asked after the old Postmaster, and went to his grave."

"What sort of a lady?" I asked with 5 curiosity.

"A very beautiful lady," replied the lad. "She was in a carriage with six horses, and had along with her three little children, a nurse, and a little black dog; and when they told her that the old Postmaster was dead, she began to cry, and said to the children: 'Sit still, I will go to the cemetery.' I offered to show her the way. But the lady said: 'I know 15 the way.' And she gave me a five-copeck piece . . . such a kind lady!"

We reached the cemetery, a dreary place, not inclosed in the least; it was sown with wooden crosses, but there was not a single tree to throw a shade over it. Never in my life had I seen such a dismal cemetery.

"This is the old Postmaster's grave," said the lad to me, leaping upon a heap of sand, in which was planted a black cross with a copper image.

"And did the lady come here?" asked I.

"Yes," replied Vanka; "I watched her from a distance. She lay down here, and remained lying down for a long time. Then she went back to the village, sent for the pope, gave him some money and drove off, after giving me a five-copeck piece . . . such an excellent lady!"

And I, too, gave the lad a five-copeck piece, and I no longer regretted the journey nor the seven roubles that I had spent on it.

THE MODERN PERIOD

What we call for lack of a better name the Modern Period begins, like all other periods, at different times in different countries and different fields of literary activity. It is more difficult to define than earlier periods for two reasons: first, it is still in progress, and, second, it lacks, so far at least, any real unity of character. It is compact of nearly everything that has gone before. Each succeeding age, of course, imparts to literary consciousness characteristics that are to remain fixed in the fabric of thought; thus much writing of the Modern Period is indistinguishable in form and spirit from that of the Romantic Age. There is, on the other hand, much that could not have been written in the age of Shelley and Heine. The profound change in economic and industrial conditions, the rapid development of individual liberty, the expansion of scientific knowledge, all have altered the attitude toward life. Although an indifference toward the ameliorating flourishes of Romanticism was by no means new, an increasing emphasis on that tendency to which we give the name of Realism is undoubtedly one of the most distinctive characteristics of the Modern Age.

The two forms best suited to realism, the novel and the drama, especially the former, have developed enormously. •Although generalizations about such a complex age must be quite insufficient, it seems safe to say that writers have been more concerned with a faithful analysis of life than with the creation of beauty, — except where the romantic tendency lingers, as in lyric and dramatic poetry. While Ibsen, on the one hand, is searching for the answer to riddles of life in a business-like fashion, Maeterlinck, D'Annunzio, and others are writing poetic dramas full of the mystery of life and the charm of far-away lands and bygone days. It is almost impossible to characterize in general terms an age in which one of its prominent writers (Hauptmann) composes pieces as utterly diverse as The Sunken Bell and Before Sunrise.

National differences, which we are apt to imagine as growing less with every century, are still noticeable. The realism of Russia is far different from the realism of France. The beliefs, the situations, the materials tend to draw together, but the treatment is widely diversified.

Realism as a systematic program has had far-reaching results. It has brought into literary use many features of civilization that formerly belonged simply to statistics and legal records. Workers in the industries, farmers, tradesmen, although not newcomers in the realm of prose fiction and drama, appear in greater numbers and with new importance. The drama and the novel present and interpret not only the problems of the individual but of society. Economic and political questions, problems of race relations, mass psychology, and religion in all their complicated ramifications have been visualized as they affect typical sets of individuals.

Along with this prevailing realism there persist influences and interests that this age has inherited from its predecessors: the interest in classical antiquity, the susceptibility to the charms of the Orient and to the romance of districts yet in the frontier stage of civilization, the revelling in fantasy and in art for its own sake.

In a volume of this size it is impossible to present material fully representative of the age. The following survey, however, may indicate the significance of various characteristic writers: romance of the Middle Ages, D'Annunzio (p. 929); realism, Ibsen (p. 966) and most of the narrative writers in the volume, although we may think of Zola (p. 1150) as representing a more particularized realism, and of Keller (p. 1178), as inclined rather toward the romantic; confidence in Man's possibilities, Nietzsche (p. 1045); symbolic realism, Andreyev (p. 948) and Hauptmann (p. 910); loss of confidence in man, Schopenhauer (p. 1036), Baudelaire (p. 1070); interest in classical antiquity, Carducci (p. 1089), Louys (p. 1082); art for art's sake, Mallarmé (p. 1075); continuation of romanticism, Musset (p. 1065), Leconte de Lisle (p. 1068), Freiligrath (p. 1059); metrical innovation and experiment, Dehmel (p. 1062).

DRAMA

GERMAN

HAUPTMANN

(1862-)

Gerhart Hauptmann was born in Salzbrunn in Silesia, where he attended school until he was twelve years of age. Next he went to Breslau, but a turn in the family fortunes called him back home to take up farming. In 1880 he again went to Breslau to study sculpture, but progressed slowly. Feeling in need of a wider range of experience, he went, with the assistance of a rich patron, to the university of Jena, where his brother Karl was already studying philosophy. Here he eagerly absorbed the modern ideas of natural science and philosophy. He went south in 1883, and after visiting many Mediterranean cities stopped at Rome and occupied a studio until illness forced him to return home. In 1885 he married Marie Thienemann, the third of three sisters, the other two having married his brothers George and Karl. His wife's considerable means enabled Hauptmann to continue his studies in natural and social sciences, and in 1888 he withdrew to a beautiful country place to write. In 1889 he brought out Before Sunrise, a play which stimulated much discussion, especially among critics; Hannele, with which he was introduced to the Berlin stage, appeared in 1893; The Weavers (1896) brought him his greatest triumph in drama. Besides his plays Hauptmann wrote numerous novels, criticisms, and poems, and won prize after prize, including the Nobel prize for literature in 1912.

To Hauptmann is given the credit for introducing naturalism to the German stage. Being exceptionally fond of his Silesian home; he presented in fine detail the milieu of his youth; his love for the poor and oppressed is one of the vital motives of his life and writing. Though he began as a disciple of naturalism, the theme of romantic love and the mission of the poet began to take its place; symbolical forms began to flow into his naturalism. Beneath both moods one feels the strong current of a poet's awe before life in all its manifestations, an awe often tinged with irony because life is not always just. Hauptmann's characters are not moulded after a fixed conception of life in the author's mind, but create themselves.

Hannele grows out of great pity for the poor and a deep longing for beauty. Perhaps its greatest power lies in the development from the portrayal of misery to the vision of a new and marvelous beauty, in which dream and reality are mingled. It is no modern miracle or mystery play; it carries with it no religious propaganda; it is a poem of pity; "It is only the heart of humanity that can cure the sorrows of mankind."

The following translation is that of Charles H. Melzer in The Dramatic Works of Gerhart Hauptmann, New York, B. W. Huebsch, 1914.

ACT I

A room in the almshouse of a village in the mountains. Bare walls. A door at centre, back. To the left of this door is a small window. Before the window are a rickety table and a bench. Near the table and to the left of it is a stove. To the right of the door is a pallet with a straw mattress and a few ragged coverlets. It is a stormy December evening. At the table, seated and singing a hymn which she reads from a hymn book, by the light of a tallow candle, sits TULPE, an old ragged pauper.

TULPE. (Sings in a cracked quavering voice.)

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
 Let me to thy bosom fly,
 While the waves of trouble . . . "

(Enter HEDWIG, familiarly known as HETE, a disreputable woman of about thirty with curly hair. Round her head is wrapped a thick cloth. She carries a bundle under her arm. Her dress is light and shabby.)

HETE. (Blowing on her fingers.) Mercy on us, nice weather we're havin'. (Drops her bundle on the table and goes on blowing her fingers, standing alternately on each of her feet, which are shod in worn-out old boots.) We ain't had such weather for an age.

TULPE. What have yer got in there?

HETE. (Grinning and whining with pain, sits on the bench by the stove and tries to take off her boots.) Oh, Lord! My blessed toes are just burnin'!

TULPE. (Unties HETE'S bundle, in which are seen a loaf, a packet of chicory, a bag of coffee, a few pairs of stockings, etc.) Ain't there nothin' for me in your bundle?

HETE. (At first too busy with her boots to mind TULPE. Suddenly snatches at the bundle and collects its contents.) Tulpe! (One of HETE'S feet is bare. She piles her belongings together and carries them off to the pallet.) Now you'd best leave my things alone — D'you think I've been trampin' about and freezin' all the bones in my body for you, eh?

TULPE. Ah, yer needn't make such a fuss about it, you fool! (Rises, closes her hymn book, and wipes it carefully with her skirt.) I don't want none of the rubbish you've been beggin' for.

HETE. (Hiding her property under the mattress.) Beggin'? I'd like to know who's done most beggin' — you or me! You've done nothin' else all your life. And you're no chicken, neither.

TULPE. Don't you fly out about it. We know the sort er life you've led. Pastor told you what he thought of you, he did. I didn't tramp about the streets when I was a girl. I was respect'ble.

HETE. I s'pose that's why you were sent to jail!

TULPE. You'll get there fast enough, don't you fear, my beauty. Just you let me get a sight of a gendarme, that's all. I could tell him a thing or two about you, 's sure's yer live!

HETE. Oh, shut up! I don't care for your gendarmes. Let 'em come and see if I don't tell 'em somethin' as'll make you feel uncomf'ble.

TULPE. Yer can't say nothin' against me!

HETE. Oh, I can't, can't I? Who stole the overcoat from the innkeeper's little boy, eh? (TULPE makes as though to spit at HETE.) That's what you call manners, I s'pose? Yer shan't have nothin' now, just to spite yer.

TULPE. Ah, go on! I wouldn't take anythin' from the likes er you, anyhow.

HETE. No, and you won't get nothin'.

(PLESCHKE and HANKE appear outside the open door, against which they have been literally blown by the howling wind. PLESCHKE, a scrofulous, childish old man, in rags, bursts out laughing. HANKE, a good-for-nothing blackguard, blasphemes. They are seen to shake the snow off their hats and cloaks. Each carries a bundle.)

PLESCHKE. Lord, how it do blow! One er these 'ere nights, you see if the old shanty ain't smashed to bits!

(At sight of the newcomers, HETE hurriedly drags her bundle from beneath the mattress, picks it up and runs past the men into the courtyard and up a flight of stairs.)

PLESCHKE. (Calling after HETE.) Hey! Hulloo! Yer in a hurry! Wot are yer 10 runnin' away fur? We won't hurt yer, will we, Hanke?

TULPE. (Busy at the stove with a sauce-pan.) Oh, she ain't right in her head. She thinks you'll steal her bundle.

PLESCHKE. (Enters.) Lord save us! That's rough on us, that is! Evenin'! G'd evenin'! Good Lord, what weather! Hang me if I wasn't a'most blown off my feet!

(Limps to the table, lays his bundle down, and wags his white-haired, feeble head at TULPE. Pants from fatigue, coughs and tries to warm himself. Meanwhile, HANKE enters, lays his beggar's bag against the door 25 and shivers with cold as he puts fuel into the stove.)

TULPE. Where er you been?

PLESCHKE. (Stuttering.) Where — where have I been? Quite a way, quite a 30 way. Up in the hills.

TULPE. Brought anythin' back?

PLESCHKE. Lots — lots of things. Th' priest giv' me this 'ere five-pfenniger, and down at th' inn they give me — er — give 35 me — er — a bowl er soup —

TULPE. Hand it over, and I'll warm it up.

(Takes a pot out of the bundle, sets it on the table and stirs the contents of the sauce- 40 pan.)

PLESCHKE. I — I've got somethin' else in here — sausage. The butcher give it to me. Ay, the butcher.

TULPE. Where's the money?

PLESCHKE. Oh, the money's all right. Here's the money.

TULPE. Give it t' me. I'll take care of it for yer.

HETE. (Re-enters.) Yer blamed old 50 fool, why d' yer let her have it?

(She goes to the stove.)

TULPE. You mind yer own business.

HANKE. Don't worry. He's her sweet-heart.

HETE. Saints alive!

HANKE. It's only right he should bring 5 her home a trifle now and then, ain't it?

PLESCHKE. (Stammering.) You — you ought — oughter know — better, you ought. Can't yer leave a poor old man alone an' — n — not make game of him?

HETE. (Mimicking PLESCHKE.) W — why d — don't yer l — let the poor old man alone? Pleschke, yer gettin' shaky. You won't last much longer.

PLESCHKE. (Threatening her with a 15 stick.) Y — you'd best c — clear outer this!

HETE. I'd like to see you make me clear out.

PLESCHKE. Clear out! D'ye hear?

20 TULPE. Catch her one on the head. It'll do her good.

PLESCHKE. Clear out!

HANKE. Oh, drop it! Leave her alone.

(HETE, taking advantage of HANKE'S having turned his back to defend her from PLESCHKE, makes a grab at his bag and tries to steal something from it. TULPE 25 sees her and shakes with laughter.)

HANKE. I don't see much to laugh 30 about.

TULPE. (Still laughing.) He don't see nothin' to laugh at!

PLESCHKE. Oh, Lord, just look at her!

TULPE. Yer'd best look arter yer bag, or maybe you'll miss somethin'.

HANKE. (Turns and sees that he has been tricked.) You would, would you, you devil! (Rushes after HETE.) Just you let me get at you!

(Tramping of feet, as HANKE runs up the staircase after HETE. Smothered cries.)

PLESCHKE. Well, well, well! She's a smart 'un.

(He laughs.)

45 (TULPE joins in his laughter, which is interrupted by the sound of the sudden opening and shutting of a door.)

W — what was that?

(Howling wind heard outside. Snow dashes against the window-panes. Then all is quiet for a moment. The schoolmaster, GOTTWALD, a man of two-and-thirty, with a dark beard, enters, carrying HANNELE MATTERN, a girl of about fourteen. The child whimpers. Her long red hair streams over the schoolmaster's shoulders, her face is pressed against his throat, her arms hang straight and limp. The rags in which she is clothed barely cover her. GOTTWALD takes no notice of PLESCHKE and TULPE, carries the child in tenderly, and lays her on the bed, which stands on the right near the wall. He is followed by SEIDEL, a woodcutter, who carries a lantern in one hand. He also carries a saw, an axe, and a bundle of rags. On his grey head he wears a shabby old hat.)

PLESCHKE. (Staring stupidly at the newcomers.) Hulloo, hulloo, hulloo! W— what's the matter?

GOTTWALD. (Laying his overcoat and some blankets over HANNELE.) Hot bricks, Seidel! Quick.

SEIDEL. (To TULPE.) Don't stand there doin' nothin'. Heat some bricks. Look sharp!

TULPE. What's the matter with the girl?

SEIDEL. I've no time for talkin'.

(Exit with TULPE.)

GOTTWALD. (Trying to soothe HANNELE.) There, there, don't you fear. We'll soon put you right.

HANNELE. (Her teeth chattering.) I'm afraid! I'm afraid!

GOTTWALD. Fear nothing. We won't let any harm come to you.

HANNELE. It's father! It's father!

GOTTWALD. Why, he's not here, my dear.

HANNELE. I'm afraid of father. Oh, if he should come!

GOTTWALD. Ssh! Ssh! He won't come.

(Hurried steps are heard on the staircase.)

HETE bustles in, with an iron grater in her hand.)

HETE. (Holding up the grater.) Just look what Hanke's got!

(HANKE rushes in after HETE and tries to take the grater from her. She flings it into the middle of the room.)

HANNELE. (Screams with terror.) He's coming! He's coming!

(She half rises, leans forward, with anguish on her pale, sick, pinched little face, and stares at the place from which the noise comes. HETE dodges away from HANKE and runs into the back room. HANKE goes to pick up the grater.)

HANKE. (Astonished.) I'll give you a taste of it presently, you slut, you!

GOTTWALD. (To HANNELE.) It's all right, my child. (To HANKE.) What are you doing here?

HANKE. What am I doin' here?

HETE. (Putting her head in at the back door.) 'Tain't his! He stole it!

HANKE. (Threatening.) You wait a bit! I'll get even with you.

GOTTWALD. I beg you to be quiet. The child's ill.

HANKE. (Picks up the grater and draws back abashed.) Why, what's the matter?

SEIDEL. (Enters with two bricks.) These ought to do.

GOTTWALD. (Examining the bricks.) Are they warm enough?

SEIDEL. Oh, they'll warm her.

(He puts one of the bricks under HANNELE'S feet.)

GOTTWALD. Put the other one there. (Points to another place.)

SEIDEL. She don't seem much warmer yet.

GOTTWALD. The child's shivering with cold.

(TULPE has entered, following SEIDEL. Behind her enter HETE and PLESCHKE and several other paupers, who stand in the doorway whispering and fussing about inquisitively. TULPE moves to the bedside and stands there with her arms akimbo.)

TULPE. Brandy and hot water 'ud do her good.

SEIDEL. (Pulls out a flask. So do PLESCHKE and HANKE.) There's just a drop left.

TULPE. (At the stove.) Bring it here.

SEIDEL. Is the water hot?

TULPE. Scaldin'!

GOTTWALD. You'd better put in a lump of sugar.

HETE. Where d'yer s'pose we'd get sugar from?

TULPE. Ah, shut up! Yer know yer've got some stowed away.

HETE. Yer lie. I ain't got no sugar.

(Laughs nervously.)

TULPE. It's you that's lyin'. I saw yer bring it in.

SEIDEL. (To HETE.) Run and get it, can't you?

HANKE. (To HETE.) What are yer waitin' for?

HETE. (Doggedly.) Fetch it yerself.

PLESCHKE. Get the sugar!

HETE. Yer can get all yer want at the grocer's. (Exit.)

SEIDEL. And if you don't get some at the grocer's, double quick time — Well, you'll see! That's all I've got to say. You won't want more nor I'll give you, my lass.

PLESCHKE. (Who has been out, returns.) Ah, she's a bad lot, she is.

SEIDEL. I'd like to have the handlin' of her. I'd take her down a bit, I would, if I was the Burgomaster. She's got no business to be in an almshouse — a great, big, healthy slut like her. Why don't she work?

PLESCHKE. H — here's a — b — b — bit of sugar.

HANKE. (Sniffing the aroma of the grog.) I'd like to be ill myself, I would!

(SCHMIDT enters with a lantern. His manner is important and impressive.)

SCHMIDT. Now then, make room there. The judge'll be here in a moment.

(BERGER, the magistrate, enters. His manner stamps him as a retired officer. He wears a short beard. Although his hair is grizzled, he seems still youthful and good-looking. He wears a well-cut, long overcoat. His cocked hat is set jauntily on his head. One of his characteristics is a boyish swag.)

THE PAUPERS. Evenin', Judge. Evenin', Captain!

BERGER. Evenin'. (Takes off his hat and cloak and puts them down with his stick. With a commanding gesture.) Out with you, the whole lot of you!

(SCHMIDT hustles THE PAUPERS into the back room.)

BERGER. Evenin', Schoolmaster. How are you getting on?

GOTTWALD. We've just pulled the child out of the water!

SEIDEL. (Stepping forward.) Excuse me, Judge. (Makes a military salute.) I was working later than usual down at t' smithy. You see, I was puttin' a new clamp round my axe — and just as I was comin' out er — t' smithy — down yonder by the pond, Judge — you know the big pond — it's pretty nigh as big as a lake — 5 (BERGER makes an impatient gesture.) Yes, Judge. Well, there's a corner in that pond as never freezes over — I can call to mind when I was a boy —

BERGER. Never mind that. Go on with your story.

SEIDEL. (Saluting again.) Yes, Cap'n. Well — as I was sayin', I'd just come out o' t' smithy and was standin' in th' moonlight, when I heard someone cryin'. At first I thought it was only someone makin' believe, as you might say. But happenin' to look toward the pond, I saw somethin' in the water! Yes, Judge. Where it never freezes over. I called out to say I was a-comin', but she'd fainted! Well, I just ran back and fetched a plank from t' smithy and laid it over the hole — and in a moment I had brought her safe to land again.

BERGER. Bravo, Seidel. We don't hear that sort of tale every day. We hear more about quarrelling and fighting, and head-breaking, down in the village. . . . And then, I suppose, you brought her straight up here?

SEIDEL. Excuse me, Judge. It was the teacher —

GOTTWALD. I happened to be passing by on my way home from a lecture. So I took her to my house first and got my wife to find some warm clothes for her.

BERGER. What do you make of the affair?

SEIDEL. (Hesitating.) Well, you see — h'm. She's Mattern's stepdaughter.

BERGER. (Seems shocked.) That ragged little thing Mattern's stepdaughter?

SEIDEL. Ay. Her mother died six weeks ago. . . . There ain't much more to tell. She kicked and scratched because she thought I was her stepfather.

BERGER. (Thinking of MATTERN, mutters.) The scoundrel!

SEIDEL. He's bin sittin' at the inn, drinkin' hard, ever since yesterday. It takes a cask to fill him up, it does.

BERGER. He'll have a score to settle with me, for this job. (Bends over HAN- NELE.) Now, my child. Listen. You needn't cry about it. What's the girl looking at me like that for? . . . I won't hurt you. What's your name? . . . A little louder, please. I can't hear you — (He rises.) The child seems very stubborn.

GOTTWALD. She's only frightened . . . Hannele!

HANNELE. (Gasping.) Yes, sir!

GOTTWALD. Do as the Judge bids you, 10 child.

HANNELE. (Shivering.) Dear Lord, I'm freezing!

SEIDEL. (Bringing in the grog.) There. Take a drop o' this, my lass.

HANNELE. (As before.) Dear Lord, I'm hungry!

GOTTWALD. (To the Magistrate.) It's no use. We can't make her drink.

HANNELE. It hurts!

GOTTWALD. Where does it hurt you, little one?

HANNELE. Oh, I'm afraid! I'm afraid!

BERGER. Who's frightening you, my dear? Come, come, now. Tell us all about 25 it. Don't be afraid. What was that? — I can't understand a word you're saying. Try and remember how it happened. Did your stepfather ill-treat you? — Did he beat you or lock you up or — turn you out 30 into the street? — It's hard to get anything out of her —

SEIDEL. Ay! She ain't fond er chat-terin'! Choppin' trees is easier nur makin' her talk. She's as still as a mouse, she is. 35

BERGER. If we only had facts to go on — we might have the fellow locked up.

GOTTWALD. She's terribly afraid of him.

SEIDEL. 'Tain't the first time, neither, 40 as he's been caught at this sort of game. Jest you ask the folks about him. They'll tell you what sort of man he is. It's a wonder she wasn't killed years ago. '

BERGER. What has he done to her? 45

SEIDEL. Done? — Druv her out o' doors o' nights. That's what he's done to her. Sent her out a-beggin' in the snow. That's what he's done. And if she didn't bring him back enough to get him roarin' 50 drunk, out she'd have to go agen. That's what he's done. Many's the night she's froze and cried her eyes out, she has.

GOTTWALD. It wasn't quite so bad while her mother lived.

BERGER. Well, anyhow, we'll have the man arrested. He's a notorious drunkard. 5 Now, my little maid, just look me straight in the face.

HANNELE. (Imploringly.) Oh, please, please, please!

SEIDEL. 'Tain't no use your askin' questions. You won't get nothin' out o' her.

GOTTWALD. (Gently.) Hannele!

HANNELE. Yes, sir.

GOTTWALD. Do you know me?

15 HANNELE. Yes, sir.

GOTTWALD. Who am I?

HANNELE. Teacher, sir — Teacher Gottwald.

GOTTWALD. That's right. We're get-ting along famously. Now, my dear child, tell us all about it. Don't be afraid. How is it you did not stay at home instead of going down to the pond by the black-smith's? Eh?

HANNELE. I'm afraid! I'm afraid!

BERGER. We'll go away, and you can say all you have to say to the school-master.

HANNELE. (Shyly and mysteriously.) He called me!

GOTTWALD. Who called you, my dear?

HANNELE. The Lord Jesus.

GOTTWALD. Where did the Lord Jesus call you?

35 HANNELE. From the water.

GOTTWALD. Where?

HANNELE. Why, from the bottom of the water.

BERGER. (Changing his mind and putting on his overcoat.) We'd better have the doctor fetched. I daresay he's not left the inn yet.

GOTTWALD. I have sent for one of the Sisters. The child needs very careful nursing.

BERGER. I'll go for the doctor at once. (To SCHMIDT.) Bring the policeman to me at the inn, Schmidt. We'll have the fellow locked up. Good-night, Schoolmaster.

(BERGER and SCHMIDT exeunt. HANNELE falls asleep.)

SEIDEL. (After a pause.) He won't lock him up. Not much.

GOTTWALD. Why not?

SEIDEL. He knows why, he does. Who's the girl's father, eh?

GOTTWALD. Stuff, Seidel. That's all gossip.

SEIDEL. All right. I knows what I knows.

GOTTWALD. You mustn't mind what people say. Half are lies. — I only wish the doctor would make haste.

SEIDEL. (Softly.) She won't get over it. You'll see.

(Enter DR. WACHLER, a grave-looking man of four-and-thirty.)

DR. WACHLER. Good evening!

GOTTWALD. Good evening, Doctor.

SEIDEL. (Helping the DOCTOR to take off his fur overcoat.) Good evening, Doctor.

DR. WACHLER. (Warming his hands at the stove.) I should like another candle. (The sound of a barrel-organ comes from the adjoining room.) They must have lost their wits!

SEIDEL. (At the half-closed door of the back room.) Can't you keep quiet in there?

(Noise ceases. SEIDEL goes into the back room.)

DR. WACHLER. Mr. Gottwald, I believe?

GOTTWALD. That is my name.

DR. WACHLER. I hear she tried to drown herself?

GOTTWALD. She saw no other way out of her troubles, poor child.

(Short pause.)

DR. WACHLER. (Watching HANNELE

beside her bed.) Has she been talking in her

sleep?

HANNELE. Millions and millions of stars! (DR. WACHLER and GOTTWALD watch the child. Through the window the moonlight streams on the group.) Why are you pulling at my bones? Don't! Don't!

It hurts, oh, it does hurt so!

DR. WACHLER. (Carefully loosening the collar of HANNELE's chemise.) Her body is a mass of bruises!

SEIDEL. Ah, and that's how her mother looked when she was put in her coffin!

DR. WACHLER. Shocking! Shocking!

HANNELE. (In a changed, peevish voice.)

I won't go home. I won't! I want to go to Dame Holle. — Let me go to the pond.

— Let me go! — Oh, that dreadful, dreadful smell! — Father, you've been drinking

5 brandy again! — Hark! how the wind blows in the wood! — There was a storm

in the hills this morning. — Oh, I do hope there won't be a fire. — Do you hear? Oh, what a storm! — It'll blow the tailor away,

10 if he hasn't put his goose in his pocket!

(Enter SISTER MARTHA.)

GOTTWALD. Good evening, Sister.

(SISTER MARTHA bends her head in re- sponse. GOTTWALD joins her at the back

15 of the stage, where she is getting everything ready for nursing.)

HANNELE. Where's mother? In heaven?

How far away it is! (She opens her eyes, stares about her in a dazed way, rubs her eyes slowly and says in an almost in-audible voice:) Where am I?

DR. WACHLER. (Bending over her.)

You're with friends, Hannele.

HANNELE. I'm thirsty.

DR. WACHLER. Water!

(SEIDEL, who has brought in another can- dle, goes out to get some water.)

DR. WACHLER. Does it pain you anywhere? (HANNELE shakes her head.) No.

That's first-rate. We'll soon put you right.

HANNELE. Please, sir, are you the doctor?

DR. WACHLER. Yes, my dear.

HANNELE. Am I very, very ill?

DR. WACHLER. No, no! Not very ill.

HANNELE. Are you going to make me well again?

DR. WACHLER. (Examining her quickly.) Does that hurt? No! Does

40 that? Ah, this is the place! — Don't be frightened! I won't hurt you. Is this where the pain is?

GOTTWALD. (Returning to the bedside.)

Answer the doctor, Hannele.

HANNELE. (Earnestly, imploringly, tear- fully.) Oh, dear Teacher Gottwald!

GOTTWALD. Come, come! Attend to what the doctor says and answer his questions. (HANNELE shakes her head.)

No? Why not?

HANNELE. Oh, do, do let me go to mother!

GOTTWALD. (Deeply moved — strokes her hair gently.) Don't, don't say that, my child.

(Short pause.)

(The DOCTOR lifts his head, draws a long breath and reflects for a moment. SISTER MARTHA has brought the lighted candle from the table and stands near by, holding it.)

DR. WACHLER. (Beckons to SISTER MARTHA.) One moment, Sister.

(The DOCTOR and SISTER MARTHA retire to the table. The DOCTOR gives the SISTER some instructions in an undertone. GOTTWALD glances at HANNELE, the SISTER, and the DOCTOR alternately. He stands waiting, hat in hand. DR. WACHLER ends his quiet talk with SISTER MARTHA.)

DR. WACHLER. I'll look in again later on. I'll have the medicine sent round. (To GOTTWALD.) It seems they have arrested the man at the inn.

SISTER MARTHA. Yes. So they say.

DR. WACHLER. (Putting on his overcoat. To SEIDEL.) You'd better come to the apothecary's with me.

(The DOCTOR, GOTTWALD and SEIDEL take leave of SISTER MARTHA quietly as they move toward the door.)

GOTTWALD. (In a casual way.) What do you think of the case, Doctor?

(DOCTOR, GOTTWALD and SEIDEL exeunt.)

(SISTER MARTHA, who is now alone with HANNELE, pours some milk into a bowl. Meanwhile, HANNELE opens her eyes and watches her.)

HANNELE. Have you come from Jesus?

SISTER MARTHA. What did you say, dear?

HANNELE. Have you come from the Lord Jesus?

SISTER MARTHA. Why, Hannele, have you forgotten me? I'm Sister Martha. Don't you remember coming to see us one day and praying and singing those beautiful hymns?

HANNELE. (Nodding joyfully.) Oh, yes, yes. Such beautiful, beautiful hymns!

SISTER MARTHA. I've come to nurse you, in God's name, till you get well.

HANNELE. I don't want to get well.

SISTER MARTHA. (Bringing her the milk.) The doctor says you must take a little of this milk, to make you strong again.

HANNELE. (Turns away.) I don't want to get well.

SISTER MARTHA. Don't want to get well? That's not sensible, my dear. There, let me tie your hair up.

(She ties her hair.)

HANNELE. (Crying quietly.) I don't want to get well.

SISTER MARTHA. Well, I declare! Why not?

HANNELE. Oh, how I long to go to heaven, Sister.

SISTER MARTHA. We all long for that, darling. But we must be patient and wait until God calls us, and then, if we repent of our sins —

HANNELE. (Eagerly.) I do repent, Sister! Indeed, indeed I do!

SISTER MARTHA. — and if we believe in the Lord Jesus —

HANNELE. I do believe in Him!

SISTER MARTHA. Then you may wait in peace, my child. — Let me smooth your pillow for you. — There. Now go to sleep.

HANNELE. I can't sleep.

SISTER MARTHA. Oh, yes, you can, if you try.

HANNELE. Sister Martha!

SISTER MARTHA. Well, dear?

HANNELE. Sister! Are there any — any unpardonable sins?

SISTER MARTHA. We won't talk about that now. You must not excite yourself.

HANNELE. Please, please, please! Won't you tell me?

SISTER MARTHA. Yes, yes. There are sins that God won't pardon — sins against the Holy Ghost!

HANNELE. Oh, do you think I've committed one?

SISTER MARTHA. Nonsense. Why, only very, very wicked people, like Judas, who betrayed our Lord, could commit those sins.

HANNELE. You don't know — you don't know.

SISTER MARTHA. Hush. You must go to sleep.

HANNELE. I'm so afraid.

SISTER MARTHA. You need not be.

HANNELE. But if I have committed one?

SISTER MARTHA. Oh, but you haven't.

HANNELE. (Clings to the SISTER and stares into the darkness.) Sister! Sister!

SISTER MARTHA. Hush, dear, hush!

HANNELE. Sister!

SISTER MARTHA. What is it?

HANNELE. He's coming. Can't you hear him?¹

SISTER MARTHA. I hear nothing.

HANNELE. That's his voice — outside! 10
Hark!

SISTER MARTHA. Whose voice?

HANNELE. Father's! Father's! There he is!

SISTER MARTHA. Where? I don't see 15
him.

HANNELE. Look!

SISTER MARTHA. Where?

HANNELE. At the foot of the bed!

SISTER MARTHA. It's only this coat and 20 hat, darling. We'll take the nasty things away and give them to Daddy Pleschke. And then I'll bring some water and we'll make a compress for you. You won't be afraid if I leave you alone for a few mo- 25 ments, will you? Lie quite still till I come back.

HANNELE. Was it really only the coat and hat, Sister? How silly of me.

SISTER MARTHA. Keep quite still. I'll 30 be back directly. (She goes out, but returns, as the courtyard is pitch dark.) I'll put the candle outside in the courtyard for a minute. (Shaking her finger tenderly at HANNELE.) Now mind! Keep still!

(She goes out.)

(*It is almost dark in the room. As soon as the SISTER has gone, the figure of MAT-TERN, the mason, appears at the foot of the bed. He has a drunken and un- 40 kempt look, tangled red hair, and a shabby old soldier's cap. In his left hand he holds his tools. Round his right wrist is a cord. He stares threateningly at HANNELE as if about to strike. A pale light envelopes the apparition and streams on to the bed. 45
HANNELE covers her face with her hands in terror. She writhes and moans piteously.*)

THE APPARITION. (In a hoarse and exasperated voice.) Where are you? Loafin' 50
agen, as usual, eh? I'll teach yer to skulk, you little devil, you. So you've been tellin' tales, have you? Tellin' the folks I ill-uses you, eh? I beats you, eh? Aren't you ashamed to tell such lies? You ain't no child of mine. Get up, you lazy baggage. I don't want to have nothin' 5 more to do with you. I've half a mind to turn you out into the gutter. Get up and light the fire. D' ye hear? If I keeps you it's out o' charity. Now then, up with you! You won't, won't you? Well then, look out — (HANNELE, with an effort, rises. Her eyes remain closed. She drags herself to the stove, opens the stove door, and falls senseless as SISTER MARTHA returns with a lighted 10 candle and a jug of water. The apparition vanishes. SISTER MARTHA staggers, stares at HANNELE as she lies among the ashes, and exclaims.)

SISTER MARTHA. Saints alive! (She 15 puls down the candle and the jug, hastens to HANNELE, and lifts her from the floor. Hearing her cry, the inmates of the alms-house rush in.) I just left her for a moment to fetch some water and she got out 20 of bed. Here, Hedwig, give me a hand!

HANKE. You'd best be careful, or you'll hurt her.

PLESCHKE. It d — don't seem nat'ral to me, Sister. Someone must a bewitched 25 the girl.

TULPE. That's what's wrong wi' her.

HANKE. (Loudly.) She won't last long, she won't.

SISTER MARTHA. (*When with HED- 35
WIG'S assistance she has put HANNELE to bed again.*) That may be all very true, my good man, but you really must not excite the child.

HANKE. You're makin' quite a fuss 40 about her, ain't you?

PLESCHKE. (To HANKE.) You're a bad lot you are — a reg'lar out an' out bad lot. Ain't you got sense enough to know — as — as — sick folk mustn't be ex- 45 cited?

HETE. (Mimicking him.) S — sick folk mustn't be excited —

SISTER MARTHA. I really must request you —

TULPE. Quite right, Sister. — You get out o' here!

HANKE. When we wants to go, we'll go, and not before.

HETE. The stable's good enough for the likes of us.

PLESCHKE. Don't you make no fuss — you'll find a place to sleep in, you will.

(The inmates of the almshouse go out.)

HANNELE. (Opens her eyes. She seems terrified.) Has he gone?

SISTER MARTHA. They've all gone, Hannele. Did they frighten you?

HANNELE. (Still terrified.) Has father gone?

SISTER MARTHA. He hasn't been here.

HANNELE. Oh yes, he has, Sister!

SISTER MARTHA. You dreamed it, my dear.

HANNELE. (Sighing deeply.) Oh, dear Lord Jesus! Dear, dear Lord Jesus! Won't you please, please, take me away from here!

(Her tone changes.)

"Oh, would He but come
And guide my way home!
I'm worn and I'm weary,
No more can I roam!"

Yes, yes. I'm sure He will, Sister.

SISTER MARTHA. What, dear?

HANNELE. He's promised to take me to Him, Sister.

SISTER MARTHA. H'm. (Coughs.)

HANNELE. He's promised.

SISTER MARTHA. Who has promised?

HANNELE. (Whispering mysteriously into the SISTER'S ear.) The dear Lord — Gottwald!

SISTER MARTHA. Get off to sleep again, Hannele, that's a good girl.

HANNELE. Isn't he handsome, Sister? Don't you think teacher's handsome? His name is Heinrich! — Did you know that? What a beautiful name! (Fervently.) Dear, good, kind Heinrich! Sister, when I grow up, we're going to be married!

"And when the priest had made them one,

Away they went together.

They rested on a snow-white bed
Within a darkened chamber."

He has such a lovely beard. (Entranced.)

And, oh, his head's covered with such sweet white clover! — Hark! He's calling me! Don't you hear?

SISTER MARTHA. Do go to sleep, my pet. No one is calling.

HANNELE. It was the voice of — Jesus. Hark! He's calling me again. Oh, I hear Him quite plainly. "Hannele!" "Hannele!" — Let us go to Him!

SISTER MARTHA. When God calls He will find me ready!

HANNELE. (Her head is now bathed in moonlight. She makes a gesture as though she were inhaling some sweet perfume.) Don't you smell them, Sister?

SISTER MARTHA. No, Hannele.

HANNELE. Lilacs! (Her ecstasy increases.) Listen! Listen! (A sweet voice is faintly heard in the far distance.) Is that the angels singing? Don't you hear?

SISTER MARTHA. Yes, dear, I hear. But now you must turn round and have a good long sleep.

HANNELE. Can you sing that, too?

SISTER MARTHA. Sing what, my child? Hannele. "Sleep, darling, sleep!"

SISTER MARTHA. Would you like me to?

HANNELE. (Lies back and strokes the SISTER'S hand.) Mother, mother! Sing to me!

SISTER MARTHA. (Extinguishes the light, bends over the bed, and softly intones the following verses to the accompaniment of distant music:)

"Sleep, darling, sleep!

In the garden goes a sheep.

(She sings the rest in darkness.)

A little lamb with thee shall play,
From dawn to sunset, all the day.
Sleep, darling, sleep!"

(Twilight fills the room. SISTER MARTHA has gone. The pale and ghostly form of a woman appears and seats itself on the side of the bed. She is slightly bent and seems to rest on her thin bare arms. Her feet are bare. Her long white locks stream over her shoulders and upon the bed. Her face seems worn and wasted. Her sunken eyes, though closed, seem fixed on HANNELE. Her voice sounds as the voice of one speaking in her sleep. Before she speaks, her lips are seen to move, as though it cost her a great effort to get the words out. She is prematurely aged. Her cheeks are hollow, and she is clad in miserable clothes.)

THE FEMALE APPARITION. Hannele!

HANNELE. (Her eyes, also, are closed.) Mother, dearest mother! Is it you?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. It is I. — I have washed the feet of my Saviour with my tears, and I have dried them with my hair.

HANNELE. Do you bring me good tidings?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. Yes!

HANNELE. Have you come far?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. Hundreds of thousands of miles, through the night!

HANNELE. How strange you look, mother!

THE FEMALE APPARITION. As the children of earth look, so I look!

HANNELE. There are buttercups and daisies on your lips. Your voice rings out like music.

THE FEMALE APPARITION. It is no true ring, my child.

HANNELE. Mother, dear mother, your beauty dazzles me!

THE FEMALE APPARITION. The angels in heaven are a thousandfold more radiant!

HANNELE. Why are you not like them?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. I suffered for your sake.

HANNELE. Mother mine, won't you stay with me?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. (Rising.) I cannot stay!

HANNELE. Is it beautiful where you have come from?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. There the wide meadows are sheltered from the wind and storm and hail. God shields them.

HANNELE. Can you rest there when you are tired?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. Yes!

HANNELE. Can you get food to eat there, when you are hungry?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. There is meat and fruit for all who hunger, and golden wine for those who thirst.

(She shrinks away.)

HANNELE. Are you going, mother?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. God calls me!

HANNELE. Does He call loudly?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. He calls me loudly!

HANNELE. My heart is parched within me, mother!

THE FEMALE APPARITION. God will cool it with roses and with lilies.

HANNELE. Mother, will God redeem me?

THE FEMALE APPARITION. Do you know this flower I hold here in my hand?

HANNELE. It's golden sesame! The key of heaven!

THE FEMALE APPARITION. (Puts it into HANNELE's hand.) Take it and keep it as God's pledge. Farewell!

HANNELE. Mother! Mother, don't leave me!

THE FEMALE APPARITION. (Shrinks away.) A little while and ye shall not see me, and again a little while and ye shall see me.

HANNELE. I'm afraid!

THE FEMALE APPARITION. (Shrinking still farther away.) Even as the snowdrifts on the hills are swept away by the winds, so shall thy troubles be lifted from thee.

HANNELE. Don't go!

THE FEMALE APPARITION. The Children of Heaven are as lightnings in the Night. Sleep!

(The room gradually grows dark. Pretty voices of young children are heard singing the second verse of "Sleep, darling, sleep.")

"Sleep, darling, sleep!

Bright guests their vigils keep —

(A gold-green light suddenly floods the room. Three radiant ANGELS, crowned with roses, and having the forms of beautiful winged youths, appear and take up the song. In their hands they hold music. THE FEMALE APPARITION has vanished.)

The guests who guard thee thro' the night

Are angels from the realms of Light.
Sleep, darling, sleep!"

HANNELE. (Opens her eyes and gazes rapturously at the ANGELS.) Angels! (Her joy and her amazement grow, but she seems still in doubt.) Angels!! (Triumphantly.) Angels!!!

(Short pause. Then the ANGELS sing the following strophes from the music in their hands.)

FIRST ANGEL

The sunlight that gleamed on the mountains

Gave nothing to thee of its gold.
The wavering green of the valleys
For thee ne'er its wealth would unfold.

SECOND ANGEL

The life-giving grain as it ripened
Thy craving for bread did not heed.
The kine as they grazed in the meadows
Denied thee their milk in thy need.

THIRD ANGEL

The buds and the blossoms around thee,
Whose sweetness delighted the day,
Their glory of azure and purple
Ne'er shed on the shards of thy way.

(Brief pause.)

FIRST ANGEL

A heavenly greeting we bring thee
From out of the darkness of space,
And the tips of our radiant pinions
Are touched with God's grace.

SECOND ANGEL

In the hem of our raiment we bear thee
The fragrance and joy of the Spring.
The rose of the morn, newly born,
On our lips we bring.

THIRD ANGEL

The mystic, green glow of our Home-land
Illumines our feet in the skies.
The spires of The City Eternal
Shine deep in our eyes.

ACT II

The scene is as it was before the appearance of the ANGELS.

5 THE DEACONESS (SISTER MARTHA) sits beside HANNELE'S bed. She lights the candle again and HANNELE awakes. Her inward rapture is still shown in the expression of her face. As soon as she recognises 10 SISTER MARTHA she breaks into joyous talk.

HANNELE. Sister! Sister Martha! Do you know who has been here? Angels! Angels, Sister!

15 SISTER MARTHA. Aha! You're wide awake again.

HANNELE. Yes, yes. Only think of it. (Impulsively.) Angels! Angels! Real angels, from heaven, Sister Martha, with 20 great, big wings!

SISTER MARTHA. What sweet dreams you must have had, dear.

HANNELE. Why do you speak of dreams? Look, look! See what I have in 25 my hand!

(She holds out an imaginary flower to her.)

SISTER MARTHA. What is it, dearest?

HANNELE. Can't you see?

SISTER MARTHA. H'm.

30 HANNELE. Look at it, Sister. Only look!

SISTER MARTHA. I see, dear.

HANNELE. Smell how sweet it is!

SISTER MARTHA. (Pretending to smell.)
35 Beautiful!

HANNELE. Take care, take care. You'll crush it.

SISTER MARTHA. Oh, no, I mustn't do that, my dear. What do you call this 40 wonderful flower?

HANNELE. Why, golden sesame, of course!

SISTER MARTHA. Oh!

HANNELE. Of course it is. Can't you
45 see? Bring the light here. Quick! Quick!

SISTER MARTHA. Ah! Now I see.

HANNELE. Isn't it beautiful?

SISTER MARTHA. Yes, yes. But you musn't talk so much, my child. You must 50 keep quite, quite still, or else the doctor will be angry. Now you must take the medicine he sent for you.

HANNELE. Oh, Sister, why will you worry so much about me? You don't know what has happened — do you, now? Who do you think it was gave me this lovely golden sesame? Guess, guess. — What's sesame for? Don't you know, 5 Sister?

SISTER MARTHA. Ssh! You can tell me all about it in the morning, when you are strong, and bright, and well again.

HANNELE. I am well.

(She tries to rise and puts her feet out of bed.)

SISTER MARTHA. You mustn't do that, Hannele dear.

HANNELE. (Waving her away, gets out 15 of bed and walks a few steps.) Please — please do leave me alone. I must go — away. (She starts and stares fixedly at something.) Oh, dear Lord Jesus!

(The figure of an ANGEL, clad in black and 20 with black wings, appears. The ANGEL is tall, majestic and beautiful. In his hands he holds a long, wavy sword, the hilt of which is wrapped in crape. The ANGEL is seated near the stove. He is silent and serious. He gazes steadily and calmly at HANNELE. A supernatural white light fills the room.)

Who are you?

(Pause.)

Are you an angel? (No answer.) Is it 30 me you want? (No answer.) I am Hannele Mattern. Have you come for me? (Again no answer.)

(During this incident, SISTER MARTHA has stood looking on, perplexed and thoughtful, with folded hands. She slowly passes 35 out of the room.)

Has God made you dumb? Are you an angel? (No answer.) Are you one of God's good angels? (No answer.) Will 40 you be kind to me? (No answer.) Are you an enemy? (No answer.) Why have you hidden that sword in the folds of your dress? (Silence.) I'm so cold, so cold. Your look chills me. You're icy cold. 45 (Still silence.) Who are you?

(No answer. Terror suddenly overmasters her. She screams and turns as if appealing for help to someone behind her.) Mother! Mother!

(A figure, dressed like the DEACONESS, but younger and more beautiful, and with great white wings, enters the room. HAN- NELE hurries toward the figure, and clutches at her hand.)

Mother, mother! There's someone in the room!

DEACONESS. Where?

HANNELE. There — there!

DEACONESS. Why do you tremble so?

HANNELE. I'm afraid.

DEACONESS. Fear nothing. I am with 10 you.

HANNELE. My teeth are chattering. I can't help it, mother! He terrifies me!

DEACONESS. Fear not, my child. He is your friend.

HANNELE. Who is it, mother?

DEACONESS. Do you not know him?

HANNELE. Who is he?

DEACONESS. He is Death!

HANNELE. Death! (She stares fixedly 20 and fearfully at the ANGEL for a moment.) Must it — must it be?

DEACONESS. Death is the gate, Hannele!

HANNELE. Is there no other, mother 25 dear?

DEACONESS. There is no other.

HANNELE. Will you be cruel to me, Death? — He won't answer! Why won't he answer any of my questions, mother?

DEACONESS. The voice of God has answered you already.

HANNELE. Oh, dear Lord God, I have so often longed for this. But now — now I am afraid!

DEACONESS. Get ready, Hannele.

HANNELE. For death, mother?

DEACONESS. For death.

HANNELE. (Timidly, after a pause.) Shall I have to wear these ragged clothes, 40 when they put me into the coffin?

DEACONESS. God will clothe you.

(She produces a small silver bell and rings it. In response there enters — silently, like all the following apparitions — a little humpbacked VILLAGE TAILOR, carrying on his arm a bridal dress, a veil and a wreath. In one hand he has a pair of crystal slippers. He has a comical, seesaw gait, bows silently to the ANGEL and the 50 DEACONESS, and lastly, and obsequiously, to HANNELE.)

THE VILLAGE TAILOR. (Bobbing and bowing.) Johanna Katherina Mattern, your most obedient. (Clears his throat.) Your father, his Excellency the Count, has done me the honour of ordering this bridal robe for you.

DEACONESS. (Takes the dress from the TAILOR, and attires HANNELE.) I will help you to put it on, Hannele.

HANNELE. (Joyfully.) Oh, how it rustles.

DEACONESS. It's white silk, Hannele.

HANNELE. Won't the people be astonished to see me so beautifully dressed in my coffin!

THE VILLAGE TAILOR. Johanna Katharina Mattern — (He clears his throat.) The village is full of it. (He clears his throat.) It's full of the good luck your death is bringing you. (Clears his throat.) Your father, his Excellency the Count — (coughs) has just been talking to the Burgo-

DEACONESS. (Puts wreath on HANNELE'S head.) Lift up your head, you heavenly bride!

HANNELE. (Trembling with childish pleasure.) Oh, Sister Martha, I'm so glad I am to die. (Breaking off suddenly and doubtfully.) You are Sister Martha, are you not?

DEACONESS. Yes, my child.

HANNELE. No, no. You're not Sister Martha. You are my mother!

DEACONESS. Yes.

HANNELE. Are you both of them?

DEACONESS. The children of heaven are all one in God.

THE VILLAGE TAILOR. If I may say so, Princess Hannele — (he kneels to put on the slippers) these slippers are the smallest in the land. Hedwig, and Agnes, and Liese, and Martha, and Minna, and Anna, and Käthe, and Gretchen, and the rest of them all have such very large feet. (He puts on the slippers.) But they fit you — they fit you! We've found the bride! Princess Hannele's feet are the smallest! — Is there anything else I can do for you? (Bows and scrapes.) Your servant, Princess. Your servant. (He goes.)

HANNELE. Who would have dreamed it, mother?

DEACONESS. Now you need not take any more of that nasty physic.

HANNELE. No.

DEACONESS. Soon you will be as bright and blithe as a lark, now, darling.

HANNELE. Oh, yes!

DEACONESS. Come dear, and lie down on your death-bed.

(She takes HANNELE by the hand, leads her gently to the bed and waits while HANNELE lies down.)

HANNELE. Now I'll soon know what death is, won't I?

DEACONESS. You will, Hannele.

HANNELE. (Lying on her back and playing with an imaginary flower.) I have a pledge here!

DEACONESS. Press it closely to your breast.

HANNELE. (Growing frightened again and glancing at the ANGEL.) Must it — must it be?

DEACONESS. It must.

(Sounds of a funeral march heard in the remote distance.)

HANNELE. (Listening.) That's Master Seyfried and the musicians announcing the funeral.

(The ANGEL rises.)

Oh, he's getting up!

(The storm outside gains strength. The

30 ANGEL draws nearer to HANNELE.)

Sister! Mother! He's coming to me! Where are you? I can't see you! (Appealing to the ANGEL.) Make haste, thou dark and silent spirit! (Speaking as though a heavy weight oppressed her.) He's pressing me down! (The ANGEL solemnly lifts up his sword.) He'll crush me to pieces! (With anguish.) Help, Sister, help!

(The DEACONESS steps majestically between the ANGEL and HANNELE, and lays her hands protectingly on the child's heart. She speaks loftily, impressively and with authority.)

DEACONESS. He dare not. I lay my consecrated hands upon thy heart.

(The dark ANGEL vanishes. Silence.)

(The DEACONESS lapses into meditation and her lips move as if in prayer. The sound of the funeral march has continued through this scene. A noise as of many tramping feet is heard. The form of the schoolmaster, GOTTWALD, appears in the central doorway. The funeral march ceases.)

GOTTWALD is dressed in mourning and bears a bunch of lovely bluebells in his hand. He takes off his hat reverently, and on entering makes a gesture as though he would have silence. Behind him are ranged his pupils — boys and girls, in Sunday clothes. At the gesture of the SCHOOLMASTER, they stop chattering, and seem afraid to cross the threshold. GOTTWALD approaches the DEACONESS with a radiant look upon his face.)

GOTTWALD. Good day, Sister Martha.

DEACONESS. Good day, Teacher Gottwald.

GOTTWALD. (Shakes his head sadly as he looks at HANNELE.) Poor little maid.

DEACONESS. Why are you so sad, Teacher Gottwald?

GOTTWALD. Is she not dead?

DEACONESS. Is that a thing to grieve over? She has found peace at last. I 20 envy her.

GOTTWALD. (Sighing.) Ay, she is free from care and sorrow now. It is all for the best.

DEACONESS. (Looking steadfastly at 25 HANNELE.) How fair she seems.

GOTTWALD. Yes, very fair. Death seems to have clothed her with beauty.

DEACONESS. God has made her beautiful, because she loved Him.

GOTTWALD. Yes, she was always good and pious.

(Sighs heavily, opens his hymn book, and peers into it sadly.)

DEACONESS. (Peering into the same 35 hymn book.) We should not repine. We must be patient.

GOTTWALD. And yet my heart is heavy.

DEACONESS. You do not mourn to 40 know that she is saved?

GOTTWALD. I mourn to think that two fair flowers have withered.

DEACONESS. I do not understand you.

GOTTWALD. I have two faded violets in 45 this book. How like they are to the dead eyes of my poor little Hannele.

DEACONESS. They will grow bright and blue again in Heaven.

GOTTWALD. Oh, Lord, how long must 50 we still wander in this vale of tears! (His tone changes abruptly. He becomes bustling and business-like. Produces a hymn book.)

I thought it would be a good idea to sing the first hymn here — in the house — "Jesus, my Guide —"

DEACONESS. It is a beautiful hymn and 5 Hannele Mattern was a pious child.

GOTTWALD. And then, you know, when we get to the churchyard, we can sing, "Now lettest Thou thy servant." (He turns to the school children and addresses 10 them.) Hymn No. 62! (Intones hymn, slowly beating time.) "Now let-test-Thou-thy-servant, De-pa-ar-art-in-peace —" (The children chime in.) Children, have you all warm clothes on? It will be cold 15 out yonder in the churchyard. Come in and take one last look at our poor Hannele.

(The children enter and range themselves about the bed.)

See how beautiful death has made the child. Once she was clad in rags. Now she wears silken raiment. She went barefooted once. Now she has crystal slippers on her feet. Ere very long she will be taken to a 25 house all built of gold, where she will never more know thirst or hunger.

Do you remember how you used to mock at her and call her Princess Rag-Tag? — Now she is going away from us to be a real 30 princess in Heaven. If any of you have offended her, now is the time to beg for her forgiveness. If you do not, she will tell her Heavenly Father how unkind you were to her, and it will go hard with you.

A CHILD. (Stepping forward.) Dear 35 Princess Hannele, please, please forgive me and don't tell God that I used to call you Princess Rag-Tag.

ALL THE CHILDREN. (Together.) We 40 are all very, very sorry.

GOTTWALD. That's right, children. Hannele will forgive you. Now, boys and girls, go inside and wait till I join you.

DEACONESS. Come into the back room with me and I will tell you what you must 45 all do if you want to join the bright angels some day, like Hannele.

(She goes out. THE CHILDREN follow. The door closes.)

GOTTWALD. (Alone with HANNELE. 50 He lays his flowers at her feet.) My dear, dear Hannele, here are the violets I have brought you. (Kneels by the bedside. His voice trembles.) Do not forget me in your new felicity. (He sobs and lays his head against the folds of her dress.) My heart is breaking at the thought of parting from you.

(Voices are heard without. GOTTWALD rises and lays a covering over HANNELE. Two aging women, dressed as if for a funeral, and with handkerchiefs and yellow-edged hymn books in their hands, push their way into the room.)

FIRST WOMAN. (Glancing round.) We're ahead of them all.

SECOND WOMAN. No, we ain't. There's the Teacher. Good day, Teacher.

GOTTWALD. Good day.

FIRST WOMAN. You're takin' it to heart, Teacher. Well, well, I allow she was a sweet child. My, what a busy little thing she was, to be sure.

SECOND WOMAN. Say, Teacher, we've heard as how she killed herself. It ain't true, is it?

THIRD WOMAN. (Appears.) 'T'ud be a mortal sin!

SECOND WOMAN. Ay, that it would.

THIRD WOMAN. The minister, he says, there ain't no pardon for it.

GOTTWALD. The Saviour said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not."

FOURTH WOMAN. (Enters.) Dear, dear, what weather we're havin'. We'll all be froze, I guess, before we've done. I hope the parson won't keep us long in the churchyard. The snow's a foot deep in the churchyard.

FIFTH WOMAN. (Enters.) Th' parson won't have no prayers read over her. He says as how consecrated ground ain't no place for the likes er her.

PLESCHKE. (Enters.) Ha' yer heard the news? A grand stranger's bin to see the parson. He says that Mattern's Hannele's a saint.

HANKE. (Hurrying in.) They're bringin' her a crystal coffin.

SEVERAL VOICES. (Together.) A crystal coffin!

HANKE. Reckon it'll cost a pretty sum.

SEVERAL VOICES. (Together.) A crystal coffin!

SEIDEL. (Enters.) There's strange

goin's on down in the village. An angel's bin there — an angel as big's a poplar, they do say. An' there's more of 'em down at th' blacksmith's — little uns, they be, no bigger nor babies. (Looking at HANNELE.) She don't look like a beggar, she don't.

SEVERAL VOICES. (Scattered.) No, she don't like a beggar —

A crystal coffin! — Did you ever hear the like! — And angels in the village!

(FOUR YOUTHS clad in white enter, bearing a crystal coffin, which they put down close to HANNELE'S bed. They whisper to each other excitedly and curiously.)

GOTTWALD. (Slightly raising the cloth.) Would you like to have a look at the dead child?

FIRST WOMAN. (Peeping at HANNELE.) Just look at her hair. Why, if it ain't shinin' just like gold.

GOTTWALD. (Drawing the cloth completely from the body which is flooded with a pale light.) Have you seen her silk dress and crystal slippers?

(All utter exclamations of surprise, and draw back.)

SEVERAL VOICES. (Confusedly.) Lord, how beautiful! — Why, that ain't our Hannele! — That can't be Mattern's Hannele! — Well, if it ain't wonderful!

PLESCHKE. She's a saint, sure enough. (The FOUR YOUTHS lay HANNELE reverently in the crystal coffin.)

HANKE. I told you there wouldn't be no buryin' for her.

FIRST WOMAN. I reckon they'll put her into the church.

SECOND WOMAN. I don't believe the girl's dead at all. She looks too lifelike for that.

PLESCHKE. G — gi' me — gi' me — a feather. — We'll soon see if she's dead. — Just gi' me a feather — (They give him a feather. He holds it before her lips.) It don't stir! The girl's dead, sure enough, she is. There ain't no life left in her.

THIRD WOMAN. I'd kinder like to give her this bit o' rosemary.

(She puts a sprig into the coffin.)

FOURTH WOMAN. She can have my lavender, too.

FIFTH WOMAN. Why, where's Mattern?

FIRST WOMAN. Ay, where's Mattern?

SECOND WOMAN. Where he allus is, drinkin' down at th' inn.

FIRST WOMAN. May be he don't know what's happened?

SECOND WOMAN. He don't know nothin' when he's full o' drink.

PLESCHKE. Wot? Ain't no one told him there's a dead body in the house?

THIRD WOMAN. He might er found that 10 out for hisself.

FOURTH WOMAN. I'm not accusin' anyone, I ain't. But it do seem odd the man who killed the child, as you might say, shouldn't know nothin' about it. 15

SEIDEL. That's what I say, and everyone in th' village 'ud say the same. Why, she's got a bruise on her as big as my fist.

FIFTH WOMAN. He's the devil's own 20 child, is Mattern.

SEIDEL. I saw that there bruise when I was helpin' to put her to bed. I tell yer, it was as big as my fist. That's what settled her business.

FIRST WOMAN. He's the man as done it.

ALL. (Whispering angrily to one another.) That's what he is.

SECOND WOMAN. I call him a murderer. 30

ALL. He's a murderer, a murderer!

(The drunken voice of MATTERN, the mason, is heard without.)

MATTERN. (Without.) Lemme in, d'ye hear? Lemme in! I ain't done no harm 35 to nobody. (He appears in the doorway and bawls:) Where are you hidin', you good-for-nothin' hussy? (He staggers.) I'll give you till I count five. Then look out. Now then. One — two — three — 40 and one makes — Come out, damn you, you hussy. What d' ye mean by makin' me lose my temper? Lemme get a sight of you, that's all, and I'll break every bone in your body. (He stumbles, recovers and 45 stares stupidly at the silent bystanders.) What are you starin' at me for? (No answer.) What d' ye want? Devil take you all. I ain't done nothin' to the girl. Come out, d' ye hear? And mighty quick 50 about it, too. (He chuckles to himself.) I know what I'm about, if I have had a drop too much. What, you ain't gone yet —

(Savagely.) Don't stand there glarin' at me or I'll —

(A man wearing a long, shabby, brown robe enters. He is about thirty years old. 5 His hair is long and dark. His face is the face of the schoolmaster, GOTTWALD. In his left hand he holds a soft hat. He has sandals on his feet. He seems weary and travel-stained. He interrupts the mason by laying his hand gently on his arm. MAT- TERN turns round roughly. The stranger looks him steadily and calmly in the face.)

THE STRANGER. (Gently.) Mattern, the mason, God's peace be with thee.

MATTERN. Where do you come from? What do you want?

THE STRANGER. (Appealing.) My feet are weary and blood-stained. Give me water wherewith to wash them. The burning sun has parched my tongue. Give me wine, wherewith to cool it. No food has passed my lips since early morn. Give me bread wherewith to still my hunger.

MATTERN. It's none of my business. 25 If you'd been working, like an honest man, instead o' trampin' up and down the country roads, you'd be all right. I have to work for my livin'.

THE STRANGER. I am a workman.

MATTERN. You're a vagabond, you are. Honest workmen don't starve.

THE STRANGER. For my work no man pays me.

MATTERN. You're a yagabond.

THE STRANGER. (Faintly, submissively, but pressingly.) I am a physician. Hast thou not need of me?

MATTERN. Not I. I'm not sick. No doctors for me.

THE STRANGER. (His voice trembling with emotion.) Mattern, the mason, bethink thee! Though thou hast denied me water, I will heal thee. Though thou hast refused me bread, yet I can make thee well. God is my witness.

MATTERN. Be off with you, d' ye hear? Be off. My bones are sound. I don't want nothin' to do with doctors. Will you clear out?

THE STRANGER. Mattern, the mason, bethink thee well. I will wash thy feet. I will give thee wine. Thou shalt have sweet, white bread to eat. Set thy foot upon my head, and I will still heal thee, as God liveth.

MATTERN. You won't go, won't you, eh? I'll have to throw you out?

THE STRANGER. (Impressively.) Mattern, the mason, dost thou not know what lies within this house?

MATTERN. There ain't nothin' lyin' here but what belongs to the place, 'ceptin' you. Off you go, damn you!

THE STRANGER. (Simply.) Thy daughter lies here, sick.

MATTERN. She don't want no doctors to cure her complaint. She's lazy. That's wot's the matter with her. I'll cure her, and mighty quick, too, if she don't stop skulkin'.

THE STRANGER (Loftily.) Mattern, the mason, I come to thee as a messenger.

MATTERN. A messenger? Who sent you, eh?

THE STRANGER. I come from the Father, and I go unto the Father. What hast thou done with His child?

MATTERN. P'raps you know where she's hidin' herself better than I do. What are His children to me? He don't seem to trouble Himself much about them.

THE STRANGER. (Directly.) There is one dead within these walls.

MATTERN. (Sees HANNELE, approaches the coffin silently, and looks in, muttering.) Where the devil did she get all them fine clothes and that ere crystal coffin? (The coffin-bearers whisper together angrily, "Murderer!" "Murderer!") MATTERN, surly and stammering:) I — n-never did ye n-no harm. I was kind to you, I was. I didn't deny you nothin' — (Brutally, to the STRANGER.) Wot d' yer want? Come, speak out and ha' done with it? 'Tain't no business of mine.

THE STRANGER. Mattern, the mason, hast thou nothing to say to me? (The coffin-bearers grow more and more excited, and frequent exclamations of "Murderer!" "Murderer!" are heard.) Hast thou not sinned? Hast thou never dragged her from her sleep at night and beaten her till she grew faint with pain and anguish?

MATTERN. (Frenzied with excitement.) May Heaven strike me dead if I have! (Faint blue lightning and distant thunder.)

ALL. (Scattered voices.) It's thundering! — Thunder in mid-winter! — He's perjured himself! — The murderer's perjured himself!

THE STRANGER. (Gently and persuasively.) Hast thou still nothing to confess, Mattern?

MATTERN. (Panic-struck.) Those whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth. That's what I did to the girl. I treated her as though she was my own child, I did.

THE WOMEN. (Rushing at him.) Murderer! Murderer!

MATTERN. She lied to me and cheated me.

THE STRANGER. Is this the truth?

MATTERN. So help me God!

(The golden sesame appears in HANNELE'S clasped hands. A mystic greenish-yellow light streams from it. The sight dismays MATTERN, who recoils in terror.)

THE STRANGER. Mattern, the mason, thou hast lied to me.

ALL. (Scattered voices.) A miracle! A miracle!

PLESCHKE. The girl's a saint, sure. He's perjured hisself, he has.

MATTERN. (Shouting.) I'll go hang myself!

(He presses his hands to his temples and goes.)

THE STRANGER. (Advances to the coffin and turns to the bystanders, who draw back in awe of his now noble and imposing form.) Be not afraid! (He stops and presses HANNELE'S hand. Then in a gentle tone.) The maiden is not dead. She sleepeth. (Earnestly.) Johanna Mattern!

(A golden-green light steals into the room. HANNELE opens her eyes and, with the help of THE STRANGER'S hand, rises, not yet daring to fix her eyes on him. She leaves the coffin and sinks upon her knees before THE STRANGER. The bystanders flee in consternation. THE STRANGER and HANNELE remain alone. THE STRANGER'S shabby gown falls from his shoulders. Beneath it is a robe of white and gold.)

THE STRANGER. (Tenderly.) Hannele!

HANNELE. (With rapture, bending her head low.) 'Tis he!

THE STRANGER. Dost thou know me?

HANNELE. I have waited for thee.

THE STRANGER. Canst thou name my name?

HANNELE. (Trembling with awe.) Holy! Holy! Holy!

THE STRANGER. I know thy sorrow and thy pain.

HANNELE. I have longed for thy coming.

THE STRANGER. Arise!

HANNELE. Thy dress is spotless. I am ashamed.

THE STRANGER. (Laying his right hand on HANNELE'S head.) Thy shame I take from thee. (He lifts her face gently and touches her eyelids.) I fill thine eyes with everlasting light. Thy soul shall be all sunshine. Eternal brightness shall be thine, from dawn till eve and then till dawn again. Receive all radiant things, and feast thine eyes on all the glories of the deep blue sea and azure sky and fair green trees, forever and forever. (He touches her ears.) Let thine ears be opened to the music of the millions upon millions of God's angels. (He touches her lips.) Thus do I loose thy stammering tongue and quicken it with the life of thine own soul and my soul, and the soul of God Almighty.

(HANNELE, trembling convulsively with rapture, tries to rise, but cannot. She sobs and buries her head in THE STRANGER'S robe.)

With these thy tears I cleanse thee from the dust and stain of earth. I will raise thee high above the stars of God.

(THE STRANGER lays his hand on the child's head and speaks the lines following to the accompanying strains of soft music. As he speaks, the forms of many angels appear, crowding through the doorway. Some are tall, some short. Some are radiant winged boys and girls. They swing incense-censers and strew flowers, and spread rich stuffs on the floor.)

THE STRANGER. The Realm of Righteousness is filled with light and joy. God's everlasting peace reigns there without alloy.

(Harpers are heard, at first played softly, then gradually swelling louder and louder.)

Its mansions are marble, its roofs are of gold,

Through its rivulets ripple wines ruddy and old.

5 In its silver-white streets blow the lily and rose,

In its steeples the chiming of joy-bells grows.

The beautiful butterflies frolic and play
10 In its ramparts, rich-robed in the mosses of May.

Swans, twelve, soft as snow, ring them round in the sky,

And their wings thrill the air with sweet sounds as they fly.

And louder and louder the symphonies swell

Till their resonance reaches from heav'n to hell.

20 Forever and ever, through æons unending, With music majestic their progress attending,

They soar above Zion and meadow and sea, And their path is made lambent with mystery.

The blessed below, in the regions of Light, Wander on, hand in hand, and rejoice in their flight.

In the depths of the radiant, the ruby-red waves,

Swan dives down after swan, as its plumage it laves.

So they wash themselves clean in the clear, deep red

35 Of the blood that the Lord, their dear Saviour, had shed,

And they pass from the glory of flood and of foam,

To the rest and the bliss of their heavenly home.

(THE STRANGER turns to the ANGELS, who have ended their work. With timid joy they draw near and form a semi-circle round HANNELE and THE STRANGER.)

45 Bring hither finest linen, children mine — My fair, my pretty turtle-doves, come hither.

Surround her weak and wasted little frame With comfort and with warmth, to keep her free

From frost and fever, pain and weary woe. Be tender with her. Shield her from rude touch,

And bear her swiftly up, on pinions light. Beneath her feet spread velvets, richly Above the waving grasses of the lea, wrought, Beyond the shimmering wastes of moonlit And strew her path with daffodils and space, tulips.
 Beyond the meads and groves of Para- 5 To fan her cheek let palms in cadence
 dise, sway
 Into the cool and shade of boundless peace. And make her life unceasing holiday.
 Then, while she rests upon her silken bed, Where the red poppies rear their beauteous
 Prepare for her, in alabaster bath, heads
 Water from mountain brook, and purple 10 And happy children dance to meet the day.
 wine, and milk of antelope, Bid her repose, free now from tear and
 To wash away the stain of earthly ill! sigh,
 From off the bushes break the budding And witch her soul with gentle harmony.
 sprays,

Lilac and jessamine, with dew bent low, 15
 And let their moisture from the petals flow
 Softly upon her, as the showers in May.
 Take linen rare and fine, to dry her limbs
 With loving hands, as ye would lily-leaves.
 From jewell'd chalices pour the reviving 20
 wine,
 Pressed from the patient heart of fragrant fruit.

Delight her lips with sweets, her heart 25
 delight
 With all the dazzling splendours of the morn.
 Enchant her eyes with stately palaces.
 Let humming-birds, in iris hues arrayed, 30
 From walls of malachite flash gold and green.

THE ANGELS

(Sing in chorus.)

We bear thee away to the Heavenly Rest,
 Lullaby, into the Land of the Blest,
 Lullaby, into the Land of the Blest!

(The stage grows gradually dark, as the ANGELS sing. Out of the darkness the sound of their song is heard more and more faintly. Then the stage grows light.
 The interior of the almshouse is seen, exactly as before the first apparition. HANNELE, a poor, sick child, once more lies on the bed.
 DOCTOR WACHLER bends over her, with a stethoscope. The DEACONESS (SISTER MARTHA) stands by, watching anxiously, and holding a candle in her hand. The ANGELS' song ceases.)

D'ANNUNZIO

(1863-)

The Italian writer and soldier Gabriele d'Annunzio, prince of Monte Nevoso, was born in Pescara (Abruzzi). As a boy he published (1879) a volume of verse, Primo Vere. Later he went to Rome, where he joined a group of well-known literary men. He published Canto Nuovo (1882), Terra Vergine (1882), L'Intermezzo di Rime (1883), Il Libro delli Vergini (1884), and most of the stories later collected under the title San Pantaleone (1886). As a member of the staff of the Tribuna he did some of his most brilliant work. It was during this period that he wrote what many consider his best poem, Il Libro d'Isotta (1886). His first novel Il Piacere (translated as Child of Pleasure) was written in 1889. Then came L'Innocente (translated as The Intruder) in 1891. These two with Giovanni Episcopo (1891) caused a great sensation in Italian literary circles. Among the poetic works of this period should be noticed Il Trionfo della Morte (1894), Le Vergini delle Rocce (1896), and Il Fuoco (1900) — a glorification of Venice. D'Annunzio began writing for the stage in 1897. In 1898 he composed La Città Morta for Sarah Bernhardt, and in the same year the famous La Gioconda for Eleonora Duse. In 1899 came La Glorie, a contemporary political tragedy, and then in 1901 Francesca da Rimini, a magnificent reconstruction of mediæval atmosphere and emotion. The play is unusually preoccupied with color, sound, and movement. From 1908 to 1921 D'Annunzio as writer and as soldier led an extravagantly romantic career. Books and battles followed each other in fantastic profusion. In the disputes of the boundary settlements after the World War he defied his own government and half of Europe besides; and finally, wounded and weary, he was forced to seek retirement at Gardone on the Lake of Garda. For a time the psychological inspiration of his earlier writing, borrowed almost entirely from contemporary foreign writers, seemed to denote a lack of originality. His creations were narrow, personal, often monotonous. It is in his later work, which drew on the traditions of Italy's glorious past, and represented their beauties with all the brilliance and perfection of truly inspired art, that his real genius is to be found.

The following translation is that of Arthur Symons, New York, Frederick A. Stokes Co., 1902.

(OSTASIO, in order to gain the military support of the powerful GIOVANNI MALATESTA, decides to give him in marriage his sister FRANCESCA. GIOVANNI sends his younger brother PAOLO to fetch her. FRANCESCA and PAOLO fall in love with each other but they go on to Rimini and the marriage of FRANCESCA and GIOVANNI takes place as planned. Almost immediately PAOLO is called away to Florence. Later he returns, and the two lovers are suddenly swept together as they read the romance of Lancelot of the Lake. As Act IV opens MALATESTINO, the other brother of GIOVANNI, is making love to FRANCESCA.)

ACT IV

An octagonal hall, of grey stone, with five of its sides in perspective. High up, on the bare stone, is a frieze of unicorns on a gold background. On the wall at the back is a large window with glass panes, looking out on the mountain, furnished with benches in the recess. On the wall at right angles to it, on the right, is a grated door leading to the subterranean prison. Against the opposite wall, to the left, is a long wooden seat with a high back, in front of which is a long narrow table laid with fruit and wine. In each of the other two sides facing, is a door; the left, 15 near the table, leads to the room of FRANCESCA, the right to the corridor and stairs. All round are placed torchbearers of iron; on brackets are hung shoulder-belts, waist-belts, quivers, and different portions of armour; pikes, lances, halberds, spears, axes, balistas lean against them.

(FRANCESCA is seated at the window, and MALATESTINO stands at her feet.)

FRANCESCA. You would be justicer, Malatestino!

Your cradle, of a surety, was hewn out
From some old tree-trunk by a savage axe
That had cut many heads off before then.
MALATESTINO. (Laughs convulsively.)

Kinswoman, do I fright you?
And should I please you better
If I had had my cradle in the rose
Of a calm lute?

FRANCESCA. You are a cruel boy to take revenge

Upon a falcon!

Why did you kill him, if you held him dear?

MALATESTINO. Merely for justice's sake.

See, I had let him loose upon a crane,
The crane went up, the falcon followed him
And went up far above him, and under
him

Saw a young eagle flying, and he took him
And struck him to the ground, and held him so

Till he had killed him.

I ran to take him, thinking him the crane,
But found it was an eagle.

Then I was angry, and struck off the head
Of the fair falcon who had killed his lord.

FRANCESCA. It was a foolish deed.

MALATESTINO. But he had killed
His lord. I did but justice.

FRANCESCA. It was a wicked folly,
Malatestino.

MALATESTINO. The fool shall pass, and with the fool his folly,

And the time passes, but not every time.

FRANCESCA. Why do you speak so strangely?

You are athirst for blood

Always, always at watch,

The enemy of all things. In all your words

There is a secret menace;

Like a wild beast you bite

And tear and claw whatever comes your way.

Where were you born? Your mother gave you milk

As to another? And you are so young!
The down is scarcely shadowed on your cheek.

MALATESTINO. (With sudden violence.)
You are a goad to me,
The thought of you is like a goad to me,
Always. You are my wrath.

(FRANCESCA rises and moves away from the window, as if to escape from a snare.
She stands near the wall against which arms are heaped up.)

FRANCESCA. Malatestino, enough!

Have you no shame?

Your brother will be here.

MALATESTINO. (Following her.) You strain me like a bow,

That vibrates in an hour

A thousand times, and pierces at a venture.

Your hand is terrible,

That holds my force in it,

And casts it out to wound where it has flown.

I fly you, and you follow.

You are with me suddenly,

Like a sharp storm of rain,

In the fields and on the ways,

When I go out

Against the enemy.

I breathe you when I breathe the dust of battles.

The cloud that rises from the trampled
earth

Takes on your very form,

And you live and breathe and you dissolve
again

Under the pawing of the panting horses

In the tracks that redden and fill up with blood.

I will clasp you, I will clasp you now at
last!

(FRANCESCA retreats along the wall until she comes to the grated door.)

FRANCESCA. You do not touch me, madman, or I call

Your brother! Get you gone. I pity you.

You are a boy. If you would not be whipped,

Get you gone. You are a boy,

A wicked boy.

MALATESTINO. Whom would you call?

FRANCESCA. Your brother.

MALATESTINO. Which?

(FRANCESCA starts, hearing a cry rise up from below, through the door against which she is standing.)

FRANCESCA. Who cried there? Did you not hear it?

MALATESTINO. One

Who has to die.

FRANCESCA. Montagna
Dei Parcitadi?

(Another cry comes from the prison.)

MALATESTINO. I too will say: Enough!
Enough, Francesca, to-day you seal your fate.

FRANCESCA. Ah, now I cannot hear him; but at night
He howls, howls like a wolf;
His crying rises to me in my room.
What have you done to him?
Have you put him to the torture?

MALATESTINO. Listen to me. Giovanni
Sets out at Vespers for the Podesteria
Of Pesaro. You have prepared for him 10
Food for the journey.

(He points to the table.)

Listen. I can give him
Food for another journey.

FRANCESCA. What do you mean? 15

MALATESTINO. Look well at me. I can still see with one.

FRANCESCA. What do you mean? You threaten me? You net
Some treachery against your brother.

MALATESTINO. Treachery?
I would have thought, kinswoman, that such a word

Had burnt your tongue; I see
Your lips are scathless, though
A little paler. I but spoke at random.
My judgment was at fault. Only I say
This one time more . . .

(The crying of the PRISONER is again heard.)

FRANCESCA. (Trembling with horror.)

How he cries! How he cries!

Who tortures him, or what new agony
Have you found out for him?
Have you walled him up alive? Will he 35 cry so

All his life long? Go, put an end to it,
And take him from his torture.

I will not hear his crying any more.

MALATESTINO. Well, I will go. I will 40 see that you shall have

A quiet night and an untroubled sleep,
Because to-morrow you must sleep alone,
While my good brother rides to Pesaro.

(He goes up to the wall and chooses an axe 45 from among the weapons piled up against it.)

FRANCESCA. What are you doing?

MALATESTINO. I?

I would be justicer,
And by your wish and will, *
Kinswoman.

(He examines the blade of the weapon;

then unbolts the barred door, which opens upon black darkness.)

FRANCESCA. You are going to kill him?

Ah,

5 Wild beast, but you have lived too long, I think,

Since I bound up your wound for you, and
you

Raved at your father. Still I hear you.

Then

You bit the hand that gave you medicine,
Cared for you in your sickness, soothed your pain.

Accursed be the hour in which I bent
Over your pillow to give ease to you!

MALATESTINO. Francesca, listen, Francesca: even so sure

As death is in the point of this good weapon
I hold here in my hand, so sure is life

20 In that one word

You still may say to me,

Full-blooded life, do you not understand?
And full of winds, and full of conquering days.

25 (FRANCESCA replies slowly, in an equable voice, as in a momentary respite from horror and anxiety.)

FRANCESCA. What is the word? Who is there that could say it?

30 You live in a loud noise,

But where I live is silence. The prisoner

Is not so far and lonely

As you are far and lonely, O poor blind Slaughterman, drunk with shoutings, and with blows!

But fate is very silent.

MALATESTINO. Ah, if you could but see the countenance

Of the overhanging fate!

There is a wretched knot within my head,
A knot of thoughts like pent-up lightnings:
soon

They will break out. But listen,

Listen! If your hand will but touch my hand,

If your hair will lean over me again,
Over my fever, and . . .

(A more prolonged cry is heard from below.)

50 FRANCESCA. O horror! horror!

(She moves back to the embrasure of the window, sits down, and puts her elbows on her knees, and her head between her hands.)

MALATESTINO. (Looking aside at her.)
This shall be from you.

(He takes down a torch, puts the axe on the ground, takes the steel, strikes it, and lights the torch, while he speaks.)

I go. You will not hear him any more.

I will see that you shall have

A quiet night and an untroubled sleep,

And I will give my father quiet too;

He fears his flight. And I would have 10

Giovanni,

In passing by Gradara, give him this

Most certain token.

O kinswoman, good vespers!

(FRANCESCA remains motionless as if 15 hearing nothing.)

He picks up the weapon and goes into the darkness with his silent cat-like step, holding the lighted torch in his left hand. The little door remains open. FRANCESCA rises 20 and watches the light fade away in the opening; suddenly she runs to the door, and stops, shuddering. The barred door grates in the silence. She turns, and moves away with slow steps, her head bent, as if under a heavy 25 weight.)

FRANCESCA. (In a low voice, to herself.)
And an untroubled sleep!

(Through the great door on the right is heard the harsh voice of GIANCIOTTO. 30 FRANCESCA stops suddenly.)

GIOVANNI. Look you for Messer Paolo
my brother,

And tell him I set out for Pesaro

In an hour's time from now,

And that I wait him.

(He enters fully armed. Seeing his wife, he goes up to her.)

Ah my dear lady, you are waiting me!

Why do you tremble, why are you so pale? 40

(He takes her hands.)

And you are cold too, cold as if with fear.

But why?

FRANCESCA. Malatestino
Had scarcely entered when I heard again
The crying of the prisoner,
Who cries these many days so horribly
Out of the earth; and, seeing me
distraught,

Flamed into anger and went suddenly
Down to the prison by the door there,
armed

With a great axe, saying that he would kill
him,

Against the express commandments of his father

5 That fretted him too much.

Cruel he is, your brother, my good lord,

And does not love me.

GIANCIOTTO. Do not tremble, lady.
Where has your valiance gone? But now you were

Fearless among the fighters,

And saw men fall with arrows in their throats,

And flung about the Greek fire in your hands.

Why does the life then of an enemy

So greatly trouble you? and a cry affright
you,

Or an axe brandished?

FRANCESCA. To fight in battle is a lovely thing,

But secret slaying in the dark I hate.

GIANCIOTTO. Malatestino tired of keeping watch

So long, and so long waiting for the ransom

That the old Parcitade would not pay,

The old foul miser that in taking flight

Took with him certain rights and privileges

Of the Commune at Rimino. . . . But why

Do you say he does not love you?

FRANCESCA. I do not know. It seems
so. 35

GIANCIOTTO. Is he unkind with you?

FRANCESCA. He is a boy, and like

Young mastiffs, he must bite. But come,
my lord,

Take food and drink

Before you go your journey.

GIANCIOTTO. But perhaps
Malatestino . . .

FRANCESCA. Come, why do you think 45 Of what I said but lightly? "Heart of metal,

Tough liver": I remember your own word,
And when you said it. He will love his horse

50 Until the horse falls sick;

His armour, till the steel begins to wear.

I have no mind to trouble you with him,

My lord. 'Tis almost vespers.

Come, here is food and drink. Do you mean to go

The way of the seashore?

(GIANCIOTTO is moody, while he follows FRANCESCA towards the spread table. He takes off his basnet, unclasps his gorget,¹ and gives them to his wife, who sets them down on a seat, with sudden graceful movements, talking rapidly.)

You will have all the freshness of the night.

It is September, and the nights are soft; Just before midnight the moon rises.

When

Do you reach Pesaro,
Messere il Podestà?

GIANCIOTTO. To-morrow at the third hour,

For I must stay a little with my father
In passing through Gradara.

(He unbuckles his sword-belt and gives it to his wife.)

FRANCESCA. Is it for long that you must stay at Pesaro,

Before you come again?

(The terrible cry of MONTAGNA is heard from below. FRANCESCA shudders, and lets fall the sword, which slips from its scabbard.)

GIANCIOTTO.

It is done now.

Do not be frightened, lady. There will be Nothing but silence now. May God so take

The heads of all our enemies! From this forth

There shall no wind root into Rimino
This evil seed between the stones of it.
And may God scatter it out of all Romagna
In this most bloody year, if it so be
He wills to have his holy Easter held
By the Guelfs of Calboli with the Ghibelline blood

Of Aldobrandin degli Argogliosi!

(He stoops and picks up the bare blade.)

Pope

Martino is dead and good King Carlo went
Before him into paradise. That's ill!
As for this Pietro di Stefano that Onorio
Sends us for governor,
I doubt him, he's no friend,
He's not a Polentani, not your father's,

Francesca. We shall still have need to keep

Our swords unsheathed, and eyes in all our swords.

(He puts himself on guard, then looks along the blade from the hill.)

This is inflexible!

(He puts it back in its scabbard.)

FRANCESCA. Give it to me, my lord,

I will not let it fall

Twice over. And sit down, take food and drink.

(He gives her the sword and sits down on the bench before the table.)

15 GIANCIOTTO. Good so, my own dear lady.

I talk of war to you, and now I think

That I have never given you a flower.

Ah, we are hard. I give you arms in heaps

20 To hold in those white hands,

Malatestino gave to you at least

A falcon. Paolo gives you

Flowers perhaps. The Captain of the People

25 Learnt all the courteous virtues in his Florence,

But left his force upon the banks of Arno

And now is more in love with idleness

Than any labour. He is always with 30 His music-makers.

(He breaks the bread and pours out the wine, while FRANCESCA sits beside him, at the table, with her hands on the hill of the sword.)

35

But you,

Francesca, love your chamber-music too.
Are not your women ever tired of singing?

Their voices must have covered

40 The cries of Parcitade,

Surely? You turn the tower

Of the Malatesti

Into a singing wood of nightingales.

(He eats and drinks.)

45

FRANCESCA. I and Samaritana,

My sister, at Ravenna, in our home,

Lived always, always in the midst of singing.

Our mother had indeed a throat of gold.

50 From our first infancy

Music flowed over us and bent our souls

¹ A basnet is a simple helmet sometimes worn beneath a battle helmet. A gorget is a piece of armor designed to protect the throat.

As the water bends the grass upon the bank.

And our mother said to me:

Sweet singing can put out all harmful things.

GIANCIOTTO. My mother said to us,
Do you know what woman is a proper woman?

She that in spinning thinks upon the spindle,

She that in spinning spins without a knot,
She that in spinning lets not fall the spindle,

She that winds thread in order about thread,

She that knows when the spindle is full or half-way.

FRANCESCA. Then why did you not seek for such a woman,

My lord, through all the country?

(A knocking is heard at the little barred door. FRANCESCA rises to her feet, drops the sword on the table and turns to go out.)

Malatestino back!

I will not wait to see him.

THE VOICE OF MALATESTINO. Who has shut it?

Kinswoman, are you there? Have you shut me in?

(He kicks at the door.) GIANCIOTTO. Wait, wait, and I will open!

THE VOICE OF MALATESTINO. Ah, Giovanni!

Open, and I will bring you

A good ripe heavy fruit,

Food for your journey:

A ripe September fig.

And how it weighs!

(GIANCIOTTO goes to the door to open it. 40 FRANCESCA follows his limping steps for some instants with her eyes, then moves towards the door that leads to her rooms, and goes out.)

Be quick!

GIANCIOTTO. Why, here I am.

(He opens the door, and MALATESTINO appears in the narrow doorway holding in his left hand the lighted torch, in his right, by a knotted cord, the head of MONTAGNA 50 wrapped in a cloth.)

MALATESTINO. (Handing the torch to his brother.) Here, brother, put it out.

(GIOVANNI stamps out the flame under his foot.)

Was not your wife

With you?

5 GIANCIOTTO. (Roughly.) She was with me.

What do you want of her?

MALATESTINO. Ah, then you know
What fruit it is I am bringing to your table?

10 GIANCIOTTO. Did you not fear to disobey our father?

MALATESTINO. Feel how it weighs! now feel!

15 (He hands the bundle to GIOVANNI, who weighs it in his hand, and lets it fall on the pavement with a dull thud.)

It is yours; it is the head
Of Montagna dei Parcitadi; take it.

20 It is for your saddle bow,

For you to carry with you to Gadara

And leave it with our father, and say to him:

"Malatestino sends you

25 This token, lest you doubt his guardianship,

And pledges you his word

He will not let the prisoner escape;

And asks you in return

30 The three foot black white-spotted horse you said

That you would give him,

With saddle set with gold."

How hot it is!

35 (He wipes the sweat from his forehead. GIANCIOTTO has seated himself again at the table.)

I tell you,

When the light struck upon his eyes, he snorted,

As a horse does when it shies. Give me to drink.

(He drains a cup that stands full. GIANCIOTTO seems gloomy, and chews in silence, 45 without swallowing, like an ox ruminating.

The slayer of MONTAGNA sits where FRANCESCA had been sitting. The blood-stained bundle lies on the pavement; through the window can be seen the sun as it sets behind the Apennines, crimsoning the peaks and the clouds.)

You are not wroth with me?

You did not want to have us wait a year

In hopes of ransom from the Perdecit-tade?

I tell you we should not have had the ransom,

Sure as a florin's yellow.

From this day backwards

The Malatesti never have given quarter,
Since they first cut their teeth.

It is not two months now, at Cesena, our father

Just saved his skin by a mere miracle
From the clutches of Corrado Montefeltvo,
And the bastard Filipuccio is still living!
Heaven bless and save

Frate Alberigo,

Who knows full well the way to spare at once

Both trunk and branches!

It is time now for every Ghibelline

To come to his desert,

As the gay Knight would have us.

(He takes the sword lying across the table, and strikes the scabbard with his hands.)

And here is the dessert for every feast
Of peace and amity.

Do not be wroth with me,

Giovanni, I am yours.

Are you not called the Lamester

And am I not the One-eyed? . . .
(He is silent an instant, deceitfully.)

But Paolo is the Beautiful!

(GIANCIOTTO lifts his head and gazes fixedly at MALATESTINO. In the silence is heard the jingling of his spurs as he moves his foot restlessly on the floor.)

GIANCIOTTO. You are a babbler too?

(MALATESTINO is about to pour out more wine. His brother arrests his hand.)

No, do not drink,

But answer me. What is it you have done
To vex Francesca?

What have you done to her?

MALATESTINO. I! What is it she says?

GIANCIOTTO. You have changed colour.

MALATESTINO. What is it she says?

GIANCIOTTO. Answer me now!

MALATESTINO. (Pretending to be confused.) I cannot answer you.

GIANCIOTTO. What do you harbour against her in your mind?

MALATESTINO. (With a gleam in his eye.)

She told you this? And did she not change colour

While she was saying it?

GIANCIOTTO. Enough, Malatestino!

5 Look at me in the eyes.

I limp in going, but I go straight before
me.

You go a crooked way, and you smooth
out

10 The sound your feet have made. Only, take heed

I do not set my hand upon you. There
You would writhe your best in vain.

So now I say to you:

15 Woe to you if you touch my lady! You,
You should know, having seen me at the work,

That a less time it is 20 Between the touch of the spur and the first leap

Of the Barbary horse

Than between my saying and doing.
Think of it.

MALATESTINO. (In a low voice, with 25 downcast eye.) And if the brother sees that there is one

That touches of a truth his brother's wife,
And is incensed at it, and stirs himself

To wipe the shame out, does he therefore 30 sin?

And if, for this, he is accused to have Harboured ill thought against the woman,
say:

Is the accusation just?

35 (GIANCIOTTO springs up and raises his fists as if to crush the youth. But he restrains himself, his arms fall.)

GIANCIOTTO. Malatestino, scourge of hell, if you

40 Would have me not put out

The other eye by which your blinking soul
Offends the world, speak now,

And tell me what it is that you have seen.

(MALATESTINO rises and goes with his 45 silent, cat-like steps to the door near the table. He listens for some instants; then opens the door suddenly with a swift movement, and looks. He sees no one. He goes back to his brother's side.)

Speak.

MALATESTINO. Not for threats. You frighten me, I say.

Because I wore no visor, I was made

Blind of one eye; but you must wear indoors

Visor and headpiece, chin-piece, eye-piece,
all

Of tempered steel, without a flaw in it!
You will see nothing, nothing can come through

The iron-barred approaches to your brain.

GIANCIOOTTO. Come, come, the thing!

None of your talk! The thing!

Tell me what you have seen! Tell me the man!

MALATESTINO. Were you nowise surprised

When some one who had gone away from 15
here

No later than December suddenly

Gave up his post at Florence

And was already back by February?

(One of the silver cups is heard to crack, as 20 it is crushed in GIANCIOTTO'S hand.)

GIANCIOOTTO. Paolo? No, no. It is not.

(He rises, leaves the table, and walks to and fro in the room, grimly, with overclouded 25 eyes. He stumbles against the blood-stained bundle. He goes towards the window, whose panes glitter in the light of the setting sun.
He sits down on the window-seat, and takes his head between his hands, as if to collect 30 his thoughts. MALATESTINO plays with the sword, drawing it half in and half out of the scabbard.)

Malatestino, here!

(The youth comes across to him swiftly, 35 almost without sound, as if his feet were shod with felt. GIANCIOTTO enfolds him in his arms, and holds him tightly between his armoured knees, and speaks to him breath to breath.)

Are you sure? Have you seen this?

MALATESTINO. Yes.

GIANCIOOTTO. How and when?

MALATESTINO. I have seen him often enter . . .

GIANCIOOTTO. Enter where?

MALATESTINO. Enter the room.

GIANCIOOTTO. Well? That is not enough.

He is a kinsman. They might talk to- 50 gether.

There are the women. . . . You have seen him go

With the musicians, it may be. . . .

MALATESTINO. At night.

For God's sake, do not hurt me! Not so hard!

5 You have your iron gauntlets. Let me go.
(He writhes in his grasp.)

GIANCIOOTTO. Have I heard right?

You said . . .

Say it again.

10 MALATESTINO. At night.

At night, I say, I have seen him.

GIANCIOOTTO. If you should lie, I will break

Your body in two.

MALATESTINO. At night,
I have seen him enter, and go out at dawn.

You were in arms against the Urbinati.

GIANCIOOTTO. I will break you, if you lie.

MALATESTINO. Would you like to see and feel?

GIANCIOOTTO. I must do so,

If you have any will to go alive

Out of these mortal pincers.

MALATESTINO. Then, to-night?

GIANCIOOTTO. To-night, then.

MALATESTINO. But can you find out the way

To cheat, to smile? Ah, no, you cannot smile.

GIANCIOOTTO. Let my revenge teach me the way to smile,

If my delight could never.

MALATESTINO. Can you kiss

Both, one after the other, and not bite

Instead?

GIANCIOOTTO. Yes, I will kiss them, thinking them

Already dead.

MALATESTINO. You must put both
your arms

40 About them, you must talk to them, and not

Tremble.

GIANCIOOTTO. Ah, you are playing with my sorrow!

45 Beware! it has two edges.

MALATESTINO. Do not hurt me,
For God's sake!

GIANCIOOTTO. Good; but tell me how you think:

The way, and speedily.

MALATESTINO. You must take your
leave,

And go from here, take horse, and by the gate

Of San Genesio with all your escort
Set out for Pesaro. I will come with you.

You will say you are wroth with me
For the Parcitade's head's sake, and desire
To take me to our father at Gradara,
That he may punish me or pardon me.
So they will think

That they are left alone. Do you understand?

Then, half-way through the night,
We will leave the escort, and come back again,

And enter by the gate of the Gattolo
Before the moon is up. We will give the signal

To Rizio. But let me dispose of that.
Saddle your swiftest horse, and take with you

A little linen
To bind about his hoofs, in case of need,
Because at night the stones
Upon the noisy way
May well be traitors, brother.

GIANCIOOTTO. Then shall I see?
You are sure? Then I shall take them in the act . . .

MALATESTINO. Not so hard! Now I think,
There is the slave, there is the Cyprian slave . . .

She is their go-between.
Sly is she, works with charms. . . .
I have seen her as she goes

Snuffing the wind. . . . I must find a way to lead her

Into a snare, and blindfold her. But this,
Leave this to me: you need not think of anything

Till you are at the door.

GIANCIOOTTO. On your life now, shall I take them in the act?

MALATESTINO. Enough of this, by God!

Let me go, now, let me go! I am not Your prey.

(Through the door is heard the voice of PAOLO.)

PAOLO. (Outside.) Where is Giovanni?

(GIANCIOOTTO lets MALATESTINO go, and rises with a white face.)

MALATESTINO. Look to it now.
Look to it; no suspicion!

(As PAOLO opens the door and enters, MALATESTINO pretends to be angry with GIANCIOOTTO.)

Ah, at last

You have let me go!

(He pretends to suffer in his wrists.)

By God, it is well for you
You were born my elder brother, otherwise . . .

Ah, Paolo, well met!

(PAOLO wears a long rich surtout falling below his knees nearly to the ankle, gilt at the waist by a jewelled belt through which is thrust a beautiful damascened dagger. His curled hair, not parted, but waving in a mass, surrounds his face like a cloud.)

PAOLO. What is the matter?

20 MALATESTINO. See,
Giovanni is enraged
Because I have lost all patience at the last

And have struck dumb Montagna, being weary

25 Of listening to his cries (Francesca too Could get no sleep) and weary too of hearing

My father say twice over,
30 By word of mouth and message:

"Will you keep watch on him?
Are you sure you can keep watch?
I know he will escape;

I know that you will let him go, and then,
35 When he has gone, you will not bring him back!"

By God, I was tired of it. There is his head.

PAOLO. You cut it off yourself?

40 MALATESTINO. Yes, I myself,
And neatly.

(PAOLO looks at the bundle, but draws back so as not to stain himself with the dripping blood.)

45 Ah, you draw back, it seems
You fear to stain your garments?
I did not know I had

Two sisters, both so dainty!

GIANCIOOTTO. Enough of jesting! Paolo,
I have to take him with me to Gradara,
To our father; he must plead

His cause himself,
For disobeying. What do you say to it?

PAOLO. I say that it is well for him to go,
 Giovanni.
 MALATESTINO. I am content.
 But I must bear the token;
 I will hang it to my saddle: that is staunch.
(He takes up the bundle by the cord.)
 I have no fear our father will be angry.
 He will be filled with joy,
 I tell you, when the knots are all untied.
 And he will give me the black horse for war,
 And maybe the grey jennet for the chase.
 GIANCIOTTO. Get ready then, and without lingering,
 It is already evening.
(MALATESTINO takes up the bundle to carry it away.)
 PAOLO. (To GIOVANNI.) I see your men are armed at front and back,
 And wait the clarion.
(The two brothers go towards the window lit up by the sunset, and sit down.)
 MALATESTINO. (Going.) Ah, but how heavy! and without a helmet!
 The Parcitadi always were gross oxen,
 Fatted for slaughtering, great horned heads.
 Ah, Paozzo, where you go
 You leave behind a scent of orange-water.
 Take care, a drop may drip upon your clothes.
(He goes out.)
 PAOLO. He is all teeth and claws, ready for biting.
 Our men at arms used once
 To say he always slept with one eye closed
 And one eye open, even in his sleep.
 Now I believe he never sleeps at all,
 Nor slacks the sinews of his cruelty.
 He was made to conquer lands, and die some day
 Of extreme cold, God keep him, our good brother!
 So you are Podestà of Pesaro!
 Our father from Gradara scans the hill
 Of Pesaro as if he watched his prey.
 You, with your strength and wisdom,
 Should give it to him soon,
 Giovanni.
 GIANCIOTTO. It is not a year yet since

You went to Florence, Captain of the People,
 And now I go as Podestà. Not long
 You stayed at Florence. I shall stay there long,
 Because it is not well for me to yield
 The office to another. Yet to leave Francesca for so long
 Goes to my heart a little.
 PAOLO. You can come back again from time to time,
 Pesaro is not far.
 GIANCIOTTO. The Podestà is not allowed to leave
 His post, so long as lasts
 His office, as you know, nor bring with him
 His wife. But I will leave her in your care,
 Brother, my most dear wife; you will be here.
 PAOLO. I have held her always
 As a dear sister might be held.
 GIANCIOTTO. I know,
 Paolo.
 PAOLO. Be very sure
 That I will guard her for you well.
 GIANCIOTTO. I know,
 Paolo. You from Ravenna
 Brought her a virgin to your brother's bed,
 And you will keep her for me from all harm.
 PAOLO. I will tell Orabile
 To leave Ghaggiolo and come
 To Rimino to keep her company.
 GIANCIOTTO. See that they love each other, Paolo,
 For they are kinswomen.
 PAOLO. Francesca often
 Sends gifts to her.
 GIANCIOTTO. Go, call her. It is late.
 The sun has set, and I shall have to rest
 A little at Gradara,
 And yet be at the gates
 Of Pesaro before the third hour. Go,
 Go you yourself and call her. She has gone
 Back to her room, because Malatestino
 Frighted her with his cruelty. Go you,
 Comfort her, tell her not to be afraid
 Of being left alone, and call her here.
(He rises and puts his hand lightly on his brother's shoulder as if to urge him.) PAOLO goes towards the door. GIOVANNI stands motionless, and follows him with murderous eyes. As he goes out, GIOVANNI stretches out his hand as if to swear an oath. Then he moves towards the table, and takes up the cracked cup, wishing to hide it. He turns, sees the little barred door still open, throws the cup into the darkness, and closes the door. At the other door FRANCESCA appears by the side of PAOLO.)

FRANCESCA. Pardon me, my dear lord, 10 If I have left you hastily. You know The reason.

GIANCIOOTTO. My dear lady, I know well

The reason, and I am sorry
That you have had to suffer by the fault
Of this sad brother. And I go to see
Both to your peace and to his punishment,
For I intend to take him to our father,
For judgment at Gradara. He prepares Already to set forth. Within a little
We shall have left the city.

FRANCESCA. He will bear
Ill-will against me, if you should accuse
him

Before his father. Pardon him, I pray.
He is a boy.

GIANCIOOTTO. Yet, lady, it is better,
For your sake, that he comes with me. I leave

Paolo with you. Trust Paolo. His Orabile
Will come to stay with you at Rimino,
And keep you company: he promises.
Often from Pesaro
I mean to send you messages, and hope
Often to have the like from Rimino.

FRANCESCA. Surely, my lord. You need not fear for me.

GIANCIOOTTO. Put every trouble freely from your mind,
Let songs and music give you joy, and have Beautiful robes, and lovely odours. Not To Guido's daughter suits the spinning wheel.

I know it. And I say
My mother's saying but to make you smile.
You are not angry with me?

FRANCESCA. In your saying
There seems to lie secret rebuke for me,
My lord.

GIANCIOOTTO. A good old saying, that was born
Within the dark walls of Verrucchio,

That now are grown too narrow to hem in
The Malatesti in our house to-day.

If any spin, they spin

Only the purple, and with golden distaffs.

5 Come to my arms, my most dear lady!

(FRANCESCA goes up to him; he takes her in his arms and kisses her. PAOLO stands silent in the doorway.)

Now

10 I have to say farewell. Never so fair
You seemed to me, never so sweet. And yet

I leave you.

(He smooths her hair with his hand; then 15 looses her.)

Oh, my brother,

Keep her in safety and heaven keep you
both.

Come, and pledge faith with me.

20 (PAOLO goes up to him, and they embrace.)

Where is my gorget?

FRANCESCA. Here it is.

(She gives it to him.)

25 GIANCIOTTO. (Putting it on.) Paolo, buckle it for me.

(PAOLO buckles it on. FRANCESCA hands him the basnet.)

Do you remember, brother,

30 That night before the Mastra Tower, that bolt

Out of a crossbow? You,

Francesca, do you remember?

It was at just this hour.

35 Cignatta was killed then. To-day Montagna

Joins him. 'Tis not a year.

The house is silent now; then, all the towers

40 Were crackling to the sky.

(FRANCESCA takes the sword from the table and buckles his sword-bell.)

Francesca, do you remember? Then you gave us

45 Wine, Scian wine, to drink. We drank together

Out of one cup.

(He is fully armed.)

Now let me drink again!

50 FRANCESCA. One of the cups is missing.
There were two.

Where is the other?

(She looks to see if it has fallen.)

GIANCIOTTO. One will do for us
Still.
(He pours out the wine and offers it to FRANCESCA.)

And good luck God give you!

FRANCESCA. I cannot drink
This wine, my lord. I am not used to it.

GIANCIOTTO. Drink as you drank then,
and pass on the cup
That your kinsman may drink also, as he drank then.

(FRANCESCA drinks and offers the cup to PAOLO, who takes it.)

PAOLO. Good luck to the Podestà of Pesaro!

(He drinks throwing back his curled head.
Through the door is heard the voice of MALATESTINO, who throws open the door, and appears in full armour. From the court is heard the sound of bugles.)

MALATESTINO. Ready, Giovanni?
Hark, the clarion!
To horse! To horse!

ACT V

The room with the curtained alcove, the musicians' gallery, the lectern with the book closed. Four waxen torches burn in the iron candlestick; two tapers on the small table. The compartments of the long window are almost all open to the peaceful night air. The pot of basil is on the windowsill, and beside it is a gilt plate heaped with bunches of early grapes.

(FRANCESCA is seen through the half-drawn curtains of the alcove, lying on the bed, on which she has laid herself without undressing. The WOMEN, who wear white fillets, are seated on low stools; they speak quietly, so as not to disturb their mistress.
Near them, on a stool, are laid five silver lamps, which have gone out.)

ADONELLA. She has fallen asleep. She dreams.

(BIANCOFIORE rises and goes softly up to the alcove, looks, then turns, and goes back to her seat.)

BIANCOFIORE. How beautiful she is!

ALTICHIARA. Summer is come; she grows

In beauty with the summer.

ALDA. Like ears of corn.

GARSENDA. And like Poppies.

BIANCOFIORE. O beautiful
Summer, go not away!
5 The nights begin to grow a little cool.
Do you feel the breeze?

ALDA. It comes
From the sea. Oh, the delight!
(With her face to the window, she draws in a long breath.)

ADONELLA. Lord Autumn comes our way
With grass and figs in his lap.

BIANCOFIORE. September! Grape and fig begin to droop.

ALTICHIARA. (Pointing to the plate.)
Here, Adonella, take
A bunch of grapes to strip.

ADONELLA. You are too greedy.
ALTICHIARA. Come, come, your mouth is watering for them.

(ADONELLA takes a bunch of grapes from the plate, and goes back to her seat, holding the bunch in the air, while the others strip it of 25 its grapes.)

BIANCOFIORE. It is like sweet mus-catel.

ALDA. Don't throw away the skin!

ALTICHIARA. It is all good to eat, kernel and skin.

GARSENDA. Here is a bitter kernel.

BIANCOFIORE. Grown on the shady
side.

ADONELLA. How still it is!

ALDA. How tranquil!

GARSENDA. Listen! I hear a galley

Weigh anchor.

BIANCOFIORE. For to-night

Madonna has no singing.

ALTICHIARA. She is weary.

ALDA. Why does the prisoner

Cry out no more?

GARSENDA. Messer Malatestino has cut off
45 His head.

ALDA. Is that the truth?

GARSENDA. The truth; to-day, at Vespers.

ALDA. How do you know?

GARSENDA. Smaragdi told it me,
And had seen him, too,

Tie something huddled in a cloth to his saddle,

When, with Messer Giovanni
He mounted in the court. It was the head,
The prisoner's head.

ADONELLA. Where do they carry it?

ALTICHIARA. To whom do they carry it?

BIANCOFIORE. Now they are riding
By the seashore,
Under the stars,
They and the murdered
Head!

ADONELLA. Where will they have come?

ALDA. They should have come
To hell, and stayed there!

GARSEDA. One can breathe in the house

Now they are here no longer,
The lame man and the blind man!

ALTICHIARA. Hush! hush! let not Madonna

Hear you.

GARSEDA. She is hardly breathing.

ALDA. Messer Paolo

Is back again?

ALTICHIARA. Hush!

(FRANCESCA groans in her sleep.)

ADONELLA. She is wakening.

(She throws the grape-stalk out of the window. BIANCOFIORE again rises, and goes up to the alcove, and looks.)

BIANCOFIORE. No,

She is not awake; she is crying in her sleep.

ADONELLA. She is dreaming.

ALDA. O Garsenda, does she know

The prisoner is not crying any more

Because they have cut his head off?

GARSEDA. Certainly

She knows.

BIANCOFIORE. Perhaps she is dreaming of it now.

ADONELLA. We must sit up to-night,
Who knows to what hour?

ALDA. Are you sleepy, Adonella?

ALTICHIARA. Simonetto, the fifer, is waiting on the stairs!

ADONELLA. Who waits for you, then?

Suzzo, the falconer,

With lure of pretty leather?

ALDA. Hush! She is wakening.

BIANCOFIORE. And did it bleed, Gar-senda?

GARSEDA. Bleed? What?

BIANCOFIORE. That bundle at the saddle bow?

GARSEDA. I saw but dimly, for the court was dark.

But this I know: Smaragdi had to wash
The pavement, there, in the hall.

BIANCOFIORE. Now they are nearing the Cattolica.

GARSEDA. God keep them far away, and let them never

Find their way back again!

BIANCOFIORE. Think of the frightened
horse

Feeling the dead thing dangle in the night!

ADONELLA. How sweetly the sweet basil smells by night!

ALTICHIARA. How thick it grows; the pot

No longer holds it.

BIANCOFIORE. You know, Garsenda, tell us

The story of Lisabetta of Messina,

That loved a youth of Pisa, and how her brothers

Killed him in secret, and she found his body

And cut the head away

From off the shoulders, set it in a pot,

And earth with it, and planted

A sprig of basil plant,

And watered it with her tears,

And saw it blossom so, out of her weeping.

Tell us, Garsenda, very quietly

While we are waiting.

(FRANCESCA gives a deeper groan, and turns as if half stifled on the bed. The WOMEN shiver.)

ALDA. Listen,

She is crying in her sleep. It is some bad
dream.

GARSEDA. She is sleeping on her back; the nightmare weighs

Upon her breast.

ALTICHIARA. Shall we awake her?

BIANCOFIORE.

Evil

It is too suddenly

To rouse the heart that sees.

How should we know

What truth she sees revealed?

ADONELLA. The Slave interprets all her dreams to her.

(FRANCESCA utters a cry of terror, springs from the bed, and seems in the act to fly from some savage pursuit, throwing out her hands as if to unloose herself from some grasp.)

FRANCESCA. No, no, it is not I, it is not I!

Ah, ah, they seize me with their teeth! 5
Help! help!

They snatch my heart. Help, help!
Paolo!

(She shudders, stops, and turns on herself, pale, and breathing with difficulty, while her 10 WOMEN surround her in consternation, trying to comfort her.)

GARSENDA. Madonna, Madonna, we are here, see, see,

We are here, Madonna.

ALTICHIARA. Do not be afraid!

ADONELLA. There is no one here; there is no one here but us,

Madonna. No one is harming you, Madonna.

FRANCESCA. (Shivering.) What have I said? Did I call?

O God, what have I done?

ALDA. You have had some discomfortable dream,

Madonna.

GARSENDA. Now it is finished. We are here.

All's quiet.

FRANCESCA. Is it late?

BIANCOFIORE. The sweat is standing out upon your forehead.

(She wipes it off.)

FRANCESCA. Is it night yet? Garsenda, Biancofiore, Alda, you are all in white.

GARSENDA. It might perhaps be four hours after midnight,

Madonna.

FRANCESCA. Have I slept so long? Smaragdi,

Where is Smaragdi?

She has not come back yet?

BIANCOFIORE. She has not come back.

FRANCESCA. Why has she not come back?

BIANCOFIORE. When did you send her, Madonna?

FRANCESCA. Are you not mistaken?

Sleep,

Perhaps, deceived you, and you did not see 50 her

When she came in.

GARSENDA. Madonna,

No, none of us closed eyelid;

We watched beside you all the night.

ADONELLA.

Perhaps

She has come back, and waits, as she is wont,

Lying without the door.

FRANCESCA.

Look out and see,

Adonella, see if she is there.

(ADONELLA draws back the folds of the curtain, opens the door, and looks out.)

ADONELLA.

Smaragdi!

Smaragdi! There is no answer.

No one is there. It is all dark.

FRANCESCA.

But call,

15 Call her again.

ADONELLA. Smaragdi!

FRANCESCA.

Take a light.

(GARSENDA takes one of the lamps, lights it at a taper, and goes to the door. She and 20 her companion look around.)

She should have been here now some time ago.

What harm can have befallen her? God knows what;

25 It can be no good thing.

BIANCOFIORE.

You have not yet

Come quite out of the horror of the dream, Madonna.

ALTICHIARA. Breathe the air, the night

30 is fresh,

The night is still.

FRANCESCA. The moon

Is risen?

ALDA. It must be rising on the hills,

35 But there is yet no dawn upon the sea.

(ADONELLA and GARSENDA re-enter. One of them puts out the lamp.)

FRANCESCA. (Anxiously.) Well? Is she there?

40 GARSENDA. Madonna, there is no one.

ADONELLA.

Nothing but silence

And darkness everywhere; the whole house sleeps.

GARSENDA. We only saw . . .

45 (She hesitates.)

FRANCESCA. You only saw . . . whom did you see?

GARSENDA. (Hesitating.) Madonna, Some one was there . . . some one was standing there,

Leaning against the wall . . .

Still as a statue . . . all alone . . . his girdle

Shining . . . Madonna, do not be afraid . . .

(Goes near to her and lowers her voice.)

It was Messer Paolo!

FRANCESCA. (Startled.) Oh, why?

ADONELLA. Madonna

Will have her hair made ready for the
night?

FRANCESCA. No, no, I am not sleepy.

I will wait.

BIANCOFIORE. Her shoes unloosed?

ALDA. The perfumes?

FRANCESCA. I will wait

A little more. I am no longer sleepy.

I will wait until Smaragdi comes.

ALTICHIARA. Let me go

And seek her.

GARSENDA. The poor thing is tired
perhaps,

At the day's end, and sleeps where she has dropped.

Perhaps she is lying now

Upon the stairs.

FRANCESCA. Go, go, and I will read
Till you return. Bring me a taper, Alda.

(ALDA takes a taper and fixes it at the head of the reading-desk.)

Go now. You are all in white!

The Summer is not dead?

When it was evening, did you see the swallows

Begin to fly away?

I was elsewhere,

I was looking on the hills,

When the sun set to-night.

They have not all flown yet, have they?

But perhaps

To-morrow all the other flocks will follow.

I will go up on the tower, to see them go,

And you will sing me a merry song, men dance to,

As if 'twere the March calends. Have you still

The flight of swallows painted, as you had?

ALDA. Yes, Madonna.

FRANCESCA. To-morrow at the dance

You will put on

Over these white

Dresses a vest of black.

You will be like

"The creature of delight."

BIANCOFIORE.

Yes, Madonna. }

FRANCESCA. Go, go!

(She opens the book.)

(Each of the WOMEN takes her silver lamp, which swings from a curved handle. First

ADONELLA goes to the tall candlestick, and, standing on tiptoe, lights her lamp at one of the torches. She bows, and goes out, while FRANCESCA follows her with her eyes.)

Go, too, Adonella!

(GARSENDA does the same.)

And you, Garsenda.

(ALTICHIARA does the same.)

And you, too, Altichiara.

(ALDA does the same.)

And you, Alda.

(The four have gone out, one by one.

BIANCOFIORE remains, and she also is about to light her lamp, but as she is shorter than the others she cannot reach the flame.)

Oh, Biancofiore, what a little one!

You will not ever reach to light your lamp.

You are the gentlest of them. Little dove,

(BIANCOFIORE turns smiling.)

Come!

(BIANCOFIORE goes up to her. FRAN-CESCA caresses her hair.)

It is all of gold. You are, I think,
A little like my sister; you remember her,
Samaritana?

BIANCOFIORE. Yes, indeed, Madonna.
Such sweetness cannot be forgot. I have her

Here, in my heart, with the angels.

FRANCESCA.

She was sweet,

35 My sister; was she not sweet, Biancofiore?

Ah, if she were but here, if she might make

Her little bed beside my bed to-night!

If I might hear again

Her little naked feet run to the window,

If I might hear her run with naked feet,

My little dove, and say, and say to me:

"Francesca, now the morning-star is born,

And it has chased away the Pleiades!"

BIANCOFIORE. You weep, Madonna.

FRANCESCA. You tremble, Biancofiore.
She too was frightened of a sudden; I heard

Her heart beat; and she said to me: "O
sister,

50 Listen to me: stay with me still, oh, stay
With me! we were born here:

Do not forsake me!"

And I said to her: "Oh, take me,

And let me be with you,
And let one covering cover us!"

BIANCOFIORE. O Madonna,
Your words pierce through my heart,
What melancholy holds you Still?

FRANCESCA. No, no, do not weep:
Gentle you are. But come, light your lamp
here.

BIANCOFIORE. May I not stay with you? May I not sleep
Here, at the foot of the bed?

FRANCESCA. No, Biancofiore. Light your lamp, and go,
And God go with you. Now Samaritana, 15
It may be, is thinking of her sister.

(BIANCOFIORE lights her lamp at the taper, and bends to kiss FRANCESCA's hand.)

Go, do not weep. Let all sad thoughts go 20
by.

To-morrow you shall sing to me. Now go.

(BIANCOFIORE turns and walks slowly towards the door. As she is going out, FRAN-CESCA gives way to her presentiment.)

You are not going, Biancofiore?

BIANCOFIORE. No,
I will stay with you, Madonna. Let me stay
At least until Smaragdi has come back.

FRANCESCA. (Hesitates an instant.) Go! 30

BIANCOFIORE. God keep you, Madonna.

(She goes out, closing the door behind her.) (Left alone, FRANCESCA makes several steps towards the door; then stands still, 35 listening.)

FRANCESCA. And let it be so if it is my fate.

(Goes resolutely up to the door.)
I will call him.

(Hesitates and draws back.)
He is still there, and he stands

Leaning against the wall;
Still as a statue, all alone; his girdle
Shining in the shadow. Who said that to 45
me?

Who was it? Was it not said long ago?
Within the helmet all the face like fire . . .

(Visions pass before her soul in a flash.)
He is silent, and the lances
Of the spearmen round him.
He stands, and the arrow whistles through his hair.

He is cleansed from the pollution of the guile.

He drains the long draught, throwing back
his head.

5 Ah, now all's gone again!

The enemy holds fast

The secret and the sword.

"The executioner

I make me of your will."

But iron shall not divide the lips, but flame
Shall not divide the lips.

(She wanders to and fro, wretched and feverish.)

The utmost flame of fire shall not divide them.

(She takes up the silver mirror and looks at herself in it.)

O silence, and still water, sepulchre,
Pale sepulchre of my face!

What is this voice that says

I never was more beautiful than now?

"And in the solitude that was on fire

With your eyes, I have lived

With so swift energy,

25 Travailing secretly." . . .

One voice alone cries out

On the topmost of my heart,

And all the blood flies. . . . Ah!

(She starts, hearing a light knocking at the door. She puts down the mirror, blows out the taper with a breath, goes to the door, tottering, and calls, in a low voice.)

Smaragdi! Smaragdi!

PAOLO. (Voice heard.) Francesca!

(She flings the door open vehemently.
With a craving as of thirst she throws herself into the arms of her lover.)

FRANCESCA. Paolo! Paolo!

(He is dressed as at Vespers; his head is 40 bare.)

PAOLO. Life of my life, never was my desire

So ardent for you. In my heart I felt

A dying down

Of the bright spirits that live within your
eyes.

My forces ebbed away into the night,

Out of my breast, a flood

Terrible, clangorous,

50 And fear took hold upon my soul, as when,
In that sealed hour,

You put me to the test, God witnessing,

The test of the arrow,

And raised me there whither although he wills it

No man returns by willing to return.

Is it not morning, is it not morning yet?

The stars have all gone down into your
hair,

Scattered about the confines of the shades,
Where life may never find them!

(He kisses her hair passionately again and again.)

FRANCESCA.

Pardon me,

Pardon me! Far away

You come before me,

Far off and silent,

With fixed, dry eyeballs, as upon that day

Between the inflexible lances of the fight.

A hard sleep falling on me like a blow

Scattered my soul

As a stem breaks, and then I seemed to lie

Lost on the stones. And then there came to me

The dream that long while now

I have seen in sleep, the strange

Dream that has tortured me;

And I was full of many terrors, full

Of terrors; and my women

Saw me, and how I trembled,

And how I wept . . .

PAOLO.

Oh, wept!

FRANCESCA. Pardon me, pardon me,
Sweet friend! You have awakened me from sleep,

Freed me from every anguish.

It is not morning yet,

The stars have not gone down into the sea,

The summer is not over, and you are mine,

And I, I am all yours,

And this is perfect joy

The passion of the ardour of our life.

(PAOLO kisses her insatiably.)

PAOLO. You shivered?

FRANCESCA.

See, the door

Is open, and there passes

The breath of the night. Do you not feel it too?

This is the hour,

The hour of silence,

That sheds the dew of night

Upon the manes

Of horses on the roads.

But shut the door.

(PAOLO shuts the door.)

Paolo, did you see with your own eyes

The horsemen as they went away?

PAOLO.

Yes, yes,

I watched them from the tower, for a long while

5 Until the last lance faded

Into the dark, and I could see no more.

Come, come, Francesca! Many hours of gladness

We have before us,

10 With the wild melody of unknown winds

And the swift ravishment of solitude

In fire, and the violent

River without a goal,

And the immortal thirst;

15 But now this hour that flies

Fills me with lust to live

A thousand lives,

In the quiver of the air that kisses you,

In the short breath of the sea,

20 In the fury of the world,

That not one thing

Of all the infinite things

That are in you

Lie hid from me,

25 And I die not before I have ploughed up

Out of your depths

And relished to its infinite root in you

My perfect joy.

(He draws her towards the cushions by the windows.)

FRANCESCA. Kiss me upon my eyes, upon my brow,

Upon my cheeks, my throat,

So . . . so . . .

35 Stay, and my wrists, my fingers . . .

So . . . so . . . And take my soul and pour it out,

Because the breath of the night

Turns back my soul again

40 To things of long ago,

And the low voices of the night turn back

My soul to things that were,

And joys enjoyed are they that now weigh down

45 My heart, and as you were

I see you still, and not as you shall be,

My fair friend, my sweet friend.

PAOLO. I will carry you where all things are forgot,

50 And no more time made slave

Is lord of our desire.

Then shall the day and night

Be mingled even as one

Upon the earth as upon one sole pillow;
Then shall the hands of dawn
No more unclasp from one another's holding

The dusky arms and the white arms of
them,

Nor yet untwist

The tangles of their hair and veins.

FRANCESCA. It says

Here in the book, here where you have not read:

"We have been one life; it were a seemly thing

That we be also one death."

PAOLO. Let the book
Be closed!

(He rises, closes the book on the reading-desk, and blows out the taper.)

And read in it no more. Not
there

Our destiny is written, but in the stars,

That palpitate above

As your throat palpitates,

Your wrists, your brow,

Perhaps because they were your garland
once,

Your necklet when you went

Burningly through the ways of heaven?

From what

Vineyard of earth were these grapes gathered in?

They have the smell

Of drunkenness and honey,

They are like veins, they are swollen with
delight,

Fruits of the night! The flaming feet of Love

Shall tread them in the winepress. Give me your mouth

Again! again!

(FRANCESCA lies back on the cushions, forgetful of everything. All at once, in the dead silence, a violent shock is heard on the door, as if some one hurled himself against it. The lovers start up in terror, and rise to their feet.)

THE VOICE OF GIANCIOTTO. Francesca, open! Francesca!

(The WOMAN is petrified with terror.)

PAOLO looks round the room, putting his hand to his dagger. He catches sight of the bolt of the trap-door.)

PAOLO. (In a low voice.) Take heart, take heart, Francesca! I will get down

By the way of the trap-door.

Go, go, and open to him.

But do not tremble.

(He lifts the trap-door. The door seems to quiver at the repeated blows.)

THE VOICE OF GIANCIOTTO. Open,
Francesca, open!

PAOLO. Open to him! Go now.

I wait beneath. If he but touches you

Cry out and I am with you.

Go boldly, do not tremble!

(He begins to go down, while the WOMAN, in obedience to him, goes to open the door, tollering.)

THE VOICE OF GIANCIOTTO. Open!
upon your life, Francesca, open!

(The door being opened GIANCIOTTO, armed, and covered with dust, rushes furiously into the room, looking for his brother in every direction. Suddenly he catches sight of PAOLO, standing head and shoulders above the level of the floor, struggling to free himself from the bolt of the trap-door, which has caught in a corner of his cloak. FRANCESCA utters a piercing cry, while GIANCIOTTO falls upon his brother, seizing him by the hair, and forcing him to come up.)

GIANCIOTTO. So, you are caught in a trap,

Traitor! They are good to have you by the hair,

Your ringlets!

FRANCESCA. (Rushing forward.) Let him go!

Let him go! Me, take me!

(*The husband loosens his hold. PAOLO springs up on the other side of the trap-door,
and unsheathes his dagger. GIANCIOTTO, drawing back, bares his sword, and rushes upon him with terrible force. FRANCESCA throws herself between the two men; but as her husband has leant all his weight on the blow, and is unable to draw back, her breast is pierced by the sword, she staggers, turns on herself, towards PAOLO, who lets fall his dagger, and catches her in his arms.*)

FRANCESCA. (Dying.) Ah, Paolo!

(GIANCIOTTO pauses for an instant. He sees the woman clasped in the arms of her lover, who seals her expiring life with his lips. Mad with rage and sorrow, he pierces his brother's side with another deadly thrust. The two bodies sway to and fro for an instant without a sound. Then, still linked together, they fall at full length on the pavement. GIANCIOTTO stoops in silence, bends his knee with a painful effort, and, across the other knee, breaks his blood-stained sword.)

RUSSIAN

ANDREYEV

(1871-1919)

Leonid Nicolaievich Andreyev, Russian novelist and dramatist, was born in Orel. He attended a government school and suffered throughout his schooldays from poverty and ill-health. During his earlier years he wrote for the newspapers and magazines. In 1901, when his first series of stories appeared in book form, he was given an enthusiastic welcome by some of the leading critics. In fact Andreyev was one of the few modern Russian writers who dealt frankly with the less hopeful aspects of human life and won great popularity in time to enjoy it. His plays were widely performed and his novels were read everywhere, especially in America. Andreyev does not regard life with great optimism, and yet his pessimism is softened by a tender and humane sympathy for mankind. After the Great War he refused to accept the favors of the Bolshevik government, declined an opportunity to spend his last years in comparative affluence, and went into voluntary exile in Finland, where he died poor and neglected in 1919.

The translation of The Life of Man (1906) is that of Clarence L. Meader and Fred N. Scott in Plays by Leonid Andreyev, New York, Charles Scribners Sons, 1918.

THE LIFE OF MAN

(In Act I a crowd of Old Women await the birth of Man, hailing with ironical delight every sound from within that betokens the mother's anguish. Then Man is born, and the Relatives give the customary timeworn greetings to the Father. During the scene the Being in Grey stands at the back of the stage in a corner, holding a candle which springs into flame at the birth of Man. This figure remains on the stage during the entire play. In Act II, which is printed here in full, Man appears in youth. In Act III, which is omitted, there is presented the maturity and prosperity of Man. He lives in a rich and gorgeous house surrounded by music and dancing. In this act is shown the fickleness of those who subsist on his bounty. Acts IV and V are given in full.)

ACT II

LOVE AND POVERTY

The scene is flooded with a bright, warm light. A large, very high, and very bare room. The walls, of a light rose-colour, are perfectly smooth and covered in places with a fantastic and beautiful lacework of damp lines and spots. In the right wall are two tall windows, each with eight panes of glass and without curtains. The night looks in through them. There are two wretched beds, two chairs, and a table without a spread. On the table stands a beautiful bouquet of wild flowers and a half-broken pitcher containing water.

In one corner, which is darker than the other corners, stands the BEING IN GREY. The candle in his hand is diminished by one third, but the white flame is still bright and high and throws brilliant spots of light on his stony face and chin.

The NEIGHBOURS enter, dressed in bright, gay garments. Their hands are filled with flowers and grasses and fresh, green branches of oak and birch. They move about the room. Their faces are open, cheerful, and kindly.

CONVERSATION OF THE NEIGHBOURS

- 5 How poor they are! Just see, they haven't a single extra chair!
Nor curtains at the windows —
Nor pictures on the walls —
How poor they are! See, they have 10 nothing to eat but stale bread —
And nothing but water to drink — cold water from a well.
And they have no extra clothing, either.

She always wears her rose-coloured dress with the open neck, which makes her look like a young girl.

And he always wears his blouse and his fantastic necktie, which makes him look like an artist and causes all the dogs to bark angrily at him —

And offends all proper people.

Dogs hate shabby people. Only yesterday I saw three dogs attack him, and as he drove them away with a stick he cried: "Don't you dare touch my trousers! They are my only trousers!" Then he laughed, and the dogs showed their teeth and rushed at him and howled with anger.

And to-day I saw two very respectable-looking people, a gentleman and a lady, who, frightened by him, crossed to the other side of the street. "He will ask us for money in a minute," said the gentleman. "He will kill us!" piped the lady. So they crossed the road, looking about and holding their pockets. But he shook his head and laughed.

He is so cheerful.

They are always laughing.

And singing.

It's he who sings; she dances.

In her rose-coloured dress with the open neck.

It is a delight to look at them. They are so young and radiant.

But I am so sorry for them. They are hungry. Just think of it, hungry!

Yes, that is so. They used to have much furniture and clothing, but they have sold all and now they have nothing left to sell.

I remember she had beautiful earrings, and she sold them to buy bread.

And he had a handsome, black dress coat — his wedding-coat — and he sold it.

They have nothing left but their wedding-rings. How poor they are!

That's nothing, that's nothing! I was young myself once and I know what it means.

What's that you say, grandfather?

That's nothing, that's nothing!

Just see, merely thinking of them makes grandfather want to sing!

And dance!

Laughter.

He is so kind. He made my boy a bow and arrows.

And she wept with me when my daughter was sick.

He helped me mend my broken fence. He is a strong young fellow.

It's a delight to have such good neighbours. Their youth warms our cold age; their light-heartedness drives away our cares.

But their room is like a prison: it's so empty.

No, it is like a temple: it's so bright.

See, they have flowers on the table. She gathered them while she was walking about the fields in her rose-coloured dress with the open neck. Here are lilies-of-the-valley. The dew is not yet dry on them.

And here is flaming scarlet lychnis.

And here are violets.

And here is just green grass.

Don't touch them, girls! Don't touch the flowers! Don't drop them on the floor — her kisses are on them. Don't breathe on them with your breath — her breath is on them. Don't touch them, girls! Don't touch the flowers!

He will come and see the flowers.

He will take the kisses.

He will drink in her breath —

How poor they are! Yet how happy!

Let's go. Let's go away.

But has none of us brought anything for our dear neighbours? That would be too bad!

I have brought a piece of fragrant, warm bread and a bottle of milk.

(She puts it on the window-sill.)

And I have brought some soft, tender grass. When it is scattered about the floor, the room is like a blossoming meadow and smells like spring.

(She strews the grass on the floor.)

And I have brought flowers.

(Strewing them.)

And we have brought branches of birch and oak with green leaves. When the walls are hung with them the room will look like a cheery, green forest.

They decorate the room, filling the dark windows and covering the bare, rose-coloured walls with leaves.

I have brought a fine cigar. It is a very cheap one, but it is strong and fragrant and will bring delightful dreams.

(He lays it on the window-sill.)

I have brought a rose-coloured ribbon. When you tie it in your hair it makes you gay and beautiful. My lover gave it to me, but I have many ribbons and she has none at all.

(She lays it on the window-sill.)

How about you, grandfather? Haven't 10 you brought something?

Nothing. Nothing. I brought only my cough, and they don't need that, do they, neighbour?

No more than my crutches — Say, girls, 15 who needs my crutches?

Do you remember, neighbour —?

And do you remember, neighbour —?

Let's go to bed, neighbour. It's already late.

They sigh and go out, one of them coughing and the other's crutches clattering on the floor.

Let's go! Let's go!

God grant them happiness. They are 25 such good neighbours.

God grant they may always be healthy and cheerful, and love each other, and that no ugly black cat may ever run between them.

And that the young man may find work. It is bad when a man has no work.

They withdraw, and immediately the WIFE OF MAN enters, very beautiful, graceful, tender, and delicate, with flowers in her splendid, half-dishvelled hair. She is very sad. She seats herself in a chair and, laying her hands on her knees, speaks sorrowfully, her face toward the audience:

I have just been to town and have been 40 hunting. I don't know what I was hunting for. We are so poor. We have nothing. It is very hard for us to live. We need money, but I don't know how to get it. If you ask it of people, they won't 45 give it; and I haven't the strength to take it from them. I was hunting for work, but no one gave me any work. They all said to me: "There are so many people and so little work." I kept my eyes on the 50 road, thinking perhaps some rich people might have dropped a purse, but either they did not drop one or some one more fortunate than I had already picked it up. And I am so sad. You see my husband will soon come back from his hunt for work, tired out and hungry, and what can 5 I give him except my kisses? He cannot satisfy his hunger with kisses, can he? I feel so sad. I'd like to cry.

I can go without eating for a long time. I don't mind it. But he cannot. He has a large body which demands nourishment, and when he has not eaten for some time he becomes pitifully pale, and sick, and irritable. He scolds me, but afterward he kisses me and asks me not to be angry. But I never get angry, because I love him so. I am only sad.

My husband is a very talented architect; I even think he is a genius. His parents died very early and left him an orphan. 20 For some time after the death of his parents his relatives supported him, but, since he was always very independent in character and brusque, and often said unpleasant things, and did not express his gratitude, they cast him off. But he continued to study, supporting himself by giving lessons, and often going hungry. And so he finished his course in the university. He was often hungry, my poor 30 husband. Now he is an architect and makes designs of beautiful buildings, but no one will buy them, and lots of stupid folks even laugh at them. In order to get on one must have either a patron or a stroke of good fortune. But he has neither patron nor good fortune. He goes about, hunting for some opportunity or, perhaps, looking on the ground for money as I did. He is still very young and is simple as a 40 child.

Of course, fortune will come to us sometime, but when? Meanwhile, it is very hard to keep alive. When we were married we had a little dowry, but we quickly used it up. We always went to the theatre and ate candy. He still is hopeful, but I sometimes lose all hope and weep by myself. My heart sinks when I think that he may be here at any moment and again 50 find nothing except my poor kisses.

O God, be a kind and merciful father to us! Thou hast so much of everything — bread and work and money. Thy earth is so rich. It bears fruits and grain in the fields and covers the meadows with flowers. From its dark depths it yields up gold and beautiful precious stones. And thy sun is so warm, and there is so much quiet joy in thy pensive stars. Give us a little bread from thy bounty — even a very little — only so much as thou givest thy birds, that my dear, good husband may not be hungry; a little warmth, that he may not be cold, and a little work, that he may proudly hold up his beautiful head. And pray do not be angry with my husband because he scolds and laughs, or even sings and makes me dance. He is so young and so light-hearted.

Now that I have prayed I feel better and again I have hope.

Really, why should God not give when we pray like this? I will go out and hunt a little. Perhaps some one has dropped a purse or a sparkling diamond.

(She goes out.)

THE BEING IN GREY. She does not know that her wish is already fulfilled. She does not know that this morning two men, in a costly house, bending over a design of Man's, eagerly scanned it and were delighted with it. All day they have been hunting in vain for Man. Wealth has been seeking him, as he is seeking wealth, and to-morrow morning, when the neighbours go away to work, an automobile will come to the house and two gentlemen, bowing low, will enter the bare room and bring wealth and fame. But they do not know this — neither he nor she. Thus fortune and happiness come to Man, and thus they leave him.

MAN and his WIFE enter. MAN has a handsome, proud head, with flashing eyes and high forehead. His dark brows divide above his nose and spread like two bold wings. His wavy, black hair is carelessly thrown back. His low, soft, white collar displays a shapely neck and part of his chest. His movements are light and swift like those of a young animal, but the attitudes he takes are peculiar to MAN alone; they are masterful, free, and proud.

MAN. Again nothing. Pretty soon I shall go to bed and lie there all day long. The people that need me can come and find me. I shall not go to find them. To-morrow I am going to lie abed.

WIFE. Are you tired?

MAN. Yes, I am tired and hungry. Like Homer's hero, I could eat a whole bull, and here I have to be satisfied with a crust of stale bread. Do you know that a man cannot always live on bread alone? I want to gnaw, tear, bite!

WIFE. I am so sorry for you, dear.

MAN. Yes, I am sorry for myself, but that doesn't satisfy my hunger. To-day I stood for a whole hour in front of a lunch-room and gazed on the chickens and the tarts and the sausages, just as people view works of art. And oh, the signs! They can paint ham so exquisitely that one could eat it, iron and all.

WIFE. I like ham, too.

MAN. Is there anybody who doesn't like ham? Do you like lobsters?

WIFE. Yes, I do.

MAN. Oh, what a lobster I saw! Though he was only a painted lobster, he was more handsome than a live one. Red as a cardinal, majestic, severe. One might kneel to him for a blessing. I think that I could eat two such cardinals and a carp thrown in.

WIFE. (Sadly.) Didn't you notice my flowers?

MAN. Flowers! Can you eat flowers?

WIFE. You don't love me.

MAN kisses her.

MAN. Forgive me, but really I am so hungry. See how my hands shake. I haven't strength enough to throw a stone at a dog.

WIFE kisses his hand.

WIFE. Poor dear!

MAN. How did these leaves come to be on the floor? How sweet they smell! Did you put them there, too?

WIFE. No; probably it was our neighbours.

MAN. Our neighbours are dear people. Strange that with so many good people in the world a man can die of hunger. Why is it?

WIFE. You have become gloomy; you frown. Do you see anything?

MAN. Yes, before me, across my humorous fancies, a hideous image of poverty glided stealthily and rose up yonder in the corner. Do you see her? The pitiful, outstretched hands — like those of a child lost in the woods — the voice appealing to the silence of the human desert: "Help me!" No one hears. "Help me, I am dying!" No one hears. Look, Wife, look! Look! The black shadows, trembling, float apart like wraiths of black smoke from the long, dreadful chimney that leads down to hell. Look! I, too, am in the midst of them!

WIFE. You terrify me. I cannot look in that dark corner. Did you see all this on the street?

MAN. Yes, I saw it all on the street, and soon it will be here.

WIFE. No, God will not let it come to us.

MAN. Why does he let it come to others?

WIFE. We are better than others. We are good people. We do not anger him in any way.

MAN. Do you think so? But I often scold.

WIFE. You are not wicked.

MAN. Yes, I am wicked, I am wicked. When I walk along the street and look at the things that are not ours, I grow boar's tusks. Oh, how much money there is that is not mine! Listen, my dear little Wife. This evening I was walking in the park, in that lovely park where the roads are straight as arrows and the beautiful beech-trees are like crowned kings —

WIFE. And I was walking along the city streets, where there were stores and stores, such beautiful stores —

MAN. Well-dressed people with canes passed me, and I thought: "I have none of that."

WIFE. Handsomely gowned women in well-fitting boots which make the foot charming, in rustling silk skirts, and in elegant hats from beneath which their eyes sparkled mysteriously, passed by me, and I thought: "I have no fine hat, I have no silk skirt."

MAN. One awkward fellow shouldered me aside, but I showed him my tusks and he slunk cowardly behind the others.

WIFE. A finely dressed lady jostled me, but I was so embarrassed that I did not even look at her.

MAN. Riders swept by me on proud and fiery horses, but I have no horse.

WIFE. And such diamonds were in her ears! I wanted to kiss them.

MAN. Red and green automobiles glided by noiselessly like phantoms with blazing eyes, and people were sitting in them laughing and listlessly glancing from side to side, but I have no automobile.

WIFE. And I have neither diamonds nor emeralds — not even a pure white pearl.

MAN. On the shore of the lake glittered a luxurious restaurant with lights like the kingdom of heaven, and people were eating there. There were high officials in dress suits, and angels with white wings who distributed beer and bread and butter, and people were eating and drinking. Oh, I want to eat, little Wife, I want to eat!

WIFE. My dear boy, if you keep running about you will increase your hunger. Come, sit down, and I will sit on your knees. Now, take a paper and draw a beautiful, beautiful building.

MAN. But my genius is hungry, too, and it won't sketch anything but edible landscapes. For a long time my palaces have looked like big dumplings stuffed with fat and my churches like sausages. But there are tears in your eyes. What is the matter, little Wife?

WIFE. I am sad because I cannot help you.

MAN. You make me ashamed. Though I am a strong man, intelligent, talented, and healthy, I can do nothing, while my little wife, my fairy, weeps because she is not strong enough to help me. When woman weeps, man is disgraced. I am ashamed of myself.

WIFE. You are not to blame if people cannot appreciate you.

MAN. I am blushing to the tips of my ears. I feel like a child whose ears have been pulled. You, too, are hungry, and I, selfish creature that I am, had not noticed it. I'm a brute.

WIFE. But, my dear, I am not hungry.

MAN. It is disgraceful, cowardly. That rude fellow who jostled me was right. He saw that I was nothing but a fat pig, a boar with sharp tusks and a stupid head.

WIFE. If you are going to scold yourself so unfairly. I shall begin to cry again.

MAN. No, no. Don't cry. When I see tears in your eyes I am always terrified. I am afraid of those bright crystal drops. It is as if they were shed not by you but by some one else, some frightful being. I won't let you cry. True, we have nothing, we are miserably poor; but I will tell you what we are going to have. I will charm you with a beautiful story. I will enwreath you, my queen, with rose-coloured dreams.

WIFE. You need not fear. You are strong and talented and you will succeed. The moment of depression will pass, and a divine inspiration will again throw its halo over your proud head.

MAN. (Assumes an attitude of bold and proud defiance, and, throwing an oak spray into the corner where the UNKNOWN stands, he cries.) Ho, you, whatever your name may be — Destiny, the Devil, Life — I throw down the gauntlet to you. I challenge you to battle. The faint-hearted bend their knees before your mysterious power. Your stony face fills them with horror. In your silence they hear the coming to birth of misfortune and its ominous approach. But I am bold and strong, and I challenge you to battle. Let our swords flash, let our shields ring, let the blows fall on our heads — blows that will shake the earth. Come forth to battle!

WIFE. (Approaching and standing close behind his left shoulder, speaks earnestly.) Bolder, my dear, still bolder!

MAN. To your inertness, sinister being, I oppose my bold, living strength. To your gloom I oppose my clear and ringing laughter. Parry the blows! Against your stony face, in which there is no light of reason, I hurl the projectile of my glowing thought. You have a heart of stone that knows no pity. Stand aside! or I will pour into it the seething poison of rebellion. The black cloud of your fierce wrath has darkened the sun. We will light up the darkness with our swords. Ho! Parry the blows!

WIFE. Bolder, still bolder! Behind you stands your armour-bearer, my proud knight.

MAN. If I conquer, I shall sing songs which all the world will echo; and if I fall dumbly under your blows, then I shall think only of how I may rise again and rush to battle. There are weak spots in my armour, I know, but, though covered with wounds and dripping with crimson blood, I shall yet gather strength to cry: "You have not yet conquered, malicious enemy of mankind!"

WIFE. Bolder, my knight! I will wash your wounds with my tears. With my kisses I will stanch the flow of your crimson blood.

MAN. And dying on the field of battle as brave men do, I shall mar your brute pleasure with one last cry: "I have conquered!" I have conquered, malicious foe, for with my last breath I shall refuse to acknowledge your supremacy.

WIFE. Bolder, my knight, bolder! I will die with you.

MAN. Ho! Come forth to battle! Let our swords flash, let out shields ring, let the blows fall on our heads, blows that will shake the earth. Ho! Come forth!

For some time MAN and his WIFE remain in the same attitudes, and then they turn to each other and kiss.

MAN. Thus we shall share life together, my little Wife, shall we not? Let life blink like an owl blinded by the sunshine, we will force her to smile.

WIFE. And to dance to our songs — we two together!

MAN. We two. You are a good wife and a faithful friend. You are a brave little woman, and as long as you and I are together nothing can terrify us. What is poverty? To-day we are poor, and to-morrow we are rich.

WIFE. And what is hunger? To-day we are hungry, to-morrow we are filled.

MAN. Oh, you think so, do you? Perhaps, but it will take a great deal to fill me. My hunger isn't easily satisfied. Do you think this will be plenty? In the morning, tea, coffee, chocolate — take your choice — and then, after that, breakfast — three courses — then lunch; then dinner, then —

WIFE. Lots of fruit. I am so fond of fruit.

MAN. All right. I will buy it in baskets in the market. It is cheaper there and fresher; though, to be sure, we shall have our own orchard.

WIFE. But we have no land.

MAN. I'll buy some. For a long time I have wanted a little plot of my own, and, by the way, I'll build a house on it after my own design. I'll show the rascals what sort of architect I am!

WIFE. I want to live in Italy, right by the sea, in a white-marble villa set in a grove of lemon-trees and cypresses; and I'd like some white-marble steps leading straight down to the blue water.

MAN. I see. Good! But besides that I mean to build a castle in Norway among the mountains: far below, the fiord; high up on the steep cliff, the castle. — Haven't we any paper? No matter, the wall will do. Here is the fiord. Do you see it?

WIFE. Yes — how lovely!

MAN. The water is sparkling and deep. Here it reflects the tender, green grass and there the red and black and brown stone. And see, here in the opening, right where this spot is, a touch of deep-blue sky and a quiet, white cloud —

WIFE. Look! A white boat is reflected in the water. It is like two white swans, breast to breast.

MAN. And see, here the mountain rises from the cheerful green meadows and forests, and, as it mounts, becomes more and more gloomy, more and more severe. There are sharp cliffs, black shadows, precipices, ragged clouds —

WIFE. It is like a ruined fortress.

MAN. And see, on this fortress, right on this spot here in the centre, I will build a castle fit for an emperor.

WIFE. How cold it is there, and how the wind blows!

MAN. Oh, but I'll have thick stone walls, and there will be huge windows of one large pane, and on winter nights, when the blizzard rages and the fiord is roaring below, we will draw the curtains and kindle a fire in the huge fireplace. There will be great andirons on which will burn whole logs — whole forests of pitchy pine.

5 WIFE. Oh! How warm!

MAN. And see, how still! Everywhere rugs, and lots and lots of books which radiate silent yet living warmth and comfort, and we two together. Outside 10 roars the storm, but here we are together in front of the fireplace on a white bear's skin. You say, "Shall we take a peek at what's going on outside?" and I say, "Very well," and we go to the largest 15 window and draw the curtain. Heavens! What's that?

WIFE. Whirling snow!

MAN. It sweeps by like white horses. Look, myriads of little frightened spirits, 20 white with terror, seeking refuge from the night! And the whistling and the roaring —

WIFE. Oh, it's cold! I am shivering.

MAN. Quick! Back to the fire. Here, give me my ancestral beaker. No, not that one, the gold one that the vikings drank from. Fill it with golden wine — more — let the fiery liquid rise to the very brim. There's a chamois roasting on the spit. Bring it here; I will eat it. Quick, or I will eat you instead! I'm starved! I'm hungry as the devil!

WIFE. There, now; they've brought it. What are you going to do next?

MAN. What next? Why, eat it, of course. What else could be next? But what are you doing with my head, little Wife?

WIFE. I am the Goddess of Fame. I have twined for you a wreath of the oak leaves which our neighbours strewed, and I am crowning you. Fame has come — glorious fame!

(She puts the wreath on his head.)

MAN. Yes, fame, loud-voiced, echoing fame. Look at the wall. See, here I go, and do you know who is by my side?

WIFE. Why, that's me.

MAN. See, people are bowing to us. They are whispering about us. They are pointing at us. See that respectable-looking old gentleman who falls a-weeping and says: "Blessed is our native land to have such children!" See that pale young man who is looking at us. Fame has smiled upon him, also. By this time I have built the People's Palace of which our whole country is so proud.

WIFE. You are my glorious hero! The oak wreath becomes you, but a laurel wreath would be even better.

MAN. Look! look! Here are representatives of the city where I was born coming to me. They bow low and say: "Our city is proud of the honour —"

WIFE. Oh!

MAN. What's the matter?

WIFE. I have found a bottle of milk!

MAN. Impossible!

WIFE. And bread — soft, fragrant bread — and a cigar!

MAN. Impossible! You have made a mistake. What you think is milk is only the dampness from this accursed wall.

WIFE. No, indeed!

MAN. A cigar! Cigars don't grow on window-sills. They sell them at ridiculously high prices in the stores. This is probably just a black, broken twig.

WIFE. But, do look! Ah, now I understand! Our dear neighbours brought it.

MAN. Neighbours! Upon my word, they are angels. And even if the devil himself had brought these things — bring them here quick, my little Wife. (The Wife of Man sits on his knees and they eat, she breaking the pieces of bread and putting them in his mouth while he gives her milk from the bottle.) It looks like cream.

WIFE. No, it's milk. Chew your bread more slowly or you'll choke yourself.

MAN. Give me the crust. It is so nicely browned.

WIFE. There, didn't I tell you you would choke yourself?

MAN. It's all right: got it down.

WIFE. The milk's running down my neck and my chin — oh, it tickles!

MAN. Here, let me drink it up. (He drinks it off her neck and chin.) We mustn't waste a drop.

WIFE. What a mischief you are!

MAN. There, everything's eaten up. That was quick work. Everything that is good comes soon to an end. This bottle must have a double bottom. To look at it, you would think it was deeper. What cheats these bottle makers are! (He lights the cigar, and assumes an attitude of supreme contentment. She ties the rose-coloured ribbon in her hair, using the black window for a mirror.) This seems to be an expensive cigar. It is very fragrant and strong. I am always going to smoke that kind.

WIFE. You're not looking at me.

MAN. Yes, I am. I see everything. I see the ribbon, and I see that you want me to kiss your throat.

WIFE. I won't let you, you silly man.

MAN. You can smoke your cigar if you like, but as for my throat —

MAN. What, isn't it mine? The deuce! That is a violation of property rights. (She runs away. He catches her and kisses her.) There, the right is restored, and now, my little Wife, dance for me. Just imagine that this is a magnificent, luxurious, astounding, miraculously beautiful palace.

WIFE. I've imagined it.

MAN. Now imagine that you are the queen of the ball.

WIFE. It's done.

MAN. And that marquises and counts and lord mayors are asking you to dance with them, but you decline them all and select the — what do you call him — the fellow in tights? Oh, yes, the prince. Why! What's the matter?

WIFE. I don't like princes.

MAN. Oh, that's it! Well, what sort do you like?

WIFE. I like talented artists.

MAN. Good! Here's your artist. Oh, heavens! Look at you there flirting with empty space! Oh, woman!

WIFE. But I was just imagining.

MAN. Oh, all right. Now imagine a wonderful orchestra. See, here's a big Turkish drum — boom, boom, boom!

(He pounds his fist on the table in imitation of a drum.)

WIFE. My dear, it is only in a circus that they call the crowd together with a drum; in a palace —

MAN. Oh, the deuce! Stop the picture. Now imagine again. Listen! The singing violins are pouring forth their melody, and here sounds the tender voice of a flute.

Listen! The fat bass viol is booming like a beetle — (MAN, wearing the oak wreath, sits and strikes up the tune of the dance, beating time with the palms of his hands. The tune is the same as that which is played in the following act, at the ball of MAN. The WIFE dances gracefully.) Ah, my little gazelle!

WIFE. I am the queen of the ball.

The song and dance become more and more lively. Presently MAN gets up, begins to dance where he stands, and finally seizes his WIFE and dances with her, the oak wreath slipping to one side.

The BEING IN GREY watches them with indifference, holding in his stony hand the brightly blazing candle.

Curtain.

ACT IV

MISFORTUNE

A large, rectangular room of a gloomy aspect. The walls, ceiling, and floor are smooth and dark. In the rear wall are two tall, eight-paned, curtainless windows, between which is a low door. Two similar windows are in the right wall. Night is looking in at the windows, and when the door is open the same deep blackness peers quickly into the room. In general, however much light there may be in the rooms of MAN, the large, dark windows seem to devour it.

The left wall is pierced by a single low door leading into the inner apartments. Against this wall stands a broad divan covered with dark cloth. At the window on the right is the work-table of MAN, very plain and cheap. On it is a dimly burning lamp with a dark shade, under which a design spread out on the table makes a yellow square. On the table also are a child's toys — a little soldier cap, a wooden horse without a tail, and a red, long-nosed clown with bells. Against the wall between the windows is a shabby old bookcase, entirely empty. On the shelves can be seen streaks of dust, showing that the books have been recently removed. There is but one chair.

In a corner darker than the other corners stands the BEING IN GREY, called HE. The candle in his hand is no higher than it is broad. It is only a stub and is beginning to flatten out as it melts. It burns with a reddish, flickering light and casts red spots upon the BEING's stony face and chin.

MAN's only servant, an OLD WOMAN, is seated in the chair. She speaks in a monotonous voice, addressing an imaginary companion:

MAN is poor again. He had many valuable things — horses, and carriages, and even an automobile — but everything is gone now, and of all his servants I alone am left. In this room and in two others there are still some fine things, like the divan there and the bookcase, but in the remaining twelve rooms there is nothing. They stand empty and dark. Day and night the rats run about in them and fight and shriek. People are afraid of the rats, but I am not. It's all the same to me.

For a long time an iron plate has been hanging at the carriage entrance with a notice that the house is for sale, but nobody buys. The plate is rusty and the letters on it are worn away by the rains, but no one comes and no one buys. No one has use for the old house. But perhaps some one will buy some day. Then we shall go and hunt for another place, and the new place will seem very strange. My mistress will begin to weep, and perhaps even the old gentleman will weep. But not I. It's all the same to me.

You wonder where the wealth has gone? I don't know. Perhaps you are surprised at that, but, you see, all my life I have worked in private families and I frequently have seen their money disappear quietly through some crevice or other. So it was with this family. At first there was much; then there was less; then nothing at all. Customers used to come and give orders, and then they stopped coming. Once I asked the lady why this was so, and she answered: "They cease to like what they used to like. They cease to love what they used to love." I asked: "How can it be that people cease to like a thing when once they have come to like it?" She did not answer and began to cry. But I didn't. It's all the same to me. It's all the same to me.

As long as they pay me, I will live with them. If they stop paying, I will go somewhere else and live with others. I have cooked for them; when I leave, I shall cook for others; and, after a while, I'll stop entirely; for I shall be old and my eyesight poor. Then they will drive me away and say: "Go where you like. We will hire some one else." But what of that? I'll go. It's all the same to me.

People are surprised at me. They say it is frightful to live here; that it is frightful to sit evenings with only the wind whistling in the chimney and the rats shrieking and gnawing.

I don't know; perhaps it is frightful, only I don't think about it. Why should I? They sit quietly and look at each other and listen to the wind, and I sit by myself alone in the kitchen and also listen to the wind. Isn't it the same wind that whistles in our ears? Young people used to come and visit their son, and then they would all laugh and sing and go into the empty rooms and chase away the rats. But no one comes to me and I sit alone, all alone. There is no one to talk with, so I talk to myself. It's all the same to me.

And so they are in straits. Three days ago another misfortune came. The young gentleman went out for a walk. He put his hat on one side of his head and smoothed back his hair, as young men do. But a wicked man threw a stone at him from behind a corner and cracked his skull like a nut. They brought him home and laid him down, and he is lying there now, dying—or perhaps he will live. Who knows? The master and the mistress wept, and then they took all the books and loaded them on a dray and sold them; and now they have hired a nurse with the money and bought medicine. They even bought some grapes. So the books were of some use after all. However, he can't eat the grapes. He can't even look at them. So they lie there by him on a plate—just lie there.

DOCTOR enters by the outside door. He is gloomy and much worried.

DOCTOR. Am I in the right house? Do you know, old lady? I am the doctor. I make many calls and often I go to the wrong place. They call me here, they call me there; but all the houses look alike and the people are tiresome in all of them. Is this the right place?

OLD WOMAN. I don't know.

DOCTOR. Just let me look in my notebook. Is there a child here with sore throat—choking?

OLD WOMAN. No.

DOCTOR. Young man choking on a bone?

OLD WOMAN. No.

DOCTOR. Man here who suddenly went crazy from poverty and killed his wife and two children with an axe? There ought to be four in all.

OLD WOMAN. No.

DOCTOR. Young girl whose heart has stopped beating? Don't lie to me, old woman. I think she is here.

OLD WOMAN. No.

DOCTOR. No? I believe you. You seem to speak sincerely. Have you a young man whose skull was broken with a stone and who is dying?

OLD WOMAN. Yes. Go through that door at the left into the next room; but don't go farther, or the rats will eat you.

DOCTOR. Very well. They're always ringing my door-bell, day and night. See, it's night now. The street lights are all put out, but I am still on the go. I often make mistakes, old woman.

He goes out through the door which leads to the inner part of the house.

OLD WOMAN. One doctor attended him but didn't cure him, and now there is another, and probably he won't cure him, either. But what's the odds? Their son will die and we shall be left alone in the house. I shall sit in the kitchen and talk to myself, and they will sit in this room in silence, thinking, and there will be one more room for the rats to run and fight in. Let them run and fight. It's all the same to me. It's all the same to me.

You ask me why the wicked man hit the young master? I don't know. How should I know why people kill one another?

One threw a stone from behind a corner and ran away, and the other fell down, and now he is dying. That's all I know. They say that our young master was kind and brave and always took the part of the wretched. I don't know. It's all the same to me. Good or bad, young or old, alive or dead, it's all the same to me. It's all the same to me.

As long as they pay me, I'll stay. If they stop paying, I'll go somewhere else and cook for others; and after a while I'll stop entirely; for I shall be old, and my eyesight poor, and I shan't be able to tell salt from sugar. Then they will drive me away, and say: "Go where you like. We will hire some one else." But what of that? I'll go. It's all the same to me. Here or there or nowhere — it's all the same to me, all the same to me.

Enter DOCTOR, MAN, and his WIFE. MAN and his WIFE have perceptibly aged, and are entirely grey. MAN's long hair, rising high above his head, and his large beard make his head resemble that of a lion. Though he walks slightly bent, he holds his head erect and looks out sternly and resolutely from beneath his grey brows. When he looks at anything near, he puts on large spectacles with silver rims.

DOCTOR. Your son has fallen into a sound sleep. Don't wake him up. Perhaps the sleep will do him good. You go to sleep, too. If a man has time to sleep, he ought to sleep, and not to walk about and talk.

WIFE. Thank you, doctor. You have so reassured us. Will you not come again to-morrow?

DOCTOR. I will come to-morrow and the day after to-morrow. You go to sleep, too, old woman. It's already night and time for every one to sleep. Do I go through this door? I frequently make mistakes.

He goes out. The OLD WOMAN also goes out. MAN and his WIFE remain.

MAN. See, Wife, here is a design I began before our son was hurt. When I had drawn this line I stopped and said to myself: "After I have rested a little I will go to work again." How simple a line it is; how quiet and yet how frightful! Perhaps it is the last that I shall draw while our son is alive. How calm, how simple it is, and yet how full of foreboding!

WIFE. Don't worry, my dear. Dismiss these apprehensions. I believe that the doctor told the truth and that our son will recover.

MAN. But are you not worried? Look at yourself in the mirror. You are as white as your hair, my dear companion.

WIFE. Of course I am a little anxious; still I am sure there is no danger.

MAN. My poor armour-bearer! Steadfast guardian of my blunted sword! Now, as always, you beguile and cheer me by your sincerity and devotion. Your old knight is now broken and his withered hand cannot long hold his weapon. But what is this? Our son's toys! Who put them here?

WIFE. My dear, you forget. You put them here yourself some time ago. You said then that you could work better with these simple child's toys lying before you.

MAN. Oh, yes; I had forgotten. But now they are like instruments of torture and execution to a man condemned to death. When a child dies, his toys become a curse to the living. Oh, Wife, Wife! The very sight of them is terrible!

WIFE. We bought them when we were poor. It saddens me to look at them. Poor, dear toys!

MAN. I cannot bear it. I must take them in my hands. See, here is the horse with the broken tail. "Gid-ap, gid-ap, horsie! Where are you galloping?" "Far, papa, far away into the fields and the green woods." "Take me with you, horsie." "Gid-ap, gid-ap! Climb on, dear papa —" And here's the soldier's cap made of paste-board. Poor little cap, which I myself tried on laughingly when I bought it in the shop: "Who are you?" "I am a knight, papa. I am the strongest, bravest knight that ever was." "Where are you going, my little knight?" "I am going to kill the dragon, dear papa. I am going to free the captives, papa." "Ride on, ride on, my little knight!" (The WIFE of MAN weeps.) And see, here is our clown, just as he always looked, with his dear, stupid grin. He is as tattered as if he had been through a hundred fights, but he is still laughing and his nose is as red as ever. Come, ring your bells, my friend, as you used to ring them. You can't? Only one bell left, you say? Well, then, I'll throw you on the floor. (He throws the toy down.)

WIFE. What are you doing? Remember how often our child has kissed his funny little face.

MAN. Yes, I was wrong. Forgive me, my dear, and you, little toy, forgive me, too. (He picks up the toy, bending his knees with difficulty.) Still smiling! Come, I will lay you a little farther away. Don't be angry; I cannot look at your smile just now. Go and smile somewhere else.

WIFE. Your words wring my heart. Believe me, our son will recover. Would it be just for the young to die before the old?

MAN. Where have you ever seen justice in this world, Wife?

WIFE. My beloved, I beg you, kneel with me in prayer to God.

MAN. It is hard for my old knees to bend.

WIFE. Bend them — it is your duty.

MAN. God will not hear me, for never yet have I troubled his ear either with praise or with petition. Do you pray; you are the mother.

WIFE. No, you must pray; you are the father. If a father doesn't pray for his son, who will? To whose hands will you commit him? Could I speak alone as we two can speak together?

MAN. Let it be as you say. Perhaps, if I bend my aged knees, eternal justice will answer.

They both fall on their knees, their faces turned toward the corner where the UNKNOWN stands motionless, and their hands folded on their breasts in attitude of prayer.

PRAYER OF THE MOTHER

O God, I beseech you, let my son live. That is all I know, that is all I can say — only this one thing: "God, let my son live." I cannot frame other words. All about me is dark. All is falling away. I understand nothing, and my soul is so filled with horror, O Lord, that I can say only one thing. O God, let my son live, let my son live! Let him live! Forgive me for uttering so poor a prayer, but I cannot do otherwise, O Lord; you know I cannot. Look upon me, only look upon me. Do you see, do you see how my head trembles? Do you see how my hands shake? And what are my hands, O Lord? Have mercy upon him! He is so young. He has a birthmark on his right arm. Let him live, if only a little while, only a little while! He is only a child, and so innocent. He still loves sweets, and I bought him some grapes. Have mercy, have mercy!

She weeps silently, covering her face with her hands. Without looking at her MAN speaks.

PRAYER OF THE FATHER

See, I am praying to you. I have bent my aged knees. I have fallen in the dust before you. See, I kiss the earth. Perhaps I have sometimes offended you. In that case, pardon me, pardon me. It is true that I have been presumptuous and overbold, that I have demanded instead of beseeching, and that I have often reproached you for your acts. Pardon me. If you desire, if such is your will, punish me. Only spare my son; spare him, I pray you. I do not beg for mercy or for pity; no, I beg only for justice. You are old and I, too, as you see, am old. You will understand my prayer the better for that. Wicked people tried to kill him, people who by their evil deeds insult you and pollute the earth — malicious, brutal, villainous people, who throw stones from behind corners — from behind corners, the villains! Let not this wicked thing be done. Stanch his blood. Bring back his life, bring back life to my fine boy. You have taken everything from me, but have I ever importuned you? Have I said, Restore my wealth, restore my friends, restore my genius? No, never. I never asked you even for my genius, and you know what genius means — how it is more to one than life itself. It is the will of fate, I thought, and I bore everything, I bore everything, I bore it proudly. But now, on my knees in the dust, kissing the earth, I beg of you, bring back life to my son. I kiss the earth.

They rise. The BEING called HE listens with indifference to the prayer of the father and the mother.

WIFE. I fear that your prayer, my dear, was not sufficiently humble. There seemed to be a note of pride in it.

MAN. No, no, Wife. I said what was right, just as a man should speak. Should

He love cringing flatterers more than bold, proud people who speak the truth? No, Wife, you don't understand. Now I have faith, now I am calm, even cheerful. I feel that I am still of some service to my son, and that heartens me. See whether he is sleeping. He ought to be sleeping soundly.

The WIFE goes out. MAN casts a friendly glance into the corner where the BEING IN GREY stands. He takes up the toy clown, plays with it, and gently kisses its long, red, nose. At this moment the WIFE comes in and MAN, somewhat embarrassed, says: "I offended this poor fool, but now I have begged pardon for everything. Well, how is our dear son?"

WIFE. He is very pale.

MAN. That's nothing. It will pass. He has lost a great deal of blood.

WIFE. His pale, shaved head is so pitiful to see. He had such beautiful golden curls.

MAN. They cut them off in order to wash the wound. But never mind, Wife, never mind. They will grow out still finer. Did you gather them up? They must be gathered up and preserved. His precious blood is on them, Wife.

WIFE. Yes, I have laid them away in the jewel box, all that is left of our wealth.

MAN. Do not lament the loss of our wealth. Wait until our son begins to work. He will win back all that we have lost. Now I am cheerful, my dear, I have faith in our future. Do you remember our poor rose-tinted room? The good neighbours strewed oak leaves about it, and you made a wreath for my head and said I was a genius.

WIFE. And I say it even now, my dear. If other people have ceased to value you, I have not.

MAN. No, my dear little Wife, you are wrong. The creations of genius live longer than this wretched old garment that we call our body, but even during my lifetime my works are —

WIFE. No, they are not dead and will never die. Recall the house on the corner which you built ten years ago. Every evening at sunset you go to look at it. Is there in the whole city a building more beautiful, more meaningful?

MAN. True. I so built it that the last rays of the setting sun might fall upon it and set its windows ablaze. After the whole city is in darkness, my building is still bidding farewell to the sun. That was work well done, and perhaps it will outlive me, if only a little. Don't you think so?

WIFE. Of course it will, my dear.

MAN. One thing grieves me, Wife. Why am I so soon forgotten? I might have been remembered a little longer, my dear, a little longer.

WIFE. People forget what they once knew. They cease to love what they once loved.

MAN. They might have remembered me somewhat longer, somewhat longer.

WIFE. I saw a young artist near the house. He was studying the building carefully and was making a sketch of it in his note-book.

MAN. Why did you not tell me of that, my dear? That is significant, very significant. It means that my thoughts will pass on to others, and even though I am forgotten, yet my thoughts will live on. That is very important, extremely important.

WIFE. They have certainly not forgotten you, my dear. Think of the young man who bowed to you so respectfully on the street.

MAN. True, Wife. A fine young man, very. He had a glorious young face. It is well that you remind me of this. It has filled my soul with sunshine. But I feel sleepy. I am probably tired. Yes; and I am old. My grey little Wife, do you see that I am old?

WIFE. You are still as handsome as ever.

MAN. And my eyes shine?

WIFE. Yes, your eyes shine.

MAN. And my hair is black as pitch?

WIFE. It is as white as snow, which is even more handsome.

MAN. And I have no wrinkles?

WIFE. There are a few little wrinkles, but —

MAN. Of course. I know that I am a handsome fellow. To-morrow I will buy a uniform and enter the light brigade. Won't that be fine?

WIFE. (Smiling.) Now you are joking as you used. Well, lie down, my dear, and take a short nap and I will go to our son. Rest quietly; I will not leave him until he wakes, and then I will call you. You don't like to kiss my wrinkled old hand, do you?

MAN. Nonsense! You are the most beautiful woman in the world.

WIFE. But the wrinkles?

MAN. Wrinkles? I see a dear, kind, good, intelligent face; nothing more. 15 Don't be angry with me for my harshness. Go to our son. Guard him. Sit by him like a quiet shadow of tenderness and comfort. And if he grows restless in his sleep, sing him a little song as of old. And set 20 the grapes nearer so that he can reach them.

The WIFE goes out. MAN lies on the lounge with his head toward the corner where the BEING IN GREY stands motionless. 25 MAN'S position is such that the hand of the BEING almost touches his grey, dishevelled hair. He quickly falls asleep.

THE BEING IN GREY. Man, flattered by his hopes, has fallen into a deep and 30 grateful sleep. His breathing is as quiet as a child's, and his aged heart, resting from its sufferings, beats calmly and evenly. He does not know that in a few moments his son will die. And, as he 35 sleeps, in his mysterious fancies an impossible happiness rises before him.

He dreams that he is riding with his son in a white boat over a beautiful, smooth river. He dreams that it is a beautiful day 40 and that he sees the blue sky and the transparent, crystal water. He hears the reeds rustle as they part before the boat. He is filled with joy and he fancies that he is blessed. All his emotions are deceiving 45 him.

But suddenly he becomes restless. The terrible truth, penetrating the dense veil of his dreams, has seared his thought.

"Why is your golden hair cut so short, 50 my boy; why is it?"

"My head ached, father, and that is why my hair was cut so short."

And again deceived, Man is happy and sees the blue sky and hears the reeds rustling as they part.

He does not know that his son is already 5 dying. He does not hear how in a last wild hope, with childish faith in the power of older persons, his son calls him, without words, with the cry of his heart, "Papa, papa, I am dying! I am slipping away! 10 Hold me!" Man's sleep is deep and joyous, and in his mysterious and deceiving visions an impossible happiness rises before him.

Awake, Man! Your son is dead!

MAN. (Terrified, raises his head and gets up.) Ah! Did some one call me?

At the same moment the weeping of many women is heard in the next room. With high-pitched voices they are uttering long-drawn-out lamentation over the dead. Enter 20 the WIFE, pale as death.

MAN. Is our son dead?

WIFE. Yes, he is dead.

MAN. Did he call me?

WIFE. No, he did not wake. He called no one. He is dead, my son, my precious child!

She falls on her knees before MAN and sobs, throwing her arms about his knees. MAN places his hand upon her head, and, in a voice choked with sobs but threatening, he speaks, his face toward the corner where the BEING IN GREY stands, indifferent.

MAN. You have offended a woman, 35 villain! You have killed our boy. (The WIFE sobs. MAN with trembling hand quietly smooths her hair.) Don't weep, my dear, don't weep. He will laugh at our tears, as he laughed at our prayers. But you (I know not who you are, God, the Devil, Fate, or Life) — I curse you.

He speaks the following with a loud, strong voice, with one hand held over his wife, as if to defend her, the other threateningly ex- 45 tended toward the UNKNOWN.

THE CURSE OF MAN

I curse all that you have given me! I curse the day on which I was born! I curse the day on which I shall die! I curse my whole life, my joys, and my grief! I curse myself! I curse my eyes, my ears, my tongue! I curse my heart, my head! And I hurl all back into your cruel face, senseless Fate! Be accursed, be accursed for ever! Through my curse I rise victorious above you. What more can you do to me? Hurl me upon the ground, yes, hurl me down! I shall only laugh and cry out, "Be accursed!" Fetter my lips with the clamps of death, and my last thought shall be a cry into your ass's ears, "Be accursed, be accursed!" Seize upon my corpse, gnaw it like a dog, worry it in the darkness, — I am not within it. I have vanished and, vanishing, I repeat the curse, "Be accursed, be accursed!" Over the head of the woman whom you have offended, over the body of the boy whom you have killed, I hurl upon you the curse of Man!

He stands in silence with his hand raised in a threatening attitude. The BEING IN GREY listens with indifference to the curse, and the flame of the candle flutters as if blown by the wind. For some time the two stand facing each other in a tense silence — MAN and the BEING IN GREY. The crying in the next room becomes louder and more prolonged and gradually passes into a rhythmical wailing.

Curtain.

ACT V

THE DEATH OF MAN

A vague, wavering, flickering, dim light through which one can at first make out nothing. When the eye becomes accustomed to the gloom the following scene is disclosed:

A long, wide, basement room with a very low ceiling and without windows. A flight of stairs leads from the room to the entrance, somewhere above. The walls are smooth, gloomy, and dirty, like the coarse, spotted hide of some huge beast. The rear wall, as far as to the steps, is occupied by a large, flat buffet with a mirror. The buffet is filled with straight rows of bottles containing liquids of various colours. Behind a low counter sits the BARTENDER, perfectly motionless, with his hands folded across his stomach. He has a white face with red nose and cheeks, a bald head, and a large, sandy beard, and wears an expression of complete calm and indifference. He remains the same through the entire scene, not once moving from his place or changing his attitude. At small tables sit the DRUNKARDS, on wooden stools.

The number of the people is seemingly increased by their shadows, which rove along the walls and ceiling.

The scene presents an endless variety of the disgusting and the horrible. The faces resemble masks, the parts of which are disproportionately large or small. Some have large noses, others are entirely noseless. The eyes roll wildly, almost bursting from their sockets, or are nearly closed so that they are reduced to scarcely visible slits and points. There are prominent Adam's apples and diminutive chins. All have tangled, shaggy, and dirty hair, which in some cases half conceals the face. In spite of their variety, all the faces have a hideous resemblance, which consists in a sallow, grave-like colour and an expression now of frightful laughter and now of insane and gloomy horror.

The DRUNKARDS are dressed in rags of one colour, which expose a sallow, bony hand, or a sharp knee, or a sunken, frightful chest. Some are nearly naked. The women are scarcely distinguishable from the men and are even uglier. The hands and heads of all tremble, and their gait is unsteady, as if they were walking on very slippery or boggy or moving surfaces. Their voices, too, are alike in that they are wheezing, whimpering, and as unsteady as the gait. They utter their words with lips which do not obey them and which are, as it were, stiffened with cold.

In the centre of the group, at a separate table, sits MAN, resting his grey, dishevelled head upon his hands. He remains throughout in the same position, except for the moment that he speaks. He is shabbily dressed.

In one corner the BEING IN GREY with the nearly burned-out candle stands motionless. The narrow, blue flame flutters, now bending to one side and now reaching upward with a sharp tongue, throwing livid spots of light on His stony face and chin.

CONVERSATION OF THE DRUNKARDS

My God! My God!

Listen! How strangely everything shakes! You cannot fix your eyes on anything.

Everything trembles as in a fever: people, chairs, and the ceiling.

Everything sways as if it were afloat.

Don't you hear a noise? I hear a noise as if iron wheels were rumbling or stones were falling from a cliff — huge stones, falling like rain.

That is the noise in your ears.

That is the noise of the blood. I can feel my blood, thick, black, and smelling of rum. It rolls heavily along the veins, and when it comes to the heart everything seems to fall and terror seizes me.

I seem to see lightning flashes.

I see huge, red bonfires and people burning in them. There's a disgusting smell of burning flesh! Black shadows whirl about the bonfires, drunken shadows. Ho, there! Let me have a dance 10 with you!

My God! My God!

I, too, am cheerful. Who will laugh with me? No one wants to. Then I will laugh alone. (He laughs alone.) 15

A charming woman is kissing my lips. She smells of musk and her teeth are like a crocodile's. She is trying to bite me. Away, you slattern!

I am not a slattern. I am an old, preg- 20 nant serpent. For an hour I have been watching the little serpents issuing from my body and crawling about. Take care! Don't crush my little snakes!

Where are you going?

Who's walking about there? Sit down! The whole house shakes when you walk.

I can't sit still. It is frightful when I sit still.

It is frightful for me, too. When I sit 30 still I can feel horror running through my body.

So can I. Let me go!

Three or four drunkards wander aim- lessly about with unsteady steps, stumbling 35 among the tables.

See what it is doing! For two hours it has been trying to jump onto my knees. It comes within an inch of it. I drive it away, but it comes back. That's a queer 40 sort of game.

Black cockroaches are creeping about under my skull, making a crawling noise.

My brain is falling to pieces. I can feel one grey fragment separate from the 45 other. My brain is like spoiled cheese — it smells.

It smells like carrion here.

My God! My God!

To-night I will crawl to her on my knees 50 and butcher her. Blood will flow. It is flowing now — red blood.

Three people are continually following me. They are calling me into a dark, lonely corner. They want to butcher me there. They are gathered about the door now.

5 Who is that walking along the walls and ceiling?

My God! They have come — they're after me!

Who?

They.

My tongue is numb. What shall I do?

My tongue is numb. I will weep.

(He weeps.)

Everything in me is coming out. I shall 15 turn inside out in a moment and be red.

Listen, listen! Ho, somebody! A monster is coming upon me. It is raising its hand. Help! Oh!

What's this? Help! A spider!

Help!

(For some time they cry with hoarse voices: "Help!")

We are all drunkards. Let's call every- body down here. Up yonder it is nasty.

25 No, don't. When I go out on the street, the street rushes about like a wild beast and quickly throws me to the ground.

We have all come here from the street.

We drink alcohol and it makes us happy.

It makes us miserable. All day I trem- ble with horror.

Better this horror than life. Who wants to go back there?

Not I.

Nor I. I'd rather die here. I don't want to live.

Nobody wants to live.

My God! My God!

Why does Man come here? He drinks little and sits long. We do not need him.

Let him go home. He has a home.

He has fifteen rooms.

Don't touch him! He has nowhere else 45 to go.

He has fifteen rooms.

But they are empty, except for the rats. The rats run about in them and fight.

But his wife?

He has nobody. Probably his wife is dead.

His wife is dead.

His wife is dead.

During this conversation and that which follows, the OLD WOMEN in strange garments enter noiselessly and without attracting attention replace the quietly withdrawing DRUNKARDS. They mingle in the conversation, but so gradually that no one notices it.

CONVERSATION OF THE DRUNKARDS
AND THE OLD WOMEN

OLD WOMAN. He will soon die. He is so feeble he can scarcely walk.

DRUNKARD. He has fifteen rooms.

OLD WOMAN. Listen to his heart. How unevenly and feebly it beats. It will soon stop.

DRUNKARD. Invite us to your house, Man. You have fifteen rooms.

OLD WOMAN. It will soon stop — the big, old, feeble heart of Man.

DRUNKARD. He is asleep, the drunken fool. It is frightful to sleep, and yet he sleeps on. He might die in his sleep. Hey, there! Wake him up!

OLD WOMAN. Do you recall how his heart used to beat — fresh and strong?

Subdued laughter.

DRUNKARD. Who's laughing? There are intruders here.

DRUNKARD. Only in your imagination. There is no one here but us — us drunkards.

DRUNKARD. I will go out on the street and raise a disturbance. I have been robbed. I am completely naked. I have a green skin.

OLD WOMAN. Good evening.

DRUNKARD. Again the wheels are rumbling. My God! They will crush me. Help!

No one answers.

OLD WOMAN. Good evening.

OLD WOMAN. Do you remember how he was born?

OLD WOMAN. I think you were there.

DRUNKARD. It must be I am dying. My God! My God! Who will carry me to the grave? Who will bury me? I shall lie about like a dog in the street. People will walk over me. Carriages will ride over me. They will crush me. My God! My God! (He weeps.)

OLD WOMAN. Allow me to congratulate you, my dear kinsman, on the birth of your son.

DRUNKARD. I am firmly convinced that there is an error here. A straight line that presents the form of a closed circle is simply ridiculous.

DRUNKARD. I will prove it to you in a jiffy.

DRUNKARD. You are quite right.

10 DRUNKARD. My God! My God!

DRUNKARD. Only people who are ignorant of mathematics will admit it. I won't admit it. Do you hear? I won't admit it.

OLD WOMAN. Do you remember the rose-coloured dress and the naked throat?

OLD WOMAN. And the flowers — the lilies-of-the-valley on which the dew had not yet dried, and the violets, and the green grass?

OLD WOMAN. Don't touch them, girls! Don't touch the flowers!

Subdued laughter.

DRUNKARD. My God! My God!

The DRUNKARDS are all gone. Their places are occupied by the OLD WOMEN with strange garments. The light, though very faint, becomes steady. The figure of the UNKNOWN comes sharply out as does also the grey head of MAN, upon which from above falls a feeble light.

CONVERSATION OF THE OLD WOMEN

Good evening.

Good evening. What a glorious night!

Well, we are together again. How are you?

I have a cough.

Subdued laughter.

40 It won't be long now. He will soon die. Look at the candle. The flame is blue and narrow and droops toward the sides. There is no wax left now — only the wick is burning.

It does not want to go out.

When did you ever see a flame that wanted to go out?

Stop quarrelling! Stop quarrelling! Whether it wants to go out or not, time is passing.

Do you remember his automobile? Once it almost crushed me.

And his fifteen rooms?

I have just been there. I was nearly eaten by the rats, and I caught cold from the draughts. Now that some one has stolen the windows, the wind sweeps through the whole house.

Did you lie on the bed where his wife died? How soft it is, isn't it?

Yes, I went through all the rooms and mused a bit. They have such a dear nursery. Only it is too bad that the windows 10 are broken there, too, and the wind rustles amid the dust. The child's little bed is so dear! The mice have now built their nests in it and are raising their families.

Such dear little naked micelets.

Subdued laughter.

And in the study on the table lie the toys — the horse without a tail, the soldier cap, and the red-nosed clown. I played a 20 bit with them. I put on the cap. It quite becomes me. But there's a terrible lot of dust on them. I was just covered with dirt.

But were you not in the hall where 25 the dance took place? It is so cheerful there!

Yes, I was there, but just imagine what I saw. It was dark. The panes were all broken and the wind was rustling in the 30 wall-paper —

It makes a sound like music.

And along the wall in the darkness were squatted the guests. Oh, if you only knew how they looked! 35

We know!

And with grinning teeth they barked abruptly: "How costly! How gorgeous!" Surely you are joking!

Of course I am joking. You know how 40 jolly I am.

How costly! How luxurious!

How gorgeous!

Subdued laughter.

Remind him.

How costly! How gorgeous!

Do you remember the music at your ball?

He will soon die.

The dancers circled about and the music 50 played so tenderly, so beautifully. This is the way it played.

They form a semicircle about MAN and in a low voice hum the tune that was played at the ball.

Let's have a ball. It is so long since I have danced.

5 Just imagine that this is a palace, a miraculously beautiful palace.

Call the musicians! You cannot have a good dance without music.

Musicians!

Do you remember?

They strike up the tune and at the same moment the three musicians who played at the ball descend the stairs. The one with a violin carefully spreads the handkerchief 15 over his shoulder, and all three begin to play with extreme painstaking, though the sounds are low, soft, and sad as in a dream.

Now we have a ball!

How costly! How gorgeous!

How brilliant!

Do you remember?

Humming in a low tone in time with the music, they begin to circle about MAN, posturing and repeating with wild distortions the movements of the girls in white robes who danced at the ball. During the first musical phrase they circle about, and during the second they approach each other and then draw apart gracefully and silently. They whisper in low voices.

Do you remember?

You will soon die, but do you remember?

Do you remember?

Do you remember?

35 You will soon die, but do you remember?

Do you remember?

The dance becomes swifter and the movements more jerky. Through the voices of the OLD WOMEN who are singing there glide strange, whimpering notes; and the same strange laughter, as yet subdued, runs like a low rustling through the dancers. As they sweep past MAN they discharge, as it were, into his ears abrupt whispers:

45 Do you remember?

Do you remember?

How tender! How fine!

How restful to the soul!

Do you remember?

You will soon die. You will soon die.

You will soon die —

Do you remember?

The whirling dance becomes swifter and the movements still more abrupt. Suddenly all is silent and motionless. The musicians become rigid, with their instruments in their hands. The dancing women are motionless in the same attitudes in which the oncoming of silence found them.

MAN rises, straightens himself, throws back threateningly his beautiful grey head, and cries out in a challenging voice, unexpectedly loud and full of sorrow and anger. After each brief utterance there is a short but profound silence.

MAN. Where is my armour-bearer? Where my sword? Where is my shield? I am weaponless. Come hither quickly, quickly. Be accurs—

(He sinks upon a chair with head thrown back and dies.)

At the same instant the candle, flaring up, goes out, and a deep gloom envelops all objects. It is as though the gloom were pouring down the stairway and gradually spreading over everything. Only the face of MAN is illuminated. Low, indistinct conversation of the OLD WOMEN, whispering and interchanging laughter.

THE BEING IN GREY. Silence! Man is dead.

Profound silence, during which the same cold, indifferent voice repeats the words from the far distance like an echo: "Silence! Man is dead." Profound silence. Slowly the gloom becomes thicker, but the mice-like figures of the OLD WOMEN watchers can still be seen. Now quietly and silently they begin to circle about the corpse. Then they begin to hum in a low tone, and the musicians begin to play. The gloom becomes still more dense, and as the music and singing become louder and louder the wild dance becomes more unrestrained. They are no longer dancing but wildly whirling about the corpse, stamping and shrieking with continuous, wild laughter. Absolute darkness ensues. The face of the dead is still illumined, but presently that also vanishes. Black, impenetrable darkness.

In the darkness one can hear the movements of the wild dancers, the shrieking, the laughter, and the discordant and desperately loud sounds of the orchestra. Having attained their greatest intensity, all these sounds quickly withdraw somewhere and die away. Silence.

Curtain.

NORWEGIAN

IBSEN

(1828-1906)

Henrik Johan Ibsen, Norwegian poet and dramatist, was born at Skein, the son of a merchant. When he was eight years old the family was impoverished by his father's failure in business. At fifteen Henrik became an apothecary's assistant, and at nineteen began to write poetry. When he was twenty-two he left the apothecary's shop to go as a student to Christiania. In that year (1850) two of his plays (Cataline and The Viking's Barrow) were performed at the Christiania theater. A year later he became director of the theater in Bergen. During the six years of his directorship he wrote St. John's Night (1853), Lady Inger of Østrol (1855), The Feast of Solhaug (1856), and Oleff Liljekrans (1857). In 1857 he left Bergen to become manager of a theater in Christiania. In Love's Comedy (1862) he began his life-long fight against the majority. The public indignantly misunderstood him. His theater failed in 1862 and he took charge of another in the same city, for which he wrote The Pretenders (1864). In the same year his application for a poet's pension was rejected, and, deeply resentful, Ibsen departed for Italy. After the publication of Brand (1866) the poet's pension was granted. The climax of his early work was Peer Gynl (1867). In 1867 he also began writing prose dramas with The League of Youth. He returned to the poetic vein in 1873 with the impassioned prose of Emperor and Galilean. From 1868 to 1891 Ibsen lived in Germany, then returned to Christiania, where he remained until his death. The best-known plays of the later period are A Doll's House (1879), Ghosts (1881), An Enemy of the People (1882), The Wild Duck (1884), Rosmersholm (1886), Hedda Gabler (1890), and The Master Builder (1892).

• One of the first in his time to perceive or at least to expose the diseases of modern society, Ibsen was persistently misunderstood and reviled. His clarity of vision was labeled not only morbidity but immorality, and the fine restraint of his art, coldness. Later years have discarded these tags and recognized the superb technical skill of the poet, his devotion to humanity, his passionate faith in the rights of the individual against the unenlightened majority. Of the time in which he lived he was undoubtedly the leading dramatist.

SCENE. — A large room looking upon a garden. A door in the left-hand wall, and two in the right. In the middle of the room, a round table with chairs set about it, and books, magazines and newspapers upon it. In the foreground on the left, a window, by which is a small sofa with a work-table in front of it. At the back the room opens into a conservatory rather smaller than the room. From the right-hand side of this a door leads to the garden. Through the large panes of glass that form the outer wall of the conservatory, a gloomy fjord landscape can be discerned, half obscured by steady rain.

ENGSTRAND is standing close up to the garden door. His left leg is slightly deformed, and he wears a boot with a clump of wood under the sole. REGINA, with an empty garden syringe in her hand, is trying to prevent his coming in.

REGINA (below her breath). What is it you want? Stay where you are. The rain is dripping off you.

ENGSTRAND. God's good rain, my girl.

REGINA. The Devil's own rain, that's what it is!

ENGSTRAND. Lord, how you talk, Regina. (Takes a few limping steps forward.) What I wanted to tell you was this —

REGINA. Don't clump about like that, stupid! The young master is lying asleep upstairs.

ENGSTRAND. Asleep? In the middle of the day?

REGINA. Well, it's no business of yours.

ENGSTRAND. I was out on the spree last night —

5 REGINA. I don't doubt it.

ENGSTRAND. Yes, we are poor weak mortals, my girl —

REGINA. We are indeed.

ENGSTRAND. — and the temptations 10 of the world are manifold, you know — but, for all that, here I was at my work at half-past five this morning.

REGINA. Yes, yes, but make yourself scarce now. I am not going to stand here 15 as if I had a rendez-vous with you.

ENGSTRAND. As if you had a what?

REGINA. I am not going to have any one find you here; so now you know, and you can go.

ENGSTRAND (coming a few steps nearer). 20 Not a bit of it! Not before we have had a little chat. This afternoon I shall have finished my job down at the school house, and I shall be off home to town by to-night's boat.

REGINA (mutters). Pleasant journey to you!

ENGSTRAND. Thanks, my girl. To-morrow is the opening of the Orphanage, and I expect there will be a fine kick-up here and plenty of good strong drink, don't you know. And no one shall say of Jacob Engstrand that he can't hold off when temptation comes in his way.

35 REGINA. Oho!

ENGSTRAND. Yes, because there will be a lot of fine folk here to-morrow. Parson Manders is expected from town, too.

REGINA. What is more, he's coming to-day.

ENGSTRAND. There you are! And I'm going to be precious careful he doesn't have anything to say against me, do you see?

45 REGINA. Oh, that's your game, is it?

ENGSTRAND. What do you mean?

REGINA (with a significant look at him).

What is it you want to humbug Mr. Manders out of, this time?

ENGSTRAND. Sh! Sh! Are you crazy? Do you suppose I would want to humbug Mr. Manders? No, no — Mr. Manders has always been too kind a friend for me to do that. But what I wanted to talk to you about, was my going back home to-night.

REGINA. The sooner you go, the better I shall be pleased.

ENGSTRAND. Yes, only I want to take you with me, Regina.

REGINA (open-mouthed). You want to take me —? What did you say?

ENGSTRAND. I want to take you home with me, I said.

REGINA (contemptuously). You will never get me home with you.

ENGSTRAND. Ah, we shall see about that.

REGINA. Yes, you can be quite certain we shall see about that. I, who have been brought up by a lady like Mrs. Alving? — I, who have been treated almost as if I were her own child? — do you suppose I am going home with you? — to such a house as yours? Not likely!

ENGSTRAND. What the devil do you mean? Are you setting yourself up against your father, you hussy?

REGINA (mutters, without looking at him). You have often told me I was none of yours.

ENGSTRAND. Bah! — why do you want to pay any attention to that?

REGINA. Haven't you many and many a time abused me and called me a —? For shame!

ENGSTRAND. I'll swear I never used such an ugly word.

REGINA. Oh, it doesn't matter what word you used.

ENGSTRAND. Besides, that was only when I was a bit fuddled — hm! Temptations are manifold in this world, Regina.

REGINA. Ugh!

ENGSTRAND. And it was when your mother was in a nasty temper. I had to find some way of getting my knife into her, my girl. She was always so precious genteel. (Mimicking her). "Let go, Jacob! Let me be! Please to remember that I was three years with the Alvings at Rosenvold, and they were people who went to Court!" (Laughs.) Bless my soul, she never could forget that Captain Alving got a Court appointment while she was in service here.

REGINA. Poor mother — you worried her into her grave pretty soon.

ENGSTRAND (shrugging his shoulders). Of course, of course; I have got to take the blame for everything.

REGINA (beneath her breath, as she turns away). Ugh — that leg, too!

ENGSTRAND. What are you saying, my girl?

REGINA. Pied de mouton.¹

ENGSTRAND. Is that English?

REGINA. Yes.

ENGSTRAND. You have had a good education out here, and no mistake; and it may stand you in good stead now, Regina.

REGINA (after a short silence). And what was it you wanted me to come to town for?

ENGSTRAND. Need you ask why a father wants his only child? Ain't I a poor lonely widower?

REGINA. Oh, don't come to me with that tale. Why do you want me to go?

ENGSTRAND. Well, I must tell you I am thinking of taking up a new line now.

REGINA (whistles). You have tried that so often — but it has always proved a fool's errand.

ENGSTRAND. Ah, but this time you will just see, Regina! Strike me dead if —

REGINA (stamping her foot). Stop swearing!

ENGSTRAND. Sh! Sh! — you're quite right, my girl, quite right! What I wanted to say was only this, that I have put up a tidy penny out of what I have made by working at this new Orphanage up here.

REGINA. Have you? All the better for you.

ENGSTRAND. What is there for a man to spend his money on, out here in the country?

REGINA. Well, what then?

ENGSTRAND. Well, you see, I thought of putting the money into something that would pay. I thought of some kind of an eating-house for seafaring folk —

REGINA. Heavens!

ENGSTRAND. Oh, a high-class eating-house, of course, — not a pigsty for common sailors. Damn it, no; it would be a place ships' captains and first mates would come to; really good sort of people, you know.

REGINA. And what should I —?

ENGSTRAND. You would help there. But only to make a show, you know. You wouldn't find it hard work, I can promise you, my girl. You should do exactly as you liked.

REGINA. Oh, yes, quite so!

ENGSTRAND. But we must have some women in the house; that is as clear as daylight. Because in the evening we must make the place a little attractive — some singing and dancing, and that sort of thing. Remember they are seafolk — wayfarers on the waters of life! (Coming nearer to her.) Now don't be a fool and stand in your own way, Regina. What good are you going to do here? Will this education, that your mistress has paid for, be of any use? You are to look after the children in the new Home, I hear. Is that the sort of work for you? Are you so frightfully anxious to go and wear out your health and strength for the sake of these dirty brats?

REGINA. No, if things were to go as I want them to, then —. Well, it may happen; who knows? It may happen!

ENGSTRAND. What may happen?

REGINA. Never you mind. Is it much that you have put by, up here?

ENGSTRAND. Taking it all around, I should say about forty or fifty pounds.

REGINA. That's not so bad.

ENGSTRAND. It's enough to make a start with, my child.

REGINA. Don't you mean to give me any of the money?

ENGSTRAND. No, I'm hanged if I do.

REGINA. Don't you mean to send me as much as a dress-length of stuff, just for once?

ENGSTRAND. Come and live in the town with me and you shall have plenty of dresses.

REGINA. Pooh! — I can get that much for myself, if I have a mind to.

ENGSTRAND. But it's far better to have a father's guiding hand, Regina. Just now I can get a nice house in Little Harbour Street. They don't want much money down for it — and we could make it like a sort of seamen's home, don't you know.

REGINA. But I have no intention of living with you! I have nothing whatever to do with you. So now, be off!

ENGSTRAND. You wouldn't be living with me long, my girl. No such luck — not if you knew how to play your cards. Such a fine wench as you have grown this last year or two —

REGINA. Well —?

ENGSTRAND. It wouldn't be very long before some first mate came along — or perhaps a captain.

REGINA. I don't mean to marry a man of that sort. Sailors have no savoir-vivre.¹

ENGSTRAND. What haven't they got?

REGINA. I know what sailors are, I tell you. They aren't the sort of people to marry.

ENGSTRAND. Well, don't bother about marrying them. You can make it pay just as well. (More confidentially.) That fellow — the Englishman — the one with the yacht — he gave seventy pounds, he did; and she wasn't a bit prettier than you.

REGINA (advancing towards him). Get out!

ENGSTRAND (stepping back). Here! here! — you're not going to hit me, I suppose?

REGINA. Yes. If you talk like that of mother, I will hit you. Get out, I tell you! (Pushes him up to the garden door.) And don't bang the doors. Young Mr.

Alving —

ENGSTRAND. Is asleep — I know. It's funny how anxious you are about young Mr. Alving. (In a lower tone.) Oho! is it possible that it is he that —?

REGINA. Get out and be quick about it! Your wits are wandering, my good man. No, don't go that way; Mr.

Manders is just coming along. Be off down the kitchen stairs.

ENGSTRAND (moving towards the right). Yes, yes — all right. But have a bit of a chat with him that's coming along. He's the chap to tell you what a child owes to its father. For I am your father, anyway, you know. I can prove it by the Register. (He goes out through the farther door which REGINA has opened. She shuts it after him, looks hastily at herself in the mirror, fans herself with her handkerchief and sets her collar straight; then busies herself with the flowers. MANDERS enters the conservatory through the garden door. He wears an overcoat, carries an umbrella, and has a small traveling-bag slung over his shoulder on a strap.)

MANDERS. Good morning, Miss Engstrand.

REGINA (turning round with a look of pleased surprise). Oh, Mr. Manders, good morning. The boat is in, then?

MANDERS. Just in. (Comes into the room.) It is most tiresome, this rain every day.

REGINA (following him in). It's a splendid rain for the farmers, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. Yes, you are right. We town-folk think so little about that. (Begins to take off his overcoat.)

REGINA. Oh, let me help you. That's it. Why, how wet it is! I will hang it up in the hall. Give me your umbrella, too; I will leave it open, so that it will dry. (She goes out with the things by the farther door on the right. MANDERS lays his bag and his hat down on a chair. REGINA re-enters.) MANDERS. Ah, it's very pleasant to get indoors. Well, is everything going on well here?

REGINA. Yes, thanks.

MANDERS. Properly busy, though, I expect, getting ready for to-morrow?

REGINA. Oh, yes, there is plenty to do.

MANDERS. And Mrs. Alving is at home, I hope?

REGINA. Yes, she is. She has just gone upstairs to take the young master his chocolate.

MANDERS. Tell me — I heard down at the pier that Oswald had come back.

REGINA. Yes, he came the day before yesterday. We didn't expect him until 5 to-day.

MANDERS. Strong and well, I hope?

REGINA. Yes, thank you, well enough. But dreadfully tired after his journey. He came straight from Paris without a stop — I mean, he came all the way without breaking his journey. I fancy he is having a sleep now, so we must talk a little bit more quietly, if you don't mind.

MANDERS. All right, we will be very 15 quiet.

REGINA (while she moves an armchair up to the table). Please sit down, Mr. Manders, and make yourself at home. (He sits down; she puts a footstool under 20 his feet.) There! Is that comfortable?

MANDERS. Thank you, thank you. That is most comfortable. (Looks at her.) I'll tell you what, Miss Engstrand, I certainly think you have grown since I saw you last.

REGINA. Do you think so? Mrs. Alving says, too, that I have developed.

MANDERS. Developed? Well, perhaps a little — just suitably. (A short pause.)

REGINA. Shall I tell Mrs. Alving you are here?

MANDERS. Thanks, there is no hurry, my dear child. — Now tell me, Regina my dear, how has your father been getting on 35 here?

REGINA. Thank you, Mr. Manders, he is getting on pretty well.

MANDERS. He came to see me, the last time he was in town.

REGINA. Did he? He is always so glad 40 when he can have a chat with you.

MANDERS. And I suppose you have seen him pretty regularly every day?

REGINA. I? Oh, yes, I do — whenever I have time, that is to say.

MANDERS. Your father has not a very strong character, Miss Engstrand. He sadly needs a guiding hand.

REGINA. Yes, I can quite believe 50 that.

MANDERS. He needs some one with him that he can cling to, some one whose judgment he can rely on. He acknowledged that freely himself, the last time he came up to see me.

REGINA. Yes, he has said something of the same sort to me. But I don't know whether Mrs. Alving could do without me — most of all just now, when we have the new Orphanage to see about. And I should be dreadfully unwilling to leave Mrs. Alving, too; she has always been so good to me.

MANDERS. But a daughter's duty, my good child —. Naturally we should have to get your mistress' consent first.

REGINA. Still I don't know whether it would be quite the thing, at my age, to keep house for a single man.

MANDERS. What!! My dear Miss Engstrand, it is your own father we are speaking of!

REGINA. Yes, I dare say, but still —. Now, if it were in a good house and with a real gentleman —

MANDERS. But, my dear Regina —

REGINA. — one whom I could feel an affection for, and really feel in the position of a daughter to —

MANDERS. Come, come — my dear good child —

REGINA. I should like very much to live in town. Out here it is terribly lonely; and you know yourself, Mr. Manders, what it is to be alone in the world. And, though I say it, I really am both capable and willing. Don't you know any place that would be suitable for me, Mr. Manders?

MANDERS. I? No, indeed I don't.

REGINA. But, dear Mr. Manders — at any rate don't forget me, in case —

MANDERS (getting up). No, I won't forget you, Miss Engstrand.

REGINA. Because, if I —

MANDERS. Perhaps you will be so kind as to let Mrs. Alving know I am here?

REGINA. I will fetch her at once, Mr. Manders. (Goes out to the left. MANDERS walks up and down the room once or twice, stands for a moment at the farther end of the room with his hands behind his back and looks out into the garden. Then he comes back to the table, takes up a book and looks at the title page, gives a start, and looks at some of the others.)

MANDERS. Hm! — Really! (MRS. ALVING comes in by the door on the left. She is followed by REGINA, who goes out at once through the nearer door on the right.)

MRS. ALVING (holding out her hand). I am very glad to see you, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. How do you do, Mrs. Alving. Here I am, as I promised.

MRS. ALVING. Always punctual!

MANDERS. Indeed, I was hard put to it to get away. What with vestry meetings and committees —

MRS. ALVING. It was all the kinder of you to come in such good time; we can settle our business before dinner. But where is your luggage?

MANDERS (quickly). My things are down at the village shop. I am going to sleep there to-night.

MRS. ALVING (repressing a smile). Can't I really persuade you to stay the night here this time?

MANDERS. No. No; many thanks all the same; I will put up there, as usual. It is so handy for getting on board the boat again.

MRS. ALVING. Of course you shall do as you please. But it seems to me quite another thing, now we are two old people —

MANDERS. Ha! ha! You will have your joke! And it's natural you should be in high spirits to-day — first of all there is the great event to-morrow, and also you have got Oswald home.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, am I not a lucky woman! It is more than two years since he was home last, and he has promised to stay the whole winter with me.

MANDERS. Has he, really? That is very nice and filial of him; because there must be many more attractions in his life in Rome or in Paris, I should think.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, but he has his mother here, you see. Bless the dear boy, he has got a corner in his heart for his mother still.

MANDERS. Oh, it would be very sad if absence and pre-occupation with such a thing as Art were to dull the natural affections.

MRS. ALVING. It would, indeed. But there is no fear of that with him, I am glad to say. I am quite curious to see if you recognize him again. He will be down directly; he is just lying down for a little on the sofa upstairs. But do sit down, my dear friend.

MANDERS. Thank you. You are sure I am not disturbing you?

MRS. ALVING. Of course not. (She sits down at the table.)

MANDERS. Good. Then I will show you —. (He goes to the chair where his bag is lying and takes a packet of papers from it; then sits down at the opposite side of the table and looks for a clear space to put the papers down.) Now first of all, here is — (breaks off). Tell me, Mrs. Alving, what are these books doing here?

MRS. ALVING. These books? I am reading them.

MANDERS. Do you read this sort of things?

MRS. ALVING. Certainly I do.

MANDERS. Do you feel any the better or the happier for reading books of this kind?

MRS. ALVING. I think it makes me, as it were, more self-reliant.

MANDERS. That is remarkable. But why?

MRS. ALVING. Well, they give me an explanation or a confirmation of lots of different ideas that have come into my own mind. But what surprises me, Mr. Manders, is that, properly speaking, there is nothing at all new in these books. There is nothing more in them than what most people think and believe. The only thing is, that most people either take no account of it or won't admit it to themselves.

MANDERS. But, good heavens, do you seriously think that most people —?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, indeed, I do.

MANDERS. But not here in the country at any rate? Not here amongst people like ourselves?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, amongst people like ourselves too.

MANDERS. Well, really, I must say —!

MRS. ALVING. But what is the particular objection that you have to these books?

MANDERS. What objection? You surely don't suppose that I take any particular interest in such productions?

MRS. ALVING. In fact, you don't know anything about what you are denouncing?

MANDERS. I have read quite enough about these books to disapprove of them.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, but your own opinion —

MANDERS. My dear Mrs. Alving, there are many occasions in life when one has to rely on the opinion of others. That is the way in this world, and it is quite right that it should be so. What would become of society, otherwise?

MRS. ALVING. Well, you may be right.

MANDERS. Apart from that, naturally I don't deny that literature of this kind may have a considerable attraction. And I cannot blame you, either, for wishing to make yourself acquainted with the intellectual tendencies which I am told are at work in the wider world in which you have allowed your son to wander for so long. But —

MRS. ALVING. But —?

MANDERS. (lowering his voice). But one doesn't talk about it, Mrs. Alving. One certainly is not called upon to account to every one for what one reads or thinks in the privacy of one's own home.

MRS. ALVING. Certainly not. I quite agree with you.

MANDERS. Just think of the consideration you owe to this Orphanage, which you decided to build at a time when your thoughts on such subjects were very different from what they are now — as far as I am able to judge.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, I freely admit that. But it was about the Orphanage —

MANDERS. It was about the Orphanage we were going to talk; quite so. Well — walk warily, dear Mrs. Alving! And now let us turn to the business in hand. (Opens an envelope and takes out some papers.) You see these?

MRS. ALVING. The deeds?

MANDERS. Yes, the whole lot — and everything in order. I can tell you it has been no easy matter to get them in time. I had positively to put pressure on the authorities; they are almost painfully conscientious when it is a question of settling property. But here they are at last. (Turns over the papers.) Here is the deed of conveyance of that part of the Rosenvold estate known as the Solvik property, together with the buildings newly erected thereon — the school, the masters' houses and the chapel. And here is the legal sanction for the statutes of the institution. Here, you see — (reads) "Statutes for the Alving Orphanage."

MRS. ALVING (after a long look at the papers). That seems all in order.

MANDERS. I thought "Captain" was the better title to use, rather than your husband's Court title of "Chamberlain." "Captain" seems less ostentatious.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, yes; just as you think best.

MANDERS. And here is the certificate for the investment of the capital in the bank, the interest being earmarked for the current expenses of the Orphanage.

MRS. ALVING. Many thanks; but I think it will be most convenient if you will kindly take charge of them.

MANDERS. With pleasure. I think it will be best to leave the money in the bank for the present. The interest is not very high, it is true; four per cent at six months' call. Later on, if we can find some good mortgage — of course it must be a first mortgage and on unexceptionable security — we can consider the matter further.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, yes, my dear Mr. Manders, you know best about all that.

MANDERS. I will keep my eye on it, anyway. But there is one thing in connection with it that I have often meant to ask you about.

MRS. ALVING. What is that?

MANDERS. Shall we insure the buildings, or not?

MRS. ALVING. Of course we must insure them.

MANDERS. Ah, but wait a moment, dear lady. Let us look into the matter a little more closely.

MRS. ALVING. Everything of mine is insured — the house and its contents, my livestock — everything.

MANDERS. Naturally. They are your own property. I do exactly the same, of course. But this, you see, is quite a different case. The Orphanage is, so to speak, dedicated to higher uses.

MRS. ALVING. Certainly, but —

MANDERS. As far as I am personally concerned, I can conscientiously say that I don't see the smallest objection to our insuring ourselves against all risks.

MRS. ALVING. That is exactly what I think.

MANDERS. But what about the opinion of the people hereabouts?

MRS. ALVING. Their opinion —?

MANDERS. Is there any considerable body of opinion here — opinion of some account, I mean — that might take exception to it?

MRS. ALVING. What, exactly, do you mean by opinion of some account?

MANDERS. Well, I was thinking particularly of persons of such independent and influential position that one could hardly refuse to attach weight to their opinion.

MRS. ALVING. There are a certain number of such people here, who might perhaps take exception to it if we —

MANDERS. That's just it, you see. In town there are lots of them. All my fellow-clergymen's congregations, for instance! It would be so extremely easy for them to interpret it as meaning that neither you nor I had a proper reliance on Divine protection.

MRS. ALVING. But as far as you are concerned, my dear friend, you have at all events the consciousness that —

MANDERS. Yes, I know, I know; my own mind is quite easy about it, it is true. But we should not be able to prevent a wrong and injurious interpretation of our action. And that sort of thing, moreover, might very easily end in exercising a hampering influence on the work of the Orphanage.

MRS. ALVING. Oh, well, if that is likely to be the effect of it —

MANDERS. Nor can I entirely overlook the difficult — indeed, I may say, painful — position I might possibly be placed in. In the best circles in town the matter of this Orphanage is attracting a great deal of attention. Indeed the Orphanage is to some extent built for the benefit of the town too, and it is to be hoped that it may result in the lowering of our poor-rate by a considerable amount. But as I have been your adviser in the matter and have taken charge of the business side of it, I should be afraid that it would be I that spiteful persons would attack first of all —

MRS. ALVING. Yes, you ought not to expose yourself to that.

MANDERS. Not to mention the attacks that would undoubtedly be made upon me in certain newspapers and reviews —

MRS. ALVING. Say no more about it, dear Mr. Manders; that quite decides it.

MANDERS. Then you don't wish it to be insured?

MRS. ALVING. No, we will give up the idea.

MANDERS (leaning back in his chair). But suppose, now, that some accident happened? — one can never tell — would you be prepared to make good the damage?

MRS. ALVING. No; I tell you quite plainly I would not do so under any circumstances.

MANDERS. Still, you know, Mrs. Alving — after all, it is a serious responsibility that we are taking upon ourselves.

MRS. ALVING. But do you think we can do otherwise?

MANDERS. No, that's just it. We really can't do otherwise. We ought not to expose ourselves to a mistaken judgment; and we have no right to do anything that will scandalise the community.

MRS. ALVING. You ought not to, as a clergyman, at any rate.

MANDERS. And, what is more, I certainly think that we may count upon our enterprise being attended by good fortune — indeed, that it will be under a special protection.

MRS. ALVING. Let us hope so, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. Then we will leave it alone?

MRS. ALVING. Certainly.

MANDERS. Very good. As you wish. (Makes a note.) No insurance, then.

MRS. ALVING. It's a funny thing that you should just have happened to speak about that to-day —

MANDERS. I have often meant to ask you about it —

MRS. ALVING. — because yesterday we very nearly had a fire up there.

MANDERS. Do you mean it!

MRS. ALVING. Oh, as a matter of fact it was nothing of any consequence. Some shavings in the carpenter's shop caught fire.

MANDERS. Where Engstrand works?

MRS. ALVING. Yes. They say he is often so careless with matches.

MANDERS. He has so many things on his mind, poor fellow — so many anxieties. Heaven be thanked, I am told he is really making an effort to live a blameless life.

MRS. ALVING. Really? Who told you so?

MANDERS. He assured me himself that it is so. He's a good workman, too.

MRS. ALVING. Oh, yes, when he is sober.

MANDERS. Ah, that sad weakness of his! But the pain in his poor leg often drives him to it, he tells me. The last time he was in town, I was really quite touched by him. He came to my house and thanked me so gratefully for getting him to work here, where he could have the chance of being with Regina.

MRS. ALVING. He doesn't see very much of her.

MANDERS. But he assured me that he saw her every day.

MRS. ALVING. Oh, well, perhaps he does.

MANDERS. He feels so strongly that he needs some one who can keep a hold on him when temptations assail him. That is the most winning thing about Jacob Engstrand; he comes to one like a helpless child and accuses himself and confesses his frailty. The last time he came and had a talk with me —. Suppose now, Mrs. Alving, that it were really a necessity of his existence to have Regina at home with him again —

MRS. ALVING (standing up suddenly). Regina!

MANDERS. — you ought not to set yourself against him.

MRS. ALVING. Indeed, I set myself very definitely against that. And, besides, you know Regina is to have a post in the Orphanage.

MANDERS. But consider, after all he is her father —

MRS. ALVING. I know best what sort of a father he has been to her. No, she shall never go to him with my consent.

MANDERS (getting up). My dear lady, don't judge so hastily. It is very sad how you misjudge poor Engstrand. One would 10 really think you were afraid —

MRS. ALVING (more calmly). That is not the question. I have taken Regina into my charge, and in my charge she remains. (Listens.) Hush, dear Mr. 15 Manders, don't say any more about it. (Her face brightens with pleasure.) Listen! Oswald is coming downstairs. We will only think about him now. (OSWALD 20 ALVING, in a light overcoat, hat in hand and smoking a big meerschaum pipe, comes in by the door on the left.)

OSWALD (standing in the doorway). Oh, I beg your pardon, I thought you were in the office. (Comes in.) Good morning, 25 Mr. Manders.

MANDERS (staring at him). Well! It's most extraordinary —

MRS. ALVING. Yes, what do you think of him, Mr. Manders?

MANDERS. I — I — no, can it possibly be —?

OSWALD. Yes, it really is the prodigal son, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. Oh, my dear young friend — 35

OSWALD. Well, the son come home, then.

MRS. ALVING. Oswald is thinking of the time when you were so opposed to the idea of his being a painter.

MANDERS. We are only fallible, and many steps seem to us hazardous at first, that afterwards — (grasps his hand). Welcome, welcome! Really, my dear Oswald — may I still call you Oswald?

OSWALD. What else would you think of calling me?

MANDERS. Thank you. What I mean, my dear Oswald, is that you must not imagine that I have any unqualified dis- 50 approval of the artist's life. I admit that there are many who, even in that career, can keep the inner man free from harm.

OSWALD. Let us hope so.

MRS. ALVING (beaming with pleasure). I know one who has kept both the inner and the outer man free from harm. Just 5 take a look at him, Mr. Manders.

OSWALD (walks across the room). Yes, yes, mother dear, of course.

MANDERS. Undoubtedly — no one can deny it. And I hear you have begun to make a name for yourself. I have often seen mention of you in the papers — and extremely favourable mention, too. Although, I must admit, latterly I have not seen your name so often.

OSWALD (going towards the conservatory). I haven't done so much painting just lately.

MRS. ALVING. An artist must take a rest sometimes, like other people.

MANDERS. Of course, of course. At those times the artist is preparing and strengthening himself for a greater effort.

OSWALD. Yes. Mother, will dinner soon be ready?

MRS. ALVING. In half an hour. He has a fine appetite, thank goodness.

MANDERS. And a liking for tobacco, too.

OSWALD. I found father's pipe in the room upstairs, and —

30 MANDERS. Ah, that is what it was!

MRS. ALVING. What?

MANDERS. When Oswald came in at that door with the pipe in his mouth, I thought for the moment it was his father 35 in the flesh.

OSWALD. Really?

MRS. ALVING. How can you say so! Oswald takes after me.

40 MANDERS. Yes, but there is an expression about the corners of his mouth — something about the lips — that reminds me so exactly of Mr. Alving — especially when he smokes.

MRS. ALVING. I don't think so at all. 45 To my mind, Oswald has much more of a clergyman's mouth.

MANDERS. Well, yes — a good many of my colleagues in the church have a similar expression.

MRS. ALVING. But put your pipe down, my dear boy. I don't allow any smoking in here.

OSWALD (puts down his pipe). All right, I only wanted to try it, because I smoked it once when I was a child.

MRS. ALVING. You?

OSWALD. Yes; it was when I was quite a little chap. And I can remember going upstairs to father's room one evening when he was in very good spirits.

MRS. ALVING. Oh, you can't remember anything about those days.

OSWALD. Yes, I remember plainly that he took me on his knee and let me smoke his pipe. "Smoke, my boy," he said, "have a good smoke, boy!" And I smoked as hard as I could, until I felt I was turning quite pale and the perspiration was standing in great drops on my forehead. Then he laughed — such a hearty laugh —

MANDERS. It was an extremely odd thing to do.

MRS. ALVING. Dear Mr. Manders, Oswald only dreamt it.

OSWALD. No indeed, mother, it was no dream. Because — don't you remember — you came into the room and carried me off to the nursery, where I was sick, and I saw that you were crying. Did father often play such tricks?

MANDERS. In his young days he was full of fun —

OSWALD. And, for all that, he did so much with his life — so much that was good and useful, I mean — short as his life was.

MANDERS. Yes, my dear Oswald Alving, you have inherited the name of a man who undoubtedly was both energetic and worthy. Let us hope it will be a spur to your energies —

OSWALD. It ought to be, certainly.

MANDERS. In any case it was nice of you to come home for the day that is to honour his memory.

OSWALD. I could do no less for my father.

MRS. ALVING. And to let me keep him so long here — that's the nicest part of what he has done.

MANDERS. Yes, I hear you are going to spend the winter at home.

OSWALD. I am here for an indefinite time, Mr. Manders. — Oh, it's good to be at home again!

MRS. ALVING (beaming). Yes, isn't it?

MANDERS (looking sympathetically at him). You went out into the world very young, my dear Oswald.

OSWALD. I did. Sometimes I wonder if I wasn't too young.

MRS. ALVING. Not a bit of it. It is the best thing for an active boy, and especially for an only child. It's a pity when they are kept at home with their parents and get spoilt.

MANDERS. That is a very debatable question, Mrs. Alving. A child's own home is, and always is, and always must be, his proper place.

OSWALD. There I agree entirely with Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. Take the case of your own son. Oh yes, we can talk about it before him. What has the result been in his case? He is six or seven and twenty, and has never yet had the opportunity of learning what a well-regulated home means.

OSWALD. Excuse me, Mr. Manders, you are quite wrong there.

MANDERS. Indeed? I imagined that your life abroad had practically been spent entirely in artistic circles.

OSWALD. So it has.

MANDERS. And chiefly amongst the younger artists.

OSWALD. Certainly.

MANDERS. But I imagined that those gentry, as a rule, had not the means necessary for family life and the support of a home.

OSWALD. There are a considerable number of them who have not the means to marry, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. That is exactly my point.

OSWALD. But they can have a home of their own, all the same; a good many of them have. And they are very well-regulated and very comfortable homes, too. (MRS. ALVING, who has listened to him attentively, nods assent, but says nothing.)

MANDERS. Oh, but I am not talking of bachelor establishments. By a home I mean family life — the life a man lives with his wife and children.

OSWALD. Exactly, or with his children and his children's mother.

MANDERS (starts and clasps his hands).
Good heavens!

OSWALD. What is the matter?

MANDERS. Lives with — with — his children's mother!

OSWALD. Well, would you rather he should repudiate his children's mother?

MANDERS. Then what you are speaking of are those unprincipled conditions known as irregular unions!

OSWALD. I have never noticed anything particularly unprincipled about these people's lives.

MANDERS. But do you mean to say that it is possible for a man of any sort of 15 bringing up, and a young woman, to reconcile themselves to such a way of living — and to make no secret of it, either?

OSWALD. What else are they to do? 20 A poor artist, and a poor girl — it costs a good deal to get married. What else are they to do?

MANDERS. What are they to do? Well, Mr. Alving, I will tell you what they 25 ought to do. They ought to keep away from each other from the very beginning — that is what they ought to do!

OSWALD. That advice wouldn't have much effect upon hot-blooded young folk 30 who are in love.

MRS. ALVING. No, indeed it wouldn't.

MANDERS (persistently). And to think that the authorities tolerate such things! That they are allowed to go on, openly! 35 (Turns to MRS. ALVING.) Had I so little reason, then, to be sadly concerned about your son? In circles where open immorality is rampant — where, one may say, it is honoured —

OSWALD. Let me tell you this, Mr. Manders. I have been a constant Sunday guest at one or two of these "irregular" households —

MANDERS. On Sunday, too!

OSWALD. Yes, that is the day of leisure. But never have I heard one objectionable word there, still less have I ever seen anything that could be called immoral. No; but do you know when 50 and where I have met with immorality in artists' circles?

MANDERS. No, thank heaven, I don't!

OSWALD. Well, then, I shall have the pleasure of telling you. I have met with it when some one or other of your model husbands and fathers have come out there 5 to have a bit of a look round on their own account, and have done the artists the honour of looking them up in their humble quarters. Then we had a chance of learning something, I can tell you. These 10 gentlemen were able to instruct us about places and things that we had never so much as dreamt of.

MANDERS. What! Do you want me to believe that honourable men when they get away from home will —

OSWALD. Have you never, when these same honourable men come home again, heard them deliver themselves on the subject of the prevalence of immorality 20 abroad?

MANDERS. Yes, of course, but —

MRS. ALVING. I have heard them, too.

OSWALD. Well, you can take their word for it, unhesitatingly. Some of them are experts in the matter. (Putting his hands to his head.) To think that the glorious freedom of the beautiful life over there should be so besmirched!

MRS. ALVING. You mustn't get too heated, Oswald; you gain nothing by that.

OSWALD. No, you are quite right, mother. Besides, it isn't good for me. It's because I am so infernally tired, you know. I will go out and take a turn before dinner. I beg your pardon, Mr. Manders. It is impossible for you to realise the feeling; but it takes me that way. (Goes out by the farther door on the right.)

40 MRS. ALVING. My poor boy!

MANDERS. You may well say so. This is what it has brought him to! (MRS. ALVING looks at him, but does not speak.) He called himself the prodigal son. It's 45 only too true, alas — only too true! (MRS. ALVING looks steadily at him.) And what do you say to all this?

MRS. ALVING. I say that Oswald was right in every single word he said.

MANDERS. Right? Right? To hold such principles as that?

MRS. ALVING. In my loneliness here I have come to just the same opinions as he,

Mr. Manders. But I have never presumed to venture upon such topics in conversation. Now there is no need; my boy shall speak for me.

MANDERS. You deserve the deepest pity, Mrs. Alving. It is my duty to say an earnest word to you. It is no longer your business man and adviser, no longer your old friend and your dead husband's old friend, that stands before you now. It is your priest that stands before you, just as he did once at the most critical moment of your life.

MRS. ALVING. And what is it that my priest has to say to me?

MANDERS. First of all I must stir your memory. The moment is well chosen. To-morrow is the tenth anniversary of your husband's death; to-morrow the memorial to the departed will be unveiled; to-morrow I shall speak to the whole assembly that will be met together. But to-day I want to speak to you alone.

MRS. ALVING. Very well, Mr. Manders, speak!

MANDERS. Have you forgotten that after barely a year of married life you were standing at the very edge of a precipice? — that you forsook your house and home? — that you ran away from your husband — yes, Mrs. Alving, ran away, ran away — and refused to return to him in spite of his requests and entreaties?

MRS. ALVING. Have you forgotten how unspeakably unhappy I was during that first year?

MANDERS. To crave for happiness in this world is simply to be possessed by a spirit of revolt. What right have we to happiness? No, we must do our duty, Mrs. Alving. And your duty was to cleave to the man you had chosen and to whom you were bound by a sacred bond.

MRS. ALVING. You know quite well what sort of a life my husband was living at that time — what excesses he was guilty of.

MANDERS. I know only too well what rumour used to say of him; and I should be the last person to approve of his conduct as a young man, supposing that rumour spoke the truth. But it is not a wife's part to be her husband's judge. You should have considered it your bounden duty humbly to have borne the cross that a higher will had laid upon you. But, instead of that, you rebelliously cast off your cross, you deserted the man whose stumbling footsteps you should have supported, you did what was bound to imperil your good name and reputation, and came very near to imperilling the reputation of others into the bargain.

MRS. ALVING. Of others? Of one other, you mean.

MANDERS. It was the height of imprudence, your seeking refuge with me.

MRS. ALVING. With our priest? With our intimate friend?

MANDERS. All the more on that account. You should thank God that I possessed the necessary strength of mind — that I was able to turn you from your outrageous intention, and that it was vouchsafed to me to succeed in leading you back into the path of duty and back to your lawful husband.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, Mr. Manders, that certainly was your doing.

MANDERS. I was but the humble instrument of a higher power. And is it not true that my having been able to bring you again under the yoke of duty and obedience sowed the seeds of a rich blessing on all the rest of your life? Did things not turn out as I foretold to you? Did not your husband turn from straying in the wrong path, as a man should? Did he not, after all, live a life of love and good report with you all his days? Did he not become a benefactor to the neighborhood? Did he not so raise you up to his level, that by degrees you became his fellow-worker in all his undertakings — and a noble fellow-worker, too, I know, Mrs. Alving; that praise I will give you. — But now I come to the second serious false step in your life.

MRS. ALVING. What do you mean?

MANDERS. Just as once you forsook your duty as a wife, so, since then, you have forsaken your duty as a mother.

MRS. ALVING. Oh —!

MANDERS. You have been over-mastered all your life by a disastrous spirit of wilfulness. All your impulses have led you towards what is undisciplined and lawless. You have never been willing to submit to any restraint. Anything in life that has seemed irksome to you, you have thrown aside recklessly and unscrupulously, as if it were a burden that you were free to rid yourself of if you would. It did not please you to be a wife any longer, and so you left your husband. Your duties as a mother were irksome to you, so you sent your child away among strangers.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, that is true; I did that.

MANDERS. And that is why you have become a stranger to him.

MRS. ALVING. No, no, I am not that!

MANDERS. You are; you must be. And what sort of a son is it that you have got back? Think over it seriously, Mrs. Alving. You erred grievously in your husband's case — you acknowledge as much, by erecting this memorial to him. Now you are bound to acknowledge how much you have erred in your son's case; possibly there may still be time to reclaim him from the paths of wickedness. Turn over a new leaf, and set yourself to reform what there may still be that is capable of reformation in him. Because (with uplifted forefinger) in very truth, Mrs. Alving, you are a guilty mother! — That is what I have thought it my duty to say to you. (A short silence.)

MRS. ALVING (speaking slowly and with self-control). You have had your say, Mr. Manders, and to-morrow you will be making a public speech in memory of my husband. I shall not speak to-morrow. But now I wish to speak to you for a little, just as you have been speaking to me.

MANDERS. By all means; no doubt you wish to bring forward some excuses for your behaviour —

MRS. ALVING. No. I only want to tell you something.

MANDERS. Well?

MRS. ALVING. In all that you said just now about me and my husband, and about our life together after you had, as you put it, led me back into the path of duty — there was nothing that you knew at first hand. From that moment you never again set foot in our house — you, who had been our daily companion before that.

MANDERS. Remember that you and your husband moved out of town immediately afterwards.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, and you never once came out here to see us in my husband's lifetime. It was only the business in connection with the Orphanage that obliged you to come and see me.

MANDERS (in a low and uncertain voice). Helen — if that is a reproach, I can only beg you to consider —

MRS. ALVING. — the respect you owed to your calling? — yes. All the more as I was a wife who had tried to run away from her husband. One can never be too careful to have nothing to do with such reckless women.

MANDERS. My dear — Mrs. Alving, you are exaggerating dreadfully —

MRS. ALVING. Yes, yes, — very well. What I mean is this, that when you condemn my conduct as a wife you have nothing more to go upon than ordinary public opinion.

MANDERS. I admit it. What then?

MRS. ALVING. Well — now, Mr. Manders, now I am going to tell you the truth. I had sworn to myself that you should know it one day — you, and you only!

MANDERS. And what may the truth be?

MRS. ALVING. The truth is this, that my husband died just as great a profligate as he had been all his life.

MANDERS (feeling for a chair). What are you saying?

MRS. ALVING. After nineteen years of married life, just as profligate — in his desires at all events — as he was before you married us.

MANDERS. And can you talk of his youthful indiscretions — his irregularities — his excesses, if you like — as a profligate life!

MRS. ALVING. That was what the doctor who attended him called it.

MANDERS. I don't understand what you mean.

MRS. ALVING. It is not necessary you should.

MANDERS. It makes my brain reel. To think that your marriage — all the years of wedded life you spent with your husband — were nothing but a hidden abyss of misery.

MRS. ALVING. That and nothing else. Now you know.

MANDERS. This — this bewilders me. I can't understand it! I can't grasp it! How in the world was it possible —? How could such a state of things remain concealed?

MRS. ALVING. That was just what I had to fight for incessantly, day after day. When Oswald was born, I thought I saw a slight improvement. But it didn't last long. And after that I had to fight doubly hard — fight a desperate fight so that no one should know what sort of a man my child's father was. You know quite well what an attractive manner he had; it seemed as if people could believe nothing but good of him. He was one of those men whose mode of life seems to have no effect upon their reputations. But at last, Mr. Manders — you must hear this too — at last something happened more abominable than everything else.

MANDERS. More abominable than what you have told me!

MRS. ALVING. I had borne with it all, though I knew only too well what he indulged in in secret, when he was out of the house. But when it came to the point of the scandal coming within our four walls —

MANDERS. Can you mean it! Here?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, here, in our own home. It was in there (pointing to the nearer door on the right) in the dining-room that I got the first hint of it. I had something to do in there and the door was standing ajar. I heard our maid come up from the garden with water for the flowers in the conservatory.

MANDERS. Well —?

MRS. ALVING. Shortly afterwards I heard my husband come in too. I heard him say something to her in a low voice. And then I heard — (with a short laugh) —

oh, it rings in my ears still, with its mixture of what was heart-breaking and what was so ridiculous — I heard my own servant whisper: "Let me go, Mr. Alving! Let me be!"

MANDERS. What unseemly levity on his part! But surely nothing more than levity, Mrs. Alving, believe me.

MRS. ALVING. I soon knew what to believe. My husband had his will of the girl — and that intimacy had consequences, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS (as if turned to stone). And all that in this house. In this house!

MRS. ALVING. I have suffered a good deal in this house. To keep him at home in the evening — and at night — I have had to play the part of boon companion in his secret drinking-bouts in his room up there. I have had to sit there alone with him, have had to hobnob and drink with him, and have had to listen to his ribald senseless talk, have had to fight with brute force to get him to bed —

MANDERS (trembling). And you were able to endure all this!

MRS. ALVING. I had my little boy, and endured it for his sake. But when the crowning insult came — when my own servant — then I made up my mind that there should be an end of it. I took the upper hand in the house, absolutely — both with him and all the others. I had a weapon to use against him, you see; he didn't dare to speak. It was then that Oswald was sent away. He was about seven then, and was beginning to notice things and ask questions as children will. I could endure all that, my friend. It seemed to me that the child would be poisoned if he breathed the air of this polluted house. That was why I sent him away. And now you understand, too, why he never set foot here as long as his father was alive. No one knows what it meant to me.

MANDERS. You have indeed had a pitiable experience.

MRS. ALVING. I could never have gone through with it, if I had not had my work. Indeed, I can boast that I have worked. All the increase in the value of property, all the improvements, all the useful arrangements that my husband got the honour and glory of — do you suppose that he troubled himself about any of them? He, who used to lie the whole day on the sofa reading old Official Lists! No, you may as well know that too. It was I that kept him up to the mark when he had his lucid intervals; it was I that had to bear the whole burden of it when he began his excesses again or took to whining about his miserable condition.

MANDERS. And this is the man you are building a memorial to!

MRS. ALVING. There you see the power of an uneasy conscience.

MANDERS. An uneasy conscience? What do you mean?

MRS. ALVING. I had always before me the fear that it was impossible that the truth should not come out and be believed. That is why the Orphanage is to exist, to silence all rumours and clear away all doubt.

MANDERS. You certainly have not fallen short of the mark in that, Mrs. 25 Alving.

MRS. ALVING. I had another very good reason. I did not wish Oswald, my son, to inherit a penny that belonged to his father.

MANDERS. Then it is with Mr. Alving's property —

MRS. ALVING. Yes. The sums of money that, year after year, I have given towards this Orphanage, make up the 35 amount of property — I have reckoned it carefully — which in the old days made Lieutenant Alving a catch.

MANDERS. I understand.

MRS. ALVING. That was my purchase 40 money. I don't wish it to pass into Oswald's hands. My son shall have everything from me, I am determined.

(OSWALD comes in by the farther door on the right. He has left his hat and coat out- 45 side.)

MRS. ALVING. Back again, my own dear boy?

OSWALD. Yes, what can one do outside in this everlasting rain? I hear dinner is 50 nearly ready. That's good! (REGINA comes in from the dining-room, carrying a parcel.)

REGINA. This parcel has come for you, ma'am. (Gives it to her.)

MRS. ALVING (glancing at MANDERS). The ode to be sung to-morrow, I expect.

MANDERS. Hm —

REGINA. And dinner is ready.

MRS. ALVING. Good. We will come in a moment. I will just — (begins to open the parcel.)

REGINA (to OSWALD). Will you drink white or red wine, sir?

OSWALD. Both, Miss Engstrand.

REGINA. Bien — very good, Mr. Alv- 15 ing. (Goes into the dining-room.)

OSWALD. I may as well help you to uncork it —. (Follows her into the dining-room, leaving the door ajar after him.)

MRS. ALVING. Yes, I thought so. Here is the ode, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS (clapping his hands). How shall I ever have the courage to-morrow to speak the address that —

MRS. ALVING. Oh, you will get through it.

MANDERS (in a low voice, fearing to be heard in the dining-room). Yes, we must raise no suspicions.

MRS. ALVING (quietly but firmly). No; and then this long dreadful comedy will be 30 at an end. After to-morrow, I shall feel as if my dead husband had never lived in this house. There will be no one else here then but my boy and his mother. (From the dining-room is heard the noise of a chair falling; then REGINA'S voice is heard in a loud whisper: Oswald! Are you mad? Let me go!)

MRS. ALVING (starting in horror). Oh —! (She stares wildly at the half-open door.)

OSWALD is heard coughing and humming, then the sound of a bottle being un- corked.)

MANDERS (in an agitated manner). What's the matter? What is it, Mrs. 45 Alving?

MRS. ALVING (hoarsely). Ghosts. The couple in the conservatory — over again.

MANDERS. What are you saying! Regina —? Is she —?

MRS. ALVING. Yes. Come. Not a word —! (Grips MANDERS by the arm and walks unsteadily with him into the dining-room.)

ACT II

The same scene. The landscape is still obscured by mist. MANDERS and MRS. ALVING come in from the dining-room.

MRS. ALVING (calls into the dining-room from the doorway). Aren't you coming in here, Oswald?

OSWALD. No, thanks; I think I will go out for a bit.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, do; the weather is clearing a little. (She shuts the dining-room door, then goes to the hall door and calls.) Regina!

REGINA (from without). Yes, ma'am?

MRS. ALVING. Go down into the laundry and help with the garlands.

REGINA. Yes, ma'am.

(MRS. ALVING satisfies herself that she has gone, then shuts the door.)

MANDERS. I suppose he can't hear us?

MRS. ALVING. Not when the door is shut. Besides, he is going out.

MANDERS. I am still quite bewildered. I don't know how I managed to swallow a mouthful of your excellent dinner.

MRS. ALVING (walking up and down, trying to control her agitation). Nor I. But what are we to do?

MANDERS. Yes, what are we to do? Upon my word I don't know; I am so completely unaccustomed to things of this kind.

MRS. ALVING. I am convinced that nothing serious has happened yet.

MANDERS. Heaven forbid! But it is the most unseemly behaviour, for all that.

MRS. ALVING. It is nothing more than a foolish jest of Oswald's, you may be sure.

MANDERS. Well, of course, as I said, I am quite inexperienced in such matters; but it certainly seems to me —

MRS. ALVING. Out of the house she shall go — and at once. That part of it is as clear as daylight —

MANDERS. Yes, that is quite clear.

MRS. ALVING. But where is she to go? We should not be justified in —

MANDERS. Where to? Home to her father, of course.

MRS. ALVING. To whom, did you say?

MANDERS. To her — No, of course Engstrand isn't — But, great heavens, Mrs. Alving, how is such a thing possible?

You surely may have been mistaken, in spite of everything.

MRS. ALVING. There was no chance of mistake, more's the pity. Joanna was obliged to confess it to me — and my husband couldn't deny it. So there was nothing else to do but to hush it up.

MANDERS. No, that was the only thing to do.

MRS. ALVING. The girl was sent away at once, and was given a tolerably liberal sum to hold her tongue. She looked after the rest herself when she got to town. She renewed an old acquaintance with the carpenter Engstrand, gave him a hint, I suppose, of how much money she had got, and told him some fairy tale about a foreigner who had been here in his yacht in the summer. So she and Engstrand were married in a great hurry. Why, you married them yourself!

MANDERS. I can't understand it —. I remember clearly Engstrand's coming to arrange about the marriage. He was full of contrition, and accused himself bitterly for the light conduct he and his fiancée had been guilty of.

MRS. ALVING. Of course he had to take the blame on himself.

MANDERS. But the deceitfulness of it! And with me, too! I positively would not have believed it of Jacob Engstrand. I shall most certainly give him a serious talking to. — And the immorality of such a marriage! Simply for the sake of the money —! What sum was it that the girl had?

MRS. ALVING. It was seventy pounds.

MANDERS. Just think of it — for a paltry seventy pounds to let yourself be bound in marriage to a fallen woman!

MRS. ALVING. What about myself, then? — I let myself be bound in marriage to a fallen man.

MANDERS. Heaven forgive you! what are you saying? A fallen man?

MRS. ALVING. Do you suppose my husband was any purer, when I went with him to the altar, than Joanna was when Engstrand agreed to marry her?

MANDERS. The two cases are as different as day and night —

MRS. ALVING. Not so very different, after all. It is true there was a great difference in the price paid, between a paltry seventy pounds and a whole fortune.

MANDERS. How can you compare such totally different things! I presume you consulted your own heart — and your relations.

MRS. ALVING (looking away from him). I thought you understood where what you 10 call my heart had strayed to at that time.

MANDERS (in a constrained voice). If I had understood anything of the kind, I would not have been a daily guest in your husband's house.

MRS. ALVING. Well, at any rate this much is certain, that I didn't consult myself in the matter at all.

MANDERS. Still you consulted those nearest to you, as was only right — your 20 mother, your two aunts.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, that is true. The three of them settled the whole matter for me. It seems incredible to me now, how clearly they made out that it would be 25 sheer folly to reject such an offer. If my mother could only see what all that fine prospect has led to!

MANDERS. No one can be responsible for the result of it. Anyway, there is this 30 to be said, that the match was made in complete conformity with law and order.

MRS. ALVING (going to the window). Oh, law and order! I often think it is that that is at the bottom of all the misery in 35 the world.

MANDERS. Mrs. Alving, it is very wicked of you to say that.

MRS. ALVING. That may be so; but I don't attach importance to those obligations and considerations any longer. I cannot! I must struggle for my freedom.

MANDERS. What do you mean?

MRS. ALVING (tapping on the window panes). I ought never to have concealed 45 what sort of a life my husband led. But I had not the courage to do otherwise then — for my own sake, either. I was too much of a coward.

MANDERS. A coward?

MRS. ALVING. If others had known anything of what happened, they would have said: "Poor man, it is natural enough that he should go astray, when he has a wife that has run away from him."

MANDERS. They would have had a certain amount of justification for saying so.

MRS. ALVING (looking fixedly at him). If I had been the woman I ought, I would have taken Oswald into my confidence and said to him: "Listen, my son, your father was a dissolute man" —

MANDERS. Miserable woman —

MRS. ALVING. — and I would have told him all I have told you, from beginning to end.

MANDERS. I am almost shocked at 15 you, Mrs. Alving.

MRS. ALVING. I know. I know quite well! I am almost shocked at myself when I think of it. (Comes away from the window.) I am coward enough for that.

MANDERS. Can you call it cowardice that you simply did your duty! Have you forgotten that a child should love and honour his father and mother?

MRS. ALVING. Don't let us talk in such general terms. Suppose we say: "Ought Oswald to love and honour Mr. Alving?"

MANDERS. You are a mother — isn't there a voice in your heart that forbids you to shatter your son's ideals?

MRS. ALVING. And what about the truth?

MANDERS. What about his ideals?

MRS. ALVING. Oh — ideals, ideals? If only I were not such a coward as I am!

MANDERS. Do not spurn ideals, Mrs. Alving — they have a way of avenging themselves cruelly. Take Oswald's own case, now. He hasn't many ideals, more's the pity. But this much I have seen, that his father is something of an ideal to him.

MRS. ALVING. You are right there.

MANDERS. And his conception of his father is what you inspired and encouraged by your letters.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, I was swayed by duty and consideration for others; that was why I lied to my son, year in and year out. Oh, what a coward — what a coward I have been!

MANDERS. You have built up a happy 50 illusion in your son's mind, Mrs. Alving — and that is a thing you certainly ought not to undervalue.

MRS. ALVING. Ah, who knows if that is such a desirable thing after all! — But anyway I don't intend to put up with any goings on with Regina. I am not going to let him get the poor girl into trouble.

MANDERS. Good heavens, no — that would be a frightful thing!

MRS. ALVING. If only I knew whether he meant it seriously, and whether it would mean happiness for him —

MANDERS. In what way? I don't understand.

MRS. ALVING. But that is impossible; Regina is not equal to it, unfortunately.

MANDERS. I don't understand. What do you mean?

MRS. ALVING. If I were not such a miserable coward, I would say to him: "Marry her, or make any arrangement you like with her — only let there be no deceit in the matter."

MANDERS. Heaven forgive you! Are you actually suggesting anything so abominable, so unheard of, as a marriage between them!

MRS. ALVING. Unheard of, do you call it? Tell me honestly, Mr. Manders, don't you suppose there are plenty of married couples out here in the country that are just as nearly related as they are?

MANDERS. I am sure I don't understand you.

MRS. ALVING. Indeed you do.

MANDERS. I suppose you are thinking of cases where possibly —. It is only too true, unfortunately, that family life is not always as stainless as it should be. But as for the sort of thing you hint at — well, it's impossible to tell, at all events with any certainty. Here, on the other hand — for you, a mother, to be willing to allow your —

MRS. ALVING. But I am not willing to allow it. I would not allow it for anything in the world; that is just what I was saying.

MANDERS. No, because you are a coward, as you put it. But, supposing you were not a coward —! Great heavens — such a revolting union!

MRS. ALVING. Well, for the matter of that, we are all descended from a union of that description, so we are told. And who was it that was responsible for this state of things, Mr. Manders?

MANDERS. I can't discuss such questions with you, Mrs. Alving; you are by no means in the right frame of mind for that. But for you to dare to say that it is cowardly of you —!

MRS. ALVING. I will tell you what I mean by that. I am frightened and timid, because I am obsessed by the presence of ghosts that I never can get rid of.

MANDERS. The presence of what?

MRS. ALVING. Ghosts. When I heard Regina and Oswald in there, it was just like seeing ghosts before my eyes. I am half inclined to think we are all ghosts, Mr. Manders. It is not only what we have inherited from our fathers and mothers that exists again in us, but all sorts of old dead ideas and all kinds of old dead beliefs and things of that kind. They are not actually alive in us; but there they are dormant, all the same, and we can never be rid of them. Whenever I take up a newspaper and read it, I fancy I see ghosts creeping between the lines. There must be ghosts all over the world. They must be as countless as the grains of the sands, it seems to me. And we are so miserably afraid of the light, all of us.

MANDERS. Ah, — there we have the outcome of your reading. Fine fruit it has borne — this abominable, subversive, free-thinking literature!

MRS. ALVING. You are wrong there, my friend. You are the one who made me begin to think; and I owe you my best thanks for it.

MANDERS. I!

MRS. ALVING. Yes, by forcing me to submit to what you called my duty and my obligations; by praising as right and just what my whole soul revolted against, as it would against something abominable. That was what led me to examine your teachings critically. I only wanted to unravel one point in them; but, as soon as I had got that unraveled, the whole fabric came to pieces. And then I realized that it was only machine-made.

MANDERS (softly, and with emotion). Is that all I accomplished by the hardest struggle of my life?

MRS. ALVING. Call it rather the most ignominious defeat of your life.

MANDERS. It was the greatest victory of my life, Helen; victory over myself.

MRS. ALVING. It was a wrong done to both of us.

MANDERS. A wrong? — wrong for me to entreat you as a wife to go back to your lawful husband, when you came to me half distracted and crying: "Here I am, take me!" Was that a wrong?

MRS. ALVING. I think it was.

MANDERS. We two do not understand one another.

MRS. ALVING. Not now, at all events.

MANDERS. Never — even in my most secret thoughts — have I for a moment regarded you as anything but the wife of another.

MRS. ALVING. Do you believe what you say?

MANDERS. Helen —!

MRS. ALVING. One so easily forgets one's own feelings.

MANDERS. Not I. I am the same as I always was.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, yes — don't let us talk any more about the old days. You are buried up to your eyes now in committees and all sorts of business; and I am here, fighting with ghosts both without and within me.

MANDERS. I can at all events help you to get the better of those without you. After all that I have been horrified to hear from you to-day, I cannot conscientiously allow a young defenceless girl to remain in your house.

MRS. ALVING. Don't you think it would be best if we could get her settled? — by some suitable marriage, I mean.

MANDERS. Undoubtedly. I think, in any case, it would have been desirable for her. Regina is at an age now that — well, I don't know much about these things, but —

MRS. ALVING. Regina developed very early.

MANDERS. Yes, didn't she. I fancy I remember thinking she was remarkably well developed, bodily, at the time I prepared her for Confirmation. But, for the time being, she must in any case go home. Under her father's care — no, but of course Engstrand is not —. To think that he, of all men, could so conceal the truth from me! (A knock is heard at the hall door.)

MRS. ALVING. Who can that be? Come in! (ENGSTRAND, dressed in his Sunday clothes, appears in the doorway.)

ENGSTRAND. I humbly beg pardon, but —

MANDERS. Aha! Hm! —

MRS. ALVING. Oh, it's you, Engstrand!

ENGSTRAND. There were none of the maids about, so I took the great liberty of knocking.

MRS. ALVING. That's all right. Come in. Do you want to speak to me?

ENGSTRAND (coming in). No, thank you very much, ma'am. It was Mr. Manders I wanted to speak to for a moment.

MANDERS (walking up and down). Hm! — do you. You want to speak to me, do you?

ENGSTRAND. Yes, sir, I wanted so very much to — MANDERS (stopping in front of him). Well, may I ask what it is you want?

ENGSTRAND. It's this way, Mr. Manders. We are being paid off now. And many thanks to you, Mrs. Alving. And now the work is quite finished, I thought it would be so nice and suitable if all of us, who have worked so honestly together all this time, were to finish up with a few prayers this evening.

MANDERS. Prayers? Up at the Orphanage?

ENGSTRAND. Yes, sir, if it isn't agreeable to you, then —

MANDERS. Oh, certainly — but — hm! —

ENGSTRAND. I have made a practice of saying a few prayers there myself each evening —

MRS. ALVING. Have you?

ENGSTRAND. Yes, ma'am, now and then — just as a little edification, so to speak. But I am only a poor common man, and haven't rightly the gift, alas — and so I thought that as Mr. Manders happened to be here, perhaps —

MANDERS. Look here, Engstrand. First of all I must ask you a question. Are you in proper frame of mind for such a thing? Is your conscience free and untroubled?

ENGSTRAND. Heaven have mercy on me a sinner! My conscience isn't worth our speaking about, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. But it is just what we must speak about. What do you say to my question?

ENGSTRAND. My conscience? Well — 10 it's uneasy sometimes, of course.

MANDERS. Ah, you admit that at all events. Now will you tell me, without any concealment — what is your relationship to Regina?

MRS. ALVING (hastily). Mr. Manders!

MANDERS (calming her). — Leave it to me!

ENGSTRAND. With Regina? Good Lord, how you frightened me! (Looks at MRS. 20 ALVING.) There is nothing wrong with Regina, is there?

MANDERS. Let us hope not. What I want to know is, what is your relationship to her? You pass as her father, don't 25 you?

ENGSTRAND (unsteadily). Well — hm! — you know, sir, what happened between me and my poor Joanna.

MANDERS. No more distortion of the 30 truth! Your late wife made a full confession to Mrs. Alving, before she left her service.

ENGSTRAND. What! — do you mean to say —? Did she do that after all?

MANDERS. You see it has all come out, Engstrand.

ENGSTRAND. Do you mean to say that she, who gave me her promise and solemn oath —

MANDERS. Did she take an oath?

ENGSTRAND. Well, no — she only gave me her word, but as seriously as a woman could.

MANDERS. And all these years you have 45 been hiding the truth from me — from me, who have had such complete and absolute faith in you.

ENGSTRAND. I am sorry to say I have, sir.

MANDERS. Did I deserve that from you, Engstrand? Haven't I been always ready to help you in word and deed as far as lay in my power? Answer me! Is it not so?

ENGSTRAND. Indeed there's many a time I should have been very badly off 5 without you, sir.

MANDERS. And this is the way you repay me — by causing me to make false entries in the church registers, and afterwards keeping back from me for years the information which you owed it both to me and to your sense of the truth to divulge. Your conduct has been absolutely inexcusable, Engstrand, and from to-day everything is at an end between us.

15 ENGSTRAND (with a sigh). Yes, I can see that's what it means.

MANDERS. Yes, because how can you possibly justify what you did?

ENGSTRAND. Was the poor girl to go and increase her load of shame by talking about it? Just suppose, sir, for a moment that your reverence was in the same predicament as my poor Joanna —

MANDERS. I!

ENGSTRAND. Good Lord, sir, I don't mean the same predicament. I mean, suppose there were something your reverence were ashamed of in the eyes of the world, so to speak. We men oughtn't to judge a poor woman too hardly, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. But I am not doing so at all. It is you I am blaming.

ENGSTRAND. Will your reverence grant 35 me leave to ask you a small question?

MANDERS. Ask away.

ENGSTRAND. Shouldn't you say it was right for a man to raise up the fallen?

MANDERS. Of course it is.

40 ENGSTRAND. And isn't a man bound to keep his word of honour?

MANDERS. Certainly he is; but —

ENGSTRAND. At the time when Joanna had her misfortune with this Englishman — or maybe he was an American or a Russian, as they call 'em — well, sir, then she came to town. Poor thing, she had refused me once or twice before; she only had eyes for good-looking men in those 50 days, and I had this crooked leg then.

Your reverence will remember how I ventured up into a dancing-saloon where seafaring men were revelling in drunkenness and intoxication, as they say. And when I tried to exhort them to turn from their evil ways —

MRS. ALVING (coughs from the window). Ahem!

MANDERS. I know, Engstrand, I know — the rough brutes threw you downstairs. You have told me about that incident before. The affliction to your leg is a credit to you.

ENGSTRAND. I don't want to claim credit for it, your reverence. But what I wanted to tell you was that she came then and confided in me with tears and gnashing of teeth. I can tell you, sir, it went to my heart to hear her.

MANDERS. Did it, indeed, Engstrand? Well, what then?

ENGSTRAND. Well, then I said to her: "The American is roaming about on the high seas, he is. And you, Joanna," I said, "you have committed a sin and are a fallen woman. But here stands Jacob Engstrand," I said, "on two strong legs" — of course that was only speaking in a kind of metaphor, as it were, your reverence.

MANDERS. I quite understand. Go on.

ENGSTRAND. Well, sir, that was how I rescued her and made her my lawful wife, so that no one should know how recklessly she had carried on with the stranger.

MANDERS. That was all very kindly done. The only thing I cannot justify was your bringing yourself to accept the money —

ENGSTRAND. Money? I? Not a far-thing.

MANDERS (to MRS. ALVING, in a questioning tone). But —

ENGSTRAND. Ah, yes! — wait a bit; I remember now. Joanna did have a trifle of money, you are quite right. But I didn't want to know anything about that. "Fie," I said, "on the mammon of unrighteousness, it's the price of your sin; as for this tainted gold" — or notes, or whatever it was — "we will throw it back in the American's face," I said. But he had gone away and disappeared on the stormy seas, your reverence.

MANDERS. Was that how it was, my good fellow?

ENGSTRAND. It was, sir. So then Joanna and I decided that the money should go towards the child's bringing-up, and that's what became of it; and I can give a faithful account of every single penny of it.

MANDERS. This alters the complexion of the affair very considerably.

ENGSTRAND. That's how it was, your reverence. And I make bold to say that I have been a good father to Regina — as far as was in my power — for I am a poor erring mortal, alas!

MANDERS. There, there, my dear Engstrand —

ENGSTRAND. Yes, I do make bold to say that I brought up the child, and made my poor Joanna a loving and careful husband, as the Bible says we ought. But it never occurred to me to go to your reverence and claim credit for it or boast about it because I had done one good deed in this world. No; when Jacob Engstrand does a thing like that, he holds his tongue about it. Unfortunately it doesn't often happen, I know that only too well. And whenever I do come to see your reverence, I never seem to have anything but trouble and wickedness to talk about. Because, as I said just now — and I say it again — conscience can be very hard on us sometimes.

MANDERS. Give me your hand, Jacob Engstrand.

ENGSTRAND. Oh, sir, I don't like —

MANDERS. No nonsense. (Grasps his hand.) That's it!

ENGSTRAND. And may I make bold humbly to beg your reverence's pardon —

MANDERS. You? On the contrary it is for me to beg your pardon —

ENGSTRAND. Oh no, sir.

MANDERS. Yes, certainly it is, and I do it with my whole heart. Forgive me for having so much misjudged you. And I assure you that if I can do anything for you to prove my sincere regret and my goodwill towards you —

ENGSTRAND. Do you mean it, sir?

MANDERS. It would give me the greatest pleasure.

ENGSTRAND. As a matter of fact, sir, you could do it now. I am thinking of using the honest money I have put away out of my wages up here, in establishing a sort of Sailors' Home in the town.

MRS. ALVING. You?

ENGSTRAND. Yes, to be a sort of Refuge, as it were. There are such manifold temptations lying in wait for sailor men when they are roaming about on shore. But my idea is that in this house of mine they should have a sort of parental care looking after them.

MANDERS. What do you say to that, Mrs. Alving!

ENGSTRAND. I haven't much to begin such a work with, I know; but Heaven might prosper it, and if I found any helping hand stretched out to me, then —

MANDERS. Quite so; we will talk over the matter further. Your project attracts me enormously. But in the meantime go back to the Orphanage and put everything tidy and light the lights, so that the occasion may seem a little solemn. And then we will spend a little edifying time together, my dear Engstrand, for now I am sure you are in a suitable frame of mind.

ENGSTRAND. I believe I am, sir, truly. Good-bye, then, Mrs. Alving, and thank you for all your kindness; and take good care of Regina for me. (Wipes a tear from his eye.) Poor Joanna's child — it is an extraordinary thing, but she seems to have grown into my life and to hold me by the heartstrings. That's how I feel about it, truly. (Bows, and goes out.)

MANDERS. Now then, what do you think of him, Mrs. Alving! That was quite another explanation that he gave us.

MRS. ALVING. It was, indeed.

MANDERS. There, you see how exceedingly careful we ought to be in condemning our fellow-men. But at the same time it gives one genuine pleasure to find that one was mistaken. Don't you think so?

MRS. ALVING. What I think is that you are, and always will remain, a big baby.

MR. MANDERS. I?

MRS. ALVING (laying her hands on his shoulders). And I think that I should like very much to give you a good hug.

MANDERS (drawing back hastily). No, no, good gracious! What an idea!

MRS. ALVING (with a smile). Oh, you needn't be afraid of me.

MANDERS (standing by the table). You choose such an extravagant way of expressing yourself sometimes. Now I must get these papers together and put them in my bag. (Does so.) That's it. And now good-bye, for the present. Keep your eyes open when Oswald comes back. I will come back and see you again presently.

(He takes his hat and goes out by the hall door. MRS. ALVING sighs, glances out of the window, puts one or two things tidy in the room and turns to go into the dining-room. She stops in the doorway with a stifled cry.)

MRS. ALVING. Oswald, are you still sitting at table?

OSWALD (from the dining-room). I am only finishing my cigar.

MRS. ALVING. I thought you had gone out for a little turn.

OSWALD (from within the room). In weather like this? (A glass is heard clinking.) MRS. ALVING leaves the door open and sits down with her knitting on the couch by the window.) Wasn't that Mr. Manders that went out just now?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, he has gone over to the Orphanage.

OSWALD. Oh. (The clink of a bottle on a glass is heard again.)

MRS. ALVING (with an uneasy expression). Oswald, dear, you should be careful with that liquor. It is strong.

OSWALD. It's a good protective against the damp.

MRS. ALVING. Wouldn't you rather come in here?

OSWALD. You know you don't like smoking in there.

MRS. ALVING. You may smoke a cigar in here, certainly.

OSWALD. All right; I will come in, then. Just one drop more. There! (Comes in, smoking a cigar, and shuts the door after him. A short silence.) Where has the parson gone?

MRS. ALVING. I told you he had gone over to the Orphanage.

OSWALD. Oh, so you did.

MRS. ALVING. You shouldn't sit so long at table, Oswald.

OSWALD (holding his cigar behind his back). But it's so nice and cosy, mother dear. (Caresses her with one hand.) Think what it means to me — to have come home; to sit at my mother's own table, in my mother's own room, and to enjoy the charming meals she gives me.

MRS. ALVING. My dear, dear boy!

OSWALD (a little impatiently, as he walks up and down smoking). And what else is there for me to do here? I have no occupation —

MRS. ALVING. No occupation?

OSWALD. Not in this ghastly weather, when there isn't a blink of sunshine all day long. (Walks up and down the floor.) Not to be able to work, it's —!

MRS. ALVING. I don't believe you were wise to come home.

OSWALD. Yes, mother; I had to.

MRS. ALVING. Because I would ten times rather give up the happiness of having you with me, sooner than that you should —

OSWALD (standing still by the table). Tell me, mother — is it really such a great happiness for you to have me at home?

MRS. ALVING. Can you ask?

OSWALD (crumpling up a newspaper). I should have thought it would have been pretty much the same to you whether I were here or away.

MRS. ALVING. Have you the heart to say that to your mother, Oswald?

OSWALD. But you have been quite happy living without me so far.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, I have lived without you — that is true.

(A silence. The dusk falls by degrees. Oswald walks restlessly up and down. He has laid aside his cigar.)

OSWALD (stopping beside Mrs. Alving). Mother, may I sit on the couch beside you?

MRS. ALVING. Of course, my dear boy.

OSWALD (sitting down). Now I must tell you something, mother.

MRS. ALVING (anxiously). What?

OSWALD (staring in front of him). I can't bear it any longer.

MRS. ALVING. Bear what? What do you mean?

OSWALD (as before). I couldn't bring myself to write to you about it; and since I have been at home —

MRS. ALVING (catching him by the arm). Oswald, what is it?

OSWALD. Both yesterday and to-day I have tried to push my thoughts away from me — to free myself from them. But I can't.

MRS. ALVING (getting up). You must speak plainly, Oswald!

OSWALD (drawing her down to her seat again). Sit still, and I will try and tell you. I have made a great deal of the fatigue I felt after my journey —

MRS. ALVING. Well, what of that?

OSWALD. But that isn't what is the matter. It is no ordinary fatigue —

MRS. ALVING (trying to get up). You are not ill, Oswald!

OSWALD (pulling her down again). Sit still mother. Do take it quietly. I am not exactly ill — not ill in the usual sense. (Takes his head in his hands.) Mother, it's my mind that has broken down — gone to pieces — I shall never be able to work any more! (Buries his face in his hands and throws himself at her knees in an outburst of sobs.)

MRS. ALVING (pale and trembling). Oswald! Look at me! No, no, it isn't true!

OSWALD (looking up with a distracted expression). Never to be able to work any more! Never — never! A living death! Mother, can you imagine anything so horrible!

MRS. ALVING. My poor unhappy boy! How has this terrible thing happened?

OSWALD (sitting up again). That is just what I cannot possibly understand. I have never lived recklessly, in any sense. You must believe that of me, mother! I have never done that.

MRS. ALVING. I haven't a doubt of it, Oswald.

OSWALD. And yet this comes upon me all the same! — this terrible disaster!

MRS. ALVING. Oh, but it will all come right again, my dear precious boy. It is nothing but overwork. Believe me, that is so.

OSWALD (dully). I thought so too, at first; but it isn't so.

MRS. ALVING. Tell me all about it.

OSWALD. Yes, I will.

MRS. ALVING. When did you first feel anything?

OSWALD. It was just after I had been home last time and had got back to Paris. I began to feel the most violent pains in my head — mostly at the back, I think. It was as if a tight band of iron was pressing on me from my neck upwards.

MRS. ALVING. And then?

OSWALD. At first I thought it was nothing but the headaches I always used to be so much troubled with while I was growing.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, yes —

OSWALD. But it wasn't; I soon saw that. I couldn't work any longer. I would try and start some big new picture; but it seemed as if all my faculties had forsaken me, as if all my strength were paralysed. I couldn't manage to collect my thoughts; my head seemed to swim — everything went round and round. It was a horrible feeling! At last I sent for a doctor — and from him I learnt the truth.

MRS. ALVING. In what way, do you mean?

OSWALD. He was one of the best doctors there. He made me describe what I felt, and then he began to ask me a whole heap of questions which seemed to me to have nothing to do with the matter. I couldn't see what he was driving at —

MRS. ALVING. Well?

OSWALD. At last he said: "You have had the canker of disease in you practically from your birth" — the actual word he used was "vermoulu."

MRS. ALVING (anxiously). What did he mean by that?

OSWALD. I couldn't understand, either — and I asked him for a clearer explanation. And then the old cynic said — (clenching his fist). Oh! —

MRS. ALVING. What did he say?

OSWALD. He said: "The sins of the fathers are visited on the children."

MRS. ALVING (getting up slowly). The sins of the fathers —!

OSWALD. I nearly struck him in the face —

MRS. ALVING (walking across the room). The sins of the fathers —!

OSWALD (smiling sadly). Yes, just imagine! Naturally I assured him that what he thought was impossible. But do you think he paid any heed to me? No, he persisted in his opinion; and it was only when I got out your letters and translated to him all the passages that referred to my father —

MRS. ALVING. Well, and then?

OSWALD. Well, then of course he had to admit that he was on the wrong tack; and then I learnt the truth — the incomprehensible truth! I ought to have had nothing to do with the joyous happy life I had lived with my comrades. It had been too much for my strength. So it was my own fault!

MRS. ALVING. No, no, Oswald! Don't believe that!

OSWALD. There was no other explanation of it possible, he said. That is the most horrible part of it. My whole life incurably ruined — just because of my own imprudence. All that I wanted to do in the world — not to dare to think of it any more — not to be able to think of it! Oh! if only I could live my life over again — if only I could undo what I have done! (Throws himself on his face on the couch. MRS. ALVING wrings her hands, and walks up and down silently fighting with herself.)

OSWALD (looks up after a while, raising himself on his elbows). If only it had been something I had inherited — something I could not help. But, instead of that, to have disgracefully, stupidly, thoughtlessly thrown away one's happiness, one's health, everything in the world — one's future, one's life —

MRS. ALVING. No, no, my darling boy; that is impossible! (Bending over him.) Things are not so desperate as you think.

OSWALD. Ah, you don't know — (Springs up.) And to think, mother, that I should bring all this sorrow upon you! Many a time I have almost wished and hoped that you really did not care so very much for me.

MRS. ALVING. I, Oswald? My only son! All that I have in the world! The only thing I care about!

OSWALD (taking hold of her hands and kissing them). Yes, yes, I know that is so. When I am at home I know that is true. And that is one of the hardest parts of it to me. But now you know all about it; and now we won't talk any more about it to-day. I can't stand thinking about it long at a time. (Walks across the room.) Let me have something to drink, mother!

MRS. ALVING. To drink? What do you want?

OSWALD. Oh, anything you like. I suppose you have got some punch in the house.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, but my dear Oswald —!

OSWALD. Don't tell me I mustn't, mother. Do be nice! I must have something to drown these gnawing thoughts. (Goes into the conservatory.) And how — how gloomy it is here! (MRS. ALVING rings the bell.) And this incessant rain. It may go on week after week — a whole month. Never a ray of sunshine. I don't remember ever having seen the sun shine once when I have been at home.

MRS. ALVING. Oswald — you are thinking of going away from me!

OSWALD. Hm! — (sighs deeply). I am not thinking about anything. I can't think about anything! (In a low voice.) I have to let that alone.

REGINA (coming from the dining-room). Did you ring, ma'am?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, let us have the lamp in.

REGINA. In a moment, ma'am; it is all ready lit. (Goes out.)

MRS. ALVING (going up to OSWALD). Oswald, don't keep anything back from me.

OSWALD. I don't, mother. (Goes to the table.) It seems to me I have told you a good lot. (REGINA brings the lamp and puts it upon the table.)

MRS. ALVING. Regina, you might bring us a small bottle of champagne.

REGINA. Yes, ma'am. (Goes out.)

OSWALD (taking hold of his mother's face). That's right. I knew my mother wouldn't let her son go thirsty.

MRS. ALVING. My poor dear boy, how could I refuse you anything now?

OSWALD (eagerly). Is that true, mother? Do you mean it?

MRS. ALVING. Mean what?

OSWALD. That you couldn't deny me anything?

MRS. ALVING. My dear Oswald —

OSWALD. Hush! (REGINA brings in a tray with a small bottle of champagne and two glasses, which she puts on the table.)

REGINA. Shall I open the bottle?

OSWALD. No, thank you, I will do it. (REGINA goes out.)

MRS. ALVING (sitting down at the table). What did you mean, when you asked if I could refuse you nothing?

OSWALD (busy opening the bottle). Let us have a glass first — or two.

(He draws the cork, fills one glass and is going to fill the other.)

MRS. ALVING (holding her hand over the second glass). No, thanks — not for me.

OSWALD. Oh, well, for me then! (He empties his glass, fills it again and empties it; then sits down at the table.)

MRS. ALVING (expectantly). Now, tell me.

OSWALD (without looking at her). Tell me this; I thought you and Mr. Manders seemed so strange — so quiet — at dinner.

MRS. ALVING. Did you notice that?

OSWALD. Yes. Ahem! (After a short pause.) Tell me — What do you think of Regina?

MRS. ALVING. What do I think of her?

OSWALD. Yes, isn't she splendid!

MRS. ALVING. Dear Oswald, you don't know her as well as I do —

OSWALD. What of that?

MRS. ALVING. Regina was too long at home, unfortunately. I ought to have taken her under my charge sooner.

OSWALD. Yes, but isn't she splendid to look at, mother? (Fills his glass.)

MRS. ALVING. Regina has many faults —

OSWALD. Yes, but what of that? (Drinks.)

MRS. ALVING. But I am fond of her all the same; and I have made myself responsible for her. I wouldn't for the world she should come to any harm.

OSWALD (jumping up). Mother, Regina is my only hope of salvation!

MRS. ALVING (getting up). What do you mean?

OSWALD. I can't go on bearing all this agony of mind alone.

MRS. ALVING. Haven't you your mother to help you to bear it?

OSWALD. Yes, I thought so! that was why I came home to you. But it is no use; I see that it isn't. I cannot spend 15 my life here.

MRS. ALVING. Oswald!

OSWALD. I must live a different sort of life, mother; so I shall have to go away from you. I don't want you watching it. 20

MRS. ALVING. My unhappy boy! But, Oswald, as long as you are ill like this —

OSWALD. If it was only a matter of feeling ill, I would stay with you, mother. You are the best friend I have in the 25 world.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, I am that, Oswald, am I not?

OSWALD (walking restlessly about). But all this torment — the regret, the remorse 30 — and the deadly fear. Oh — this horrible fear!

MRS. ALVING (following him). Fear? Fear of what? What do you mean?

OSWALD. Oh, don't ask me any more 35 about it. I don't know what it is. I can't put it into words. (MRS. ALVING crosses the room and rings the bell.) What do you want?

MRS. ALVING. I want my boy to be 40 happy, that's what I want. He mustn't brood over anything. (To REGINA, who has come to the door.) More champagne — a large bottle.

OSWALD. Mother!

MRS. ALVING. Do you think we country people don't know how to live?

OSWALD. Isn't she splendid to look at? What a figure! And the picture of health!

MRS. ALVING (sitting down at the table). 50 Sit down, Oswald, and let us have a quiet talk.

OSWALD (sitting down). You don't know, mother, that I owe Regina a little reparation.

MRS. ALVING. You!

OSWALD. Oh, it was only a little thoughtlessness — call it what you like. Something quite innocent, anyway. The last time I was home —

MRS. ALVING. Yes?

OSWALD. — she used often ask me 10 questions about Paris, and I told her one thing and another about the life there. And I remember saying one day: "Wouldn't you like to go there yourself?"

MRS. ALVING. Well?

OSWALD. I saw her blush, and she said: "Yes, I should like to very much." "All right," I said, "I daresay it might be managed" — or something of that sort.

MRS. ALVING. And then?

OSWALD. I naturally had forgotten all about it; but the day before yesterday I happened to ask her if she was glad I was going to be so long at home —

MRS. ALVING. Well?

OSWALD. — and she looked so queerly at me, and asked: "But what is to become of my trip to Paris?"

MRS. ALVING. Her trip!

OSWALD. And then I got it out of her that she had taken the thing seriously, and had been thinking about me all the time, and had set herself to learn French —

MRS. ALVING. So that was why —

OSWALD. Mother — when I saw this fine, splendid, handsome girl standing there in front of me — I had never paid any attention to her before then — but now, when she stood there as if with open arms ready for me to take her to myself —

MRS. ALVING. Oswald!

OSWALD. Then I realised that my salvation lay in her, for I saw the joy of life in her.

MRS. ALVING (starting back). The joy 45 of life —? Is there salvation in that?

REGINA (coming in from the dining-room with a bottle of champagne). Excuse me for being so long; but I had to go to the cellar. (Puts the bottle down on the table.)

OSWALD. Bring another glass, too.

REGINA (looking at him in astonishment). The mistress's glass is there, sir.

OSWALD. Yes, but fetch one for yourself, Regina. (REGINA starts, and gives a quick shy glance at MRS. ALVING.) Well.

REGINA (in a low and hesitating voice). Do you wish me to, ma'am?

MRS. ALVING. Fetch the glass, Regina. (REGINA goes into the dining-room.)

OSWALD (looking after her). Have you noticed how well she walks? — so firmly and confidently!

MRS. ALVING. It cannot be, Oswald.

OSWALD. It is settled. You must see that. It is no use forbidding it. (REGINA comes in with a glass, which she holds in her hand.) Sit down, Regina. (REGINA looks questioningly at MRS. ALVING.)

MRS. ALVING. Sit down. (REGINA sits down on a chair near the dining-room door, still holding the glass in her hand.) Oswald, what was it you were saying about the joy of life?

OSWALD. Ah, mother — the joy of life! You don't know very much about that at home here. I shall never realise it here.

MRS. ALVING. Not even when you are with me?

OSWALD. Never at home. But you can't understand that.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, indeed I almost think I do understand you — now.

OSWALD. That — and the joy of work. They are really the same thing at bottom. But you don't know anything about that either.

MRS. ALVING. Perhaps you are right. Tell me some more about it, Oswald.

OSWALD. Well, all I mean is that here people are brought up to believe that work is a curse and a punishment for sin, and that life is a state of wretchedness and that the sooner we can get out of it the better.

MRS. ALVING. A vale of tears, yes. And we quite conscientiously make it so.

OSWALD. But the people over there will have none of that. There is no one there who really believes doctrines of that kind any longer. Over there the mere fact of being alive is thought to be a matter for exultant happiness. Mother, have you noticed that everything I have painted has turned upon the joy of life? — always upon the joy of life, unfaillingly. There is light there, and sunshine, and a holiday feeling — and people's faces beaming with happiness. That is why I am afraid to stay at home here with you.

MRS. ALVING. Afraid? What are you afraid of here, with me?

OSWALD. I am afraid that all these feelings that are so strong in me would degenerate into something ugly here.

MRS. ALVING (looking steadily at him). Do you think that is what would happen?

OSWALD. I am certain it would. Even if one lived the same life at home here, as over there — it would never really be the same life.

MRS. ALVING (who has listened anxiously to him, gets up with a thoughtful expression and says): Now I see clearly how it all happened.

OSWALD. What do you see?

MRS. ALVING. I see it now for the first time. And now I can speak.

OSWALD (getting up). Mother, I don't understand you.

REGINA (who has got up also). Perhaps I had better go.

MRS. ALVING. No, stay here. Now I can speak. Now, my son, you shall know the whole truth. Oswald! Regina!

OSWALD. Hush! — here is the parson — (MANDERS comes in by the hall door.)

MANDERS. Well, my friends, we have been spending an edifying time over there.

OSWALD. So have we.

MANDERS. Engstrand must have help with his Sailors' Home. Regina must go home with him and give him her assistance.

REGINA. No, thank you, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS (perceiving her for the first time). What —? you in here? — and with a wineglass in your hand!

REGINA (pulling down the glass hastily). I beg your pardon —!

OSWALD. Regina is going away with me, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. Going away! With you!

OSWALD. Yes, as my wife — if she insists on that.

MANDERS. But, good heavens —!

REGINA. It is not my fault, Mr. Manders.

OSWALD. Or else she stays here if I stay.

REGINA (involuntarily). Here!

MANDERS. I am amazed at you, Mrs. Alving.

MRS. ALVING. Neither of those things will happen, for now I can speak openly.

MANDERS. But you won't do that! No, no, no!

MRS. ALVING. Yes, I can and I will. And without destroying any one's ideals.

OSWALD. Mother, what is it that is being concealed from me?

REGINA (listening). Mrs. Alving! Listen. They are shouting outside. (Goes into the conservatory and looks out.)

OSWALD (going to the window on the left). What can be the matter? Where does that glare come from?

REGINA (calls out). The Orphanage is on fire!

MRS. ALVING (going to the window). On fire?

MANDERS. On fire? Impossible. I was there just a moment ago.

OSWALD. Where is my hat? Oh, never mind that. Father's Orphanage —! (Runs out through the garden door.)

MRS. ALVING. My shawl, Regina! The whole place is in flames.

MANDERS. How terrible! Mrs. Alving, that fire is a judgment on this house of sin!

MRS. ALVING. Quite so. Come, Regina. (She and REGINA hurry out.)

MANDERS (clasping his hands). And no insurance! (Follows them out.)

ACT III

The same scene. All the doors are standing open. The lamp is still burning on the table. It is dark outside, except for a faint glimmer of light seen through the windows at the back. MRS. ALVING, with a shawl over her head, is standing in the conservatory, looking out. REGINA, also wrapped in a shawl, is standing a little behind her.

MRS. ALVING. Everything burnt — down to the ground.

REGINA. It is burning still in the basement.

MRS. ALVING. I can't think why Oswald doesn't come back. There is no chance of saving anything.

REGINA. Shall I go, and take his hat to him?

MRS. ALVING. Hasn't he even got his hat?

REGINA (pointing to the hall). No, there it is, hanging up.

MRS. ALVING. Never mind. He is sure to come back soon. I will go and see what he is doing. (Goes out by the garden door.) MANDERS comes in from the hall.)

MANDERS. Isn't Mrs. Alving here?

REGINA. She has just this moment gone down into the garden.

MANDERS. I have never spent such a terrible night in my life.

REGINA. Isn't it a shocking misfortune, sir!

MANDERS. Oh, don't speak about it. I scarcely dare to think about it.

REGINA. But how can it have happened?

MANDERS. Don't ask me, Miss Engstrand! How should I know? Are you going to suggest too —? Isn't it enough that your father —?

REGINA. What has he done?

MANDERS. He has nearly driven me crazy.

ENGSTRAND (coming in from the hall). Mr. Manders —!

MANDERS (turning round with a start). Great heavens!

ENGSTRAND. What a dreadful thing, your reverence!

MANDERS (walking up and down). Oh dear, oh dear!

REGINA. What do you mean?

ENGSTRAND. Our little prayer-meeting was the cause of it all, don't you see? (Aside to REGINA.) Now we've got the old fool, my girl. (Aloud.) And to think it is my fault that Mr. Manders should be the cause of such a thing.

MANDERS. I assure you, Engstrand —

ENGSTRAND. But there was no one else carrying a light there except you, sir.

MANDERS (standing still). Yes, so you say. But I have no clear recollection of having had a light in my hand.

ENGSTRAND. But I saw quite distinctly your reverence take a candle and snuff it with your fingers and throw away the burning bit of wick among the shavings.

MANDERS. Did you see that?

ENGSTRAND. Yes, distinctly.

MANDERS. I can't understand it at all. It is never my habit to snuff a candle with my fingers.

ENGSTRAND. Yes, it wasn't like you to do that, sir. But who would have thought it could be such a dangerous thing to do?

MANDERS (walking restlessly backwards and forwards). Oh, don't ask me!

ENGSTRAND (following him about). And you hadn't insured it either, had you, sir?

MANDERS. No, no, no; you heard me say so.

ENGSTRAND. You hadn't insured it — and then went and set light to the whole place! Good Lord, what bad luck!

MANDERS (wiping the perspiration from his forehead). You may well say so, Engstrand.

ENGSTRAND. And that it should happen to a charitable institution that would have been of service both to the town and the country, so to speak! The newspapers won't be very kind to your reverence, I expect.

MANDERS. No, that is just what I am thinking of. It is almost the worst part of the whole thing. The spiteful attacks and accusations — it is horrible to think of!

MRS. ALVING (coming in from the garden). I can't get him away from the fire.

MANDERS. Oh, there you are, Mrs. Alving.

MRS. ALVING. You will escape having to make your inaugural address now, at all events, Mr. Manders.

MANDERS. Oh, I would so gladly have —

MRS. ALVING (in a dull voice). It is just as well it has happened. This Orphanage would never have come to any good.

MANDERS. Don't you think so?

MRS. ALVING. Do you?

MANDERS. But it is none the less an extraordinary piece of ill luck.

MRS. ALVING. We will discuss it simply as a business matter. — Are you waiting for Mr. Manders, Engstrand?

ENGSTRAND (at the hall door). Yes, I am.

MRS. ALVING. Sit down then, while you are waiting.

ENGSTRAND. Thank you, I would rather stand.

MRS. ALVING (to MANDERS). I suppose you are going by the boat?

MANDERS. Yes. It goes in about an hour.

MRS. ALVING. Please take all the documents back with you. I don't want to hear another word about the matter. I have something else to think about now —

MANDERS. Mrs. Alving —

MRS. ALVING. Later on I will send you a power of attorney to deal with it exactly as you please.

MANDERS. I shall be most happy to undertake that. I am afraid the original intention of the bequest will have to be entirely altered now.

MRS. ALVING. Of course.

MANDERS. Provisionally, I should suggest this way of disposing of it. Make over the Solvik property to the parish. The land is undoubtedly not without a certain value; it will always be useful for some purpose or another. And as for the interest on the remaining capital that is on deposit in the bank, possibly I might make suitable use of that in support of some undertaking that promises to be of use to the town.

MRS. ALVING. Do exactly as you please. The whole thing is a matter of indifference to me now.

ENGSTRAND. You will think of my Sailors' Home, Mr. Manders?

MANDERS. Yes, certainly, that is a suggestion. But we must consider the matter carefully.

ENGSTRAND (aside). Consider! — devil take it! Oh, Lord.

MANDERS (sighing). And unfortunately I can't tell how much longer I may have anything to do with the matter — whether public opinion may not force me to retire from it altogether. That depends entirely upon the result of the enquiry into the cause of the fire.

MRS. ALVING. What do you say?

MANDERS. And one cannot in any way reckon upon the result beforehand.

ENGSTRAND (going nearer to him). Yes, indeed one can; because here stand I, Jacob Engstrand.

MANDERS. Quite so, but —

ENGSTRAND (lowering his voice). And Jacob Engstrand isn't the man to desert a worthy benefactor in the hour of need, as the saying is.

MANDERS. Yes, but my dear fellow — how —?

ENGSTRAND. You might say Jacob Engstrand is an angel of salvation, so to speak, your reverence.

MANDERS. No, no, I couldn't possibly 10 accept that.

ENGSTRAND. That's how it will be, all the same. I know some one who has taken the blame for some one else on his shoulders before now, I do.

MANDERS. Jacob! (Grasps his hand.) You are one in a thousand! You shall have assistance in the matter of your Sailors' Home, and you may rely upon that. (ENGSTRAND tries to thank him, but 20 is prevented by emotion.)

MANDERS (hanging his wallet over his shoulder). Now we must be off. We will travel together.

ENGSTRAND (by the dining-room door, 25 says aside to REGINA). Come with me, you hussy! You will be as cosy as the yolk in an egg!

REGINA (tossing her head). Merci! (She goes out into the hall and brings back MAN- 30 ders' luggage.)

MANDERS. Good-bye, Mrs. Alving! And may the spirit of order and of what is lawful speedily enter into this house.

MRS. ALVING. Good-bye, Mr. Manders. (She goes into the conservatory, as she sees OSWALD coming in by the garden door.)

ENGSTRAND (as he and REGINA are helping MANDERS on with his coat). Good-bye, my child. And if anything should happen 40 to you, you know where Jacob Engstrand is to be found. (Lowering his voice.) Little Harbour Street, ahem —! (To MRS. ALVING and OSWALD.) And my house for poor seafaring men shall be called the "Alving Home," it shall. And, if I can carry out my own ideas about it, I shall make bold to hope that it may be worthy of bearing the late Mr. Alving's name.

MANDERS (at the door). Ahem — ahem! 50 Come along, my dear Engstrand. Good-bye — good-bye! (He and ENGSTRAND go out by the hall door.)

OSWALD (going to the table). What house was he speaking about?

MRS. ALVING. I believe, it is some sort of a Home that he and Mr. Manders want 5 to start.

OSWALD. It will be burnt up just like this one.

MRS. ALVING. What makes you think that?

OSWALD. Everything will be burnt up; nothing will be left that is in memory of my father. Here am I being burnt up, too. (REGINA looks at him in alarm.)

MRS. ALVING. Oswald! You should 15 not have stayed so long over there, my poor boy.

OSWALD (sitting down at the table). I almost believe you are right.

MRS. ALVING. Let me dry your face, Oswald; you are all wet. (Wipes his face with her handkerchief.)

OSWALD (looking straight before him, with no expression in his eyes). Thank you, mother.

MRS. ALVING. And aren't you tired, Oswald? Don't you want to go to sleep?

OSWALD (uneasily). No, no — not to sleep! I never sleep; I only pretend to. (Gloomily.) That will come soon 30 enough.

MRS. ALVING (looking at him anxiously). Anyhow you are really ill, my darling boy.

REGINA (intently). Is Mr. Alving ill?

OSWALD (impatiently). And do shut all 35 the doors! This deadly fear —

MRS. ALVING. Shut the doors, Regina. (REGINA shuts the doors and remains standing by the hall door. MRS. ALVING takes off her shawl; REGINA does the same.)

MRS. ALVING draws up a chair near to OSWALD'S and sits down beside him.) That's it! Now I will sit beside you —

OSWALD. Yes, do. And Regina must stay in here too. Regina must always be 45 near me. You must give me a helping hand, you know, Regina. Won't you do that?

REGINA. I don't understand —

MRS. ALVING. A helping hand?

OSWALD. Yes — When there is need for it.

MRS. ALVING. Oswald, have you not your mother to give you a helping hand?

OSWALD. You? (Smiles.) No, mother, you will never give me the kind of helping hand I mean. (Laughs grimly.) You! Ha, ha! (Looks gravely at her.) After all, you have the best right. (Impetuously.) Why don't you call me by my Christian name, Regina? Why don't you say Oswald?

REGINA (in a low voice). I did not think Mrs. Alving would like it.

MRS. ALVING. It will not be long before you have the right to do it. Sit down here now beside us, too. (REGINA sits down quietly and hesitatingly at the other side of the table.) And now, my poor tortured boy, I am going to take the burden off your mind —

OSWALD. You, mother?

MRS. ALVING. — all that you call remorse and regret and self-reproach.

OSWALD. And you think you can do that?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, now I can, Oswald. A little while ago you were talking about the joy of life, and what you said seemed to shed a new light upon everything in my whole life.

OSWALD (shaking his head). I don't in the least understand what you mean.

MRS. ALVING. You should have known your father in his young days in the army. He was full of the joy of life, I can tell you.

OSWALD. Yes, I know.

MRS. ALVING. It gave me a holiday feeling only to look at him, full of irrepressible energy and exuberant spirits.

OSWALD. What then?

MRS. ALVING. Well, then this boy, full of the joy of life — for he was just like a boy, then — had to make his home in a second-rate town which had none of the joy to offer him, but only dissipations. He had to come out here and live an aimless life; he had only an official post. He had no work worth devoting his whole mind to; he had nothing more than official routine to attend to. He had not a single companion capable of appreciating what the joy of life meant; nothing but idlers and tipplers —

OSWALD. Mother!

MRS. ALVING. And so the inevitable happened!

OSWALD. What was the inevitable?

MRS. ALVING. You said yourself this evening what would happen in your case if you stayed at home.

OSWALD. Do you mean by that, that father —?

MRS. ALVING. Your poor father never found any outlet for the overmastering joy of life that was in him. And I brought no holiday spirit into his home, either.

OSWALD. You didn't either?

MRS. ALVING. I had been taught about duty, and the sort of thing I believed in so long here. Everything seemed to turn upon duty — my duty, or his duty — and I am afraid I made your poor father's home unbearable to him, Oswald.

OSWALD. Why did you never say anything about it to me in your letters?

MRS. ALVING. I never looked at it as a thing I could speak of to you, who were his son.

OSWALD. What way did you look at it, then?

MRS. ALVING. I only saw the one fact, that your father was a lost man before you ever were born.

OSWALD (in a choking voice). Ah —! (He gets up and goes to the window.)

MRS. ALVING. And then I had the one thought in my mind, day and night, that Regina in fact had as good a right in this house — as my own boy had.

OSWALD (turns round suddenly). Regina —?

REGINA (gets up and asks in choking tones). I —?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, now you both know it.

OSWALD. Regina!

REGINA (to herself). So mother was one of that sort too.

MRS. ALVING. Your mother had many good qualities, Regina.

REGINA. Yes, but she was one of that sort, too, all the same. I have even thought so myself, sometimes, but —. Then, if you please, Mrs. Alving, may I have permission to leave at once?

MRS. ALVING. Do you really wish to, Regina?

REGINA. Yes, indeed, I certainly wish to.

MRS. ALVING. Of course you shall do as you like, but —

OSWALD (going up to REGINA). Leave now? This is your home.

REGINA. Merci, Mr. Alving — oh, of course I may say Oswald now, but that is not the way I thought it would become allowable.

MRS. ALVING. Regina, I have not been open with you —

REGINA. No, I can't say you have! If I had known Oswald was ill —. And now that there can never be anything serious between us —. No, I really can't stay here in the country and wear myself out looking after invalids.

OSWALD. Not even for the sake of one who has so near a claim on you?

REGINA. No, indeed I can't. A poor girl must make some use of her youth, otherwise she may easily find herself out in the cold before she knows where she is. And I have got the joy of life in me, too, Mrs. Alving!

MRS. ALVING. Yes, unfortunately; but don't throw yourself away, Regina.

REGINA. Oh, what's going to happen will happen. If Oswald takes after his father, it is just as likely I take after my mother, I expect. — May I ask, Mrs. Alving, whether Mr. Manders knows this about me?

MRS. ALVING. Mr. Manders knows everything.

REGINA (putting on her shawl). Oh, well then, the best thing I can do is to get away by the boat as soon as I can. Mr. Manders is such a nice gentleman to deal with; and it certainly seems to me that I have just as much right to some of that money as he — as that horrid carpenter.

MRS. ALVING. You are quite welcome to it, Regina.

REGINA (looking at her fixedly). You might as well have brought me up like a gentleman's daughter; it would have been more suitable. (Tosses her head.) Oh, well — never mind! (With a bitter glance at the unopened bottle.) I daresay some day I shall be drinking champagne with gentle folk, after all.

MRS. ALVING. If ever you need a home, Regina, come to me.

REGINA. No, thank you, Mrs. Alving. Mr. Manders takes an interest in me, I know. And if things should go very badly with me, I know one house at any rate where I shall feel at home.

MRS. ALVING. Where is that?

REGINA. In the "Alving Home."

MRS. ALVING. Regina — I can see quite well — you are going to your ruin!

REGINA. Pooh! — good-bye. (She bows to them and goes out through the hall.)

OSWALD (standing by the window and looking out). Has she gone?

MRS. ALVING. Yes.

OSWALD (muttering to himself). I think it's all wrong.

MRS. ALVING (going up to him from behind and putting her hands on his shoulders). Oswald, my dear boy — has it been a great shock to you?

OSWALD (turning his face towards her). All this about father, do you mean?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, about your unhappy father. I am so afraid it may have been too much for you.

OSWALD. What makes you think that? Naturally it has taken me entirely by surprise; but, after all, I don't know that it matters much to me.

MRS. ALVING (drawing back her hands). Doesn't matter! — that your father's life was such a terrible failure!

OSWALD. Of course I can feel sympathy for him, just as I would for any one else, but —

MRS. ALVING. No more than that! For your own father!

OSWALD (impatiently). Father — father. I never knew anything of my father. I don't remember anything else about him except that he once made me sick.

MRS. ALVING. It is dreadful to think of it! — But surely a child should feel some affection for his father, whatever happens?

OSWALD. When the child has nothing to thank his father for? When he has never known him? Do you really cling to that antiquated superstition — you, who are so broadminded in other things?

MRS. ALVING. You call it nothing but a superstition!

OSWALD. Yes, and you can see that for yourself quite well, mother. It is one of those beliefs that are put into circulation in the world, and —

MRS. ALVING. Ghosts of beliefs!

OSWALD (walking across the room). Yes, 5 You have no longer all those painful depressing thoughts to brood over.

MRS. ALVING (with an outburst of feeling). Oswald — then you don't love me either!

OSWALD. You I know, at any rate — 10

MRS. ALVING. You know me, yes; but is that all?

OSWALD. And I know how fond you are of me, and I ought to be grateful to you for that. Besides, you can be so tremendously 15 useful to me, now that I am ill.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, can't I, Oswald! I could almost bless your illness, as it has driven you home to me. For I see quite well that you are not my very own yet; 20

OSWALD (impatiently). Yes, yes, yes; all that is just a way of talking. You must remember I am a sick man, mother. I can't concern myself much with any one 25 else; I have enough to do, thinking about myself.

MRS. ALVING (gently). I will be very good and patient.

OSWALD. And cheerful too, mother! 30

MRS. ALVING. Yes, my dear boy, you are quite right. (Goes up to him.) Now have I taken away all your remorse and self-reproach?

OSWALD. Yes, you have done that. 35 But who will take away the fear?

MRS. ALVING. The fear?

OSWALD (crossing the room). Regina would have done it for one kind word.

MRS. ALVING. I don't understand you. 40 What fear do you mean — and what has Regina to do with it?

OSWALD. Is it very late, mother?

MRS. ALVING. It is early morning. (Looks out through the conservatory win- 45 dows.) The dawn is breaking already on the heights. And the sky is clear, Oswald. In a little while you will see the sun.

OSWALD. I am glad of that. After all, 50 there may be many things yet for me to be glad of and to live for —

MRS. ALVING. I should hope so!

OSWALD. Even if I am not able to work —

MRS. ALVING. You will soon find you are able to work again now, my dear boy. You have no longer all those painful depressing thoughts to brood over.

OSWALD. No, it is a good thing that you have been able to rid me of those fancies. If only, now, I could overcome this one thing — (Sits down on the couch.) Let us have a little chat, mother.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, let us. (Pushes an armchair to the couch and sits down beside him.)

OSWALD. The sun is rising — and you know all about it; so I don't feel the fear any longer.

MRS. ALVING. I know all about what?

OSWALD (without listening to her). Mother, isn't it the case that you said this evening there was nothing in the world you would not do for me if I asked you?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, certainly I said so.

OSWALD. And you will be as good as your word, mother?

MRS. ALVING. You may rely upon that, my own dear boy. I have nothing else to live for, but you.

OSWALD. Yes, yes; well, listen to me, mother. You are very strong-minded, I know. I want you to sit quite quiet when you hear what I am going to tell you.

MRS. ALVING. What is this dreadful thing —?

OSWALD. You mustn't scream. Do you hear? Will you promise me that? We are going to sit and talk it over quite quietly. Will you promise me that, mother?

MRS. ALVING. Yes, yes, I promise — only tell me what it is.

OSWALD. Well, then, you must know that this fatigue of mine — and my not being able to think about my work — all that is not really the illness itself —

MRS. ALVING. What is the illness itself?

OSWALD. What I am suffering from is hereditary; it — (touches his forehead, and 55 speaks very quietly) — it lies here.

MRS. ALVING (almost speechless). Oswald! No — no!

OSWALD. Don't scream; I can't stand it. Yes, I tell you, it lies here, waiting. And any time, any moment, it may break out.

MRS. ALVING. How horrible —!

OSWALD. Do keep quiet. That is the state I am in —

MRS. ALVING (springing up). It isn't true, Oswald! It is impossible. It can't be that!

OSWALD. I had one attack while I was abroad. It passed off quickly. But when I learnt the condition I had been in, then this dreadful haunting fear took possession of me.

MRS. ALVING. That was the fear, 15 then —

OSWALD. Yes, it is so indescribably horrible, you know. If only it had been an ordinary mortal disease —. I am not so much afraid of dying; though, of course, 20 I should like to live as long as I can.

MRS. ALVING. Yes, yes, Oswald, you must!

OSWALD. But this is so appallingly horrible. To become like a helpless child 25 again — to have to be fed, to have to be —. Oh, it's unspeakable!

MRS. ALVING. My child has his mother to tend to him.

OSWALD (jumping up). No, never; that 30 is just what I won't endure! I dare not think what it would mean to linger on like that for years — to get old and grey like that. And you might die before I did. (Sits down in MRS. ALVING'S chair.) 35 Because it doesn't necessarily have a fatal end quickly, the doctor said. He called it a kind of softening of the brain — or something of that sort. (Smiles mournfully.) I think that expression sounds so 40 nice. It always makes me think of cherry-coloured velvet curtains — something that is soft to stroke.

MRS. ALVING (with a scream). Oswald!

OSWALD (jumps up and walks about the 45 room). And now you have taken Regina from me! If I had only had her. She would have given me a helping hand, I know.

MRS. ALVING (going up to him). What do you mean, my darling boy? Is there 50 any help in the world I would not be willing to give you?

OSWALD. When I had recovered from the attack I had abroad, the doctor told me that when it recurred — and it will recur — there would be no more hope.

MRS. ALVING. And he was heartless enough to —

OSWALD. I insisted on knowing. I told him I had arrangements to make —. (Smiles cunningly.) And so I had. (Takes a small box from his inner breast-pocket.)

Mother, do you see this?

MRS. ALVING. What is it?

OSWALD. Morphia powders.

MRS. ALVING (looking at him in terror). Oswald — my boy!

OSWALD. I have twelve of them saved up —

MRS. ALVING (snatching at it). Give me the box, Oswald!

OSWALD. Not yet, mother. (Puts it back in his pocket.)

MRS. ALVING. I shall never get over this!

OSWALD. You must. If I had had Regina here now, I would have told her quietly how things stand with me — and asked her to give me this last helping hand. She would have helped me, I am certain.

MRS. ALVING. Never.

OSWALD. If this horrible thing had come upon me and she had seen me lying helpless, like a baby, past help, past saving, past hope — with no chance of recovering —

MRS. ALVING. Never in the world would Regina have done it.

OSWALD. Regina would have done it. Regina was so splendidly light-hearted. And she would very soon have tired of looking after an invalid like me.

MRS. ALVING. Then thank heaven Regina is not here!

OSWALD. Well, now you have got to give me that helping hand, mother.

MRS. ALVING (with a loud scream). I! OSWALD. Who has a better right than you?

MRS. ALVING. I! Your mother!

OSWALD. Just for that reason.

MRS. ALVING. I, who gave you your life!

OSWALD. I never asked you for life. And what kind of a life was it that you gave me? I don't want it! You shall take it back!

MRS. ALVING. Help! Help! (Runs into the hall.)

OSWALD (following her). Don't leave me! Where are you going?

MRS. ALVING (in hall). To fetch the doctor to you, Oswald! Let me out!

OSWALD (going into the hall). You shan't go out. And no one shall come in. 10 (Turns the key in the lock.)

MRS. ALVING (coming in again). Oswald! Oswald! — my child!

OSWALD (following her). Have you a mother's heart — and can bear to see me 15 suffering this unspeakable terror?

MRS. ALVING (controlling herself, after a moment's silence). There is my hand on it.

OSWALD. Will you —?

MRS. ALVING. If it becomes necessary. 20 But it shan't become necessary. No, no — it is impossible that it should!

OSWALD. Let us hope so. And let us live together as long as we can. Thank you, mother.

(He sits down in the armchair, which MRS. ALVING had moved beside the couch. Day is breaking; the lamp is still burning on the table.)

MRS. ALVING (coming cautiously nearer). 30 Do you feel calmer now?

OSWALD. Yes.

MRS. ALVING (bending over him). It has only been a dreadful fancy of yours, Oswald. Nothing but fancy. All this 35 upset has been bad for you. But now you will get some rest, at home with your own mother, my darling boy. You shall have everything you want, just as you did when you were a little child. — There, now. 40 The attack is over. You see how easily it passed off! I knew it would. — And look,

Oswald, what a lovely day we are going to have? Brilliant sunshine. Now you will be able to see your home properly. (She goes to the table and puts out the lamp. It is sunrise. The glaciers and peaks in the distance are seen bathed in bright morning light.)

OSWALD (who has been sitting motionless in the armchair, with his back to the scene outside, suddenly says): Mother, give me the sun.

MRS. ALVING (standing at the table, and looking at him in amazement). What do you say?

OSWALD (repeats in a dull, toneless voice). The sun — the sun.

MRS. ALVING (going up to him). Oswald, what is the matter with you? (OSWALD seems to shrink up in the chair; all his muscles relax; his face loses its expression, and his eyes stare stupidly. MRS. ALVING is trembling with terror.)

What is it! (Screams.) Oswald! What is the matter with you! (Throws herself 25 on her knees beside him and shakes him.) Oswald! Oswald! Look at me! Don't you know me!

OSWALD (in an expressionless voice, as before). The sun — the sun.

MRS. ALVING (jumps up despairingly, beats her head with her hands, and screams). I can't bear it! (Whispers as though paralysed with fear.) I can't bear it! Never! (Suddenly.) Where has he got it? (Passes her hand quickly over his coat.) Here! (Draws back a little way and cries:) No, no, no! — Yes! — no, no! (She stands a few steps from him her hands thrust into her hair, and stares at him in speechless 40 terror.)

OSWALD (sitting motionless, as before). The sun — the sun.

CRITICISM AND PHILOSOPHY

FRENCH

SAINTE-BEUVE

(1804-1869)

Charles Augustin Sainte-Beuve was born in Boulogne. His father was a native of Picardy and his mother was half English. He went to a boarding school in Paris and later for four years studied medicine. He then joined the staff of a liberal newspaper, Le Globe, in which he published excellent articles on sixteenth-century French poetry. He also published volumes of poems in 1829, 1830, and 1837, and he was an active contributor to the Revue des deux mondes, founded in 1831. In 1840 he became one of the keepers of the Mazarin library, a post which gave him leisure for study and writing. Being now much preoccupied with the Greek classics, he wrote articles on them for the Revue des deux mondes; between 1832 and 1848 he contributed a series entitled "Portraits" to the Revue des deux mondes and the Revue de Paris. He was elected to the French Academy in 1844. After a political quarrel in 1848 had caused him to resign his post in the library, he spent a short time lecturing in Liège and then returned to Paris, where he began, in the Constitutionnel, his famous Causeries de lundi. Three years later he began a series for the Moniteur. In 1854 he was given the chair of French poetry in the College of France, but was so ill-received by the students that he resigned almost at once. He next held for four years a lectureship in the École Normale Supérieure, and in 1865 was made a senator. This position gave him sufficient income and leisure to pursue his work; but his health was gone and his career ended.

• Sainte-Beuve has been called the source of modern criticism. When someone once expressed the belief that Sainte-Beuve clung fast to a set pattern of literary opinions, he replied, "I hold very little to literary opinions; literary opinions occupy very little place in my life and in my thoughts. What does occupy me seriously is life itself and the object of it." Thus, as Henry James says in his article on Sainte-Beuve, the critic for Sainte-Beuve was "the student, the inquirer, the interpreter, the taker of notes, the active, restless commentator, whose constant aim was to arrive at justice of comprehension." Passionately devoted to the search for truth, through his enormously wide reading Sainte-Beuve constantly disciplined and steadied his judgment. He read to understand and to love, and he wrote that others might read and understand and love as well. He began always by attempting to determine the object of the author. Matthew Arnold was not far wrong when he referred to Sainte-Beuve as "a perfect critic." It was largely through Arnold that the Sainte-Beuve tradition reached English criticism.

The following selection comes from Essays on Men and Women, ed. Wm. Sharp, London, David Stott, 1890.

ROUSSEAU

After having spoken of the pure, airy, unemphatic, entirely fluid and free language which the closing seventeenth century had left to some extent as a legacy to the eighteenth, I would like to-day to speak of that language of the eighteenth century, as exemplified in the writer who did the most to improve it, who made it undergo, at least, the greatest revolution since Pascal, a revolution from which we of the nineteenth century begin to reckon. Before Rousseau and since Pascal there had been many trials of ways of writing, which were quite different from those of the eighteenth century: Fontenelle had his manner, if there had ever been a manner; Montesquieu had his, stronger, firmer, 10 more striking, but a manner still. Voltaire alone had none, and his vivid, clear, rapid language ran, so to speak, almost from the spring. "You find," says he, somewhere, "that I express myself very clearly: I am like the little rivulets; they are transparent because they are not very deep."

He said that laughing; one tells himself thus many half truths. The age, however, demanded more; it wished to be moved, warmed, rejuvenated by the expression of ideas and sentiments which it had not well defined, but which it was still seeking for. The prose of Buffon, in the first volumes of the Natural History, offered it a kind of image of what it desired, an image more majestic than lively, a little beyond its reach, and too much fettered to scientific themes. Rousseau appeared: the day when he became fully known to himself, he revealed at the same time to his age the writer who was best fitted to express with novelty, with vigour, with logic mingled with flame, the confused ideas which were fermenting and which desired expression.

In laying hold of the language which it was necessary for him to conquer and command, he gave it a bent which it was henceforth to keep; but he gave back to it more than he took away, and, in many respects, he reinvigorated and regenerated it. Since Rousseau, it is in the mould of language established and created by him that our greatest writers have cast their own innovations, and tried to excel. The pure form of the seventeenth century, such as we love to recall it, has been little more than a graceful antiquity and a regret to people of taste.

Although the Confessions did not appear till after the death of Rousseau, and when his influence was fully dominant, it is in that work that it is most convenient for us to study him to-day with all the merits, the fascinations, and the faults of his talents. We shall try to do so, confining ourselves as far as possible to a consideration of the writer, but without interdicting ourselves from remarks upon the ideas and character of the man. The present moment is not very favourable to Rousseau, who is accused of having been the author and promoter of many of the ills from which we suffer. "There is no writer," it has been judiciously said, "better fitted to make the poor man proud." In spite of all, in considering him here, we shall try not to harbour too much of that almost personal feeling which leads some good spirits to have a grudge against him, in the painful trials we are passing through. Men who have such a range of influence and such a future must not be judged by the feelings and reactions of a day.

The idea of writing the Confessions seems so natural to Rousseau, and so suitable to his disposition as well as to his genius, that one would not believe that it had been necessary to suggest it to him. It came to him, however, in the first place, from his publisher, Rey, of Amsterdam, and also from Duclos. After the Nouvelle Héloïse, after the Émile, Rousseau, fifty-two years old, began to write his Confessions in 1764, after his departure from Montmorency, during his stay at Motiers in Switzerland. In the last number of the Swiss Review (October, 1850), there has just been published a beginning of the Confessions, taken from a manuscript deposited in the Library of Neuchâtel, — a beginning which is Rousseau's first rough draft, and which he afterwards suppressed. In this first beginning, much less emphatic and less pompous than we read at the opening of the Confessions, we hear no peal of the trumpet of the Judgment, nor does it finish with the famous apostrophe to the Eternal Being. Rousseau sets forth there more at length, but philosophically, his plan of portraying himself, of giving his confessions with rigorous truthfulness; he shows clearly wherein the originality and singularity of his design consist: —

"No one can write a man's life but himself. The character of his inner being, his real life, is known only to himself; but, in writing it, he disguises it; under the name of his life, he makes an apology; he shows himself as he wishes to be seen, but not at all as he is. The sincerest persons are truthful at most in what they say, but they lie by their reticences, and that of which they say nothing so changes that which they pretend to confess, that in uttering only a part of the truth they say nothing. I put Montaigne at the head of these falsely-sincere persons who wish to deceive in telling the truth. He shows himself with his faults, but he gives himself none but amiable ones; there is no man who has not odious ones. Montaigne paints his likeness, but it is a profile. Who knows whether some scar on the cheek, or an eye put out, on the side which he conceals from us, would not have totally changed the physiognomy?"

He wishes, then, to do what no one has planned or dared before him. As to style, it seems to him that he must invent one as novel as his plan, and commensurate with the diversity and disparity of the things which he proposes to describe:—

"If I wish to produce a work written with care, like the others, I shall not paint, I shall rouge myself. It is with my portrait that I am here concerned, and not with a book. I am going to work, so to speak, in the dark room; there is no other art necessary than to follow exactly the traits which I see marked. I form my resolution then about the style as about the things. I shall not try at all to render it uniform; I shall write always that which comes to me, I shall change it, without scruple, according to my humour; I shall speak of everything as I feel it, as I see it, without care, without constraint, without being embarrassed by the medley. In yielding myself at once to the memory of the impression received and to the present sentiment, I shall doubly paint the state of my soul, namely, at the moment when the event happened to me and the moment when I describe it; my style, unequal and natural, sometimes rapid and sometimes diffuse, sometimes wise and sometimes foolish, sometimes grave and sometimes gay, will itself make a part of my history. Finally, whatever may be the way in which this book may be written, it will be always, by its object, a book precious for philosophers; it is, I repeat, an illustrative piece for the study of the human heart, and it is the only one that exists."

Rousseau's error was not in believing that in thus confessing himself aloud before everybody, and with a sentiment so different from Christian humility, he did a singular thing; his error was in believing that he did a useful thing. He did not see that he did like the doctor who should set himself to describe, in an intelligible, seductive manner, for the use of worldly people and the ignorant, some infirmity, some well-characterized mental malady: that doctor would be partially guilty of, and responsible for, all the maniacs and fools whom, through imitation and contagion, his book should make. The first pages of the Confessions are too strongly accented and very painful. I find in them, at the very beginning, "a void occasioned by a fault of memory"; Rousseau speaks there of the authors of his days; he brings at birth the germ of an inconvenience which the years have increased, he says, and "which now sometimes gives him some respites only to," etc. etc. All this is disagreeable, and savours little of that flower of expression which we enjoyed the other day under the name of urbanity. And yet, close by these roughnesses of expression, and these crudities of the soil, we meet, strange to say, with a novel, familiar, and impressive simplicity!

"I felt before thinking; it is the common lot of humanity. I experienced it more than others. I know not what I did till I was five or six years old. I know not how I learned to read; I recollect only my first readings, and their effect upon me. My mother had left some romances; my father and I set to reading them after supper. The object, at first, was only to instruct me in reading, by means of amusing books, but soon the interest became so lively, that we read by turns without relaxation, and spent the night in that occupation. We could never leave off till the end of the volume. Sometimes my father, hearing the swallows in the morning, said, quite ashamed: 'Let us go to bed, I am more of a child than you.'"

Note well that swallow; it is the first, and it announces the new spring-time of the language; one does not see it begin to appear till in Rousseau. It is from him that the sentiment of nature is reckoned among us, in the eighteenth century. It is from him also that is dated, in our literature, the sentiment of domestic life; of that homely, poor, quiet, hidden life, in which are accumulated so many treasures of virtue and affection. Amid certain details, in bad taste, in which he speaks of robbery and of eatables, how one pardons him on account of that old song of childhood, of which he knows only the air and some words stitched together, but which he always wished to recover, and which he never recalls, old as he is, without a soothing charm!

"It is a caprice which I wholly fail to comprehend, but it is utterly impossible for me to sing it to the end, without being checked by my tears. I have a hundred times planned to write to Paris, to have the rest of the words sought for, if any one there knows them still: but I am almost sure that the pleasure which I take in recalling that air would vanish in part, if I had proof that other persons than my poor Aunt Susy have sung it."

This is the novelty in the author of the Confessions, this is what ravishes us by opening to us an unexpected source of deep and domestic sensibility. We read together the other day Madame de Caylus¹ and her Recollections; but of what memories of childhood does she speak to us? whom did she love? for what did she weep in quitting the home in which she was born, in which she was reared? Has she the least thought in the world of telling us of it? These aristocratic and refined races, gifted with so exquisite a tact and so lively a sensibility to raillery, either do not love these simple things, or dare not let it be seen that they do. Their wit we know well enough, and we enjoy it; but where is their heart? One must be plebeian, and provincial, and a new man like Rousseau, to show himself so subject to affections of the heart and so sensitive to natural influences.

Again, when we remark with some regret that Rousseau forced, racked, and, so to speak, ploughed the language, we add immediately that he at the same time sowed and fertilized it.

A man of a proud, aristocratic family, but a pupil of Rousseau, and who had hardly more than he the sentiment and fear of the ridiculous, M. de Chateaubriand, has repeated in René and in his Memoirs that more or less direct manner of avowals and confessions, and he has drawn from it some magical and surprising effects. Let us note, however, the differences. Rousseau has not the original elevation; he is not entirely — far from it! — what one calls a well-born child; he has an inclination to vice, and to low vices; he has secret and shameful lusts which do not indicate the gentleman; he has that extreme shyness which so suddenly turns into the effrontery of the rogue and the vagabond, as he calls himself; in a word, he has not that safeguard of honour which M. de Chateaubriand had from childhood, standing like a watchful sentinel by the side of his faults. But Rousseau, with all these disadvantages, which we do not fear, after him, to mention by their name, is a better man than Chateaubriand, inasmuch as he is more human, more a man, more tender. He has not, for example, that incredible hardness of heart (a hardness really quite feudal), and that thoughtlessness in speaking of his father and his mother. When he speaks of the wrongs done him by his father, who, an honest man, but a man of pleasure, thoughtless, and remarried, abandoned him and left him to his fate, with what delicacy does he mention that painful matter! With what deep feeling is all that depicted! It is not of chivalric delicacy that I speak; it is of the real, the heart-felt, that which is moral and human.

It is incredible that this inner moral sentiment with which he was endowed, and which kept him so much in sympathy with other men, should not have apprised Rousseau how far he derogated from it in many a passage of his life and in many a phrase which he affects. His style, like his life, contracted some of the vices of his early education and of the bad company which he kept at first. After a childhood, virtuously passed in the circle of the domestic hearth, he became an apprentice, and as such underwent hardships which spoiled his tone and deprived him of delicacy. The words, rogue, vagabond, ragamuffin, knave, have nothing that gives him any embarrassment, and it even seems as if they returned with a certain complacency to his pen. His language preserves always something of the bad tone of his early years. I distinguish in his language two kinds of debasement: the objection to one of them is merely that it is provincial, and bespeaks a Frenchman born out of France. Rousseau will write without scowling: "Comme que je fasse, comme que ce fût," etc., instead of saying, "De quelque manière que je fasse, de quelque manière que ce fût," etc.; he articulates strongly and roughly; he has at times a little goffre in his voice. But that is a fault which one pardons him, so far has he succeeded in triumphing over it in some happy pages; so far, by force of labour and emotion, has he softened his organ of speech, and learned how to give to that cultivated and laborious style mellowness and the appearance of a first gush. The other kind of debasement and corruption which one may note in him is graver, inasmuch as it touches the moral sense; he does not seem to suspect that there are certain things, the mention of which is forbidden, that there are certain ignoble, disgusting, cynical expressions which a virtuous man never uses, and which he ignores. Rousseau, at some time, was a lackey; we perceive it, in more than one place, in his style. He hates neither the word nor the thing. "If Fénelon were living, you would be a Catholic," said Bernardin de Saint-Pierre¹ to him one day, on seeing him affected by some ceremony of the Catholic worship. "Oh! if Fénelon were living," cried Rousseau, all in tears, "I should seek to be his lackey, that I might deserve to be his valet de chambre." We see the lack of taste even in the emotion. Rousseau is not only a workman in respect to language, an apprentice before becoming a master, who lets us see in passages marks of the solderings; he is morally a man who, when young, had the most motley experiences, and whom ugly and villainous things do not make heart-sick when he names them. I shall say no more of this essential vice, this stain which it is so painful to have to notice and to censure in so great a writer and so great a painter, in such a man.

Slow to think, prompt to feel, with ardent and suppressed desires, with suffering and constraint each day, Rousseau reaches the age of sixteen, and he paints himself to us in these terms: —

"I reached thus my sixteenth year, restless, dissatisfied with everything and with myself, without a liking for my condition, without the pleasures of my age, devoured by desires of whose object I was ignorant, shedding tears without occasion, sighing without knowing why; finally, cherishing tenderly my chimeras from inability to see anything about me which was of equal value. On Sundays my play-mates came for me, after the church service, to go and play with them if I could; but, once engaged in their sports, I was more ardent, and I went farther than the rest, being difficult to stir and to restrain."

Always in extremes! We here recognise the first form of the thoughts, and almost the phrases of René,² those words which are already a music, and which sing still in our ears: —

"My disposition was impetuous, my character unequal. By turns noisy and joyous, silent and sad, I gathered my young companions about me, then, suddenly abandoning them, I went and seated myself apart to contemplate the fugitive cloud, or to hear the rain fall on the foliage."

Again: —

"When young I cultivated the Muses; there is nothing more poetic than a heart of sixteen years in the freshness of its passions. The morning of life is like the morning of the day, full of purity, of hopes, and of harmonies."

René, indeed, is no other than this young man of sixteen transposed, exiled amid different natural scenery, and in the midst of a different social condition; no longer an engraver's apprentice, son of a citizen of Geneva, of a citizen of the lower class, but a cavalier, a noble traveller at large, smitten with the Muses; all, at the first view, wears a more seductive, a more poetic colour; the unexpected character of the landscape and of the framework heightens the character, and denotes a new manner; but the first evident type is where we have indicated it, and it is Rousseau who, in looking into himself, has found it. René is a more pleasing model for us, because in it all the vile aspects of humanity are concealed from us; it has a tint of Greece, of chivalry, of Christianity, the reflections of which cross each other on its surface. Words, in that masterpiece of art, have acquired a new magic; they are words full of light and harmony. The horizon is enlarged in all directions, and the rays of Olympus play upon it. Rousseau has nothing comparable with this at the first view, but he is truer at heart, more real, more living. That workman's son who goes to play with his comrades after the preaching, or to muse alone if he can, that little youth with the well-shaped form, with the keen eye, with the fine physiognomy, and who arraigns all things more than one would like, — he has more reality than the other, and more life; he is benevolent, tender, and compassionate. In the two natures, that of René and that of Rousseau, there is a spot that is diseased; they have too much ardour mingled with a tendency to inaction and idleness — a predominance of imagination and of sensibility which turn back and prey upon themselves; but, of the two, Rousseau is the more truly sensitive, as he is the most original and the most sincere in his chimerical flights, in his regrets, and in his pictures of a possible but lost ideal felicity. When, at the end of the first book of the Confessions, quitting his country, he pictures to himself in a simple and touching manner the happiness which he could have enjoyed there in obscurity; when he tells us: "I should have passed in the bosom of my religion, of my country, of my family, and of my friends, a sweet and peaceful life, such as my disposition required, in regular labour suited to my taste, and in a society after my heart; I should have been a good Christian, a good citizen, a good father of a family, a good friend, a good workman, a good man in every respect; I should have loved my situation; I should have honoured it, perhaps, and, after having passed an obscure and simple, but even and pleasant life, I should have died peacefully in the bosom of my family; soon forgotten, no doubt, I should have been regretted, at least, as long as I should have been remembered"; when he speaks to us thus, he does indeed convince us of the sincerity of his wish and of his regret, so profound and lively is the sentiment that breathes through all his words, of the quiet, unvarying, and modest charm of a private life! Let none of us who, in this age, have been more or less afflicted with the malady of reverie, do like those ennobled persons who disown their ancestry, and let us learn that, before being the very unworthy children of the noble René, we are more certainly the grandchildren of citizen Rousseau.

The first book of the Confessions is not the most remarkable, but we find Rousseau in it already, quite complete, with his pride, his vices in their germ, his odd and grotesque humours, his meannesses and his obscenities (you see that I note everything); with his pride also, and that firm and independent spirit which exalts it; with his happy and healthy childhood, his suffering and martyred youth, and the apostrophes to society and avenging reprisals (one foresees them), with which it will inspire him at a later day; with his tender sentiment of domestic happiness and family life which he had so little opportunity of enjoying, and also with the first breaths of spring-time, a signal of the natural revival which will appear in the literature of the nineteenth century. We run a risk to-day of being too little impressed by these first picturesque pages of Rousseau; we are so spoiled by colours that we forget how fresh and new those first landscapes then were, and what an event it was in the midst of that very witty, very refined, but arid society, which was as devoid of imagination as of true sensibility, and had in its own veins none of the sap which circulates and at each season comes back again. French readers, accustomed to the factitious life of a salon atmosphere — the urbane readers, as he calls them — were astonished and quite enraptured to feel blowing from the region of the Alps these fresh and healthy mountain breezes which came to revive a literature that was alike elegant and dried up. It was time for this revival, and hence it is that Rousseau was not a corrupter of language, but, on the whole, a regenerator.

Before him La Fontaine alone, among us, had had as keen a relish for nature, and had known that charm of reverie in the fields; but the example had little effect; the people let the good man come and go with his fables, and kept in their salons. Rousseau was the first person who compelled all these fashionable people to go out of them, and to quit the great alley of the park for the true walk in the fields.

The beginning of the second book of the Confessions is delightful and full of freshness; Madame de Warens appears to us for the first time. In painting her, Rousseau's style becomes gentle and gracefully-mellow, and at the same time we discover a quality, an essential vein which is innate and pervades his whole manner — I mean sensuality. "Rousseau had a voluptuous mind," says a good critic; women play in his writings a great part; absent or present, they and their charms occupy his mind, inspire him and affect him, and something relating to them is mingled with all that he has written. "How," says he of Madame de Warens, "in approaching for the first time a lovely, polished, dazzling woman, a woman of a superior condition to mine, whose like I had never met, . . . how did I find myself at once as free, as much at my ease, as if I had been perfectly sure of pleasing her?"

This facility, this ease, which he will not usually feel when he finds himself in the presence of women, will always be found in his style when he paints them. The most adorable pages of the Confessions are those concerning that first meeting with Madame de Warens; those, also, where he describes the welcome of Madame Basile, the pretty shopkeeper of Turin: "She was brilliant and elegantly attired, and in spite of her gracious air that splendour had overpowered me. But her welcome, which was full of kindness, her compassionate tone, her soft and endearing manners, soon put me at my ease; I saw that I had succeeded, and that made me more successful."

Have you never observed that brilliancy and splendour of complexion, like a ray of the Italian sun? He then relates that vivid and mute scene, which nobody has forgotten, that scene of gestures, seasonably checked, all full of blushes and young desires. Join to this the walk in the environs of Annecy with Mademoiselles Galley and de Graffenried, every detail of which is enchanting. Such pages were, in French literature, the discovery of a new world, a world of sunshine and freshness, which men had near them without having perceived it; they presented a mixture of sensibility and of nature, one in which no sensuality appeared, except so far as it was permissible and necessary to deliver us at last from the false metaphysics of the heart and from conventional spiritualism. The sensuality of the brush, in that degree, cannot displease; it is temperate also, and is not masked, which renders it more innocent than that of which many painters have since made use.

As a painter, Rousseau everywhere manifests the sentiment of reality. He shows it every time that he speaks to us of beauty, which, even when it is imaginary, like his Julia,¹ assumes a body and perfectly visible forms, and is by no means an airy and intangible Iris. That he has this sense of reality appears from his wishing that every scene which he recollects or invents, that every character he introduces, should be enclosed and move in a well determined place, of which the smallest details may be traced and retained.

One of the things which he found fault with in the great novelist Richardson² was, that he did not connect the recollection of his characters with a locality the pictures of which one would have loved to identify. See also how he has contrived to naturalize his Julia and his Saint-Preux¹ in the Pays-de-band, on the border of that lake about which his heart never ceased to wander. His sound, firm mind continually lends its graver to the imagination, that nothing essential to the sketch may be omitted. Finally, this sense of reality is noticeable again in the care with which, amid all his circumstances and his adventures, happy or unhappy, and even the most romantic, he never forgets to speak of repasts and the details of a good, frugal cheer, fitted to give joy alike to heart and mind.

² An English novelist, 1689-1761, whose Clarissa Harlowe, a novel somewhat similar to Werther and to La Nouvelle Héloïse, admirably represented and strongly influenced the character of the romantic novel at that period.

This trait is also a material one; it is related to that citizen-like and popular character which I have noted in Rousseau. He had been hungry in his lifetime; he notes in his Confessions, with a feeling of thankfulness to Providence, the last time that it was his lot to experience literal want and hunger. Nor will he ever forget to introduce these incidents of real life and of the common humanity, these heart-matters, even into the ideal picture of his happiness, which he will give at a later day. It is by all these true qualities combined in his eloquence, that he seizes and holds us.

Nature, sincerely enjoyed and loved for herself, is the source of Rousseau's inspiration, whenever that inspiration is healthy, and not of a sickly kind. When he sees Madame de Warens again, on his return from Turin, he stays some time at her house, and from the room that is given him he sees gardens and discovers the country: "It was the first time," he says, "since I was at Bossey (a place where he was sent to be boarded in his childhood), that I had something green before my windows." Till then, to have or not to have something green under one's eyes had been a matter of great indifference to French literature; it belonged to Rousseau to make it perceive it. It is from this point of view that one might characterize him by a word: he was the first who put something green into our literature. Living thus, at the age of nineteen, near a woman whom he loved, but to whom he dare not declare his passion, Rousseau abandoned himself to a sadness which yet had nothing gloomy in it, and which was tempered by a flattering hope. Having gone to walk out of town, on a great fête day, whilst the people were at vespers, —

"The sound of the bells, which has always strangely affected me, the song of the birds, the beauty of the day, the softness of the landscape, the scattered and rural houses, in which I fixed in imagination our common abode, all this affected me with such a vivid, tender, sad, and touching impression, that I saw myself, as it were, in ecstasy transported to that happy time and to that happy sojourn, in which my heart, possessing all the felicity that could please it, enjoyed it with inexpressible rapture, without even dreaming of the pleasure of the senses."

This is what the child of Geneva felt at Annecy in the year 1731, whilst at Paris people were reading the Temple of Gnidus. On that day he discovered the reverie, that new charm which had been left as a singularity to La Fontaine, and which he was going, himself, finally to introduce into a literature that was till then polite or positive. Reverie, — such is his novelty, his discovery, his own America. The dream of that day was realized by him some years afterward, in his sojourn at the Charmettes, in that walk by day from Saint Louis, which he has described as nothing like it had ever before been depicted: —

"Everything seemed to conspire to promote the happiness of that day. It had rained just before; there was no dust, and the streams were running well; a gentle breeze stirred the leaves, the air was pure, the horizon cloudless, serenity reigned in the sky as in our hearts. We took our dinner at a peasant's house, and shared it with his family, who blessed us heartily. These poor Savoyards are such good people!"

With this kindly feeling, and in this observant and simply truthful way, he continues to unfold a picture in which all is perfect, all is enchanting, and in which only the name of Mamma applied to Madame de Warens morally wounds and pains us.

That period at the Charmettes, in which this still young heart was permitted to open for the first time, is the divinest of the Confessions, and it will never return, even when Rousseau shall have retired to the Hermitage. The description of those years at the Hermitage, and of the passion which came to seek him there, is very fascinating also, and is more remarkable perhaps than all that precedes it; he will justly exclaim, however: It is no longer the Charmettes there! The misanthropy and the suspicion, of which he is already the victim, will pursue him in that period of solitude. He will be thinking continually there of the Parisian world, of the society at D'Holbach's; he will enjoy his retreat in spite of them, but that thought will poison his purest enjoyments. His disposition will sour, and will contract during these years a henceforth incurable disorder. He will have, no doubt, some delicious moments then, and afterward, even to the end; he will find again, in Saint-Peter's Island, in the middle of Lake Bienne, an interval of calmness and of forgetfulness which will furnish him with inspiration for some of his finest pages, — that fifth walk of the Reveries, which, with the third letter to M. de Malesherbes, cannot be separated from the divinest passages of the Confessions. Nevertheless, nothing will equal in lightness, freshness, and joyousness the description of life at the Charmettes. Rousseau's true happiness, of which no one, not even himself, could rob him, was the ability thus to evoke and to retrace, with the precision and vividness which characterized his recollection, such pictures of youth, even in the years that were fullest of troubles and distractions.

The pedestrian journey, with its impressions at each moment, was also one of the inventions of Rousseau, one of the novelties which he imported into literature; it has since been greatly abused. It was not just after he had enjoyed his trip, but much later, that he thought of relating his experiences. It was only then, he assures us, when he travelled on foot, at a beautiful season, in a beautiful country, without being hurried, having for the goal of his journey an agreeable object which he was not in too great haste to attain, — it was then that he was entirely himself, and that ideas of his which were cold and dead in the study came to life and took flight: —

"Walking has something in it that animates and brightens my ideas: I am scarcely able to think when I keep one position; my body must be in full swing before my mind can be so. The sight of the country, the succession of agreeable objects, the open air, the good health I gain by walking, the freedom of the inn, the removal from everything that reminds me of my situation, all this sets my soul free, gives me a greater audacity of thought, casts me, in some way, into the immensity of beings where I may combine, choose, and appropriate them at will, without hindrance and without fear. I dispose, as a master, of all nature. . . ."

Do not ask him to write, at these moments, the sublime, foolish, pleasant thoughts which pass through his mind: he likes much better to taste and to relish than to speak of them: "Besides, did I carry with me paper and pens? If I had thought of all that, nothing would have come to me. I did not foresee that I should have ideas; they come when it pleases them, not when it pleases me." Thus, in all that he has since related, we should have, if we may believe him, only distant recollections and feeble remains of himself, as he was at those moments.

And yet what could be at once more true, more precise, and more delicious? Let us recall that night which he passes in the starlight, on the bank of the Rhone or the Saone, in a hollow way near Lyons: —

"I slept voluptuously on the sill of a kind of niche or false door opened in a terrace wall. The canopy of my bed was formed of the tops of the trees; a nightingale was just above me, I fell asleep under his song: my sleep was sweet, my waking was more so. It was broad day; my eyes, as they opened, saw the water, the verdure, a wonderful landscape. I rose and roused myself; I felt hungry; I proceeded gaily towards the city, resolved to lay out for a good breakfast two six-blanc pieces¹ which were yet left to me."

All the native Rousseau is there, with his reverie, his ideality, his reality, and that six-blanc piece itself, which comes after the nightingale, is not too much to bring us back to the earth, and make us feel all the humble enjoyment which poverty conceals within itself when it is joined with poetry and with youth. I desired to extend the quotation as far as this six-blanc piece, to show that when we are with Rousseau we are not merely keeping company with René and with Jocelyn.²

The picturesque in Rousseau is temperate, firm, and clear, even in the softest passages; the colouring is always laid upon a well-drawn outline; that Genevese citizen shows in this that he is of pure French extraction. If he lacks at times a warmer light and the splendours of Italy and Greece; if, as about that beautiful Geneva lake, the north wind comes sometimes to chill the atmosphere, and if at times a cloud suddenly casts a greyish tint upon the sides of the mountains, there are days and hours of clear and perfect serenity. Improvements have since been made upon this style, and persons have believed that they have paled and surpassed it; they have certainly succeeded in respect to certain effects of colours and sounds. Nevertheless, the style remains still the surest and the finest which one can offer as an example in the field of modern innovation. With him the centre of the language has not been too much displaced. His successors have gone farther; they have not merely transferred the seat of the Empire to Byzantium, they have often carried it to Antioch, and even to mid-Asia. With them the imagination in its pomp absorbs and dominates all.

The portraits in the Confessions are lively, piquant, and spiritual — Bach, the friend, Venture, the musician, Simon, the *jugemage*³ are finely seized and observed; they are not so easily dashed off as in Gil Blas, they are rather engraved; Rousseau has here recalled his first trade. I have been unable to do more than hurriedly to indicate the leading particulars in which the author of the Confessions remains a master to salute this time the creator of the reverie, — him who has inoculated us with the sentiment of nature and with the sense of reality, the father of the literature of the heart, and of internal painting. What a pity that misanthropic pride should be mingled with these excellences, and that cynical remarks should cast a stain upon so many charming and genuine beauties! But these follies and vices of man cannot overcome his original merits, nor hide from us the great qualities in which he shows himself still superior to his descendants.

BRUNETIÈRE

(1849-1906)

Ferdinand Brunetière was born at Toulon, attended school at Marseilles, and later studied at the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris. Disappointed in his desire to become a teacher, he took up private tuition and literary criticism; and, after publishing a number of articles in the Revue bleue, began to contribute to the Revue des deux mondes, of which he became principal editor in 1893. In 1886 he was presented with a professorship at the École Normale; he was decorated in 1887 with the Legion of Honor; and in 1893 he became a member of the Academy. Although usually in poor health, Brunetière in the literary field lived an exceptionally active life. Besides a great number of polemical works, his publications, largely critical, include six series of Études critiques (1880-1907) on French history and literature, Le Roman naturaliste (1883), Histoire et littérature (1884-1886), Questions de critique (1888, 1890), L'Évolution de genres dans l'histoire de la littérature, and two volumes of studies in 1894 on the evolution of French lyrical poetry in the nineteenth century.

Brunetière brought to the service of literary criticism vast erudition, a vigorous spirit of analysis, an aggressive enthusiasm, and remarkable oratorical gifts. In his appreciation of literary works, instead of appealing to his personal impressions, he had recourse to certain general principles which he felt constituted the essential requirements of literary art, and in the front rank of these requirements he placed social and moral value. His purpose was to make criticism objective. In his analysis of literary works he followed Taine in asserting that the three influences exerted upon a writer were race, environment (milieu), and literary movements. He went beyond Taine in introducing into the study of literary development something of the ideas of evolution put forward by Darwin and Spencer; that is, he saw among the classes of literature certain "species" which came into being, developed, degenerated, and changed into something else. He is well known also as a bibliographer and literary historian.

The following lecture, written in 1898, is translated by Arthur Beatty in The Living Age, CCXX, 1890.

ART AND MORALITY

Ladies and Gentlemen:

In order that I may not surprise anyone, and also that I may secure to myself the benefit of my frankness, I will tell you at the very beginning that, in this lecture, I purpose to be long, tiresome, obscure, and commonplace, withal. And, in truth, the fault will not be entirely in me, but in the subject I have chosen: Morality in Art, or rather Art and Morality, a trite subject, as you know; for since the time of Plato, at least, it has been the common ground of conversation in Academies, salons, studios, schools; and in spite, or rather because, of its banality it is a subject both complex and difficult.

I say because of its triteness; and indeed one of the great mistakes we make in regard to "commonplaces" is believing them easy to deal with. We have no doubt that the easiest thing in the world to-day is to be, or seem to be, original; and the means thereto have become so simple! We simply have to maintain the opposite of what people around us think; to say of charity, for instance, that there is no need to practice it, — and that is what a whole school is teaching; — to say of justice that there is no need to administer it; to say of patriotism that it is the prejudice of another age; and twenty paradoxes of the same nature. This is a sure way of astonishing, of cheaply shocking, one's readers or hearers, and to-day it is the A B C of the art of the paragrapher and of the platform lecturer. In these days intellectuality merely consists in thinking the opposite of other people! But on the other hand, to think like everybody else; to seek solid reasons and precise reasons that are those of almost all reasonable people or of all cultivated people; to confirm people, as need be perhaps, in what the learned Professor Lombroso has called their misoneism, — and which is only a wise distrust of novelty; — to tell them there are ideas, old ideas, without which the life of humanity cannot do any more than without bread; in a word, to communicate to them the rare courage, the unusual audacity, of not wishing, at any price, to appear more "advanced" than their times, — that, ladies and gentlemen, yes, that is a difficult undertaking, that is a hazardous undertaking; and that is what I would try to do to-day.

I

You know the problem, and I have only to remind you of the terms in which it is stated. If we are to believe the artists in this matter, at least certain of the artists, and the greater number of the critics, or aesthetes, but especially the journalists, Art, great Art, Art with a capital A, would transform, would transmute into pure gold everything it touches, would sublimate it, so to speak; and would make a thing to be admired out of a thing obscene or most atrocious. Do not some call this a means of purgation?

There's not a monster bred beneath the sky,
But, well disposed by art, may please the eye.

•Pascal said the same thing, but in a far more Jansenist manner, when he wrote: "What a vanity is painting, which attracts our admiration by the imitation of things which we do not admire in reality." You see that I am keeping my promise, and one could scarcely bring forward more familiar quotations.

Illustrious examples, moreover, confirm, or seem to confirm, the sentence of Pascal and the verses of Boileau. We admire in good faith, we credit ourselves with good taste for admiring, under Greek names, Venuses which we would not dare to name in French; and if we strip (I well know it is a sacrilege), but if we do really strip the subject of Corneille's "Rodogune" or of Racine's "Bajazet," for example, of the prestige of poetry which transfigures them; if we reduce both of them to the essence of the fable which sustains them, what will remain of them but two intrigues of the harem, which would be all very well in their place in the annals of crime and indecency.

Yet we are told, neither "Bajazet," nor "Rodogune" especially, are works which we can tax as immoral. In seizing on these intrigues the poet — and it is his privilege — has transformed their nature. That man would be condemned, he would be disqualified, who in the presence of the goddesses of Praxiteles¹ felt emotions other than those of the most chaste and disinterested admiration. The fact is, we are further told, the artist or the poet has lifted us above what is instinctive or animal in us; they have performed this miracle by placing us — how, is not very well known, by a secret known only to them — in a sphere where the gross excitements of sense are unknown; they have freed us from ourselves (you know the theory of the liberating power of art, that of the "purgation of the emotions" and I need only allude to it in passing); and we have entered with them into the region of supreme calm and of divine repose.

La Mort peut disperser les univers tremblans,
Mais la Beauté flamboie, et tout renaît en elle,
Et les mondes encore roulent sous ces pieds blancs.²

That is not my opinion.

And first, if this were the place to produce texts, I should not be embarrassed to prove that Greek sculpture — I mean that of the great epoch — fell short of that character of ideal purity that we are accustomed to attribute to it. It is pagan; and we must remember that when we speak of it! And paganism is not here or there, the religion of Jupiter or that of Venus, the mysteries of Eleusis³ or the Thesmophoria,⁴ but simply and in a word the adoration of the energies of nature. Here custom makes us blind; but in order to see clearly, think what the amours of the chief gods — Europa, Danaë, Leda, Semele, Ganymede — have become with an Ovid, for example, or with very great painters, a Michel Angelo,⁴ a da Vinci,⁴ a Correggio,⁴ a Veronese⁴; and, more generally, all those voluptuous fictions which, after having furnished the materials of classic art, have come to their end in the terrible games in the amphitheatre. Ask yourselves, in another art and in another order of ideas, whether, when we come from seeing this "Bajazet" or this "Rodogune" played, of which I was speaking just now — whether the impression which we carry from it has not something of mingled estrangement, of suspicious estrangement?

On this point there is a confession of Diderot⁵ which you will find quite eloquent, and which will show too how this creator of "art criticism" admired the "Antiope" by Correggio. Alas! gentlemen, Corneille, the great Corneille, is not always moral; and I mean by that that I would not be sure of the quality of the soul formed in the school of his "heroism" alone. It would be lacking in what Shakespeare has so finely called "the milk of human kindness."

I continue, ladies and gentlemen, to say trite things, exceedingly trite things, 10 things even worthy of Mrs. Grundy, and what would the case be if I wished to take my examples from music instead of from painting, sculpture, or poetry? But this is the most banal of all these things, — I 15 mean that of which you are all secretly, though perhaps without knowing it, most certainly convinced; yet which is most difficult to prove. It is, that these examples have nothing that need astonish 20 us if in every form or every species of art there is as principle or germ a furtive immorality. Note that I am not speaking of inferior forms of art; of the café-concert song, for example, of the vaudeville, 25 or of the dance. Of the dance! Yes, I know that David danced before the ark, and we hear every day much talk of hieratic dances, of sacred dances, of martial dances. There is also the danse du 30 ventre; and I should not be at all surprised if some grave author should find it symbolic. But symbolic or expressive of what? That is the point; and no one else will pretend that it is expressive of de- 35 cency or modesty. "How much there is to a minuet!" said a famous dancing-master. Why, certainly, but how much of what? For, certainly the opera ballet may have all sorts of qualities, — qualities 40 that I myself may have the weakness not to despise, — that they have not the quality of elevating the mind is something of which I am certain! Neither has a café-concert song, nor a vaudeville: "Cé- 45 limare le bien-aimé," or "Un Chapeau de paille d'Italie."

But since this is not what we ask of them I will not insist. That would be to make myself ridiculous! Let us take the 50 highest things. I speak to you of great art, of the greatest art; it is in the notion of great art that I say a germ of immorality is enveloped; and it is here that I am going to become wearisome. Or rather, not yet, ladies and gentlemen; that will be 5 presently; for I must first of all tell you of the memorable exploit of M. Taine,¹ the most glorious of his exploits, and the one which most eloquently testifies that in him sincerity of research and uprightness of character did not yield to brilliancy of talent.

He began, as you know — in conformity with his intention of finding an objective foundation for critical judgments, 10 and thus of rescuing the works of literature and art from the caprice of particular opinions — by taking the attitude which I will not call indifferent or uninterested, but impartial and impersonal, which is that of the geologist before the animal or of the botanist with regard to the plant. When the zoölogist studies the habits of the hyena or of the antelope, of the jackal or of the dog, and when the botanist 25 describes to us the rose or the datura stramonium, the belladonna or "the sacred blade which gives us bread," you know they always use the same patient method, and we do not see them angry with the ferocious beast or the poisonous plant. We do not find them changing either tone or composure of mind with their subject. Taine tried to imitate them, and for a moment he could believe that he had 30 succeeded; when, as yet knowing only France and England, on his appointment as professor of æsthetics in the École des Beaux-Arts, he visited Italy. That was a revelation. The difference between the best, the mediocre, and the worst, that difference, that sense of difference, of which the spirit of system so easily de- 35 prives us in literature, because words express ideas and because we have a leaning towards ideas that resemble our own, however feebly they may be expressed, — this difference which we do not always appreciate in music, because music is a kind of science as well as an art, 40 and especially because our judgments do not anywhere depend more on the state of our nerves than in music — this, on the other hand, stands out clearly in painting, in sculpture; and Taine was forcibly struck by it.

That, ladies and gentlemen, is why, when he began those celebrated lectures on "The Production of the Work of Art," on "Art in Italy," "Art in Holland," "Art in Greece," on "The Ideal in Art" — certainly, with the work of Eugène Fromentin¹ on "The Early Masters," and some rare writings of M. Guillaume, the most remarkable things which art criticism has produced in our times — that is why it appeared to him necessary to classify, to judge works, to establish "scales of values," — what is more pedantically called an æsthetic criterion — in order to judge them. And where did he find this criterion, gentlemen, after having long sought for it, where did he find it, he, the pupil of Condillac² and of Hegel, the theorist and philosopher of the impassibility of criticism, whose most serious reproach to the Cousins³ and Jouffroys⁴ was that of trying to bring everything to the "moral point of view"? What is the sign by which he declared that the most elevated in the museum of masterpieces can be recognized? It is by what he calls "the degree of beneficence in the character." The page is important, and I wish to place it entire before your eyes.

"All things being equal in other respects, the work which expresses a beneficent character is superior to the work which expresses a malevolent character. If in two given works both exhibit, with the same talent in execution, natural forces of like grandeur, that which represents to us a hero is better than that which represents to us a dolt; and in this gallery of living works of art, which form the definitive museum of the human mind, you will see established, according to our new principle, a new order of ranks.

"At the lowest step of all are the types preferred by the literature of realism and by the comic drama; that is to say, simpletons and egotists, — limited, weak and inferior natures. . . . The spectacle of these belittled or crippled spirits ends by leaving in the reader's mind a vague sense of weariness and disgust, and even irritation and bitterness. . . . We demand that we be shown creations of a more vigorous birth and of a loftier character.

"At this point of the scale is placed a family of powerful but incomplete types, and generally wanting in balance."

He cites as examples of these the ordinary characters of Balzac and Shakespeare: Coriolanus, Hamlet, Macbeth, Othello, Iago, Richard III., Lady Macbeth and Hulot, Baltasar Claës, Goriot, le père Grandet, Vautrin, Bridau, Rastignac. He admires them; he admires in them the incarnation of the elemental forces "which govern mind, society, and history," — but there is a but.

"They leave on the mind a painful impression; we behold too much misery and too many crimes; the passions developed and in mortal encounter display too great ravages. . . ."

"Advancing a step further, we encounter complete personages, true heroes. We find many such in the dramatic and philosophic literature of which I have just spoken to you. Shakespeare and his contemporaries have multiplied perfect images of feminine innocence, goodness, virtue, and delicacy; down through every successive age their conceptions have reappeared under diverse forms in English romance and drama, the latest of the descendants of Miranda and Imogen being found in the Esthers and Agneses of Dickens. . . ."

And what, then, are the works he places highest in the heaven of art, he, I repeat, the theorist of naturalism, whose deeper sympathies all went, in spite of himself, to the manifestations of force and violence? Now it is "Polyeucte,"¹ "le Cid,"¹ "les Horace";¹ it is "Pamela,"² "Clarissa,"² "Grandison";² it is "Mauprat,"³ "François le Champi,"³ "La Mare au Diable";³ it is "Hermann and Dorothea";⁴ it is Goethe's "Iphigenia"; it is Tennyson with his "Idylls of the King." Who, in very truth, would have suspected it only three or four years before, when he wrote his "History of English Literature"; and when, with an energy of style which at times resembled a gymnastic feat, he glorified, in the drama of Shakespeare or in the poetry of Byron, the splendid villainy of Don Juan 20 or of Iago?

I do not discuss these judgments, gentlemen; I do not deny any of them to-day; I do not speak to you of the reservations they permit, and of the 25 principal ones which the author himself has made. But I see in them an instructive testimony — a presumption, if you like — for what I was saying to you just now: that is, that the art which 30 has only itself as an object, the art which does not care for the quality of the characters it expresses; the art, in a word, which does not take account of the impressions which it is capable of making on the senses 35 or of exciting in the mind, that art, however great the artist, I do not say is inferior (that is another question), but I say that it necessarily tends to immorality. I am now going to try to 40 give you the reasons for this.

II

There is one reason which, if I am 45 not mistaken, is as clear as noon-day; and which is that every form of art, light in reds or blues, yellows or greens in order to reach the mind, is obliged to have recourse to the mediation, not only of the senses, but of the pleasure of the senses. No painting but must first of all be a joy to the eye! No music but must be a pleasure to the ear! No poetry but must be a caress! And that very thing, we may remark in passing, is one of the reasons for the changes in fashion and taste. The works exist; and whether good or bad, they remain what they are. We like them or we do not like them! They do not change in character; the "Iliad" is always the "Iliad," "l'École d'Athènes" is always "l'École d'Athènes." But the senses become refined, or, rather, they are sharpened; they become more subtle and more exacting; they require, in order to experience the same quantity of pleasure, a greater amount of excitation. As has been well observed, "La Dame Blanche," "Le Pré-aux-Clercs," and so many other works we to-day call out-of-date, — although their representation once 5 was profitable to dozens of theatres in Germany, — these works doubtless gave to our fathers the same kind of pleasure as "Carmen,"⁵ for example, or "Die Meistersinger,"⁶ gives us. It is because their less practiced ears were less exacting.

Have you never asked yourselves at times whence comes the scorn it is fashionable, in the last few years, to show towards Raphael's painting? Independently of the element of snobbery which is certainly mixed with it, — and which consists in people thinking that this gives them the air of connoisseurs, — it is because after the lapse of fifty years our eyes have 10 learned to enjoy color far more intensely than formerly. The sense of color, which, as you know, has had a long history, and the increasing complexity of which in the progress of time we can follow, seems to have profited by what the sense of design and form has lost. And we de- 15 sign and form has lost. And we de- light in reds or blues, yellows or greens to-day, as such, demanding only vigor or delicacy. Perhaps this, too, is the reason, or one at least, for the development of landscape. The chief actor of landscape is light or color, a pleasure purely sensuous, or primarily sensuous, which it affords us; and do not the very words we used to admire, for example, a canvas by Corot, indicate it when we speak of the calm, of the freshness, of the melancholy, which 10 we breathe there? All that is not only sensed, but sensuous; and I do not think I need support this point any further.

But there results from this, ladies and gentlemen, several consequences; and 15 thus it is that we see — I say, in history — that when art is left to itself and seeks its principle only in itself, — poetry, music, or painting, — it degenerates into a mass of artifices to stir up sensuality. Then no 20 one asks of it anything more; it itself no longer thinks of anything but of pleasing, and of pleasing at any price, by every means; and it literally changes from a leader or from a guide into a kind of go- 25 between. That is the only name which fits it when I think of our closing XVIIIth century, of the novels of Duclos¹ and of Crébillon¹ the younger, of that of Laclos¹: “Les Liaisons dangereuses”; of the 30 sculpture of Clodion; of the painting of Boucher, of Fragonard; of the libertine engravings of so many dandies; of that furor of eroticism which disgraces not only the “Poésies” of Parny,² but even those 35 of André Chénier.³ Let us be bold enough to confess it; all this art which is so praised to us, which is still celebrated, all this art, in all its forms, has been, for nearly half a century, scarcely anything 40 but a perpetual incentive to debauch; and do you think that, although it be called elegant, debauchery is any the less dangerous? As for me, I believe it is far more so!

Here is something graver still; for, at heart, when they are not devoid of all moral sense, these Fragonards or these Crébillons cannot but know that they ply a shameful trade. But the seduction of form 5 sometimes works in a more subtle and insidious fashion, for which the artist or the public can scarcely themselves account, and of which the effects are more disastrous; for while corrupting the principle of art there is the appearance of respecting it: optimi corruptio pessima.⁴ When an exaggerated importance, not to say an importance which ignores all else, 10 is attributed to the form, then it is that there results, from this very importance, what an Italian critic, writing of the decadence of Italian art, has justly called “the indifference to the content.” That 15 is when the painter, Correggio or Titian, with the same hand, as skilful, as caressing, as licentious, but as sure, with which he yesterday painted a “Madonna” or an “Assumption,” to-day paints, warm and 20 amber on a dark background, the nudity of a courtesan. It is when a Montesquieu,⁵ with the same pen with which he has thrown on paper a sketch of the “Esprit des Lois,” writes the “Lettres Persanes” or the “Temple de Gnide.” Or better still, it is when relaxation is 25 taken after writing a “Stabat”⁶ by writing the music of a ballet. •For, what, indeed, do the things we say matter? But what must be considered is the manner of saying them! Form is everything, the basis is nothing, if it is not the pretext or occasion for the form. And, 30 as this striving, as this care, as this passion for form never fails to lead to new effects; as the qualities lost are, or seem to be, replaced by others; as the execution becomes more masterly or more skilful, it cannot at first be seen where 35 that leads to. That, ladies and gentlemen, leads directly to dilettanteism; and dilettanteism is the death both of all art and of all morality.

Oh, certainly, I know very well I speak like a barbarian, not to say like one possessed; at all events, like an iconoclast; and you are used to see something else in dilettanteism. Dilettanteism, I know, for the most of those who profess it and glory in it, for the most of those who are in sympathy with it, means independence of mind, liberty, diversity, superiority of taste; it means absence of prejudices; it is the faculty of comprehending everything. But, gentlemen, is it also the faculty of excusing everything? For, indeed, we who believe in anything and who have what are called "principles" — you know that that means to-day that we are limited on all sides — can any one imagine that when we adopt, when we maintain, an opinion, that we have not seen the reasons for the contrary opinion, or the difficulties of the one we adopt? Alas! there is not a critic or historian worthy of the name who does not argue against his tastes, who does not combat his own pleasures, who does not harden himself against the things that attract him. But dilettanteism is nothing but an incapacity for taking sides, an enfeeblement of the will, when it is not a clouding of the moral sense; and — on the most favorable supposition — a tendency, eminently immoral, to make of the beauty of things the measure of their absolute value.

When art comes to that — and it necessarily comes to that whenever it seeks its end only in itself or in what is emphatically called the realization of pure beauty — I once more repeat, it is not only art which is ruined; it is morality; or, if you want something more precise, it is society, which has made an idol of it. We have a memorable example of this in the Italy of the XVth and of the XVIth centuries, assuredly one of the most corrupt societies of history, according to the admission of all historians; the Italy of all these tyrants to whom we seem to have pardoned everything because they have had triumphal mythologies painted in fresco on the walls and ceilings of their palaces; or because the daggers they buried in the breasts of their victims were marvellously carved by a Benvenuto Cellini. And do you know whence is this corruption, gentlemen? Precisely from this idolizing of art, or, if you prefer it, from the subordination of every part of public and private life to art and its demands. An excellent critic has said:

"The Italians of the Renaissance, under the sway of the fine arts, sought after form, and satisfied themselves with rhetoric. Therefore we condemn their moral disquisitions and their criticisms as the flimsy playthings of intellectual voluptuaries. Yet the right way of doing justice to these stylistic trifles is to regard them as products of an all-embracing genius for art, in a people whose most serious enthusiasms were æsthetic. . . . If the methods of science may be truly said to regulate our modes of thinking at the present time, it is no less true that, during the Renaissance, art exercised a like controlling influence."

Note, ladies and gentlemen, this last comparison; we shall return to it in a little while. Penetrated with the idea of the "beautiful," Italy went so far as to find it in crime. It recognized in a crime well done, boldly conceived, skillfully executed, and audaciously avowed, merits analogous to those she applauded in her works of art. Why is that? You see why, perhaps. It is in distinguishing and dividing the invisible, in separating the inseparable, in dissociating the form from the substance; it is in placing in the execution all the merit of art. As long as this tendency found its counterpoise in the sincerity of the religious, moral, social, or political sentiment, it gave to the world the masterpieces which you know, from the "Divine Comedy" to the decoration of the Sistine.¹ But according as the tendency was able to develop freely, the decadence of art was seen to commence, followed by the decadence of morality. That is a first-class proof, in my opinion — a proof by the facts, a proof by history — that every form of art contains a principle of immorality, and there is another in the fact that it is obliged to address the mind only by the mediation of the pleasure of the senses, of which art must exercise a wise mistrust, the chief part of which will be never to seek its end in itself.

It is to that, you know, that people have tried to answer, in giving as its end the imitation of nature; and as regards this, I begin by declaring that two things are equally certain, that we are cured of dilettanteism or of virtuosity only by returning to the imitation of nature; and the other is that if the imitation of nature is not, perhaps, the end of art, it is at least the principle. "All rules," said a great painter, "have been made only to aid us in placing ourselves before nature, and thus to teach us to see it better"; and a great poet has said before him:

Nature is made better by no mean,
But nature makes that mean; so, over that art
Which you say adds to nature, is an art
That nature makes.

But what is this nature which it is a question of imitating? How, in what measure, ought we to imitate it? If we feel in us any temptation to correct it, or, as is said, to perfect it, ought we to yield to it? And how, in short, have morals or morality accommodated themselves? I mean, how, in fact and in history, have they accommodated themselves to that recommendation and that principle?

I will not examine, gentlemen, whether nature is always beautiful, or whether it is never so. The question would take us too far afield. Truly, I, for my part, will freely say that if colors are not in objects, but in our eye (and that is proven), the proof would have greater validity for that relative and changing quality which is called "Beauty." Plato has said, rather, has been made to say, that "the beautiful is the splendor of the true"; and I admire Plato; none the less, this is an example of one of these immortal blunders which we piously transmit from generation to generation. If we only take the trouble to try to understand ourselves, there is no "beauty" in a geometrical theorem, nor in a chemical law, or at least the beauty shines in it only with a mild brilliance, modest and timid. There is beauty, in the human sense of the word, only in those very general laws that are, properly speaking, hypotheses rather than laws, and of which I do not wish to speak disparagingly, because it may be that the search for them is the very end, the highest end, of science. But, on the other hand, we might easily show that there have been some very great mistakes. But, I repeat, and without wishing to examine the question, ugliness as well as beauty is in nature; and you know, we all know, some artists who have seen it alone. The romanticists have even made the representation of the ugly an essential part of their æsthetics, — and it certainly is not on this point that contemporary naturalism has disavowed them.

•What is still more certain, and what is especially important to us to-day, is that, beautiful or ugly, nature is not "good"; and I scarcely need to maintain this point, since the Schopenhauers,¹ the Darwins, the Vignys, have firmly established it. Do not let us needlessly complicate matters, and do not let us embarrass ourselves with metaphysical complications. If the first need of a creature is "to preserve its being," nature, you know well enough, has, as it were, surrounded us with snares, and we cannot make a movement without running the risk of perishing by it. Life is spent in learning to live, and no sooner have we succeeded in it than we die. Does the living console us, and can we say with the poet:

Mais la nature est là qui invite et qui t'aime, Plonge-toi dans son sein qu'elle t'ouvre tous
jours?²

But her "bosom" is rather a stepmother's; and her indifference to us is equalled only

² "But nature is ever there, inviting thee and loving thee; plunge into her bosom ever open for thee."

by her lack of regard for all that we call by the name of good or bad.

On me dit une mère et je suis une tombe,
Mon hiver prend vos morts comme son hécatombe,
Mon printemps ne sent pas vos adorations.¹

Let us go still further, gentlemen; nature is immoral, thoroughly immoral, I may say immoral to such a degree that everything moral is, in a sense, and especially in its origin, in its first principle, only a reaction against the lessons or counsels that nature gives us. Vitium hominis, natura pecus,² I believe St. Augustine has said; there is no vice of which nature does not give us the example, nor any virtue from which she does not dissuade us. This is the empire of brute force and unchained instincts, neither moderation nor shame, neither pity nor compassion, neither charity nor justice; all species are armed against one another, *in mutua funera*³; all passions aroused, every individual ready to oppose every other, — that is the spectacle that nature offers us; and if we imitate it who does not see and who does not understand what humanity would become in so doing? Plunge us into nature! Why, gentlemen, if we were not careful, that would be to plunge us into animality; and that is what has not been understood by certain who are inviting us to take “nature” only for a guide in all things, — that they were inviting us to go back again over the very steps of history and civilization. We have become men, and can become more so each day only by detaching ourselves from nature, and by trying to institute in the midst of it “an Empire within an Empire.”

Shall I add to this that it is not always true? That is what I ought to do if I keep myself narrowly within the bounds of my subject. Nature has its failures, it has its exceptions, it has its monstrosities. If we are to attach a precise meaning to the words, which will make us understood, it is not “natural” to be blind or a hunchback; and that is what so many artists readily forget. They also forget that 5 Some truths may be too strong to be believed.

We see examples of it every day. Every day there happens the reality that resembles a fiction, and, on the other hand, the fiction that one would take for a reality. It is even a commonplace with novelists to say that they invent nothing that reality does not surpass. . . . But all these considerations are purely æsthetic, and to-day I am interested in the relations between morality and art.

Now you see that they are of such a nature, that, as we have just now seen, immorality engendered in the very seduction of the form, so in the same way it is always to be feared lest it may also result from a too faithful imitation. Examples of this are innumerable in the history of painting, and especially of literature. But, as I should compromise myself if I here invoked the memory of the “Contes” of La Fontaine, or of his “Fables,” it is the author of “Andromaque” and of “Bajazet” that I shall ask to offer me his repentance. For indeed, when this great man, in the maturity of life and genius, not yet having reached forty, — that is, the age at which Molière had just begun to write — abandoned the stage, what sentiments do you think dictated his conduct? He was afraid of himself, afraid of the truth of the paintings he had made; of the terrible fidelity with which he had rendered what is most natural in the passions; of the justification that he had found for their excess in their conformity to instinct; and that is why from that moment his life was nothing but one long expiation for the errors of his genius. Let us regret it if we will! But let us not have minds so narrow as to be astonished at it; nor especially to blame the poet for it; and let us consider that at this very moment there is an example of this very thing in him who was in his hour the illustrious novelist¹ of "War and Peace" and of "Anna Karenina." You will find the proof of this in the work, "What is Art?" in which he wages the same warfare as I do to-day, — and if this endeavor appears only ordinary in a critic, or in a historian of ideas, so much the worse for those who did not understand how heroic it is in a novelist!

I suppose that in that work he will not fail to clearly bring to light a final cause of that immorality which we can look upon as inherent in the very principle of art. I mean a condition which seems to be imposed on the artist, and which consists, in order to assure his originality, not precisely in his cutting himself off from the society of other men, and shutting himself in his "ivory tower," but in his distinguishing himself from the crowd. La Bruyère has excellently said: "If we always listened to criticism, there is not a work that is not completely founded on it"; and he was right. Painter, poet, sculptor, or musician, if the originality of the artist is to feel, by the same things, sensations different from other men, it would seem that one of his cares should be not to let them in any way become "banal," and consequently it would seem that this is a right that cannot be denied him. But to what dangers at all times, and especially at a time like ours, does not the application of this principle lead?

By it, humanity is divided into two kinds of men: the "Artists," who make art, and the "Philistines," the "Bourgeois," who do not make it, or who do not understand it as the "artists" do, or who do not like the same art as they. In this connection recall Flaubert in his "Correspondence," or the Goncourts² in their "Journal." It has been said, and I hasten to subscribe to it, "What love, what passion, what religion for their art!" And, in truth, that is admirable! But also what ignorance, what thoughtlessness for all that is not art and their art; what scorn of their contemporaries, of the "Messrs. Dumas, Augier, Feuillet," of all the novels that are not "Madame Bovary,"³ of all the comedies that are not "Henriette Maréchal"! Evidently all of us, — we who believe that there may be something else in life than art, — in their eyes we are all only simple Bouvards⁴ or frightful Pécuchets.⁴ We are the crowd, and the crowd is always to be despised.

"I believe that the crowd, the flock, will always be hateful. In so far as the people do not bow before the mandarins, in so far as the academy of sciences will not take the place of the Pope, society to its very roots will be only a lot of sickening humbugs."

I do not stop over the strangeness of the phrase, — which would be worthy of a place on the wall of the editor's office, — but you see the sentiment! I do not even reply that, if it is works that will ultimately try doctrines, we can conceive of a more useful employment in life than writing "Paradis Artificiels," "Tentations de Saint Antoine," "Faustin" and "Fille Elsa." But I ask you, gentlemen, whether the consequence of the doctrine is not to make art consist in what is most inhuman and most foreign to our occupations, our cares, our anxieties!

Not that for this reason they repel praises or admiration. "Money is always good," said an Emperor; and our "Artists" think that, from whatever hand it may come, admiration is always good to take and to retain if possible. Only, if, in the midst of these praises, any misunderstanding arises between the artist and the public, it is always the public that is in the wrong; and let us render this justice to the artists; they think it a matter of honor to aggravate the misunderstanding. Ah, but we are reproached for our harshness of manner! Well, we will be still more harsh, and we will elevate our very lack of feeling into a principle of art. Ah, but we are told that they claim from us emotion and feeling! Well, then we will take shelter in our indifference and coldness! What do we care for the miseries of humanity! "The crowd is always hateful." We are the mandarins, before whom you must bow! To others the business of justice and charity! As for us, 10 we are busy with art; that is, we are pounding colors and we are cadencing phrases. We are noting sensations, and we are producing artificial ones to note! We are doing "artistic writing," and if we are not admired it is so much the worse for our contemporaries! But it is all the better for us, for he who does not understand us judges himself; and the incomprehensibility of our inventions is simply a 20 proof of our superiority. It pleases us to be misunderstood.

Thus it is that people bury themselves in a proud self-satisfaction; and that would not matter if it did not entail the 25 monopolizing of the attention by a coterie! But what I hate about these paradoxes — and without taking into account the fact that they do nothing less than cut art off from its communications 30 with life — is that they are eminently and insolently aristocratic. A little indulgence, O great artists, and permit us to be men! Yes, permit us to believe that there is something else in the world as impor- 35 tant as pounding colors or cadencing phrases! Do not imagine that we are made for you, and that for six thousand years humanity has travailed, has labored, has suffered, only to establish your 40 mandarinat. We could do without you much more easily than without many other things! And you yourselves, after all, how, on what, in what conditions, would you live if the incessant toil of these 45 Bouvards, whom you despise, and of these Pécuchets, for whom you have nothing but ironies sufficiently cruel, did not assure you the security of your leisure, the peace of your meditations, a public to 50 admire you, and, I may even say, your daily bread?

III

Whither does this discourse tend, ladies and gentlemen, and what are the conclusions I wish to draw from it? That art, as has been said of love, is mixed, especially in our time, "with a host of things with which it has no more to do than the Doge has with what is done in Venice"? Of course, and, for that matter, nothing should hinder a picture dealer or a book publisher from being true "artists." That has been seen more than once in history. The studio of more than one great painter 15 in Italy or in Flanders has often been nothing more than a manufactory of cartoons or of canvases, and two of the rare surviving works of our XVIIIth century, "Manon Lescaut"¹ and "Gil Blas" were, as was then said, made for the publisher. No, it is not the love of lucre that is the worst enemy of art.

Ladies and gentlemen, I do not mean, either, that the artist or the writer ought to metamorphose himself into a moral preacher. There are sermonizers and moralists for that, whose purpose or trade it is. Whatever admiration I have for Richardson, this is what prevents me from speaking of "Clarissa Harlowe" with the declamatory enthusiasm of Diderot, and still more from daring to place his "Pamela" or his "Grandison" so high in the history of art as you have seen that Taine has placed them. We must try not to confuse anything!

•But, as I have tried to show you, if every form of art, so far as it is a pleasure of the senses, and in so far as it is an imitation and consequently an apology for nature, and again, in so far as it develops in the artist this ferment of egotism which is a part of his individuality, if every form of art, when thus left to itself, runs the inevitable risk of "demoralizing" or of "dehumanizing" a soul, then we must premise, in the first place, that art has not all the liberties. "Stop, my child," said Montesquieu to his daughter, whom he found reading the "Lettres Persanes," "Stop, that is a book of my youth that is not made for yours"; and I have told you that in my opinion it was not to become a convert that Racine abandoned the theatre, but that he believed he ought to become a convert because he had written plays, or rather because he was the creator of his plays, the father of Hermione, of Roxane, and of Phèdre. As for the aged Corneille, he did not feel the need of becoming a convert. Why so? For a very simple and sufficiently evident reason! Because in his old age, as in the morning of his glory, he was convinced that Rodrigue had done right in avenging Don Diègue's honor; that Horace was excusable for having hurled in Camille's teeth the curses she spewed forth against Rome; that Polyeucte was to be praised for having overthrown the idols, and for having preferred the conversion of Paulina to the tranquillity of their amours. He did not become a convert, because he believed that he never excited other than generous and noble passions, even if he thought more than once of depicting base or sanguinary ones. He did not become a convert, because, as Taine told you just now, he believed that he "whose hand had sketched the soul of the great Pompey" worked only for the exaltation of the "Will"; and of all the human faculties, will, real will, is at once the rarest of things, and the thing of which men have always thought the most, first because it is the rarest, and then because it is the real cause of personal and social progress.

"This is the same thing as saying, in the second place, that if the end of art is not to move the passions or to tickle the senses, neither can it be complete, and narrow itself in any way within itself. There are several ways of interpreting the theory of "art for art's sake," and on this point, as on all, it is only a matter of coming to an agreement; and unfortunately that is most frequently what people do not want to do. But if the theory of "art for art's sake" consists in seeing in art only art itself, I know of nothing more false, and I have tried to tell you why. Art has its object and its end outside of itself and beyond itself; and if that object is not exactly moral, it is social, which, for that matter, is the same thing.

Whether we are painters or poets, we are not allowed to forget that we are men; and in return for the society of men we must give the means of propaganda or of action, which we hold from them alone. Do you remember in this connection, or do you know, that page of Alexandre Dumas? I say "do you know"; for you will not find it in all the editions of his plays, but only in that which is called the "Édition des Comédiens":

"What has made the dramatic poets great, what has most ennobled the stage, are the subjects which at first sight seemed absolutely incompatible with the habits of the stage or of the public. Thus we cannot be told, 'Stop here or there.' All that is man and woman belongs to us, not only in the relations of these two creatures between themselves by the sentiments and the passions, but in their isolated or collective relations with all kinds of occurrences, of customs, of ideas, of powers, of social, moral, political, and religious laws, which, in turn, produce their action on them."

That certainly might be better said; and I sometimes fear, gentlemen, that, one or two pieces aside, imperfection of form will draw the drama of Alexandre Dumas into oblivion; but you understand sufficiently well what he means, and I assent to it entirely. "Art has a social function, and its true morality is the conscientiousness with which it discharges this function.

You will tell me that this formula is vague, and I acknowledge it. If it were not vague, if it had the precision of a geometrical formula or of a medical prescription (are medical prescriptions so very precise?) we should no longer be dealing with art, or criticism, or history, but with science. Let us leave the learned in their laboratories, and let us not imagine that we can find the secret of genius or moral law in the bottom of a retort. But for that, ladies and gentlemen, you must give me your attention for a moment longer.

There is scarcely any doctrine more widely diffused amongst us than that of "the relativity of knowledge." But what exactly does it mean? This is what many people do not seem to know who none the less profess belief in it; and you see how it can be reclothed with meaning.

To say that everything is relative may mean that nothing is false and nothing is true, but everything is possible; everything is therefore probable; and each of us becomes "the measure of all things," as the ancient sophist taught; all opinions have worth, and the only difference between them is the manner of expressing them. I do not pause, gentlemen, over this interpretation.

But in the second place, to say that everything is relative may mean that everything depends, not only for each of us individually, but for man in general, the species, on the constitution of its organs, and that, if we had our cranium made otherwise, or if we had six senses, for example, in place of five, or three eyes in place of two, the universe would appear to us under an aspect entirely different from that which we know. Bodies would be revealed to us by other qualities; we should perceive in them what we do not now perceive, unknown forms and nameless colors. It is very possible and I readily believe it! But I know nothing about it, nor does any one else; and besides it does not matter. If in another planet bodies have n plus 1 dimensions instead of three, how can that affect us as long as we know nothing about it, and when there are only three on this earth? What does it matter to us that the color of the flower or the taste of the fruit is in our eye, or in our palate, provided that the rose is always red and the orange is always scented? Do you feel yourselves humiliated or chagrined by it?

But there is a third way of understanding the relativity of knowledge, and the best, which is — as Pascal said before both Comte¹ and Kant¹ — that "all things being causes and caused, aiding and aided," a thing can be exactly defined only by its relations to another thing. Each of you is seated in his place in this room. But how can I give an idea of it to any one outside? That will be done only in beginning by describing the arrangement of the room, of the seats, my situation, the left chair, the right chair, that at the back, that at the front, and ten, twenty, other details. In other words, every object is relative to an infinity of others with which it stands in relations more or less constant, and moreover, according to their nature, more or less complex to determine. Or, again, and in general philosophical terms if you wish, everything is entangled in a system of relations from which its character results; and that is what Pascal meant when he added to the other part of the phrase which I have just recalled to you: "I hold it impossible to know the parts without knowing the whole, as it is to know the whole without knowing the parts." If we knew only Racine's "Thébaïde," just think what a strange idea we should have of his genius; and how badly we should know it if we did not know who preceded and followed him! A certain knowledge of the "Cid" and of "Polyeucte" thus forms a part of the very definition of "Andromaque" or of "Phèdre," and that definition, in turn, needs to be completed by some knowledge of "Zaïre" and of "Mérope." We know Racine truly only when we know him in his relation to Voltaire and Corneille, and all these in their relation to Shakespeare or to Euripides, and all in relation to a certain idea of tragedy, which still other relations determine.

If we put ourselves at this point of view we perceive, gentlemen, that the definition of art is thus relative to the definition of other social functions, to which it holds, or ought to hold, determine relations; or, if you prefer, it appears that, like religion, like science, like tradition, art is a force, the use of which cannot be regulated by itself and by itself alone. These forces must be balanced among themselves in a well-ordered society; and none among them can establish its absolute domination over the others without harm, and sometimes disaster, resulting therefrom. If it is religion that gains the day, and subordinates tradition, science, and art, the history of the Papacy of the middle ages is there to tell us of the grandeurs, but also of the dangers of theocracy. If it is tradition, custom, superstitious respect for the past, which make themselves masters of consciences, and consequently of actions, it seems to me — I dare not say more — but it seems to me that the example of China emerges from the shade at this moment to teach us, with its advantages of stability, the dangers of immobility. If art in its turn seizes the entire life, in order to govern it, it may indeed flatter the imagination of some dilettantes; but we have looked closely at this matter just now, and the Italy of the Renaissance, to which I can add the Greece of the decadence, is there to prove to us that the danger is not any less. I would say freely it is greater still, or as great, when we give over, as has been tried in our days, to positive and experimental science the work of directing or ordering existence. On the contrary, gentlemen, the great epochs of history are precisely those in which these forces have been placed in equilibrium, — and such have been, in France, chiefly, — the great years of the XVIIth century, or the early years of our own.

Does the realization of that equilibrium depend on the will of men? And are we able, at every moment of the period, to prevent one of the forces from advancing in excess of the other? For my part, gentlemen, I believe we can. I believe that, if we wish, we can maintain the authority of tradition against the craze of novelty. I believe that it depends only on ourselves to prevent even religion from encroaching on the liberty of scientific research. I believe that we can stem, check, prevent science from overstepping the limits of its own domain. And I also believe that, — just as science is characterized by a sort of moral indifference, so art, as I have tried to show you, is characterized on its part by an unconscious tendency to immorality, — we can, if we will, annul these effects, not only without harming it, but in directing it to its proper object. But will would be needed; and unhappily we live in a time when — to give meaning to an old distinction that might be thought very subtle and very vain and which profound philosophers have denied — the failure, or rather, the enfeeblement of the will has perhaps no equal except in the increasing intensity of the desires.

RUSSIAN

(1828-1910)

Leo Nikolaivitch Tolstoi was born in Yasnaya Polyana. From 1843 on he studied oriental languages and jurisprudence in Kazan and at the University of St. Petersburg. After a short stay on his estate he departed for the Caucasus on military service. Here were written his Childhood, Boyhood, Youth, and other books, including The Cossacks. In St. Petersburg in 1856 he joined the company of Turgenev, Gontcharov, and Ostrovsky. The Snowstorm and The Two Hussars belong to this period of his writing. Journeying through Europe in 1857 he composed an indictment of Western European culture entitled Lucerne. Retiring then to his estate he led a peaceful life which he described in his Domestic Happiness (1859). Here also were composed Three Dead (1859) and Polikushka (1860). In the interest of popular education in Russia Tolstoi made a second foreign journey. He married in 1862 Sofia Andreyevna Behrs, the daughter of a Moscow physician. In 1865 he began to publish War and Peace, based on the events of the French campaign of 1812. In 1870 he began to busy himself with questions of public education, making use in the A B C, a Reader, and other educational books, of the observations he had made in the journey of 1860. In 1874 he began his famous novel Anna Karenina. Losing patience at this period of his life with his parasitical existence as a member of the landed class, and longing to dedicate himself to some service useful to humanity, Tolstoi abandoned imaginative literature, took up the study of theology and undertook to translate the Gospels. In 1881 he wrote What We Live On and later What Can We Do? To this period also belong the novel The Death of Ivan Ilyitch, the naturalistic peasant drama The Powers of Darkness, the Kreutzer Sonata, the satirical comedy The Fruits of Culture, and also Master and Man, Politics and Religion, What is Art? and the novel Resurrection. His treatment of religious questions in Resurrection caused him to be excommunicated from the Greek Orthodox Church. He died in retirement in 1910. Strange as it may seem, it is possible to sum up the work of one of the greatest and most influential thinkers of modern times in one phrase, — a religious but unorthodox interpretation of life. In comparing the aims in writing expressed by Tolstoi and Ibsen, it may be said that the first wrote admittedly for the healing of man, the second wrote to diagnose the evils of society.

The present translation of Where Is the Way Out? (1900) is that of Leo Wiener in The Complete Works of Count Tolstoi, Boston, Dana Estes and Co., 1905.

WHERE IS THE WAY OUT?

On the Condition of the Labouring Classes

1

A boy is born in the country; he grows up and works with his father, his grandfather, his mother.

And the boy sees that from the field 10 which he ploughed, harrowed, and seeded with his father, which his mother and the girl cut with the sickle and harvested, the sheaves which he himself pulled down from the rick, to help his mother, — the boy sees 15 that his father does not take the first ricks to his own house, but, past the garden, to the threshing-floor of the landed proprietor. Driving with the squeaky wagon, which he and his father had themselves 20 fastened with ropes, past the manor, the boy sees on the balcony a dressed-up lady sitting near a shining samovar at a table, which is covered with dishes, pastry, and sweets, and on the other side of the road, 25 in a cleared space, the proprietor's two boys, in embroidered shirts and shining boots, playing ball.

One boy throws the ball over the wagon.

"Pick it up, boy!" he shouts.

"Pick it up, Vaska!" Vaska's father, walking beside the wagon, with the reins in his hand, and taking off his hat, cries out to his son.

"What is this?" thinks the boy. "I 35 am worn out from work, and they play, and I am to pick up their ball."

But he picks up the ball, and the young lord, without looking at the boy, takes the ball with his white hand out of the sun-burnt black hand of the boy, and goes back 5 to his game.

The father has walked on with the wagon. The boy catches up with him on a run, shuffling his tattered low boots in the dust of the road, and they drive into the manorial threshing-floor, which is full of wagons with sheaves. The busy steward, in linen frock coat, which is wet from perspiration in the back, and with a rod in his hand, meets the boy's father, whom he scolds for not having driven to the right spot. His father makes excuses, walks as though fatigued, jerks the tired horse by the rein, and drives the wagon on the other side.

The boy goes up to his father and asks: "Father, why do we take our rye to him? We harvested it?"

"Because the land is theirs," the father answers, angrily.

"Who gave them the land?"

"Ask the steward. He will show you who. Do you see their rod?"

"Where will they put all this corn?"

"They will thresh it, and then they will 30 sell it."

"And what will they do with the money?"

"They will buy those cakes that you saw on the table as we drove by."

The boy grows silent and falls to musing. But he has no time for that. They are shouting to his father to move the wagon closer to the barn. The father moves the wagon, climbs upon it, and, having with difficulty loosened the ropes, straining his rupture more and more, throws the sheaves into the mow, while the boy holds the old mare, which he has for two years been driving to pasture, keeping the flies away from her, as his father commands him to do. He thinks and thinks, and cannot understand why the land does not belong 10 to those who work upon it, but to those sons of the lord, who in embroidered shirts play ball and drink tea and eat cakes.

The boy continues to think about it at work, and when he goes to bed, and when 15 he pastures the horses, — and can find no answer for it. All say that it must be so, and all live in that manner.

And the boy grows up, and he is married off, and children are born to him, and his 20 children ask the same question of him, and he answers them in the same way that his father answered him. And, living like him in want, he works submissively for other, idle people.

And thus he lives, and thus live all around him. Wherever he may go or travel, — so a pilgrim tells him, — it is the same. Everywhere peasants work above 30 their strength for other, idle people, by overwork get ruptures, asthma, consumption, take to drinking from grief, and die before their time; the women exhaust their last strength in cooking, attending to the cattle, washing for the peasants, and making 35 their clothes, and also age before their time, and waste away from overwork and untimely labour.

And everywhere those they work for provide themselves with buggies, carriages, trotters, horses, build harbours, arrange games, and from Easter to Easter, from morning until evening, dress themselves up as for a holiday, play and eat 40 and drink every day as even on the greatest holiday is not the case with him who works for them.

Why is that so?

The first answer which presents itself to the labouring farmer is this, that it is so, because the land was taken from him and was given to those who do not work it. He and his family have to eat, but the working peasant has either no land at all, or so little of it that it will not support his 5 family. Thus he must starve or else take the land which is not far from the farms, but which does not belong to those who work; he has to take the land, agreeing to those conditions which are offered to him.

At first it seems to be so, but that is not all of it: there are peasants who have enough land, and who may be able to support themselves by it.

But it turns out that even such peasants, 15 all of them or a part, again sell themselves into slavery. Why is that so? Because the peasants have to buy for money ploughshares, scythes, horseshoes, materials for buildings, kerosene, tea, sugar, liquor, ropes, salt, matches, cottons, tobacco; but the money which a peasant earns by the sale of his products is all the time taken away from him in the form of direct and indirect imposts, and the price 25 of those articles which he needs is raised.

Thus the majority of the peasants are unable to provide themselves with the necessary money except by selling themselves into slavery to those who have the money.

This the peasants and their wives and daughters do. Some sell themselves in their neighbourhood; others sell themselves a distance away, in the capitals, — hiring themselves out as lackeys, coachmen, 35 nurses, wet-nurses, chambermaids, bath servants, waiters, and, above all, as factory hands, going to the cities by whole families.

Having sold themselves into these 40 occupations in the cities, the country people become unaccustomed to farm labour and simplicity of life, and get used to city food, dress, beverages, and through these habits still more confirm their 45 slavery.

Thus it is not merely the lack of land that causes the labouring man to be in the slavery of the rich; the cause of it is also to be found in the taxes, the raised price of 50 commodities, and the luxurious city habits, which the country workers get used to, when they go away from their villages.

The slavery began with the land, with the land being taken away from the workers, but this slavery has been strengthened and confirmed by this, that the country people have become unaccustomed to labour and have become used to city luxury, which cannot be satisfied in any other way than by selling themselves into slavery to those who have money; and this slavery is growing and becoming more and more confirmed.

In the country people live on semi-starvation rations, in constant labour and want, enslaved to the landowners; in the cities, in the factories and plants, the labourers live in slavery to the manufacturers, for generations physically and morally corrupted by the monotonous, tedious, unhealthy work, which is not proper for a man. And with the years the situation of either class of men is getting worse and worse. In the country the people are getting poorer and poorer, because an ever growing number of people are going to the factories. In the cities the people are not getting poorer, but seemingly richer, but at the same time more and more incontinent, and more and more unable to do any other work than the kind they are used to, and so they are more and more in the power of the manufacturers.

Thus the power of the landowners and the manufacturers, of the rich in general, is getting stronger and stronger, while the condition of the labourers is getting worse and worse. What, then, is the way out of this situation? Is there one?

It would seem that the liberation from the slavery of the land is very easy. For this liberation all that is needed is to recognize what is self-understood, and what people would never have doubted, if they were not deceived, namely, that every man born has the right to gain his sustenance from the land, just as every man has a right to the air and the sun, and that, therefore, no one who does not work the land has the right to regard the land as his own and to keep others from working it.

But the government will never permit

this liberation from the slavery of the land to take place, because the majority of the men who constitute the government own lands, and upon this ownership all their existence is based.

They know this, and so they try with all their forces to hold on to this right, and defend this right.

About thirty years ago Henry George proposed, not only a rational, but a very practicable project for the emancipation of the land from ownership. But neither in America nor in England (in France they do not even speak of it) was this project accepted, and they tried in every way to overthrow it; but, as it is impossible to overthrow it, they passed it in silence.

If this project has not been accepted in America and in England, there is still less hope that this project will be accepted in monarchical countries, such as Germany, Austria, or Russia.

In Russia vast expanses of territory have been seized by private individuals and by the Tsar and the imperial family, and so there is no hope that these men, feeling themselves as helpless without the right to the land as the birdlings feel without their nest, will give up their right and will refrain from fighting for this right with all their strength. And so, as long as the power shall be on the side of the government, which is composed of landowners, there will be no emancipation from the ownership of the land.

Just as little, and even less, will there be a liberation from the taxes. The whole government, from the head of the state, the Tsar, down to the last policeman, lives by the taxes. And so the abolition of the taxes by the government is as unthinkable as that a man should take from himself his only means of existence.

It is true, some governments seem to be trying to relieve their people from the burden of the taxes by transferring them to the income, by increasing the taxes in accordance with the income. But such a transference of the taxes from a direct levy to the income cannot deceive the masses, because the rich, that is, the merchants, landowners, and capitalists will, in proportion with the increase of the taxes, increase the price of commodities which are needed by the labourers and the price of the land, and will lower the wages of labour. Thus the whole burden of the taxes will again be borne by the labourers.

For the labourers to be freed from the slavery which is due to this, that the implements of production are owned by the capitalists, the learned have proposed a whole series of measures, in consequence of which, according to their assumption, the wages of the labourers are to increase all the time, while the hours of labour must diminish, and finally all the implements of labour have to pass from the possession of the masters into the hands of the labourers, so that the labourers, possessing all the factories and plants, will not be compelled to give up a part of their labours to the capitalists, but will have for their labours the necessary commodities. This method has been advocated in Europe, in England, France, and Germany, for more than thirty years, but so far there has not only been no realization of this method, but not even any approach to it.

There exist labour unions, strikes are inaugurated, by means of which the labourers demand fewer working hours and greater pay; but since the governments, who are united with the capitalists, do not allow, and never will allow, the implements of production to be taken away from the capitalists, the essence of the matter remains the same.

Receiving better pay and doing less work, the labourers increase their needs and so remain in the same slavery to the capitalists.

Thus the slavery in which the working people are can obviously not be destroyed so long as the governments, in the first place, will secure the ownership of land to the non-working landowners; in the second, will collect direct and indirect taxes; in the third, will defend the property of the capitalists.

The slavery of the working people is due to this, that there are governments. But if the slavery of the labourers is due to the government, the emancipation is naturally conditioned by the abolition of the existing governments and the establishment of new governments, — such as will make possible the liberation of the land from ownership, the abolition of taxes, and the transference of the capital and the factories into the power and control of the working people.

There are men who recognize this issue as possible, and who are preparing themselves for it. But fortunately (since such an action, which is always connected with violence and murder, is immoral and ruinous for the cause itself, as has frequently been repeated in history) such actions are impossible in our time.

The time has long ago passed, when the governments naively believed in their beneficent destiny for humanity and did not take any measures for securing themselves against rebellions (besides, there were no railways and no telegraphs then), and they were easily overthrown, as was the case in England in 1740, in France during the great Revolution and later, and in Germany in 1848. Since then there has been but one revolution in 1871, and that one happened under exceptional conditions. In our day revolutions and the overthrow of governments are simply impossible. They are impossible, because in our time the governments, knowing their uselessness and harmfulness, and that in our time no one believes in their sanctity, are guided by nothing but a feeling of self-preservation, and, making use of all the means at their command, are constantly on the lookout for everything which may not only impair their power, but even shake it.

Every government has in our time an army of officials, which is connected by means of railways, telegraphs, telephones; it has fortresses and prisons with all the most modern appliances, — photography, anthropometric¹ measurements, mines, cannon, guns, all the most perfect instruments of violence that can be had, — and, the moment something new appears, it is at once applied to purposes of self-preservation. There is the organization of espionage, a venal clergy, venal scholars and artists, and a venal press. Above all else, every government has a body of officers, who are corrupted by patriotism; bribery, and hypnotism, and millions of physically sound and morally undeveloped children of twenty-one years of age, — the soldiers, or a rabble of immoral hirelings, who are stultified by discipline and are ready for any crime which they are ordered by their superiors to commit.

And so it is impossible in our time by force to destroy the government, which is in possession of such means, and which is all the time on guard. No government will allow this to be done to itself. And so long as there shall be a government, it will maintain the ownership of the land, the collection of the taxes, and the possession of capital, because the larger landowners and the officials, who receive their salaries from the taxes, and the capitalists form parts of the government. Every attempt of the labourers to get possession of the land, which is in the hands of private owners, will always end the way it has always ended, — in that the soldiers will come, will beat and drive away those who want to seize the land, and will give it back to the owner. In the same way will end every attempt at not paying the taxes demanded, — the soldiers will come, will take away as much as the taxes amount to, and will beat him who refuses to pay what is demanded of him. The same will happen to those who will try, not so much to seize the implements of production, the factory, but simply to institute a strike, to keep other workmen from lowering the wages for work. The soldiers will come and will disperse the participants, as has constantly happened in every place, in Europe and in Russia. So long as the soldiers are in the hands of the government, which lives on taxes and is connected with the owners of land and of capital, a revolution is impossible. And so long as the soldiers are in the hands of the government, the structure of life will be such as those who have the soldiers in their hands will want it to be.

And so there naturally arises the question: Who are these soldiers?

5 These soldiers are the same people whose land has been taken away, from whom the taxes are being collected, and who are in slavery to the capitalists.

Why do these soldiers act against themselves?

They do so because they cannot do otherwise. They cannot do otherwise, because by a long, complex past — of their education, of their religious instruction, of hypnotization — they have been brought to such a state that they cannot reflect, and are able only to obey. The government, having in its hands the money, which it has taken from the masses, with this money bribes all kinds of chiefs, who have to enlist soldiers, and then military chiefs, who have to teach, that is, deprive the men of their human consciousness; but, above all, the government with this money bribes the teachers and the clergy, who have to use every effort for impressing adults and children with the idea that militarism, that is, the preparation for murder, is not only useful for men, but also good and pleasing to God. And year after year, though they see that they and their like are enslaving the masses to the rich and the government, they submissively enter the army, and, having entered, without a murmur do everything prescribed to them, though that not only may be the obvious detriment of their brothers, but may even be the killing of their own parents.

The bribed officials, military teachers, and the clergy prepare the soldiers, by stupefying them.

The soldiers, at the command of their superiors and with threats to deprive of liberty, to inflict wounds and death, take the income from the land, the taxes, and the income from the factories, from commerce, for the benefit of the ruling classes. But the ruling classes use a part of this money for bribing the chiefs, the military teachers, and the clergy.

Thus the circle is closed, and there does not seem to be any way out.

The issue suggested by the revolutionists, which consists in using force in the struggle with force, is obviously impossible. The governments, who are already in possession of a disciplined force, will never permit the formation of another disciplined force. All the attempts of the past century have shown how vain such attempts are. Nor is there a way out, as the socialists believe, by means of forming a great economic force which would be able to fight successfully against the consolidated and ever more consolidating force of the capitalists. Never will the labour unions, who may be in possession of a few miserable millions, be able to fight against the economic power of the multi-millionaires, who are always supported by the military force. Just as little is there a way out, as is proposed by other socialists, by getting possession of the majority of the parliament. Such a majority in the parliament will not attain anything, so long as the army shall be in the hands of the governments. The moment the decrees of the parliament shall be opposed to the interests of the ruling classes, the government will close and disperse such a parliament, as has been so frequently done and as will be done so long as the army is in the hands of the government. The introduction of socialistic principles into the army will not accomplish anything. The hypnotism of the army is so artfully applied that the most free-thinking and rational person will, so long as he is in the army, always do what is demanded of him. Thus there is no way out by means of revolution or in socialism.

If there is a way out, it is the one which has not been used yet and which alone incontestably destroys the whole consolidated, artful, and long-established governmental machine for the enslavement of the masses. This way out consists in refusing to enter into the army, before one is subjected to the stupefying and corrupting influence of discipline.

This way out is the only one which is possible and which at the same time is inevitably obligatory for every individual person. It is the only possible one, because the existing violence is based on three actions of the government, — on the robbery of the masses, on the distribution of money thus taken to those who commit the robbery, and on the drafting of the masses into the army.

A private individual cannot keep the government from practising robbery on the masses by means of the drafted army, nor can it keep it from distributing the money collected from the masses to those who are needed by the government for the drafting of the army and their stultification; but he can keep the masses from entering into the army, by not joining it himself and by explaining to others the essence of the deception to which they fall a prey when they enter into the army.

Not only can every man do so, — every private individual must do so. Every private individual must do so, because the entrance into military service is a renunciation of every religion, no matter which he may profess (every one of them prohibits murder), and a renunciation of human dignity, — a voluntary entrance into slavery having for its purpose nothing but murder.

In this is the only possible, necessary, and inevitable way out from that enslavement in which the ruling classes keep the working people.

The way out does not consist in destroying violence by means of violence, not in seizing the implements of production or in fighting the governments in the parliaments, but in every man's recognition of the truth for himself, in practising it, and in acting in accordance with it. But the truth that a man must not kill his neighbour has been so universally cognized by humanity that it is known to everybody.

Let only men apply their forces, not to external phenomena, but to the causes of the phenomena, to their own lives, and like wax before the fire will all that power of violence and evil melt, which now holds and torments people.

ITALIAN

CROCE

(1866-)

Benedetto Croce was born in Pescasseroli, Aquila, Italy, and was educated in a Catholic school. Upon losing his parents in an earthquake in 1883, he went to Rome, where he lived with an uncle. He entered the university but never pursued his studies there; he went instead to Naples (1886) and studied local history and antiquities. His first contributions to philosophical study were two essays (1893) on the nature of history and the method of literary criticism. From 1896 to 1900 he published essays on the Marxian economic doctrine. In 1902 he began the systematic exposition of his philosophy according to the divisions of Æsthetic, Logic, Philosophy of Conduct, Theory and History of Historiography. In 1903 he founded the critical journal La Critica. By 1926 his collected works filled nearly twenty volumes.

Croce's philosophy seeks a serious and thorough consideration of the union of philosophy and history, especially the history of the spirit. It is a philosophy which many have found to accommodate both the realistic and the idealistic needs of Western culture at the present time. Croce is now generally regarded as one of the world's greatest philosophers and critics.

X

•ÆSTHETIC FEELINGS AND THE DISTINCTION BETWEEN THE BEAUTIFUL AND THE UGLY

Passing to the study of more complex concepts, where the æsthetic activity is to be considered in conjunction with other orders of facts, and showing the mode of their union or complication, we find ourselves first face to face with the concept of feeling and with those feelings that are called æsthetic.

The word "feeling" is one of the richest in meanings in philosophic terminology. We have already had occasion to meet with it once, among those used to designate the spirit in its passivity, the matter or content of art, and so as synonym of impressions. Once again (and then the meaning was altogether different), we have met with it as designating the non-logical and non-historical character of the æsthetic fact, that is to say, pure intuition, a form of truth which defines no concept and affirms no fact.

But here it is not regarded in either of these two meanings, nor in the others which have also been conferred upon it to designate other cognitive forms of the spirit, but only in that where feeling is understood as a special activity, of non-cognitive nature, having its two poles, positive and negative, in pleasure and pain.

This activity has always greatly embarrassed philosophers, who have therefore attempted either to deny it as activity, or to attribute it to nature, excluding it from the spirit. But both these solutions bristle with difficulties of such a kind as to prove them finally unacceptable to any one who examines them with care. For what could a non-spiritual activity ever be, an activity of nature, when we have no other knowledge of activity save as spirituality, nor of spirituality save as activity? Nature is in this case, by definition, the merely passive, inert, mechanical, material. On the other hand, the negation of the character of activity to feeling is energetically disproved by those very poles of pleasure and of pain which appear in it and manifest activity in its concreteness, or, so to say, quivering.

This critical conclusion should place us especially in the greatest embarrassment, for in the sketch of the system of the spirit given above we have left no room for the new activity of which we are now obliged to recognize the existence. But the activity of feeling, if it is activity, is not new. It has already had its place assigned to it in the system that we have sketched, where, however, it has been given another name, economic activity. What is called the activity of feeling is nothing but that more elementary and fundamental practical activity which we have distinguished from the ethical activity and made to consist of the appetition and volition for some individual end, apart from any moral determination.

If feeling has been sometimes considered to be an organic or natural activity, this has happened just because it does not coincide either with logical, æsthetic or ethical activity. Looked at from the standpoint of those three (which were the only ones admitted), it has seemed to lie outside the true and real spirit, spirit in its aristocracy, and to be almost a determination of nature, or of the soul in so far as it is nature. From this too results the truth of another thesis, often maintained, that the æsthetic activity, like the ethical and intellectual activities, is not feeling. This thesis is inexpugnable, when feeling has already been understood implicitly and unconsciously as economic volition. The view refuted in this thesis is known as hedonism. This consists in reducing all the various forms of the spirit to one, which thus also loses its own distinctive character and becomes something obscure and mysterious, like "the night in which all cows are black." Having brought about this reduction and mutilation, the hedonists naturally do not succeed in seeing anything else in any activity but pleasure and pain. They find no substantial difference between the pleasure of art and that of easy digestion, between the pleasure of a good action and that of breathing the fresh air with wide-expanded lungs.

But if the activity of feeling in the sense here defined must not be substituted for all the other forms of spiritual activity, we have not said that it cannot accompany them. Indeed it accompanies them of necessity, because they are all in close relation both with one another and with the elementary volitional form. Therefore each of them has for concomitants individual volitions and volitional pleasures and pains, known as feeling. But we must not confound a concomitant with the principal fact, and substitute the one for the other. The discovery of a truth, or the fulfilment of a moral duty, produces in us a joy which makes vibrate our whole being, which, by attaining the aim of those forms of spiritual activity, attains at the same time that to which it was practically tending, as its end. Nevertheless, economic or hedonistic satisfaction, ethical satisfaction, æsthetic satisfaction, intellectual satisfaction, though thus united, remain always distinct.

A question often asked is thus answered at the same time, one which has correctly seemed to be a matter of life or death for æsthetic science, namely, whether feeling and pleasure precede or follow, are cause or effect of the æsthetic fact. We must widen this question to include the relation between the various spiritual forms, and answer it by maintaining that one cannot talk of cause and effect and of a chronological before and after in the unity of the spirit.

And once the relation above expounded is established, all necessity for inquiry as to the nature of æsthetic, moral, intellectual and even what was sometimes called economic feelings, must disappear. In this last case, it is clear that it is a question, not of two terms, but of one, and inquiry as to economic feeling must be the same as that relating to economic activity. But in the other cases also, we must attend, not to the substantive, but to the adjective: the æsthetic, moral and logical character will explain the colouring of the feelings as æsthetic, moral and intellectual, whereas feeling, studied alone, will never explain those refractions and colorations.

A further consequence is, that we no longer need retain the well-known distinctions between values or feelings of value, and feelings that are merely hedonistic and without value; disinterested and interested feelings, objective feelings and feelings not objective but simply subjective feelings of approbation and of mere pleasure (cf. the distinction of Gefallen and Vergnügen in German). Those distinctions were used to save the three spiritual forms, which were recognized as the triad of the True, the Good and the Beautiful, from confusion with the fourth form, still unknown, and therefore insidious in its indeterminateness and mother of scandals. For us this triad has completed its task, because we are capable of reaching the distinction far more directly, by receiving also the selfish, subjective, merely pleasurable feelings among the respectable forms of the spirit; and where formerly antitheses were conceived (by ourselves and others), between value and feelings, as between spirituality and naturality, henceforth we see nothing but differences between value and value.

As has already been said, feeling or the economic activity presents itself as divided into two poles, positive and negative, pleasure and pain, which we can now translate into useful and disuseful (or hurtful). This bipartition has already been noted above, as a mark of the activistic character of feeling, and one which is to be found in all forms of activity. If each of these is value, each has opposed to it antivalue or disvalue. Absence of value is not sufficient to cause disvalue, but activity and passivity must be struggling between themselves, without the one getting the better of the other; hence the contradiction and disvalue of the activity that is embarrassed, impeded, or interrupted. Value is activity that unfolds itself freely: disvalue is its contrary.

We will content ourselves with this definition of the two terms, without entering into the problem of the relation between value and disvalue, that is, the problem of contraries (that is to say, whether they are to be thought of dualistically, as two beings or two orders of beings, like Ormuzd and Ahriman, angels and devils,¹ enemies to one another; or as a unity, which is also contrariety). This definition of the two terms will be sufficient for our purpose, which is to make clear the nature of æsthetic activity, and at this particular point one of the most obscure and disputed concepts of Æsthetic: the concept of the Beautiful.

Æsthetic, intellectual, economic and ethical values and disvalues are variously denominated in current speech: beautiful, true, good, useful, expedient, just, right and so on — thus designating the free development of spiritual activity, action, scientific research, artistic production, when they are successful; ugly, false, bad, useless, inexpedient, unjust, wrong designating embarrassed activity, the product that is a failure. In linguistic usage, these denominations are being continually shifted from one order of facts to another. Beautiful, for instance, is said not only of a successful expression, but also of a scientific truth, of an action successfully achieved and of a moral action: thus we talk of an intellectual beauty, of a beautiful action, of a moral beauty. The attempt to keep up with these infinitely varying usages leads into a trackless labyrinth of verbalism in which many philosophers and students of art have lost their way. For this reason we have thought it best studiously to avoid the use of the word "beautiful" to indicate successful expression in its positive value. • But after all the explanations that we have given, all danger of misunderstanding being now dissipated, and since on the other hand we cannot fail to recognize that the prevailing tendency, both in current speech and in philosophy, is to limit the meaning of the word "beautiful" precisely to the æsthetic value, it seems now both permissible and advisable to define beauty as successful expression, or rather, as expression and nothing more, because expression when it is not successful is not expression.

• Consequently, the ugly is unsuccessful expression. The paradox is true, for works of art that are failures, that the beautiful presents itself as unity, the ugly as multiplicity. Hence we hear of merits in relation to works of art that are more or less failures, that is to say, of those parts of them that are beautiful, which is not the case with perfect works. It is in fact impossible to enumerate the merits or to point out what parts of the latter are beautiful, because being a complete fusion they have but one value. Life circulates in the whole organism: it is not withdrawn into the several parts.

• Unsuccessful works may have merit in various degrees, even the greatest. The beautiful does not possess degrees, for there is no conceiving a more beautiful, that is, an expressive that is more expressive, an adequate that is more than adequate. Ugliness, on the other hand, does possess degrees, from the rather ugly (or almost beautiful) to the extremely ugly. But if the ugly were complete, that is to say, without any element of beauty, it would for that very reason cease to be ugly, because it would be without the contradiction in which is the reason of its existence. The disvalue would become non-value; activity would give place to passivity, with which it is not at war, save when activity is really present to oppose it.

And because the distinctive consciousness of the beautiful and of the ugly is based on the conflicts and contradictions in which æsthetic activity is developed, it is evident that this consciousness becomes attenuated to the point of disappearing altogether, as we descend from the more complicated to the more simple and to the simplest instances of expression. Hence the illusion that there are expressions neither beautiful nor ugly, those which are obtained without sensible effort and appear easy and natural being considered such.

• The whole mystery of the beautiful and the ugly is reduced to these henceforth most easy definitions. Should any one object that there exist perfect æsthetic expressions before which no pleasure is felt, and others, perhaps even failures, which give him the greatest pleasure, we must recommend him to concentrate his attention in the æsthetic fact, upon that which is truly æsthetic pleasure. Æsthetic pleasure is sometimes reinforced or rather complicated by pleasures arising from extraneous facts, which are only accidentally found united with it. The poet or any other artist affords an instance of purely æsthetic pleasure at the moment when he sees (or intuits) his work for the first time; that is to say, when his impressions take form and his countenance is irradiated with the divine joy of the creator. On the other hand, a mixed pleasure is experienced by one who goes to the theatre, after a day's work, to witness a comedy: when the pleasure of rest and amusement, or that of laughingly snatching a nail from his coffin, accompanies the moment of true æsthetic pleasure in the art of the dramatist and actors. The same may be said of the artist who looks upon his labour with pleasure when it is finished, experiencing, in addition to the æsthetic pleasure, that very different one which arises from the thought of self-complacency satisfied, or even of the economic gain which will come to him from his work. Instances could be multiplied.

A category of apparent æsthetic feelings has been formed in modern Æsthetic, not arising from the form, that is to say, from the works of art as such, but from their content. It has been remarked that artistic representations arouse pleasure and pain in their infinite shades of variety. We tremble with anxiety, we rejoice, we fear, we laugh, we weep, we desire, with the personages of a drama or of a romance, with the figures in a picture and with the melody of music. But these feelings are not such as would be aroused by the real fact outside art; or rather, they are the same in quality, but are quantitatively an attenuation of real things. Æsthetic and apparent pleasure and pain show themselves to be light, shallow, mobile. We have no need to treat here of these apparent feelings, for the good reason that we have already amply discussed them; indeed, we have hitherto treated of nothing but them. What are these apparent or manifested feelings, but feelings objectified, intuited, expressed? And it is natural that they do not trouble and afflict us as passionately as those of real life, because those were matter, these are form and activity; those true and proper feelings, these intuitions and expressions. The formula of apparent feelings is therefore for us nothing but a tautology, through which we can run the pen without scruple.

GERMAN

SCHOPENHAUER

(1788-1860)

Arthur Schopenhauer was born in Dantzig, Germany. His father was a prosperous merchant, and his mother, Joanna, a novelist of fair ability. When he was still a child the family moved to Hamburg, where Arthur began his schooling. His early life was absorbed in a struggle to avoid entering his father's business. In 1809 he entered the University of Göttingen to study physical science. He became interested in philosophy after a few months, and began to read Plato and Kant. He attended the lectures of Schleiermacher and Fichte and developed a violent antagonism against them. In 1813 he started on his own account with The Fourfold Root of the Principle of Sufficient Reason. The book failed, and he returned to Weimar. He found it impossible, however, to live peaceably with his mother, and moved therefore to Dresden, where he found leisure to study the works of the French materialists and to complete his The World as Will and Idea. This was published in 1818 (dated 1819) and was also a failure. In 1820, after a trip to Italy, he secured a position in the University of Berlin, where, unfortunately, he tried to rival the famous Hegel. He finally settled in Frankfort, where for the most part he spent the rest of his life, quiet, secluded, writing books that few people read. Not until after the break-up of the old order of German life in the revolution in 1848 could he claim recognition. His popularity then grew until, after forty years of disappointment and obscurity, he found himself famous. He is the chief expounder of modern philosophic pessimism.

His philosophy exercised a wide influence upon late nineteenth-century thought and literature. Much of the modern professional pessimism, and much of the enthusiasm over self-expression and complete egoism are probably due to his influence. Besides being a deep and original thinker, Schopenhauer is also important as a master of literary style.

The following translation is taken from The Selected Essays of Arthur Schopenhauer, by Belford Box, London, G. Bell and Sons, 1891.

• ON THINKING FOR ONESELF

As the richest library unarranged is not so useful as a very moderate one well arranged, so the greatest amount of erudition, if it has not been elaborated by one's own thought, is worth much less than a far smaller amount that has been well thought over. For it is through the combination on all sides of that which one knows, 10 through the comparison of every truth with every other, that one assimilates one's own knowledge and gets it into one's power. One can only think out what one knows; hence one should learn something; but one only knows what one has thought out.

One can only apply oneself of set purpose to reading and learning, but not to thinking proper. The latter must, that is, 20 be stimulated and maintained, like fire by a draught of air, by some interest in the subject itself, which may be either a purely objective or a merely subjective one. The latter is only present in the case of our 25 personal interest, but the former only for thinking heads by nature, for which thought is as natural as breath, but which are very rare. For this reason it is so little 5 the case with most scholars.

The distinction between the effect which thinking for oneself, and that which reading has upon the mind, is inconceivably great, hence it perpetually increases the original diversity of heads, by virtue of which a man is driven to the one or to the other. Reading imposes thoughts upon the mind which are as foreign and heterogeneous to the direction and mood which it has for the moment, as the seal is to the wax on which it impresses its stamp. The mind suffers thereby an entire compulsion from without, to think now this, now that, for which it has no desire, and no capacity. In thinking for itself, on the other hand, it follows its own natural impulse, as either external circumstance or some recollection has determined it for the moment. Personal surroundings, namely, do not impress one definite thought upon the mind as reading does, but merely give it material and occasion to think that which is according to its nature and present disposition. Hence much reading deprives the mind of all elasticity, as a weight continually pressing upon it does a spring, and the most certain means of never having any original thoughts is to take a book in hand at once, at every spare moment. This practice is the reason why scholarship makes most men more unintelligent and stupid than they are by nature, and deprives their writings of all success; they are, as Pope says —

"For ever reading, never to be read."

POPE, "Dunciad," iii, 194.

Scholars are those who have read in 20 books; but thinkers, geniuses, enlighteners of the world, and benefactors of the human race, are those who have directly read in the book of the world.

At bottom it is only our own fundamental conceptions which have truth and life, for it is they alone that one thoroughly and correctly understands. Alien thoughts that we read are the remnants of another's 30 meal, the cast-off clothes of a strange guest.

The alien thought arising within us is related to our own as the impression in stone of a plant of the early world is to 35 the blooming plant of spring.

Reading is a mere surrogate for original thought. In reading, one allows one's own thoughts to be guided by another in leading strings. Besides, many books are 40 only good for showing how many false paths there are, and how seriously one may miss one's way if one allows oneself to be guided by them; but he whom genius guides, he, that is, who thinks for himself, 45 thinks of free will, thinks correctly — he has the compass to find out the right way. One should only read when the source of original thoughts fails, which is often enough the case even with the best heads. 50 But to scare away one's own original thoughts for the sake of taking a book in the hand is a sin against the Holy Ghost.

In this case, one resembles a man who runs away from free nature in order to look at a herbarium, or to contemplate a beautiful landscape in an engraving.

5 Even if sometimes one may find with ease in a book a truth or an insight already given, which one has worked out slowly, and with much trouble, by one's own thinking and combining; it is yet worth a hundred times more when one has attained it through one's original thought. Only then does it become an integral part, as living member, one with the whole system of our thoughts; only then does it 15 stand in complete and firm cohesion with them, is understood in all its grounds and consequences, bears the colour, the shade, the stamp of our whole mode of thought, and this because it has come at the precise time that the need for it was present, and therefore sits firmly, secure from dispossession. Here accordingly Goethe's verse,

"What thou hast inherited from thy fathers 25 Acquire it, in order to possess it,"

finds its most perfect application and explanation. The self-thinker, namely, learns the authorities for his opinions afterwards, when they serve merely to confirm him in them and for his own strengthening. The book-philosopher, on the other hand, starts from them, in that he constructs a whole for himself out of the alien opinions he has read up, which then resembles 35 an automaton that has been put together of foreign material, while the former resembles a living man. For in this case it has arisen like the living man, since the outer world has impregnated the thinking mind which has carried it, and given it birth.

Truth that has only been learnt cleaves to us like a limb that has been stuck on — a false tooth, a waxen nose, or at best like a genuine one of alien flesh. But that which has been acquired by original thought resembles the natural limb; it alone really belongs to us. On this rests the distinction between the thinker and the mere scholar. Hence the intellectual acquirement of the self-thinker is like a fine painting, which stands out life-like with accurate light and shade, well-balanced tone, and complete harmony of colour. The intellectual acquirement of the mere scholar, on the contrary, resembles a large palette full of bright colours, systematically arranged indeed, but without harmony, cohesion, and significance.

Reading means thinking with an alien head, not one's own. But to original thought, from which a coherent whole, even if not a strictly rounded-off system, seeks to develop itself, nothing is more injurious than too great an influx of foreign thoughts through continual reading. For these, each sprung from another mind, belonging to another system, bearing another colour, never of themselves flow together to form a whole of thought, of knowledge, of insight, and conviction, but rather set up a Babylonian confusion of tongues in the head, and rob the mind which has been filled with them of all clear insight, and thus almost disorganize it. This state is noticeable with many scholars, and the result is that they are behind many unlearned persons in healthy understanding, accurate judgment, and practical tact, the latter having always subordinated to and incorporated with their own thought what has come to them from without, through experience, conversation, and a little reading. The scientific thinker does this in a greater degree. Although he needs much knowledge, and therefore must read much, his mind is nevertheless strong enough to master all this, to assimilate it, to incorporate it into the system of his thoughts, and so to subordinate it to the organically coherent whole of a magnificent insight, which is always growing. In this, his own thinking, like the ground bass of the organ, perpetually dominates all, and is never drowned by foreign tones, as is the case with merely poly-historical heads, in which, as it were, musical fragments from all keys run into one another, and the fundamental note is no more to be heard.

People who have occupied their life with reading, and who have derived their wisdom from books, resemble those who have acquired a correct knowledge of a country from many descriptions of travel. Such persons can give information about much, but at bottom they have no coherent, clear, fundamental knowledge of the structure of the country. Those, on the contrary, who have occupied their life with thought, resemble persons who have themselves been in that country. They alone know, properly speaking, what is in question, since they know the things there in their connection, and are truly at home in them.

The ordinary book-philosopher is related to the self-thinker as an historical investigator to an eye-witness. The latter speaks from his own direct apprehension of the matter. Hence all self-thinkers agree in the last resort, and their diversity only arises from that of their standpoint; and where this does not alter anything they all say the same. For they only put forward what they have objectively apprehended. I have often found propositions which, on account of their paradoxical nature, I only brought before the public with hesitation, to my agreeable surprise repeated in the old works of great men. The book-philosopher, on the contrary, reports what this one has said, and what that one has thought, and what another has objected, &c. This he compares, weighs, criticises, and thus seeks to get at the truth of things, a point in which he strongly resembles the critical historian. Thus, for example, he will institute investigations as to whether Leibnitz¹ had ever been for a time at any period a Spinozist,¹ &c. Conspicuous instances of what is here said are furnished to the curious admirer in Herbart's² "Analytical Explanation of Moral and Natural Right," as also in his "Letters on Freedom." One might well wonder at the considerable trouble which such a one gives himself, for it seems as though, if he would only fix his eye on the subject itself, he would soon, by a little self-thought, attain to the goal. But as to this, there is one small hindrance, namely that it does not depend on our will. One can always sit down and read, but not always think as well. It is, namely, with thoughts as with men, one cannot always have them called up at one's pleasure, but must wait till they come. Thought on a subject must make an appearance of itself by a happy, harmonious concurrence of the outward occasion with the inward mood and interest; and it is precisely this which will never occur to the foregoing persons. The above finds its explanation even in those thoughts which concern our personal interest. If we under certain circumstances have to form a decision, we cannot well sit down at any time we choose, think over the reasons, and then decide; for often our reflections on the subject will then precisely not hold, but wander to other things, for which sometimes even the disinclination for the circumstance is responsible. We should not therefore attempt to force it, but wait till the mood comes of itself; it will often do so unexpectedly and repeatedly, and every different mood at a different time throws a new light on the subject. This slow procedure it is which is understood as maturity of judgment. For the thought must be distributed; much that has before been overlooked will thereby be clear to us, and the disinclination will thereby be lost, since things more clearly kept in view appear in general much more endurable. In the same way, in theoretical departments, the right time has to be waited for, and even the greatest mind is not always capable of thinking for itself. It will do well therefore to utilize the remainder of the time for reading, which is, as already said, a surrogate of original thought, and brings material to the mind, in that another thinks for us, albeit invariably in a manner which is not our own. For this reason one ought not to read too much, in order that the mind may not become accustomed to the surrogate, and thereby forget the thing itself; in other words, that it shall not accustom itself to an already trodden path, and by going along an alien track of thought become estranged from its own. Least of all ought one, for the sake of reading, to withdraw oneself entirely from the view of the real world. For the occasion and the disposition to original thought occur incomparably more often here than in reading. For the perpetual, the real, in its originality and power, is the natural object of the thinking mind, and is able most easily to move it deeply.

If these considerations are correct, we shall not wonder that the self-thinker and the book-philosopher are easily to be recognized by their delivery; the former by the stamp of earnestness, directness, and originality, in the idiosyncrasy of all his thoughts and expressions; the latter, on the contrary, in that everything is pieced together at second hand, out of traditional notions and stuff that has been raked up, and is thus flat and dull, like the impression of an impression. His style, consisting of conventional, banal phrases and current tags, resembles a small state whose circulation consists solely in foreign money, because it does not itself coin.

Mere experience can replace thought just as little as reading. Pure empiricism is related to thinking as eating is to digestion and assimilation. When the former boasts that it alone, through its discoveries, has furthered human knowledge, it is as though the mouth should boast that the maintenance of the body was its work alone.

•The works of all really competent heads distinguish themselves from the rest by their character of decisiveness and definiteness, together with the distinctness and clearness springing therefrom, for such heads always know definitely and distinctly what they want to express, be it in prose, in verse, or in sounds. This decisiveness and clearness is wanting in the rest, and in this they may be at once recognized.

The characteristic sign of minds of the first order is the immediateness of all their judgments. All that they bring forward is the result of their own thinking, and everywhere proclaims itself as such by its delivery. They accordingly, like princes, have an imperial immediacy in the empire of mind; the rest are all mediatized, as may be easily seen from their style, which has no original stamp.

Every true self-thinker thus resembles pro tanto a monarch; he is immediate, and recognizes no one above himself. His judgments, like the decisions of a monarch, spring from his own supreme power, proceed directly from himself. For just as little as the monarch does he accept commands and authorizations, but lets nothing obtain that he has not confirmed himself. The common herd of heads, on the other hand, entangled in all sorts of opinions, authorities, and prejudices, resemble the people who silently obey his law and mandate.

Those persons who are so zealous and hasty in deciding most questions by the quotation of authorities, are glad when, instead of their own understanding and without weight and without trouble. There is, therefore, no happiness on earth like that which a beautiful and fruitful mind in a happy hour finds in itself.

•The presence of a thought is like the presence of a loved one. We deem that we shall never forget this thought, and that this loved one can never become indifferent to us. But out of sight, out of mind! The most beautiful thought runs the risk of being irrevocably forgotten if it is not written down, and the loved one to be torn from us if she has not been wedded.

There are many thoughts which have a value for him who thinks them, but few only among them which possess the power of acting through re-percussion or reflection, that is, after they have been written down, to gain the reader's interest.

•But as regards this, that only has true worth which one has in the first instance thought out for oneself. One may divide lems and purposes are overshadowed and hidden by it; and if one keeps before one's eyes how all men, with few and rare exceptions, are never clearly conscious of this problem, seeming indeed not to be possessed of it, but to trouble themselves rather about anything else than about it, and are concerned only for the present day, and for the scarcely longer span of their personal future, either expressly declining the problem in question, or willingly contenting themselves in respect of it with any system of popular metaphysics; when one, I say, well considers this, one might almost be of the opinion that man could only in a very general sense be called a thinking being, and one might wonder at no trait of thoughtlessness or simplicity, but rather recognize that the intellectual scope of the average man, although it indeed transcends that of the animal (unconscious of its whole existence, future and past, and living, as it were, a single present), is yet not so incalculably removed as one is accustomed to imagine.

It is in accordance with the above, that in conversation one finds the thoughts of most men clipped as short as chopped straw, and therefore not admitting of any longer thread being spun out of them.

It would be impossible, moreover, if this world were peopled by merely thinking beings, that noise of every kind should be allowed and given such unlimited scope, even the most horrible and purposeless. If nature had intended man for thinking, she would never have given him ears, or would at least, as with the bats, whom I envy on this account, have furnished him with airtight covers. But he, like the rest, is in truth a poor creature, whose powers are merely directed to the maintenance of his existence, for which reason he always requires open ears, which unsolicited, and by night as well as by day, announce the approach of the persecutor.

ON READING AND BOOKS

Ignorance first degrades a man when it is met with in company with riches. The poor man is crushed by his poverty and distress; his work takes the place of knowledge with him, and occupies his thoughts. The rich, on the contrary, who are ignorant, live merely for their lusts, and resemble brutes, as may daily be seen. To this is to be added further the reproach that they have not used their riches and leisure for that which gives them their greatest value.

When we read, another thinks for us; we merely repeat his mental process. It is as when in learning to write the pupil follows with his pen the strokes that have been made in pencil by the teacher. In reading, accordingly, we are relieved of the greater part of the work of thinking. Hence the perceptible relief when we pass from the occupation of our own thoughts to reading. But while we read, our head is, properly speaking, only the arena of alien thoughts. Hence it is, that he who reads very much and almost the whole day, amusing himself in the intervals of his reading with thoughtless pastime, gradually loses the capacity even to think, just as one who always rides at last forgets how to walk. But such is the case with many scholars; they have read themselves stupid. For perpetual reading recurred to immediately at every free moment cripples the mind more than perpetual work with the hands, for with the latter one can always follow one's own thoughts. Just as a spring by the continuous pressure of a foreign body loses its elasticity, so does the mind through the continuous pressure of foreign thoughts. Just as one injures the stomach by too much aliment, and thereby damages the whole body, so the mind may be clogged and suffocated by too much intellectual nourishment. For the more one reads the fewer traces does what is read leave on the mind. It is like a tablet on which many things have been written over one another. It never comes to rumination therefore; but it is only by this that one makes what one reads one's own. If one reads incessantly, without afterwards thinking further upon it, it does not take root, and gets for the most part lost. For it is precisely the same with the intellectual nourishment as with the corporeal; scarcely the fiftieth part of what we take is assimilated, the rest passes off through evaporation, respiration, or otherwise.

In addition to all this, thoughts reduced to paper are nothing more than the footprint of a wayfarer in the sand; one sees well enough the way which he has taken, but in order to know what he saw on the way we must use our own eyes.

There is no literary quality, as, for example, persuasive power, wealth of imagery, the gift of comparison, boldness, or bitterness, or brevity, or grace, or facility of expression; or again, wit, striking contrasts, a laconic style, naïveté, &c., which we can acquire by reading authors who possess such qualities. But we may nevertheless call forth thereby these qualities in ourselves if we already possess them as disposition, that is, in potentia,¹ and bring them to our consciousness; we can see all that is to be done with them, we can be strengthened in the inclination, or indeed in the courage to use them; we can judge by instances of the effect of their application, and so learn the right employment of them, after which we assuredly first possess them in actu.² 30 This then is the only way in which reading educates to writing, inasmuch as it teaches us the use we can make of our own natural gifts, always supposing of course that we possess these; without them, on the contrary, we can learn nothing by reading but cold, dead mannerisms, and become arid imitators.

As the strata of the earth preserve the 40 living beings of past epochs in their order, so the shelves of libraries preserve in their order past errors and their expositions, which, like the former, in their time, were living enough and made much noise, but exist now stiff and petrified, only to be contemplated by the literary paleontologist.

Xerxes, according to Herodotus,³ wept at the sight of his countless host, when he thought that of all these not one would be in life after a hundred years. Who would not weep at the sight of a thick catalogue, when he considers that of all these books, after ten years, none will any longer be alive?

10 In literature it is not otherwise than in life. Wherever one turns, one encounters immediately the incorrigible common herd of humanity present everywhere in legions, filling everything and defiling everything, like flies in summer. Hence the 15 number of bad books, those rank weeds of literature, which withdraw the nourishment from the wheat and choke it. They absorb, namely, the time, the money, the attention of the public, which belong of right to the good books and their noble purposes, while they themselves are merely written with the intention of bringing in money or procuring places; hence they are 25 not merely useless, but positively injurious. Nine-tenths of our whole modern literature has no other purpose than to swindle the public of a few thalers out of its pocket. Author, publisher, and reviewer are in a conspiracy to do this.

It is a mean and base, but not inconsiderable trick, which the littérateurs, bread-and-butter writers and scribblers, have succeeded in playing off on the good 35 taste and the true culture of the period, in that they have brought things so far as to have the whole elegant world in leading-strings, so that the latter has been condemned to read a tempo, to wit, that all must read the same thing, and that the newest, in order to have material for conversation in its circles. For to this end serve bad novels and similar productions from once celebrated pens, as formerly 45 those of Spindler, Bulwer, Eugène Sue,⁴ &c. But what can be more miserable than the fate of such a belletristic public, which deems itself in duty bound to read, always

² "Actually."

³ One of the most famous of the Greek historians of antiquity (ca. 484-425 B.C.).

⁴ Spindler was a popular German novelist (1795-1855); Bulwer, an English author and diplomatist (1803-1873); Sue, a French novelist (1804-1857).

to read, the latest scribblings of the most ordinary heads who merely write for money, and are therefore invariably to be had in crowds, and, in consequence, to know the works of the rare and deep-thinking minds of all times and countries merely by name! The belletristic daily press is especially a cunningly devised plan to rob the æsthetic public of the time which it should devote for the sake of its culture 10 to the genuine productions in this department, in order that it may accrue to the daily twaddlings of these everyday minds.

Hence, in respect of our reading, the art not to read is extremely important. It 15 consists in that, what at all times occupies the greater public, should for this very reason not be taken in hand, as, for instance, political or ecclesiastical pamphlets, novels, poems, &c., and this notwithstanding that they make much noise, and reach many editions in their first and last year of life. But rather let us remember that he who writes for fools will always find a large public, and let us turn the 25 always comparatively short time we have for reading exclusively to the works of the great minds of all times and peoples, which tower above the rest of humanity, and which the voice of fame indicates as such. 30 These only really educate and instruct. We can never read the bad too little, nor the good too often; bad books are intellectual poison, they destroy the mind. Because people, instead of reading the best 35 of all times, only read the newest, writers remain in the narrow circle of circulating ideas, and the age sinks ever deeper into the slough of its own filth.

There are at all times two literatures 40 which go along a parallel course tolerably independent of each other; a real, and a merely apparent. The former grows to be enduring literature, carried on by persons who live for science or poetry; it goes its 45 way seriously and quietly, but with exceeding slowness; produces in Europe scarcely a dozen works in a century, which works however endure. The other, carried on by persons who live on science or 50 poetry, goes in a gallop, amid the great noise and applause of those interested, and brings yearly many thousand works to market. But after a few years one asks, Where are they? Where is their so early 5 and so loud fame? One may therefore designate the latter as the floating, the former as the standing literature.

In the history of the world, half a century is always considerable, since its material is always flowing on, inasmuch as something is always happening. In the history of literature, on the other hand, the same period of time is often not to be 10 reckoned at all, since nothing has happened, for clumsy attempts do not concern it. One is, in this case, where one was fifty years before.

In order to make this clear, let us view the progress of knowledge in the human race under the figure of a planetary orbit. Let us then represent the deviations which it mostly acquires after every important progress, by Ptolemaic epicycles,¹ after 15 passing through each of which it is again where it was before the deviation began. The great heads, however, which really lead the race farther along this planetary orbit, do not participate in the recurring epicycle. From this is to be explained why the fame of posterity is generally paid for 20 by the loss of the applause of contemporaries, and vice versa. Such an epicycle is, for example, the philosophy of Fichte² and Schelling,² crowned at its close by the Hegelian caricature of it. This epicycle began from the last circle described by Kant, which I have since again resumed in order to carry it farther. But in the mean- 30 time the above sham philosophers, together with sundry others, have passed through their epicycle, which is now just completed, the public which has gone with them having become aware that it finds 35 itself precisely where it was at starting.

With this progress of things is connected the fact that we see the scientific, literary, and artistic spirit of the age make a declaration of bankruptcy about every thirty 40 years. During such a period, the recurring errors have so increased, that they collapse under the weight of their absurdity, and at the same time the opposition to them has strengthened. The position is now reversed; there often follows now an error in the opposite direction. To show this course of things in its periodical return would be the correct pragmatism of literary history, but with that the latter troubles itself little. The data of such periods, moreover, are, on account of their comparative shortness, often difficult to bring together from distant ages; and hence one can observe the matter most conveniently in one's own age. If one requires an illustration from the real sciences, one might take Werner's ¹ "Geology of Neptune." But I stand by the illustration already given, which lies nearest to us. There followed in German philosophy, upon the brilliant period of Kant, another immediately after, in which the endeavour was not to convince but to impress; instead of being deep and clear, to be brilliant and hyperbolic, but especially to be incomprehensible; indeed, instead of seeking the truth, to intrigue. In this way philosophy could make no progress. Finally, there came the bankruptcy of this entire school and method. For in Hegel and his consorts, the barefacedness of nonsense on the one side, and of unconscious glorification on the other, together with the obvious intention of the whole edifying procedure, reached such a colossal magnitude, that at last the eyes of all were opened to the whole charlatanism; and, as in consequence of certain disclosures, protection from above was withdrawn from the concern, so was also the applause. The Fichtian and Schellingian antecedents of this most miserable of all philosophizings that has ever been were dragged by it into the abyss of discredit. Thereby appears the complete philosophical incompetence of Germany, during the first half of the century following upon Kant, and yet, notwithstanding, we boast in the face of foreign nations of the philosophical gifts of the Germans, especially since an English writer has had the malicious irony to call them a nation of thinkers.

But he who desires to have confirmation from the history of art of the general theory of epicycles here put forward need only consider the flourishing school of sculpture of Bernini,² in the last century, especially in its French development, which represents, instead of antique beauty, common nature, and instead of antique simplicity and grace, French ball-room etiquette. It became bankrupt when, after Winckelmann's³ criticism, there followed the return to the school of the ancients. The first quarter of this century again furnishes a confirmation from painting, since it regarded the art as a mere means and instrument of mediæval religiosity, and hence chose ecclesiastical subjects for its exclusive theme. These were now treated by painters who lacked the true seriousness of that belief, but who, nevertheless, in consequence of the delusion in question, took as models Francesco Francia, Pietro Perrugino, Angelo da Fiesole,⁴ and similar painters, and valued these even more highly than the really great masters who followed them. In connection with this craze, and because an analogous attempt had made itself apparent at the same time in poetry, Goethe wrote the parable "Priest-play." The latter school was thereupon seen to be based on whims, became bankrupt, and there followed upon it the return to nature, announcing itself in genre pictures, and scenes from life of every kind, even though at times they ran into the common-place.

In accordance with the course of human progress described, is literary-history, which is for the most part a catalogue of a cabinet of abortions. The spirit in which these preserve themselves the longest is swine-leather. On the other hand, one does not require to seek for the few successful births. They remain living, and one encounters them everywhere in the world, where they go about immortal, in an ever-fresh youth. They alone constitute the real literature referred to in the preceding paragraph, a literature of whose history, poor in personalities, we learn from youth upwards from all educated persons, and not first of all from compendiums. Against the monomania for reading literary history dominant now-a-days, in order to be able to gossip about everything, without properly knowing anything, I recommend an extremely readable passage from Lichtenberg, vol. ii., p. 302, of the old edition.

• I could wish, however, that someone would attempt once in a way a tragical literary-history, in which he would describe how the different nations, each of which places its highest prize in the great writers and artists whom it has to show, have treated them during their lives. In this he would bring before our eyes that endless struggle which the good and genuine of all times and countries has had to wage against the mistaken and bad which is always dominant; the martyrdom of almost all true enlighteners of mankind, of almost all great masters, in every department and art, would be described; he would bring before us how they, with few exceptions, have languished without recognition, without interest, without disciples, in poverty and misery, while fame, honour, and riches were the lot of the unworthy in their calling; how, in short, it has gone with them, as with Esau, who hunted and killed game for his father, while Jacob disguised in his cloak was at home stealing his father's blessing; how, nevertheless, notwithstanding all this, love for their cause kept them upright, till at last the bitter struggle of such an educator of the human race was accomplished, the undying laurel beckoned to him, and the hour struck, which meant that for him also —

“The heavy armour vanishes to a toy;
Short is the sorrow, endless is the joy.”

NIETZSCHE

(1844-1900)

Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche was born in the Prussian province of Saxony, the descendant of clergymen on both sides of the house. He went to school at Naumburg and at Pforta and in 1864 entered the University of Bonn to study theology. Increasingly attracted by classical philology, he finally abandoned not only theology, but, after reading Schopenhauer's The World as Will and Idea, Christianity as well. Upon his graduation he was appointed professor at Basle. His great enthusiasm for music led to his friendship for Richard Wagner, whom he found to be a kindred spirit, even in his view of life. Nietzsche's and Wagner's artistic and historical views are combined in a book published by Nietzsche in 1870-71, entitled The Birth of Tragedy. Philological critics gave the book a rude welcome, and Nietzsche's philological enterprises came to an end. From 1873 to 1876 he composed polemical tracts against German lack of culture. In 1878 his Mortal, All too Mortal revealed his disillusion with regard to Wagner and Schopenhauer; and from this point on Nietzsche developed independently. He resigned his professorship to devote himself entirely to philosophy. He assailed the standard morality inherited from antiquity, and strove for what he regarded as a higher, more realistic view of human conduct. His most famous work, Thus Spake Zarathustra (1883-85), embodies the doctrine of the superman. Beyond Good and Evil (1885-86) is partly an explanation of the previous work. In 1887 he began a still greater work, The Will to Power; but his health broke and the book was never completed. He lived on for twelve years in great loneliness and depression of spirit.

• His philosophy, like that of many other great thinkers, has suffered from its friends as well as its enemies. The misuse both accidental and intentional of his principles has given him, in the minds of many, a reputation for villainy almost equal to that of Machiavelli. On the surface of his discussion one sees a vigorous denial of all recognizable moral values and destruction of all that generations have taught us to respect; and yet, for those who read him with understanding, behind his apparent iconoclasm there is a strong constructive effort to replace what seemed to him a sickly and sentimental morality by one that was more healthy, sane, and effective.

BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL

NINTH CHAPTER

WHAT IS NOBLE?

257

Every elevation of the type "man" has hitherto been the work of an aristocratic society — and so will it always be — a society believing in a long scale of gradations of rank and differences of worth among human beings, and requiring slavery in some form or other. Without the pathos of distance, such as grows out of the incarnated difference of classes, out of the constant outlooking and downlooking of the ruling caste on subordinates and instruments, and out of their equally constant practice of obeying and commanding, of keeping down and keeping at a distance — that other more mysterious pathos could never have arisen, the longing for an ever new widening of distance within the soul itself, the formation of ever higher, rarer, further, more extended, more comprehensive states, in short, just the elevation of the type "man," the continued "self-surmounting of man," to use a moral formula in a supermoral sense. To be sure, one must not resign oneself to any humanitarian illusions about the history of the origin of an aristocratic society (that is to say, of the preliminary condition for the elevation of the type "man"): the truth is hard. Let us acknowledge unprejudicedly how every higher civilisation hitherto has originated! Men with a still natural nature, barbarians in every terrible sense of the word, men of prey, still in possession of unbroken strength of will and desire for power, threw themselves upon weaker, more moral, more peaceful races (perhaps trading or cattle-rearing communities), or upon old mellow civilisations in which the final vital force was flickering out in brilliant fireworks of wit and depravity. At the commencement, the noble caste was always the barbarian caste: their superiority did not consist first of all in their physical, but in their psychical power — they were more complete men (which at every point also implies the same as "more complete beasts").

258

Corruption — as the indication that anarchy threatens to break out among the instincts, and that the foundation of the emotions, called "life," is convulsed — is something radically different according to the organisation in which it manifests itself. When, for instance, an aristocracy like that of France at the beginning of the Revolution flung away its privileges with sublime disgust and sacrificed itself to an excess of its moral sentiments, it was corruption: — it was really only the closing act of the corruption which had existed for centuries, by virtue of which that aristocracy had abdicated step by step its lordly prerogatives and lowered itself to a function of royalty (in the end even to its decoration and parade-dress). The essential thing, however, in a good and healthy aristocracy is that it should not regard itself as a function either of the kingship or the commonwealth, but as the significance and highest justification thereof — that it should therefore accept with a good conscience the sacrifice of a legion of individuals, who, for its sake, must be suppressed and reduced to imperfect men, to slaves and instruments. Its fundamental belief must be precisely that society is not allowed to exist for its own sake, but only as a foundation and scaffolding, by means of which a select class of beings may be able to elevate themselves to their higher duties, and in general to a higher existence: like those sun-seeking climbing plants in Java — they are called Sipo Malador — which encircle an oak so long and so often with their arms, until at last, high above it, but supported by it, they can unfold their tops in the open light, and exhibit their happiness.

To refrain mutually from injury, from violence, from exploitation, and put one's will on a par with that of others: this may result in a certain rough sense in good conduct among individuals* when the necessary conditions are given (namely, the actual similarity of the individuals in amount of force and degree of worth, and their co-relation within one organisation). As soon, however, as one wished to take this principle more generally, and if possible even as the fundamental principle of society, it would immediately disclose what it really is — namely, a Will to the denial of life, a principle of dissolution and decay. Here one must think profoundly to the very basis and resist all sentimental weakness: life itself is essentially appropriation, injury, conquest of the strange and weak, suppression, severity, obtrusion of its own forms, incorporation, and at the least, putting it mildest, exploitation; — but why should one for ever use precisely these words on which for ages a disparaging purpose has been stamped? Even the organisation within which, as was previously supposed, the individuals treat each other as equal — it takes place in every healthy aristocracy — must itself, if it be a living and not a dying organisation, do all that towards other bodies, which the individuals within it refrain from doing to each other: it will have to be the incarnated Will to Power, it will endeavour to grow, to gain ground, to attract to itself and acquire ascendancy — not owing to any morality or immorality, but because it lives, and because life is precisely Will to Power. On no point, however, is the ordinary consciousness of Europeans more unwilling to be corrected than on this matter; people now rave everywhere, even under the guise of science, about coming conditions of society in which "the exploiting character" is to be absent: — that sounds to my ears as if they promised to invent a mode of life which should refrain from all organic functions. "Exploitation" does not belong to a depraved, or imperfect and primitive society: it belongs to the nature of the living being as a primary organic function; it is a consequence of the intrinsic Will to Power, which is precisely the Will to Life. — Granting that as a theory this is a novelty — as a reality it is the fundamental fact of all history: let us be so far honest towards ourselves!

In a tour through the many finer and coarser moralities which have hitherto prevailed or still prevail on the earth, I found certain traits recurring regularly together, and connected with one another, until finally two primary types revealed themselves to me, and a radical distinction was brought to light. There is master-morality and slave-morality; — I would at once add, however, that, in all higher and mixed civilisations, there are also attempts at the reconciliation of the two moralities; but one finds still oftener the confusion and mutual misunderstanding of them, indeed, sometimes their close juxtaposition — even in the same man, within one soul. The distinctions of moral values have either originated in a ruling caste, pleasantly conscious of being different from the ruled — or among the ruled class, the slaves and dependents of all sorts. In the first case, when it is the rulers who determine the conception "good," it is the exalted, proud disposition which is regarded as the distinguishing feature, and that which determines the order of rank. The noble type of man separates from himself the beings in whom the opposite of this exalted, proud disposition displays itself: he despises them. Let it at once be noted that in this first kind of morality the antithesis "good" and "bad" means practically the same as "noble" and "despicable"; — the antithesis "good" and "evil" is of a different origin. The cowardly, the timid, the insignificant, and those thinking merely of narrow utility are despised; moreover, also, the distrustful, with their constrained glances, the self-abasing, the dog-like kind of men who let themselves be abused, the mendicant flatterers, and above all the liars: — it is a fundamental belief of all aristocrats that the common people are untruthful. "We truthful ones" — the nobility in ancient Greece called themselves. It is obvious that everywhere the designations of moral value were at first applied to men, and were only derivatively and at a later period applied to actions; it is a gross mistake, therefore, when historians of morals start with questions like, "Why have sympathetic actions been praised?" The noble type of man regards himself as a determiner of values; he does not require to be approved of; he passes the judgment: "What is injurious to me is injurious in itself"; he knows that it is he himself only who confers honour on things; he is a creator of values. He honours whatever he recognises in himself: such morality is self-glorification. In the foreground there is the feeling of plenitude, of power, which seeks to overflow, the happiness of high tension, the consciousness of a wealth which would fain give and bestow: — the noble man also helps the unfortunate, but not — or scarcely — out of pity, but rather from an impulse generated by the superabundance of power. The noble man honours in himself the powerful one, him also who has power over himself, who knows how to speak and how to keep silence, who takes pleasure in subjecting himself to severity and hardness, and has reverence for all that is severe and hard. "Wotan¹ placed a hard heart in my breast," says an old Scandinavian Saga: it is thus rightly expressed from the soul of a proud Viking. Such a type of man is even proud of not being made for sympathy; the hero of the Saga therefore adds warningly: "He who has not a hard heart when young will never have one." The noble and brave who think thus are the furthest removed from the morality which sees precisely in sympathy, or in acting for the good of others, or in désintéressement, the characteristic of the moral; faith in oneself, pride in oneself, a radical enmity and irony towards "selflessness," belong as definitely to noble morality, as do a careless scorn and precaution in presence of sympathy and the "warm heart." — It is the powerful who know how to honour, it is their art, their domain for invention. The profound reverence for age and for tradition — all law rests on this double reverence, — the belief and prejudice in favour of ancestors and unfavourable to newcomers is typical in the morality of the powerful; and if, reversely, men of "modern ideas" believe almost instinctively in "progress" and the "future," and are more and more lacking in respect for old age, the ignoble origin of these "ideas" has complacently betrayed itself thereby. A morality of the ruling class, however, is more especially foreign and irritating to present-day taste in the sternness of its principle that one has duties only to one's equals; that one may act towards beings of a lower rank, towards all that is foreign, just as seems good to one, or "as the heart desires," and in any case "beyond good and evil": it is here that sympathy and similar sentiments can have a place. The ability and obligation to exercise prolonged gratitude and prolonged revenge — both only within the circle of equals, — artfulness in retaliation, raffinement of the idea in friendship, a certain necessity to have enemies (as outlets for the emotions of envy, quarrelsomeness, arrogance — in fact, in order to be a good friend): all these are typical characteristics of the noble morality, which, as has been pointed out, is not the morality of "modern ideas," and is therefore at present difficult to realise, and also to unearth and disclose. — It is otherwise with the second type of morality, slave-morality. Supposing that the abused, the oppressed, the suffering, the unemancipated, the weary, and those uncertain of themselves, should moralise, what will be the common element in their moral estimates? Probably a pessimistic suspicion with regard to the entire situation of man will find expression, perhaps a condemnation of man, together with his situation. The slave has an unfavourable eye for the virtues of the powerful; he has a scepticism and distrust, a refinement of distrust of everything "good" that is there honoured — he would fain persuade himself that the very happiness there is not genuine. On the other hand, those qualities which serve to alleviate the existence of sufferers are brought into prominence and flooded with light; it is here that sympathy, the kind, helping hand, the warm heart, patience, diligence, humility, and friendliness attain to honour; for here these are the most useful qualities, and almost the only means of supporting the burden of existence. Slave-morality is essentially the morality of utility. Here is the seat of the origin of the famous antithesis "good" and "evil": — power and dangerousness are assumed to reside in the evil, a certain dreadfulness, subtlety, and strength, which do not admit of being despised. According to slave-morality, therefore, the "evil" man arouses fear; according to master-morality, it is precisely the "good" man who arouses fear and seeks to arouse it, while the bad man is regarded as the despicable being. The contrast attains its maximum when, in accordance with the logical consequences of slave-morality, a shade of depreciation — it may be slight and well-intentioned — at last attaches itself even to the "good" man of this morality; because, according to the servile mode of thought, the good man must in any case be the safe man: he is good-natured, easily deceived, perhaps a little stupid, un bonhomme. Everywhere that slave-morality gains the ascendancy, language shows a tendency to approximate the significations of the words "good" and "stupid." — A last fundamental difference: the desire for freedom, the instinct for happiness and the refinements of the feeling of liberty belong as necessarily to slave-morals and morality, as artifice and enthusiasm in reverence and devotion are the regular symptoms of an aristocratic mode of thinking and estimating. — Hence we can understand without further detail why love as a passion — it is our European specialty — must absolutely be of noble origin; as is well known, its invention is due to the Provençal poet-cavaliers, those brilliant ingenious men of the "gai saber,"¹ to whom Europe owes so much, and almost owes itself.

Vanity is one of the things which are perhaps most difficult for a noble man to understand: he will be tempted to deny it, where another kind of man thinks he sees it self-evidently. The problem for him is to represent to his mind beings who seek to arouse a good opinion of themselves which they themselves do not possess — and consequently also do not "deserve," — and who yet believe in this good opinion afterwards. This seems to him on the one hand such bad taste and so self-disrespectful, and on the other hand so grotesquely unreasonable, that he would like to consider vanity an exception, and is doubtful about it in most cases when it is spoken of. He will say, for instance: "I may be mistaken about my value, and on the other hand may nevertheless demand that my value should be acknowledged by others precisely as I rate it: — that, however, is not vanity (but self-conceit, or, in most cases, that which is called 'humility,' and also 'modesty')." Or he will even say: "For many reasons I can delight in the good opinion of others, perhaps because I love and honour them, and rejoice in all their joys, perhaps also because their good opinion endorses and strengthens my belief in my own good opinion, perhaps because the good opinion of others, even in cases where I do not share it, is useful to me, or gives promise of usefulness: — all this, however, is not vanity." The man of noble character must first bring it home forcibly to his mind, especially with the aid of history, that, from time immemorial, in all social strata in any way dependent, the ordinary man was only that which he passed for: — not being at all accustomed to fix values, he did not assign even to himself any other value than that which his master assigned to him (it is the peculiar right of masters to create values).

¹ The love poetry of the troubadours, distinguished by elegance of form and delicacy of sentiment, which was practised by persons of noble birth in the courts of southern France.

It may be looked upon as the result of an extraordinary atavism, that the ordinary man, even at present, is still always waiting for an opinion about himself, and then instinctively submitting himself to it; yet by no means only to a "good" opinion, but also to a bad and unjust one (think, for instance, of the greater part of the self-appreciations and self-deprecations which believing women learn from their confessors, and which in general the believing Christian learns from his Church). In fact, conformably to the slow rise of the democratic social order (and its cause, the blending of the blood of masters and slaves), the originally noble and rare impulse of the masters to assign a value to themselves and to "think well" of themselves will now be more and more encouraged and extended; but it has at all times an older, ampler, and more radically ingrained propensity opposed to it — and in the phenomenon of "vanity" this older propensity overmasters the younger. The vain person rejoices over every good opinion which he hears about himself (quite apart from the point of view of its usefulness, and equally regardless of its truth or falsehood), just as he suffers from every bad opinion: for he subjects himself to both, he feels himself subjected to both, by that oldest instinct of subjection which breaks forth in him. — It is "the slave" in the vain man's blood, the remains of the slave's craftiness — and how much of the "slave" is still left in woman, for instance! — which seeks to seduce to good opinions of itself; it is the slave, too, who immediately afterwards falls prostrate himself before these opinions, as though he had not called them forth. — And to repeat it again: vanity is an atavism.

A species originates, and a type becomes established and strong in the long struggle with essentially constant unfavourable conditions. On the other hand, it is known by the experience of breeders that species which receive superabundant nourishment, and in general a surplus of protection and care, immediately tend in the most marked way to develop variations, and are fertile in prodigies and monstrosities (also in monstrous vices). Now look at an aristocratic commonwealth, say an ancient Greek polis, or Venice, as a voluntary or involuntary contrivance for the purpose of rearing human beings; there are there men beside one another, thrown upon their own resources, who want to make their species prevail, chiefly because they must prevail, or else run the terrible danger of being exterminated. The favour, the superabundance, the protection are there lacking under which variations are fostered; the species needs itself as species, as something which, precisely by virtue of its hardness, its uniformity, and simplicity of structure, can in general prevail and make itself permanent in constant struggle with its neighbours, or with rebellious or rebellion-threatening vassals. The most varied experience teaches it what are the qualities to which it principally owes the fact that it still exists, in spite of all Gods and men, and has hitherto been victorious: these qualities it calls virtues, and these virtues alone it develops to maturity. It does so with severity, indeed it desires severity; every aristocratic morality is intolerant in the education of youth, in the control of women, in the marriage customs, in the relations of old and young, in the penal laws (which have an eye only for the degenerating): it counts intolerance itself among the virtues, under the name of "justice." A type with few, but very marked features, a species of severe, warlike, wisely silent, reserved and reticent men (and as such, with the most delicate sensibility for the charm and nuances of society) is thus established, unaffected by the vicissitudes of generations; the constant struggle with uniform unfavourable conditions is, as already remarked, the cause of a type becoming stable and hard. Finally, however, a happy state of things results, the enormous tension is relaxed; there are perhaps no more enemies among the neighbouring peoples, and the means of life, even of the enjoyment of life, are present in superabundance. With one stroke the bond and constraint of the old discipline severs: it is no longer regarded as necessary, as a condition of existence — if it would continue, it can only do so as a form of luxury, as an archaïsing taste. Variations, whether they be deviations (into the higher, finer, and rarer), or deteriorations and monstrosities, appear suddenly on the scene in the greatest exuberance and splendour; the individual dares to be individual and detach himself. At this turning-point of history there manifest themselves, side by side, and often mixed and entangled together, a magnificent, manifold, virgin-forest-like up-growth and up-striving, a kind of tropical tempo in the rivalry of growth, and an extraordinary decay and self-destruction, owing to the savagely opposing and seemingly exploding egoisms, which strive with one another “for sun and light,” and can no longer assign any limit, restraint, or forbearance for themselves by means of the hitherto existing morality. It was this morality itself which piled up the strength so enormously, which bent the bow in so threatening a manner: — it is now “out of date,” it is getting “out of date.” The dangerous and disquieting point has been reached when the greater, more manifold, more comprehensive life is lived beyond the old morality; the “individual” stands out, and is obliged to have recourse to his own law-giving, his own arts and artifices for self-preservation, self-elevation, and self-deliverance. Nothing but new “Whys,” nothing but new “Hows,” no common formulas any longer, misunderstanding and disregard in league with each other, decay, deterioration, and the loftiest desires frightfully entangled, the genius of the race overflowing from all the cornucopias of good and bad, a portentous simultaneousness of Spring and Autumn, full of new charms and mysteries peculiar to the fresh, still inexhausted, still unwearied corruption. Danger is again present, the mother of morality, great danger; this time shifted into the individual, into the neighbour and friend, into the street, into their own child, into their own heart, into all the most personal and secret recesses of their desires and volitions. What will the moral philosophers who appear at this time have to preach? They discover, these sharp onlookers and loafers, that the end is quickly approaching, that everything around them decays and produces decay, that nothing will endure until the day after to-morrow, except one species of man, the incurably mediocre. The mediocre alone have a prospect of continuing and propagating themselves — they will be the men of the future, the sole survivors; “be like them! become mediocre!” is now the only morality which has still a significance, which still obtains a hearing. — But it is difficult to preach this morality of mediocrity! it can never avow what it is and what it desires! it has to talk of moderation and dignity and duty and brotherly love — it will have difficulty in concealing its irony!

263

There is an instinct for rank, which more than anything else is already the sign of a high rank; there is a delight in the nuances of reverence which leads one to infer noble origin and habits. The refinement, goodness, and loftiness of a soul are put to a perilous test when something passes by that is of the highest rank, but is not yet protected by the awe of authority from obtrusive touches and incivilities: something that goes its way like a living touchstone, undistinguished, undiscovered, and tentative, perhaps voluntarily veiled and disguised. He whose task and practice it is to investigate souls will avail himself of many varieties of this very art to determine the ultimate value of a soul, the unalterable, innate order of rank to which it belongs: he will test it by its instinct for reverence. *Différence engendre haine*¹: the vulgarity of many a nature spurts up suddenly like dirty water, when any holy vessel, any jewel from closed shrines, any book bearing the marks of great destiny, is brought before it; while, on the other hand, there is an involuntary silence, a hesitation of the eye, a cessation of all gestures, by which it is indicated that a soul feels the nearness of what is worthiest of respect. The way in which, on the whole, the reverence for the Bible has hitherto been maintained in Europe, is perhaps the best example of discipline and refinement of manners which Europe owes to Christianity: books of such profoundness and supreme significance require for their protection an external tyranny of authority, in order to acquire the period of thousands of years which is necessary to exhaust and unriddle them. Much has been achieved when the sentiment has been at last instilled into the masses (the shallow-pates and the boobies of every kind) that they are not allowed to touch everything, that there are holy experiences before which they must take off their shoes and keep away the unclean hand — it is almost their highest advance towards humanity. On the contrary, in the so-called cultured classes, the believers in “modern ideas,” nothing is perhaps so repulsive as their lack of shame, the easy insolence of eye and hand with which they touch, taste, and finger everything; and it is possible that even yet there is more relative nobility of taste, and more tact for reverence among the people, among the lower classes of the people, especially among peasants, than among the newspaper-reading demi-monde of intellect, the cultured class.

264

It cannot be effaced from a man's soul what his ancestors have preferably and most constantly done: whether they were perhaps diligent economisers attached to a desk and a cash-box, modest and citizen-like in their desires, modest also in their virtues; or whether they were accustomed to commanding from morning till night, fond of rude pleasures and probably of still ruder duties and responsibilities; or whether, finally, at one time or another, they have sacrificed old privileges of birth and possession, in order to live wholly for their faith — for their “God,” — as men of an inexorable and sensitive conscience, which blushes at every compromise. It is quite impossible for a man not to have the qualities and predilections of his parents and ancestors in his constitution, whatever appearances may suggest to the contrary. This is the problem of race. Granted that one knows something of the parents, it is admissible to draw a conclusion about the child: any kind of offensive incontinence, any kind of sordid envy, or of clumsy self-vaunting — the three things which together have constituted the genuine plebeian type in all times — such must pass over to the child, as surely as bad blood; and with the help of the best education and culture one will only succeed in deceiving with regard to such heredity. — And what else does education and culture try to do nowadays! In our very democratic, or rather, very plebeian age, “education” and “culture” must be essentially the art of deceiving — deceiving with regard to origin, with regard to the inherited plebeianism in body and soul. An educator who nowadays preached truthfulness above everything else, and called out constantly to his pupils: “Be true! Be natural! Show yourselves as you are!” — even such a virtuous and sincere ass would learn in a short time to have recourse to the *furca*¹ of Horace, naturam expellere: with what results? “Plebeianism” usque recurret.

At the risk of displeasing innocent ears, I submit that egoism belongs to the essence of a noble soul, I mean the unalterable belief that to a being such as “we,” other beings must naturally be in subjection, and have to sacrifice themselves. The noble soul accepts the fact of his egoism without question, and also without consciousness of harshness, constraint, or arbitrariness therein, but rather as something that may have its basis in the primary law of things: — if he sought a designation for it he would say: “It is justice itself.” He acknowledges under certain circumstances, which made him hesitate at first, that there are other equally privileged ones; as soon as he has settled this question of rank, he moves among those equals and equally privileged ones with the same assurance, as regards modesty and delicate respect, which he enjoys in intercourse with himself — in accordance with an innate heavenly mechanism which all the stars understand. It is an additional instance of his egoism, this artfulness and self-limitation in intercourse with his equals — every star is a similar egoist; he honours himself in them, and in the rights which he concedes to them, he has no doubt that the exchange of honours and rights, as the essence of all intercourse, belongs also to the natural condition of things. The noble soul gives as he takes, prompted by the passionate and sensitive instinct of requital, which is at the root of his nature. The notion of "favour" has, inter pares,¹ neither significance nor good repute; there may be a sublime way of letting gifts as it were light upon one from above, and of drinking them thirstily like dew-drops; but for those arts and displays the noble soul has no aptitude. His egoism hinders him here: in general, he looks "aloft" unwillingly — he looks either forward, horizontally and deliberately, or downwards — he knows that he is on a height.

266

"One can only truly esteem him who does not look out for himself." — Goethe to Rath Schlosser.

267

The Chinese have a proverb which mothers even teach their children: "Siao-sin" ("make thy heart small"). This is the essentially fundamental tendency in latter-day civilisations. I have no doubt that an ancient Greek, also, would first of all remark the self-dwarfing in us Europeans of to-day — in this respect alone we should immediately be "distasteful" to him.

² Protective characteristic of the human species.

268

What, after all, is ignobleness? — Words are vocal symbols for ideas; ideas, however, are more or less definite mental symbols for frequently returning and concurring sensations, for groups of sensations. It is not sufficient to use the same words in order to understand one another: we must also employ the same words for the same kind of internal experiences, we must in the end have experiences in common. On this account the people of one nation understand one another better than those belonging to different nations, even when they use the same language; or rather, when people have lived long together under similar conditions (of climate, soil, danger, requirement, toil) there originates therefrom an entity that "understands itself" — namely, a nation. In all souls a like number of frequently recurring experiences have gained the upper hand over those occurring more rarely: about these matters people understand one another rapidly and always more rapidly — the history of language is the history of a process of abbreviation; on the basis of this quick comprehension people always unite closer and closer. The greater the danger, the greater is the need of agreeing quickly and readily about what is necessary; not to misunderstand one another in danger — that is what cannot at all be dispensed with in intercourse. Also in all loves and friendships one has the experience that nothing of the kind continues when the discovery has been made that, in using the same words, one of the two parties has feelings, thoughts, intuitions, wishes, or fears different from those of the other. (The fear of the "eternal misunderstanding": that is the good genius which so often keeps persons of different sexes from too hasty attachments, to which sense and heart prompt them — and not some Schopenhauerian "genius of the species"²!). Whichever groups of sensations within a soul awaken most readily, begin to speak, and give the word of command — these decide as to the general order of rank of its values, and determine ultimately its list of desirable things. A man's estimates of value betray something of the structure of his soul, and wherein it sees its conditions of life, its intrinsic needs. Supposing now that necessity has from all time drawn together only such men as could express similar requirements and similar experiences by similar symbols, it results on the whole that the easy communicability of need, which implies ultimately the undergoing only of average and common experiences, must have been the most potent of all the forces which have hitherto operated upon mankind. The more similar, the more ordinary people, have always had and are still having the advantage; the more select, more refined, more unique, and difficultly comprehensible, are liable to stand alone; they succumb to accidents in their isolation, and seldom propagate themselves. One must appeal to immense opposing forces, in order to thwart this natural, all-too-natural progressus in simile, the evolution of man to the similar, the ordinary, the average, the gregarious — to the ignoble! —

The more a psychologist — a born, an unavoidable psychologist and soul-diviner — turns his attention to the more select cases and individuals, the greater is his danger of being suffocated by sympathy: he needs sternness and cheerfulness more than any other man. For the corruption, the ruination of higher men, of the more unusually constituted souls, is, in fact, the rule: it is dreadful to have such a rule always before one's eyes. The manifold torment of the psychologist who has discovered this ruination, who discovers once, and then discovers almost repeatedly throughout all history, this universal inner "desperateness" of higher men, this eternal "too late!" in every sense — may perhaps one day be the cause of his turning with bitterness against his own lot, and of his making an attempt at self-destruction — of his "going to ruin" himself. One may perceive in almost every psychologist a tell-tale inclination for delightful intercourse with commonplace and well-ordered men: the fact is thereby disclosed that he always requires healing, that he needs a sort of flight and forgetfulness, away from what his insight and incisiveness — from what his "business" — has laid upon his conscience. The fear of his memory is peculiar to him. He is easily silenced by the judgment of others; he hears with unmoved countenance how people honour, admire, love, and glorify, where he has perceived — or he even conceals his silence by expressly assenting to some plausible opinion. Perhaps the paradox of his situation becomes so dreadful that, precisely where he has learnt great sympathy, together with great contempt, the multitude, the educated, and the visionaries, have on their part learnt great reverence — reverence for "great men" and marvellous animals, for the sake of whom one blesses and honours the fatherland, the earth, the dignity of mankind, and one's own self, to whom one points the young, and in view of whom one educates them. And who knows but in all great instances hitherto just the same happened: that the multitude worshipped a God, and that the "God" was only a poor sacrificial animal! Success has always been the greatest liar — and the "work" itself is a success; the great statesman, the conqueror, the discoverer, are disguised in their creations until they are unrecognisable; the "work" of the artist, of the philosopher, only invents him who has created it, is reputed to have created it; the "great men," as they are revered, are poor little fictions composed afterwards; in the world of historical values spurious coinage prevails. Those great poets, for example, such as Byron, Musset, Poe, Leopardi, Kleist, Gogol (I do not venture to mention much greater names, but I have them in my mind), as they now appear, and were perhaps obliged to be: men of the moment, enthusiastic, sensuous, and childish, light-minded and impulsive in their trust and distrust; with souls in which usually some flaw has to be concealed; often taking revenge with their works for an internal defilement, often seeking forgetfulness in their soaring from a too true memory, often lost in the mud and almost in love with it, until they become like the Will-o'-the-Wisps around the swamps, and pretend to be stars — the people then call them idealists, — often struggling with protracted disgust, with an ever-reappearing phantom of disbelief, which makes them cold, and obliges them to languish for gloria and devour "faith as it is" out of the hands of intoxicated adulators: — what a torment these great artists are and the so-called higher men in general, to him who has once found them out! It is thus conceivable that it is just from woman — who is clairvoyant in the world of suffering, and also unfortunately eager to help and save to an extent far beyond her powers — that they have learnt so readily those outbreaks of boundless devoted sympathy, which the multitude, above all the reverent multitude, do not understand, and overwhelm with prying and self-gratifying interpretations. This sympathising invariably deceives itself as to its power; woman would like to believe that love can do everything — it is the superstition peculiar to her. Alas, he who knows the heart finds out how poor, helpless, pretentious, and blundering even the best and deepest love is — he finds that it rather destroys than saves! — It is possible that under the holy fable and travesty of the life of Jesus there is hidden one of the most painful cases of the martyrdom of knowledge about love: the martyrdom of the most innocent and most craving heart, that never had enough of any human love, that *demand*ed love, that demanded inexorably and frantically to be loved and nothing else, with terrible outbursts against those who refused him their love; the story of a poor soul insatiated and insatiable in love, that had to invent hell to send thither those who would not love him — and that at last, enlightened about human love, had to invent a God who is entire love, entire capacity for love — who takes pity on human love, because it is so paltry, so ignorant! He who has such sentiments, he who has such knowledge about love — seeks for death! — But why should one deal with such painful matters? Provided, of course, that one is not obliged to do so.

270

The intellectual haughtiness and loathing of every man who has suffered deeply — it almost determines the order of rank how deeply men can suffer — the chilling certainty, with which he is thoroughly imbued and coloured, that by virtue of his suffering he knows more than the shrewdest and wisest can ever know, that he has been familiar with, and "at home" in, many distant, dreadful worlds of which "you know nothing"! — this silent intellectual haughtiness of the sufferer, this pride of the elect of knowledge, of the "initiated," of the almost sacrificed, finds all forms of disguise necessary to protect itself from contact with officious and sympathising hands, and in general from all that is not its equal in suffering. Profound suffering makes noble; it separates. — One of the most refined forms of disguise is Epicurism, along with a certain ostentatious boldness of taste, which takes suffering lightly, and puts itself on the defensive against all that is sorrowful and profound. There are "gay men" who make use of gaiety, because they are misunderstood on account of it — they wish to be misunderstood. There are "scientific minds" who make use of science, because it gives a gay appearance, and because scientificness leads to the conclusion that a person is superficial — they wish to mislead to a false conclusion. There are free insolent minds which would fain conceal and deny that they are broken, proud, incurable hearts (the cynicism of Hamlet — the case of Galiani); and occasionally folly itself is the mask of an unfortunate over-assured knowledge. — From which it follows that it is the part of a more refined humanity to have reverence "for the mask," and not to make use of psychology and curiosity in the wrong place.

271

That which separates two men most profoundly is a different sense and grade of purity. What does it matter about all their honesty and reciprocal usefulness, what does it matter about all their mutual good-will: the fact still remains — they “cannot smell each other”! The highest instinct for purity places him who is affected with it in the most extraordinary and dangerous isolation, as a saint: for it is just holiness — the highest spiritualisation of the instinct in question. Any kind of cognizance of an indescribable excess in the joy of the bath, any kind of ardour or thirst which perpetually impels the soul out of night into the morning, and out of gloom, out of “affliction” into clearness, brightness, depth, and refinement: — just as much as such a tendency distinguishes — it is a noble tendency — it also separates. — The pity of the saint is pity for the filth of the human, all-too-human. And there are grades and heights where pity itself is regarded by him as impurity, as filth.

272

Signs of nobility: never to think of lowering our duties to the rank of duties for everybody; to be unwilling to renounce or to share our responsibilities; to count our prerogatives, and the exercise of them, among our duties.

273

A man who strives after great things looks upon every one whom he encounters on his way either as a means of advance, or a delay and hindrance — or as a temporary resting-place. His peculiar lofty bounty to his fellow-men is only possible when he attains his elevation and dominates. Impatience, and the consciousness of being always condemned to comedy up to that time — for even strife is a comedy, and conceals the end, as every means does — spoil all intercourse for him; this kind of man is acquainted with solitude, and what is most poisonous in it.

274

The Problem of those who Wail. — Happy When a man has finished building his chances are necessary, and many incalculable elements, in order that a higher man in whom the solution of a problem is dormant may yet take action, or “break forth,” as one might say — at the right moment. On an average it does not happen; and in all corners of the earth there are waiting ones sitting, who hardly know to what extent they are waiting, and still less that they wait in vain. Occasionally, too, the waking call comes too late — the chance which gives “permission” to take action — when their best youth and strength for action have been used up in sitting still; and how many a one, just as he “sprang up,” has found with horror that his limbs are benumbed and his spirits are now too heavy! “It is too late,” he has said to himself — and has become self-distrustful and henceforth for ever useless. — In the domain of genius, may not the “Raphael without hands” (taking the expression in its widest sense) perhaps not be the exception, but the rule? — Perhaps genius is by no means so rare: but rather the five hundred hands which it requires in order to tyrannise over the καίρος, “the right time” — in order to take chance by the forelock!

275

He who does not wish to see the height of a man looks all the more sharply at what is low in him, and in the foreground — and thereby betrays himself.

276

In all kinds of injury and loss the lower and coarser soul is better off than the nobler soul: the dangers of the latter must be greater, the probability that it will come to grief and perish is in fact immense, considering the multiplicity of the conditions of its existence. — In a lizard a finger grows again which has been lost; not so in man. —

277

It is too bad! Always the old story! When a man has finished building his house, he finds that he has learnt unawares something which he ought absolutely to have known before he — began to build. The eternal, fatal "Too late!" The melancholia of everything completed! —

278

— Wanderer, who art thou? I see thee follow thy path without scorn, without love, with unfathomable eyes, wet and sad 10 and as a plummet which has returned to the light insatiated out of every depth — what did it seek down there? — with a bosom that never sighs, with lips that conceal their loathing, with a hand which 15 only slowly grasps: who art thou? what hast thou done? Rest thee here: this place has hospitality for every one — refresh thyself! And whoever thou art, what is it that now pleases thee? What will 20 serve to refresh thee? Only name it, whatever I have I offer thee! "To refresh me? To refresh me? Oh, thou prying one, what sayest thou! But give me, I pray thee —" What? what? Speak out! 25 "Another mask! A second mask!"

279

Men of profound sadness betray themselves when they are happy: they have a mode of seizing upon happiness as though they would choke and strangle it, out of jealousy — ah, they know only too well that it will flee from them!

280

"Bad! Bad! What? Does he not — go back?" Yes! But you misunderstand him 40 when you complain about it. He goes back like every one who is about to make a great spring.

281

— "Will people believe it of me? But I insist that they believe it of me: I have always thought very unsatisfactorily of myself and about myself, only in very rare cases, only compulsorily, always without delight in 'the subject,' ready to digress 5 from 'myself,' and always without faith in the result, owing to an unconquerable distrust of the possibility of self-knowledge, which has led me so far as to feel a *contradictio in adjecto*¹ even in the idea of 'direct knowledge' which theorists allow themselves: — this matter of fact is almost the most certain thing I know about myself. There must be a sort of repugnance in me to believe anything definite about myself. — Is there perhaps some enigma therein? Probably; but fortunately nothing for my own teeth. — Perhaps it betrays the species to which I belong? — but not to myself, as is sufficiently agree- 20 able to me."

282

— "But what has happened to you?" — "I do not know," he said, hesitatingly; "perhaps the Harpies² have flown over my table." — It sometimes happens nowadays that a gentle, sober, retiring man becomes suddenly mad, breaks the plates, 30 upsets the table, shrieks, raves, and shocks everybody — and finally withdraws, ashamed, and raging at himself — whither? for what purpose? To famish apart? To suffocate with his memories? — To him 35 who has the desires of a lofty and dainty soul, and only seldom finds his table laid and his food prepared, the danger will always be great — nowadays, however, it is extraordinarily so. Thrown into the midst of a noisy and plebeian age, with which he does not like to eat out of the same dish, he may readily perish of hunger and thirst — or, should he nevertheless finally "fall to," of sudden nausea. — 45 We have probably all sat at tables to which we did not belong; and precisely the most spiritual of us, who are most difficult to nourish, know the dangerous

² In Greek mythology, the "robbers" or "spoilers," disgusting birds with the heads of maidens, with long claws, and faces pale with hunger, who were sent by the gods to torment blind Phineus; whenever a meal was placed before him, they darted down from the air and either carried it off or rendered it unfit to eat.

dyspepsia which originates from a sudden insight and disillusionment about our food and our messmates — the after-dinner nausea.

283

If one wishes to praise at all, it is a delicate and at the same time a noble self-control, to praise only where one does not agree — otherwise in fact one would praise oneself, which is contrary to good taste: — a self-control, to be sure, which offers excellent opportunity and provocation to constant misunderstanding. To be able 15 to allow oneself this veritable luxury of taste and morality, one must not live among intellectual imbeciles, but rather among men whose misunderstandings and mistakes amuse by their refinement — or 20 one will have to pay dearly for it! — “He praises me, therefore he acknowledges me to be right” — this asinine method of inference spoils half of the life of us recluses, for it brings the asses into our 25 neighbourhood and friendship.

284

To live in a vast and proud tranquillity; 30 always beyond . . . To have, or not to have, one's emotions, one's For and Against, according to choice; to lower oneself to them for hours; to seat oneself on them as upon horses, and often as upon 35 asses: — for one must know how to make use of their stupidity as well as of their fire. To conserve one's three hundred foregrounds; also one's black spectacles: for there are circumstances when nobody must look into our eyes, still less into our “motives.” And to choose for company that roguish and cheerful vice, politeness. 5 And to remain master of one's four virtues, courage, insight, sympathy, and solitude. For solitude is a virtue with us, as a sublime bent and bias to purity, which divines that in the contact of man and man — “in society” — it must be unavoidably impure. All society makes one somehow, somewhere, or sometime — “common-place.”

285

The greatest events and thoughts — the greatest thoughts, however, are the greatest events — are longest in being comprehended: the generations which are contemporary with them do not experience such events — they live past them. Something happens there as in the realm of the stars. The light of the furthest stars is longest in reaching man; and before it has arrived man denies — that there are stars there. “How many centuries does a mind require to be understood?” — that is also a standard, one also makes a gradation of rank and an etiquette therewith, such as is necessary for mind and for star.

286

“Here is the prospect free, the mind exalted.”¹ — But there is a reverse kind of man, who is also upon a height, and has also a free prospect — but looks downwards.

POETRY

GERMAN

FREILIGRATH

(1810-1876)

Ferdinand Freiligrath was born at Detmold. His mother died when he was seven, and Ferdinand was left largely to himself. In 1820 he was sent to a boarding school, and went in 1825 to his uncle in Westphalia to learn business. During his hours of leisure he composed poetry. His fancy had early been entranced by the Orient as illustrated in Bibles and travel books, and by accounts of Iceland and other far-off countries; and at Amsterdam, where from 1831 to 1836 he was in business, he became acquainted with the sea, which thenceforth influenced his verse. In his leisure hours he wrote poems of Asia, Africa, and America, all tinted with exotic colors, full of rare plants and strange animals. When he returned to Germany in 1837, he found himself already well known as a poet. Though still in business, he continued to write. In 1841 he married, and in the same year was awarded a pension by the King of Prussia. His lack of sympathy with the administration of the government, however, led him to relinquish the pension and to publish criticisms of the government that soon made it necessary for him to leave the country. He went first to Belgium, then to Switzerland, and then in 1846 to London. Returning in 1848 to Germany he allied himself at Düsseldorf with the democratic movement. His poem From the Dead to the Living brought him into court, but he was acquitted and went to Cologne. There his writings again got him into trouble and he went to London. Eight years before his death, however, he returned.

Although Freiligrath's greatest originality is to be found in that political poetry which places him first among Germany's revolutionary poets, from the standpoint of literary history he is a romantic poet. Having absorbed the themes and tastes of his German predecessors, he turned to the French models of romantic poetry, to the English, and from time to time to American verse, and brought about an interesting assimilation into German poetry of these foreign influences. It was probably to Victor Hugo that he owed much of his orientalism. Among Freiligrath's numerous translations, a version of Longfellow's Hiawatha deserves especial mention.

The Lion's Ride (1835) is translated by H. W. Longfellow in The Poets and Poetry of Europe. The Revenge of the Flowers (1838) is translated by Dr. Alfred Baskerville in The Poetry of Germany.

THE LION'S RIDE

What! wilt thou bind him fast with a chain?

Wilt bind the king of the cloudy sands?

Idiot fool! he has burst from thy hands and bands,
And speeds like Storm through his far domain!

See! he crouches down in the sedge,

By the water's edge,
Making the startled sycamore-boughs to quiver!

Gazelle and giraffe, I think, will shun that river.

Not so! The curtain of evening falls,
And the Caffre,¹ mooring his light canoe

To the shore, glides down through the hushed karroo.²

- And the watchfires burn in the Hottentot kraals,¹
 And the antelope seeks a bed in the bush
 Till the dawn shall blush,
 And the zebra stretches his limbs by the tinkling fountain,
 And the changeful signals fade from the Table Mountain.
- Now look through the dusk! What seest thou now?
 Seest such a tall giraffe! She stalks,
 All majesty, through the desert walks,
 In search of water to cool her tongue and brow.
 From tract to tract of the limitless waste
 Behold her haste!
 Till, bowing her long neck down, she buries her face in
 The reeds, and, kneeling, drinks from the river's basin.
- But look again! — look! — see once more
 Those globe eyes glare! The gigantic reeds
 Lie cloven and trampled like puniest weeds, —
 The lion leaps on the drinker's neck with a roar!
 Oh, what a racer! Can any behold,
 'Mid the housings of gold
 In the stables of kings, dyes half so splendid
 As those on the brindled hide of yon wild animal blended?
- Greedily flashes the lion his teeth
 In the breast of his writhing prey;
 around
 Her neck his loose brown mane is wound.
 Hark, that hollow cry! She springs up from beneath,
 And in agony flies over plains and heights.
 See, how she unites,
- Even under such monstrous and torturing trammel,
 With the grace of the leopard, the speed of the camel!
- She reaches the central moon-lighted plain,
 That spreadeth around all bare and wide;
 Meanwhile, adown her spotted side
 The dusky blood-gouts rush like rain,
 And her woful eyeballs, how they stare
 On the void of air!
 Yet on she flies, — on, — on; for her there is no retreating;
 And the desert can hear the heart of the doomed one beating!
- And, lo! a stupendous column of sand,
 A sand-spout out of that sandy ocean, upcurls
 Behind the pair in eddies and whirls;
 Most like some flaming colossal brand,
 Or wandering spirit of wrath
 On his blasted path,
 Or the dreadful pillar that lighted the warriors and women
 Of Israel's land through the wilderness of Yemen.²
- And the vulture, scenting a coming corse,
 Sails, hoarsely screaming, down the sky;
 The bloody hyena, be sure, is nigh,
 Fierce pillager he of the charnel-house!
 The panther, too, who strangles the Cape-Town³ sheep
 As they lie asleep,
 Athirst for his share in the slaughter, follows;
 While the gore of their victim spreads like a pool in the sandy hollows!
- She reels, but the king of the brutes bestrides
 His tottering throne to the last: with might

THE REVENGE OF THE FLOWERS

On her couch the maid reclineth,
Wrapt in slumber's soft repose,
Long and dark, her lashes sweeping,
Veil a cheek where crimson glows.

Golden gleams the painted chalice,
Glitt'ring on the old oak chair,
Fresh plucked flowers, rainbow tinted,
Waft their fragrance through the air.

Sultry air its brooding vapour
In the heated chamber pours,
For the summer's breath is glowing,
Closed are lattices and doors.

All is hushed, a deathlike silence!
Hark! that sudden whisper faint!
Voices, from the flowers rising,
Lisp soft accents of complaint.

O'er the bell-shaped blossoms hover
Spirits, phantoms of the air:
Misty vapour is their vesture,
Shields and golden crowns they wear.

From the rose's lap of crimson
Steps a bride, so slender, fair;

Pearls, like dew-drops in the sunbeam,
Glitter in her flowing hair.

From the helmet of the monk's hood,
5 With its leaves of sombre green,
Steps a knight of daring boldness;
Brightly gleams his sabre's sheen.

O'er his helmet nods the plumage
10 Of the silver heron's tail.
From the lily soars a maiden,
Thin as gossamer her veil.

From the columbine's dark chalice
Comes a Moor with stately march;
O'er his dark green turban shining,
Glow the crescent's golden arch.

Proudly from th' imperial lily
20 Steps a sceptre-bearer bold.
From the iris, forest rangers
Follow, clad in green and gold.

From the leaves of the narcissus,
Sombre, sad, a stripling wends,
25 To imprint his glowing kisses
On the maiden's lips he bends.

Round the couch in giddy circles
Soar the sprites on airy wing.
30 Wildly dancing, springing, whirling,
Thus they to the sleeper sing:

"Maiden, maiden! thou hast torn us
"From the earth, that 'neath thine eye, 35 "In yon gaily painted chalice,
"We may languish, fade, and die.

"Oh, how happily we slumbered
"On the earth, our mother's breast, 40 "Where the sun, through verdant branches,
"Glowing kisses on us pressed.

"Where the vernal zephyr cooled us,
45 "As we bent beneath its power,
"Where at night as elves we danced,
"Merging from our leafy bower.

"Rain and dew flowed brightly round us,
50 "Now we pine in stagnant water!
"We must fade, yet ere we perish,
"Maiden, we'll revenge our slaughter."

Hushed was now their song, inclining,
 Bend they o'er the sleeping fair;
 With their former gloomy silence,
 Rose soft whispers through the air.

Lo! the sunbeam greets her bower
 With its kiss, each phantom flies.
 In the sleep of death reclining,
 Lovely still the maiden lies.

Hark! what rustling, what a humming!
 How the maiden's cheeks they glow!
 How the spirits breathe upon them!
 How the waving odours flow!

5 She, herself a faded flower,
 Yet upon her cheeks the glow,
 Slumbers by her withered sisters,
 Whose fell spirits laid her low.

DEHMEL

(1863-1920)

One of the strongest personalities and most powerful poets of the immediate past in Germany was Richard Dehmel. He was born in Wedisch-Hermsdorf, the son of a forester. He attended school in Berlin and Danzig, and then went on to the university to study philosophy and social science. He later became secretary to the Society for Fire Prevention, a position he abandoned after the publication of his first volume of poetry. Resolved to devote himself entirely to writing, in 1895 he took up his residence near Berlin. Later he travelled through Italy, Greece, Switzerland, Holland, and England, and then settled in Blankenese near Hamburg. Among his poems are some of the noblest that German lyric poetry has to show. Dehmel strongly influenced poetic art by his repeated assertion of the proper duty of the poet. This duty, he says, is to abjure all display in form and fashion, to represent, truthfully, life both inward and outward, especially the life of Mankind as a whole, and to redeem the world from suffering by a clear conception and representation of the underlying divine purpose. He felt strongly the identity of poet and man; insofar as the man fails, the poet also fails. This idea he carried out in his own poetry. None of his contemporaries has surpassed him in clarity of impression, smoothness and rhythm of language, and color and novelty of diction.

The following poems, The Bell in the Sea, Ballad of the Rabble, God's Will (1893), The Swimmer (1892), The Harp (1896), are translated by Edwin Zeydel, in Poet Lore, XXXI, 1920.

THE BELL IN THE SEA

A fisherman had two clever sons,
 He sang to them often a song which runs:
 There's a wondrous bell adrift in the sea,
 A faithful heart feels ecstasy
 To hear the bell a-ringing.

Put to sea with their waving, brown-blown
 10 hair.
 And when as gray-beards they met once
 more
 One evening, they thought, as they sat on the shore,
 15 Of the bell so wondrous.

And the one son spoke to the other son:
 The old man's dotage has begun.
 He's singing that stupid song again;
 Yes, many a storm I've seen on the main,
 But never a wondrous bell.

And one of them said, dejected and
 old:
 I know the sea and its power untold.
 I've slaved my life away on the sea,
 20 And many a gain has come to me;
 But I never heard a ringing.

The other spoke: But we're still young,
 His song from memories deep is sprung.
 On many an ocean a man must ply,
 E'er the ocean's bottom is seen by his eye; 25
 And then he may hear the ringing.

And the other one said, smiling youth-fully:

When their father had died, these lads so fair

I've acquired no gains but memory;
 There's a wondrous bell adrift in the sea,
 A faithful heart feels ecstasy
 To hear the bell a-ringing

'BALLAD OF THE RABBLE

A crowded station; there's a jam at the gate.

Shouting policemen;
All around a thousand
Animal faces,
Canine faces,
Faces of foxes, a face of a wolf,
Faces of sheep, faces of geese,
And a gobbling turkey,
Snorting pigs, staring. —
The rabble.

The train pulls in, stops,
The tumult dies down,
Dies down for a moment.
At the window appears
Bismark
And waves.
All around a thousand
Glowing and luminous
Beaming and radiant,
Human, archangel-like faces, cheering. —
The rabble.

GOD'S WILL

Thou cravest happiness, Eve,
And thou art afraid to pluck the apple,
Which thy God did forbid to thee
Three thousand years,
Thou youthful creature!

Each evening I fancy thee,
Stretching thy thin little hands,
Out from thy small lonesome bed,
In fervent prayer to the God of old people:
Give me the apple!

Poor patient creature!
Never yet has he made the fearful glad,
This old God.

'Twas he who gave thy hunger and thy hands to thee:
Take it and eat — then suffer!

THE SWIMMER

He's rescued! And he fondles the strand,
For which he fought with the raging
sea;

The white spoondrift still beats his hand.
And he glances back at the raging sea . . .

And looks about at the grayish land;
5 It lies in a storm, as before it lay,
Ponderously.
'Twill be the same as every day.
And he glances back at the raging sea. . . .

10

THE HARP

Among the lofty pines a strong wind blows;
From east to west the fleecy clouds are rolled.
15 In silent flight I see the homebound crows;
Dull do the brown boughs sound throughout the wold.
E'en duller sounds my step.

20 Here on these summits towering and steep
I stood ere stormy yearning came to me,
And ere I heard your ancient voice so deep,
At which I raise my arms in ecstasy,
Ye many giant stems.

25

At spacious intervals, and scarcely stirred,
The shafts appear, now gray with age and crude;
And through their lofty crowns, still green,
30 is heard
The thud of forces, swelling and subdued,
E'en as of yore.

One crown is like unto an earthgod's hand,
35 Into five long and mighty fingers cleaved;
Still wrapped in golden brown, this tree
doth stand
And point e'en higher than the old stiff-leaved

40 And lonesome boughs.

And these five fingers wage a struggle tense.
They fain would join — each to the other clings:
A wild convulsion shakes their tops so dense.
As if they, mad, were tearing at the strings
50 Of an enchanted harp.

And from the harp there comes a heavenly
tone,

From east to west 'tis billowed and 'tis rolled.
 E'er since my youth this music I have known.
 Dull do the brown boughs sound through-
 out the wold:
 Come, Storm, give ear to me!

How many a tear of longing have I shed!
 Oh, for a mighty hand to fit mine own!
 Oh, how I stretched my fingers till they bled!
 No one could grasp entire this hand so lone!
 And so I clenched it then.

With maddened fervidness of every kind 'Twixt God and beast I have been cast
 and torn.
 I ponder at the course I've left behind:
 One fervor only can be stanchly borne:
 Toward all the world.

Come, Storm Almighty, let the pine-trees
 blow!
 Me too with might primeval thou dost
 sway.
 In fearful homeward course flies many a crow.
 Oh, grant me strength, that lonesome I may stay,
 World!

HOFMANNSTHAL

(1874-)

Hugo von Hofmannsthal, born in Vienna, belongs to that group of poets, novelists, and dramatists who have made Austria internationally famous. Endowed with an exceptionally mature and fine sensibility, he wrote his first dramatic poem when he was still a schoolboy of seventeen. At eighteen he composed The Death of Titian, and at nineteen, Death and the Fool. These pieces were fully developed specimens of their kind and were not surpassed by anything he wrote later of the same sort. Hofmannsthal is better known for his plays than for his poetry; he is especially fond of classical Greek themes, which he treats in the modern manner. A friend of the composer Richard Strauss, he wrote for him a series of admirable librettos, the best of which is that of the Rosenkavalier. Though not preoccupied with the more difficult problems of existence, Hofmannsthal reveals a poetic sensitiveness that has rarely been surpassed.

Of the following selections, "Terzinen" (1903) and The Ballade of the Outward Life (1903) come from the Poetry Review, XVI, 1925; Death (1907), translated by C. N. Stork, from Poet Lore, XXIX, 1918; and The Two (1907), translated by Charles Wharton Smith, from Poet Lore, XXIII, 1912.

"TERZINEN"

"Such stuff as dreams are made of," such as these
 We are: and dreams awake and open eyes
 Like little children under cherry trees,
 From out whose crown the orbéd moon
 doth rise
 Through the great night his pale-gold course to take.
 Our dreams emerge in us not otherwise,

Than orbéd moon doth from the tree-tops
 wake.
 The innermost is open to their plying
 Like spirit hands in a barred room they seem
 To weave in us and have a life undying,
 And three are one, a man, a thing, a dream.

BALLADE OF THE OUTWARD
LIFE

Are there and live, like laughing children,
 break
 On us, no smaller up-and-downward
 hieing,

And babes grow up — babes with their eyes profound
 Which know not anything — grow up and die

- And all the sons of men pursue their way.
 And sweet fruits wax from sour continually
 And drop at night like dead birds, from the spray
 And lie, and rot ere many days go by.
 Still blows the wind; again and yet again
 We hear and utter many words; are ware 10
 Both of our body's pleasure and its pains.
 Roads run athwart the grass and here and there
 Are places full of torches, fountains, trees,
 And others threatful, parched to death and 15
 bare. . . .
 What were these made for and not one of these Another's double? And why thus numberless?
 What intermingles laughs and agonies?
 What boots it all? How serves this sport to bless
 Us who are great and wander evermore
 Without a goal in lasting loneliness?
 In oft-seen sight of such what vantage dwells?
 And yet he sayeth much who "Evening" saith,
 A word from which deep thought and sad- 30
 ness pour
 Like honey heavily from hollow cells.
- DEATH
- What hours are those! when, shiningly outspread,
- The ocean lures us, and we lightly learn
 The solemn lore of death, and feel no dread:
 5 As a small child, whose great eyes seem to yearn,
 A girl with pallid cheeks and limbs a-cold,
 One evening looks far out and does not turn
 Her feebly-smiling gaze, for, loosing hold
 Upon her slumber-drunken limbs, the flood
 Of life glides over into grass and wold;
 Or as a saint pours out her martyr blood.
- THE TWO
- 20 She bore a goblet in her hand,
 Her chin and mouth were like its rim,
 So sure her foot to go or stand
 That not a drop o'er sprang the brim.
- 25 As light and firm too was his hand;
 His fiery mount but fresh from pasture
 Stopped quivering at the quick command
 Of one impulsive, careless gesture.
- Yet when their fingers chanced to touch,
 As she would lift the goblet to him,
 A faintness as of death ran through him,
 35 And each was trembling now so much
 That on the ground the goblet tinkled
 And in the dust the wine was sprinkled.

FRENCH

MUSSET

(1810-1857)

Louis Charles Alfred de Musset, French poet, playwright, and novelist was born in Paris. At the age of seventeen he won a prize for an essay on The Origin of Our Feelings. He studied both law and medicine, but never followed them professionally. He was received at the house of Victor Hugo and there became acquainted with Alfred de Vigny, Prosper Mérimée, Sainte-Beuve, and others. His first volume of original work, which met with instant success, was a collection of Tales of Spain and Italy (1829). In 1830 his first play was produced, and failed and Musset came near to abandoning the drama entirely. He began in 1833 to contribute to the Revue des deux mondes, in which he published André del Sarto, Les Caprices de Marianne, and Rolla, a piece deeply tinctured with Wertherian melancholy. In the same year he left for Italy, breaking off a deep and fervent attachment for George Sand, which was the chief event of his life and inspired some of his best lyrics, notably his deservedly famous Nuits ("Nights"). After his return from Italy he produced between 1835 and 1840 what are now perhaps his best-known works. In 1840 he suffered a period of profound depression, but so far rallied from it that by 1845 he was composing pieces of sparkling charm. Some of his most delightful work is to be found in his plays, most of which tend to the romantic exaltation of love.

Musset's belief as to the function of poetry was that it should describe one's feelings and stir in its readers similar feelings. He was little concerned with form, with the technique of his art, except as it responded almost of its own accord to the emotional content of his poetry. Hence it is in his shorter pieces, and in the free, informal strophes one usually associates with meditation in verse, that he excelled. Critics today place him among the first-rate writers of his time although few besides Sainte-Beuve did so during his own age.

•BRAVE KNIGHT DEPARTING FOR THE WAR

Brave Knight, departing for the war,
Wherefore so far
Dost go from here?
In darkest clouds the night is furled,
And all the world
Is but a tear.

You who believe love vainly sought,
Thus from the thought
Are made to stray.
Alas! ye seekers of renown,
No less is flown
Your smoke away.

Brave Knight, departing for the war,
Wherefore so far
Dost go from here?
I go to weep my false love's guile,
Who said my smile
Was sweet and dear.

SONG

The soldier brave and bold
At the rolling thunder laughs.
One hand his sword doth hold,
One the cup he gallantly quaffs.

And if he perish in the gallant strife,
His warrior grave is all with glory rife.
His arm the land defends,
His heart is for his friends,
And for the king his life.

LINES

Comrades, whensoever I die,
A willow set my grave to keep;
I love its soft pale livery
And drooping boughs that seem to weep;
5 And lightly will its shadow lie
On the ground where I shall sleep.

ON ONE DEAD

She might be lovely, if the night,
10 Carved in some chapel's dark recess
By Buonarroti's¹ chilling might,
May claim the praise of loveliness.

Good was she, if it goodness reach 15 To give an alms in passing by Without one feeling, look, or speech —
If loveless gold be charity.

And she could think, if that you deem 20 In soft and modulated tone
To babble like a ceaseless stream
Is proof of thought — else had none.

25 She used to pray, if two fine eyes,
Now coldly fastened on the ground,
Now raised as coldly to the skies,
Worthy the name of prayer be found.

30 She would have smiled, if blighted flower
That ne'er expanded to the sky
Could open to the genial power
Of winds that pass it heedless by.

She might have wept, if when there lay
 Her hand on what she called her heart,
 She e'er had felt that human clay
 Softened by dews the heavens impart.

She might have loved, but selfish pride,
 Like lamps a useless light that hold,
 Standing the coffined dead beside,
 Guarded her heart, so poor and cold.

She's dead; she never lived, she stopt
 At seeming, seemed to live, though dead.
 The volume from her hand has dropt,
 From which no single word she read.

•THINK OF PAST DAYS

Think of past days when dawn with coy
 delight

Her fairy palace to the sun reveals;
 Think of past days when meditative night
 In dreamy starclad mantle by thee steals:
 When pleasure's call provokes thy heart to quickened glow,

And when the evening shades their gentle dreams bestow,

Hear from the world's deep maze
 A whispering voice that says,
 'Think of past days.'

Think of past days when unrelenting fate
 Makes me for ever from thy presence
 part;

When sorrow, exile, and the wasting weight
 Of years have withered my despairing
 heart;

Think of my ill-starred love, think of my last adieu;

Absence and time are nought if love be only true.

And long as death delays,
 To thee my heart still says,
 'Think of past days.'

Think of past days when 'neath the dark cold ground

My broken heart for evermore shall
 sleep;

Think of past days when some lone flower
 is found,

Forth from my solitary grave to peep.

I ne'er shall see thee more, but mine immortal soul

Near thee shall watch as with a sister's kind control.

Then 'neath the moon's still rays
 Hear the sad voice that says,
 'Think of past days.'

SONG

When Hope, the wanton light and gay,
 Touches our arm in passing by,
 Then flies with wingèd speed away,
 And then returns with smiling eye,

Where does man go, where calls his
 heart —

The zephyr followed by the swallow?
 And swallow far less light thou art
 Than man who doth his fancy follow.

Enchantress, who dost ever fly,
 Can you e'en tell us where you rove?
 How strange that ancient destiny
 Should have so very young a love!

SONNET

No! Though 'twere possible that bitter pain

By this dead heart could once again be known:

No! Though a flower of hope could once
 again

Upon the desert of my life be grown;

Though thy sweet innocence without a stain

Could e'en for me thy soul to pity
 move —

Dear child, thy guileless charity were vain;
 I could not, and I would not, dare to love.

But still that fated hour must on thee fall,
 When the whole world shall seem as nothingness,

My true, my pure affection then recall;
 You'll find alike in joy and in distress
 My hand to thine in ready succour shown,
 And my sad heart to listen to thine own.

LINES FROM ROLLA

Woman, strange source whence joys and torture rise,

Mysterious altar where in sacrifice
 We hear alternate prayers and blasphemies,
 Say in what echo, in what air, reside
 Those nameless words, which through all ages bide;
 And though but madness, yet 'mid smiles
 and tears,
 Have clung to lover's lips five thousand years.

FORTUNIO'S SONG

If you think I shall declare
 Whose love I seek,
 Not for a kingdom would I dare
 Her name to speak.

But I will join you in a glee
 If you think meet —
 That I adore, that fair is she
 As is the wheat.

I act but as my fantasy
 My will doth stir;
 And if she need my life, then I
 May give it her.

The anguish that a love untold
 Makes us deplore
 I carry in my heart of old —
 I can no more.

I love too deeply to declare
 Whose love I feel;
 And for my Love can die, but ne'er
 Her name reveal.

•TO MADEMOISELLE —

Yes, ladies fair! Say what you will;
 Yes, you possess the fatal might
 To cast us by a sigh, at will,
 Or in despair, or in delight.

A single word, a word denied,
 A careless look, a mocking start
 Can plant a dagger in the heart
 Of those in your enchantment tied.

Well may you boast at every hour;
 For, thanks be to our cowardice,
 There's nothing equal to your power,
 Unless it be your fickleness.

10 But every power on earth we see
 Die when its wings too mighty grow;
 And who ne'er tells his misery
 Flies from you, though his tears may 15 flow.

However great his sorrows are,
 His hapless lot I still prefer;
 Our torture better is to bear,
 20 Than is your trade of murderer.

DEJECTION

I have wasted my strength and my life,
 And friends have left, and my heart has 25 died;
 I have no longer even the pride
 Which gave me fame in a worthless
 strife.

30 Yet of old, long since, I thought to tread
 In the noble pathway of truth and right;
 But when I saw where their footsteps led,
 I swerved unequal to the sight.

35 Now I see too late they must prevail,
 And all who quit them can only fail
 Of all that's noble, great, and wise.

God calls me, and I have nought to say;
 40 Not a plea on which one hope to stay,
 Save that some tears have dimmed my eyes.

DE LISLE

(1818-1894)

Leconte de Lisle was born on the Île Bourbon in the Indian Ocean, the son of a Breton surgeon. He received strict childhood training and was sent in 1838 to Rennes to study law, but he spent most of his time in reading and in cultivating poetic ideas; and when he returned home he was ridiculed for his literary aspirations. After about nine years he went to Paris to live. At first he embraced the Utopian ideas of Fourier, the coöperative Socialist, and celebrated them in a Hymn. As he was gradually influenced by the cosmology of the Greeks and the Hindus, he tended more and more to that pantheism which forms the basis of his later work. He published volumes of poems in 1852, 1862, and 1884. Another volume appeared posthumously in 1895. He also made a number of prose translations from Greek and Latin poets. In 1886 he was elected to the French Academy in the place left vacant by Victor Hugo.

Leconte de Lisle is best known in literary history as the leader of the Parnassians, the group dominant in French poetry from 1850 to 1880. The group takes its name from an anthology called Le Parnasse Contemporain, which included poems by Gautier, Banville, Leconte de Lisle, Coppée, Baudelaire, Prudhomme, Verlaine, and Mallarmé. •The Parnassians were opposed to the looseness and unlimited self-expression of the romanticists, and followed strictly the principle that all great art is impersonal and that the highest quality of the poet is his power to see truly and to tell what he sees in the most perfect form possible. Their theory may be expressed in the often misused phrase "art for art's sake."

The following poems, written in 1884, are translated by C. L. Crittenton, the first two in Poet Lore, XIX, 1908, and the last in Poet Lore, XX, 1909.

•THE RED STAR

There will be, in the abyss of the sky, a great red Star, named Sahil.

—The Rabbi Aben-Ezra.

Over the continents, heavy waves,
Where thrills of a world have palpitated,
Swell in the silence and immensity;
The Red Sahil in depths of tragic nights, Sole torch, darts its blood-stained eye on the flood.

Through the endless space, these bare solitudes,
This dull abyss, deaf, void, to nothingness,
Sahil, supreme witness, and gloomy sun, 15
Which makes the sea sadder, blacker in nakedness,
Gloats over, with cruel sight, the universal
sleep.

Genius, love, sorrow, despair, hate, envy,
What one dreams, what one loves, and that which lies,
Earth and Sky, nothing more than the old Moment.
On the forgotten dream of Man and of Life,
The red eye of Sahil bleeds eternally.

THE PRAIRIE

In the immense prairie, ocean without
shore,
Through surging grass, which waving gives
no horizon,

A hundred reds on their savage mustangs
Chase the wild torrent of bison.

With eagle plume on their heads, body and
face
Streaked with vermilion, bow in hand, and quiver
Hanging by a band of bark across the loins,
Yelling, they pierce the beast brought to bay.

Under the barbed shafts which bite into their sides,
The long-haired bulls run, bellowing
madly, 15
Blinded and drilled by arrows, in the high grass
They leave foaming jets of their blood.

20 The heavy mass, increasing, hair on end,
Wounded and dead crushing the stunted
chaparals:
Leaping over the rocks and through streams, rushing
25 Amidst the rattle of dying cries.

In distance, behind, riveted on their track,
White wolves of the desert follow silently,
30 With tongues hanging from their ravenous jaws
And darting desire from hot eyes.

And all this, which nothing hinders,
35 nothing stops,

Bellowing, clamour, wolves, vagrant horsemen,
 In the space, like a whirlwind in a tempest,
 Rolls, flees, sinks, and disappears by 5
 bounds.

THE LAMP OF HEAVEN

Out of the golden chain of quick'ning 10 stars
 The Lamp of Heaven hangs from the som-
 brous blue
 Over the great sea, the mountains and the shore.
 In the soft peace of the pure, warm air
 Lulled to the sigh of the pensive waves,
 The Lamp of Heaven hangs from the som-
 brous blue
 Out of the golden chain of quick'ning stars. 20

It bathes and fills the horizon without end
 With the enchantment of its limpid calm;
 It silvers the shades at the bottom of the hollows 25
 And pearls the nestlings perched in the palms,
 Who sleep, lightly, in divine slumber;
 From the enchantment of its limpid calm
 It bathes and fills the horizon without end. 30

In the soft mystery, O Moon, where thou
 art,
 Art thou the sun of the happy dead,
 The White Paradise where they dream their dreams?
 O dumb world, pouring out on them
 Splendid dreams made from the best untruths,
 Art thou the sun of the happy dead,
 In the soft mystery, O Moon, where thou
 art?

Always, forever, eternally,
 Night! Silence! Forgotten of bitter
 hours! 15
 You only absorb the desire which lies,
 Hate, love, thought, pangs, and fancy?
 You only appease the old torment,
 Night! Silence! Forgotten of bitter
 hours!
 Always, forever, eternally?

Out of the golden chain of quick'ning stars,
 O Lamp of Heaven, hanging from the som-
 brous blue, 25
 Make a black gulf of the pure warm air,
 A last sigh of the pensive waves,
 O Lamp of Heaven, hanging from the sombrous blue
 Out of the golden chain of quick'ning stars.

BAUDELAIRE

(1821-1867)

Charles Pierre Baudelaire was born in Paris and received his education there and in Lyons. It is more difficult to estimate the significance, either relative or absolute, of Baudelaire than of any other poet of his time, first, because he has been until recent years singularly misunderstood and misrepresented, and second, because his influence on thought and feeling has been so great as to be, at such close range, incalculable.

•As an unusually rebellious child, Baudelaire suffered from unfortunate circumstances in his home life; as a sensitive, unconventional, perverse young man, he was increasingly tortured by the spectacle of the disorderly and false civilization into which he had been born. Using in his compositions the vocabulary of his time, — the vocabulary of the décadents — he, as no other poet since Racine, passionately and minutely examined the human soul. To comprehend the nature of the soul, to know in its origin human sinfulness, to understand the first principle of goodness — these are what may be said to constitute the passion of Baudelaire. Because of the morbidity of his subjects, he was severely criticized in his own time; later he was taken up by the English decadents, principally Arthur Symonds, who felt that in his "passionate devotion to his passions" Baudelaire belonged to their group. There is little that is more ironic in the recent history of literature; for Baudelaire knew perhaps as well as it can be known what it was to wish to escape his passions.

Little by little, Baudelaire, the "father of symbolism" and one of the greatest psychological poets of all time is coming to be recognized as the source of much that is characteristically vital in European thought and feeling at the present time. The bulk of his poetry is remarkably small; it is nearly all contained in the volume called Flowers of Evil, published only ten years before his death. The poet was a great admirer of Poe, and spent his best years translating Poe's stories into French. He composed also a series of Poems in Prose and a number of critical studies of art, music, and literature. The irregularities of his life ruined his health and caused his death, in poverty, at the age of forty-six.

The following poems are translated by F. P. Sturm in Baudelaire: His Prose and Poetry, New York, Boni and Liveright, 1919. The prose selections are translated by Arthur Symons in the same volume.

FLOWERS OF EVIL

•THE FLASK

There are some powerful odours that can pass
Out of the stoppered flagon; even glass
To them is porous. Oft when some old box
Brought from the East is opened and the locks
And hinges creak and cry; or in a press
In some deserted house, where the sharp
stress
Of odours old and dusty fills the brain,
An ancient flask is brought to light again, 15
And forth the ghosts of long-dead odours creep.
There, softly trembling in the shadows,
sleep
A thousand thoughts, funereal chrysalides, 20
Phantoms of old the folding darkness
hides,
Who make faint flutterings as their wings
unfold,
Rose-washed and azure-tinted, shot with 25
gold.
A memory that brings languor flutters
here:
The fainting eyelids droop, and giddy Fear 30
Thrusts with both hands the soul towards the pit
Where, like Lazarus from his winding sheet,
Arises from the gulf of sleep a ghost 35
Of an old passion, long since loved and lost.
So I, when vanished from man's memory
Deep in some dark and sombre chest I lie,
An empty flagon they have cast aside,
Broken and soiled, the dust upon my pride, 40
Will be your shroud, beloved pestilence!
The witness of your might and virulence,

Sweet poison mixed by angels; bitter cup
Of life and death my heart has drunken
up!

✓THE LITTLE OLD WOMEN

I

Deep in the tortuous fold of ancient towns,
Where all, even horror, to enchantment turns,
I watch, obedient to my fatal mood,
For the decrepit, strange and charming
beings,
The dislocated monsters that of old
Were lovely women — Lais or Eponine!¹
Hunchbacked and broken, crippled though they be,
Let us still love them, for they still have
souls.
They creep along wrapped in their chilly rags,
Beneath the whipping of the wicked wind;
They tremble when an omnibus rolls by,
And at their sides, a relic of the past,
A little flower-embroidered satchel hangs.
They trot about, most like to marionettes;
They drag themselves, as does a wounded
beast;
Or dance unwillingly as a clapping bell
Where hangs and swings a demon without pity.
Though they be broken they have piercing eyes,
That shine like pools where water sleeps at
night;
The astonished and divine eyes of a child
Who laughs at all that glitters in the world.
Have you not seen that most old women's shrouds
Are little like the shroud of a dead child?
Wise Death, in token of his happy whim,

¹ Lais . . . Eponine, the first a famous Greek courtesan, the second, a Gaulish wife renowned for her conjugal devotion.

Wraps old and young in one enfolding
sheet.

And when I see a phantom, frail and wan,
Traverse the swarming picture that is Paris,

It ever seems as though the delicate thing
Trode with soft steps towards a cradle new.
And then I wonder, seeing the twisted form,

How many times must workmen change 10
the shape

Of boxes where at length such limbs are laid?

These eyes are wells brimmed with a million tears;

Crucibles where the cooling metal pales —
Mysterious eyes that are strong charms to
him

Whose life-long nurse has been austere Disaster.

II

The love-sick vestal of the old "Frascati"¹;
Priestess of Thalia,² alas! whose name
Only the prompter knows and he is dead;
Bygone celebrities that in bygone days
The Tivoli³ o'ershadowed in their bloom;
All charm me; yet among these beings frail

Three, turning pain to honey-sweetness, said

To the Devotion that had lent them wings:
"Lift me, O powerful Hippogriffe,⁴ to the skies" —

One by her country to despair was driven;
One by her husband overwhelmed with
grief;

One wounded by her child, Madonna-like;

Each could have made a river with her tears.

III

Oft have I followed one of these old women,

One among others, when the falling sun
Reddened the heavens with a crimson wound —

Pensive, apart, she rested on a bench

² Tivoli, a theater.

To hear the brazen music of the band,
Played by the soldiers in the public park
To pour some courage into citizens' hearts,
On golden eves when all the world revives.

5 Proud and erect she drank the music in,
The lively and the warlike call to arms;
Her eyes blinked like an ancient eagle's
eyes;

Her forehead seemed to await the laurel crown!

IV

Thus do you wander, uncomplaining
15 Stoics,

Through all the chaos of the living town:
Mothers with bleeding hearts, saints,
courtesans,

Whose names of yore were on the lips of 20 all;

Who were all glory and all grace, and now
None know you; and the brutish drunkard stops,

Insulting you with his derisive love;
25 And cowardly urchins call behind your back.

Ashamed of living, withered shadows all,
With fear-bowed backs you creep beside the walls,

30 And none salute you, destined to loneliness!
Refuse of Time ripe for Eternity!

But I, who watch you tenderly afar,
With unquiet eyes on your uncertain steps,
As if I were your father, I — O wonder!

35 Unknown to you taste secret, hidden joy.
I see your maiden passions bud and bloom,
Sombre or luminous, and your lost days

Unroll before me while my heart enjoys
All your old vices, and my soul expands

40 To all the virtues that have once been yours.

Ruined! And my sisters! O congregate
hearts,

Octogenarian Eves o'er whom is stretched 45 God's awful claw, where will you be tomorrow?

•MIST AND RAIN

50 Autumns and winters, springs of mire and rain,

² Thalia, the muse of comedy.

⁴ Hippogriffe, half horse and half griffin.

Seasons of sleep, I sing your praises loud,
For thus I love to wrap my heart and
brain

In some dim tomb beneath a vapoury
shroud.

In the wide plain where revels the cold
wind,

Through long nights when the weather-
cock whirls round,

More free than in warm summer day my
mind

Lifts wide her raven pinions from the ground.

Unto a heart filled with funereal things
That since old days hoar frosts have gathered on,

Naught is more sweet, O pallid, queenly
springs,

Than the long pageant of your shadows
wan,

Unless it be on moonless eves to weep

On some chance bed and rock our griefs to sleep.

•SUNSET

Fair is the sun when first he flames above,
Flinging his joy down in a happy beam;

And happy he who can salute with love
The sunset far more glorious than a dream.

Flower, stream, and furrow! I have seen them all

In the sun's eye swoon like one trembling
heart.

Though it be late let us with speed depart

To catch at least one last ray ere it fall!

But I pursue the fading god in vain,
For conquering night makes firm her dark domain,

Mist and gloom fall, and terrors glide between,

And graveyard odours in the shadow
swim,

And my faint footsteps on the marsh's rim,

Bruise the cold snail and crawling toad unseen.

POEMS IN PROSE

•THE FAVOURS OF THE MOON

5 The Moon, who is caprice itself, looked in through the window when you lay asleep in your cradle, and said inwardly: "This is a child after my own soul."

And she came softly down the staircase
10 of the clouds, and passed noiselessly through the window-pane. Then she laid herself upon you with the supple tenderness of a mother, and she left her colours upon your face. That is why your eyes 15 are green and your cheeks extraordinarily pale. It was when you looked at her, that your pupils widened so strangely; and she clasped her arms so tenderly about your throat that ever since you have had the 20 longing for tears.

Nevertheless, in the flood of her joy, the Moon filled the room like a phosphoric atmosphere, like a luminous poison; and all this living light thought and said: "My 25 kiss shall be upon you forever. You shall be beautiful as I am beautiful. You shall love that which I love and that by which I am loved; water and clouds, night and silence; the vast green sea; the formless 30 and multiform water; the place where you shall never be; the lover whom you shall never know; unnatural flowers; odours which make men drunk; the cats that languish upon pianos and sob like women, 35 with hoarse sweet voices!

"And you shall be loved by my lovers, courted by my courtiers. You shall be the queen of men who have green eyes, and whose throats I have clasped by night in 40 my caresses; of those that love the sea, the vast tumultuous green sea, formless and multiform water, the place where they are not, the woman whom they know not,
the ominous flowers that are like the censers of an unknown rite, the odours that trouble the will, and the savage and voluptuous beasts that are the emblems of their folly."

And that is why, accursed dear spoilt child, I lie now at your feet, seeking to find in you the image of the fearful goddess, the fateful godmother, the poisonous nurse of all the moonstruck of the world.

WINDOWS

He who looks in through an open window never sees so many things as he who looks at a shut window. There is nothing more profound, more mysterious, more fertile, more gloomy, or more dazzling, than a window lighted by a candle. What we can see in the sunlight is always less interesting than what goes on behind the panes of a window. In that dark or luminous hollow, life lives, life dreams, life suffers.

Across the waves of roofs, I can see a woman of middle age, wrinkled, poor, who is always leaning over something, and who never goes out. Out of her face, out of her dress, out of her attitude, out of nothing almost, I have made up the woman's story, and sometimes I say it over to myself with tears.

If it had been a poor old man, I could have made up his just as easily.

And I go to bed, proud of having lived and suffered in others.

Perhaps you will say to me: "Are you sure that it is the real story?" What does it matter, what does any reality outside of myself matter, if it has helped me to live, to feel that I am, and what I am?

• CROWDS

It is not given to every man to take a bath of multitude: to play upon crowds is an art; and he alone can plunge, at the expense of humankind, into a debauch of vitality, to whom a fairy has bequeathed in his cradle the love of masks and disguises, the hate of home and the passion of travel.

Multitude, solitude: equal terms mutually convertible by the active and begetting poet. He who does not know how to people his solitude does not know either how to be alone in a busy crowd.

The poet enjoys this incomparable privilege, to be at once himself and others. Like those wandering souls that go about seeking bodies, he enters at will the personality of every man. For him alone, every place is vacant; and if certain places seem to be closed against him, that is because in his eyes they are not worth the trouble of visiting.

The solitary and thoughtful walker derives a singular intoxication from this universal communion. He who mates easily with the crowd knows feverish joys that must be for ever unknown to the egoist, shut up like a coffer, and to the sluggard, imprisoned like a shell-fish. He adopts for his own all the occupations, all the joys and all the sorrows that circumstance sets before him.

What men call love is small indeed, narrow and weak indeed, compared with this ineffable orgie, this sacred prostitution of the soul which gives itself up wholly (poetry and charity!) to the unexpected which happens, to the stranger as he passes.

It is good sometimes that the happy of this world should learn, were it only to humble their foolish pride for an instant, that there are higher, wider, and rarer joys than theirs. The founders of colonies, the shepherds of nations, the missionary priests, exiled to the ends of the earth, doubtless know something of these mysterious intoxications; and, in the midst of the vast family that their genius has raised about them, they must sometimes laugh at the thought of those who pity them for their chaste lives and troubled fortunes.

THE CAKE

I was traveling. The landscape in the midst of which I was seated was of an irresistible grandeur and sublimity. Something no doubt at that moment passed from it into my soul. My thoughts fluttered with a lightness like that of the atmosphere; vulgar passions, such as hate and profane love, seemed to me now as far away as the clouds that floated in the gulfs beneath my feet; my soul seemed to me as vast and pure as the dome of the sky that enveloped me; the remembrance of earthly things came as faintly to my heart as the thin tinkle of the bells of unseen herds, browsing far, far away, on the slope of another mountain. Across the little motionless lake, black with the darkness of its immense depth, there passed from time to time the shadow of a cloud, like the shadow of an airy giant's cloak, flying through heaven. And I remember that this rare and solemn sensation, caused by a vast and perfectly silent movement, filled me with mingled joy and fear. In a word, thanks to the enrapturing beauty about me, I felt that I was at perfect peace with myself and with the universe; I even believe that, in my complete forgetfulness of all earthly evil, I had come to think the newspapers are right after all, and man was born good; when, incorrigible matter renewing its exigencies, I sought to refresh the fatigue and satisfy the appetite caused by so lengthy a climb. I took from my pocket a large piece of bread, a leather cup, and a small bottle of a certain elixir which the chemists at that time sold to tourists, to be mixed, on occasion, with liquid snow.

I was quietly cutting my bread when a slight noise made me look up. I saw in front of me a little ragged urchin, dark and dishevelled, whose hollow eyes, wild and supplicating, devoured the piece of bread. And I heard him gasp, in a low, hoarse voice, the word: "Cake!" I could not help laughing at the appellation with which he thought fit to honor my nearly white bread, and I cut off a big slice and offered it to him. Slowly he came up to me, not taking his eyes from the coveted object; then, snatching it out of my hand, he stepped quickly back, as if he feared that my offer was not sincere or that I had already repented of it.

But at the same instant he was knocked over by another little savage, who had sprung from I know not where, and who was so precisely like the first that one might have taken them for twin brothers. They rolled over on the ground together, struggling for the possession of the precious booty, neither willing to share it with his brother. The first, exasperated, clutched the second by the hair; and the second seized one of the ears of the first between his teeth, and spat out a little bleeding morsel with a fine oath in dialect. The legitimate proprietor of the cake tried to hook his little claws into the usurper's eyes; the latter did his best to throttle his adversary with one hand, while with the other he endeavored to slip the prize of war into his pocket. But, heartened by despair, the loser pulled himself together, and sent the victor sprawling with a blow of the head in his stomach. Why describe a hideous fight which indeed lasted longer than their childish strength seemed to promise? The cake traveled from hand to hand, and changed from pocket to pocket, at every moment; but, alas, it changed also in size; and when at length, exhausted, panting and bleeding, they stopped from the sheer impossibility of going on, there was no longer any cause of feud; the slice of bread had disappeared, and lay scattered in crumbs like the grains of sand with which it was mingled.

The sight had darkened the landscape for me, and dispelled the joyous calm in which my soul had lain basking; I remained saddened for quite a long time, saying over and over to myself: "There is then a wonderful country in which bread is called cake, and is so rare a delicacy that it is enough in itself to give rise to a war literally fratricidal!"

MALLARMÉ

(1842-1898)

Stéphane Mallarmé was born in Paris and was educated at a boarding school in Auteuil and at the academy in Sens. At twenty he went to England to learn the language. On his return he taught English from 1862 to 1892. He began to write reviews in 1874, but his name was not known to the public until 1884. In 1885 he began the custom of assembling a group of friends every Tuesday evening at nine. From 1894 to 1898 he lived near Fontainebleau at Valviens, whither the members of the Stéphane Mallarmé Society now make an annual pilgrimage on the anniversary of the poet's death. At first a member of the Parnassians, he soon separated from them in order to work out his own ideas of poetry. His earlier manner reflects Baudelaire's; but he already showed a preference for suggestion by analogy rather than description. His second manner is obscure and represents a conscious effort to avoid banality, of which he had a great horror, and to limit his appeal to a few intelligent readers. Thus in his later work he belongs to that group of recent poets known as "Symbolists," so called because they are fond of symbolizing mystery and magic by haunting music and shadowy images, and because, at their worst, they seem to prefer vague suggestion to clear statement. It was his laborious search for a new poetic language that destroyed his fecundity as a writer. Although he was attacked by many critics in his time, he enjoyed, during the latter part of his career at least, the unrestrained admiration of a group of young writers who were striving to achieve "la poésie pure," and who proclaimed him the Prince of Poets. The popularity of his well-known L'Après-midi d'un faune ("A Faun's Afternoon") is partly due to Debussy's music.

L'Après-midi d'un faune, written in 1874-75, is translated by Joseph T. Shipley, in Poet Lore, XXXI, 1920.

✓ L'APRÈS-MIDI D'UN FAUNE

These nymphs, I would make them eternal.

So rare, 5
Their delicate rose, that it drifts on the air,
Drowsy with clustering sleep.

Do I love a dream?
My doubt, fruit of the ancient night,
breaks forth

In many a subtle branch, which, on the swell

Of the true forest,
Proves that I proffer to myself, — alas!
The triumph of an ideal want
Of roses.

Think:
Perhaps these women of your niceties
Are but the vacant figures of your hope!
Faun, the illusion leaps from the blue, cold 20
eyes

As a spring all of tears, of her most pure:
And she all sighs is a contrast

As a warm day's breath on the fleece!
No! By the weary and motionless swoon 25
Stifling with summer the fresh lilting
morn,

No murmur of water but wafts my flute
To the dew-sprinkled woods of consent.

The only wind 30
Hustling its sound through the twin-born pipes

Dispersing its arid rain,
The while the horizon unfrowning,
Is the calm, artificial, evident sigh
Of Inspiration, rising to its source.

O Sicilian shores of a quiet fen
Which my vanity sacks to the jealous suns
Submissive under the flowers of sparks,
Reveal:

"Here was I culling hollow reeds,
Holy to talent, when, on the glaucous gold
Of distant verdures yielding to the flood
Their richest vines,

5 A living whiteness surged to its repose:
At the soft prelude to the birth of song
The flock of storks — no! — naiads, fled, or plunged."

10 Inert and scorched in the tawny hour,
Unnoticed by what collective art
Too many hymens scamper off, desired
By him who seeketh women:

Then I shall waken, lone, erect,
15 Under an ancient surge of light,
At the first fervor:

Lily! and candor in one of you all.

Else that sweet nothing rumored from their lip,
20 The kiss, that whispers low of perfidy;
My breast, virgin of evidence, testifies a sting

Mysterious and of a sacred tooth;

But bah! such a secret elects to confide

25 In the vast twin-born reed that plays to the clouds:

That, sloughing of the cheek's pale pain,
Dreams, in a lengthy solo, I'll delight

The beauty of the roundabout with it 30 And false confusion with my listening
song;

Of notes so loud that modulated love
Shrinks from the inconsiderable dream
Of back or pure flank in my closed re-
35 gard,

A resounding, vain, and endless-dreary
line.

Strain then, O instrument of flights,
40 malign Syrinx,

To flower anew by bords where you await
me!
I, in my noisy pride, shall sing,
Sing long and longingly of goddesses;
And by the paintings of idolaters
Still in their shadows charm the girdle free:
So, when I've sucked the splendor from the grape
To banish desire dispelled by my deceit,
Mocking the summer sky,
I raise the empty cluster, with a puff
Belling the luminous skins, for frenzy flushed,
And watch through them till night fall.
O nymphs, I swell with flooding memories:
"My gaze, piercing the rushes,
Lances each deathless form, that in the wave
Drowns its mad burning, while a shout of 20
rage
Leaps to the forest-heaven;
And the glorious bath of tresses drops
below
In lightnings and shudders — O dia- 25
dems!
I hasten; when, at my ankles (bruised,
Knowing the languor of the ill of being twain)
Are sleepers conjoined, in danger of them- 30
selves.
I embraced them, not disentraining,
And bore to this grove, which futile shadows flee,
Roses yielding their fragrance to the sun; 35
Here our frolic lingered with the day it burned."

I adore you, O wrath of virgins,
O untamed delight of the holy nude bur- 40
den

That glides, to escape my lips of drinking
fire,
As the lightning leaps! The silent dread of the flesh:
5 From the head of the cruel to the heart of
the weak
From whom her innocence droppeth, moist
With half-sad vapors or with idle tears.
10 "I sinned, gay at defeating these traitorous terrors,
In having divided the disheveled cluster
Of kisses the gods had so closely intermingled;
15 For, as my lips moved in the passionate smiling
I plunged in the sensuous joy of one only (Holding by a single finger
So that the frozen candor of her breast
Her sister's crimson ferment might discolor —
Her sister enkindled —
The little one artless, unblushing)
Out of my arms, weak with uncertain
25 dyings,
The ever thankless prey was gone
Without ruth for the sob of my frenzy."

Shall I grieve? toward the joy of the others I am drawn
By their tresses bound to the horns of my
brow:
You know, my passion, how, purple and overripe,
35 Each pomegranate bursts and hums of bees;
And our blood, smitten with what will capture it,
Flows for the eternal swarming of desire, 40 When these woods are tinted of ashes and gold.

VERLAINE

(1844-1896)

Paul Verlaine, son of an officer of the engineering corps, was born in Metz. As a boy he went with his father to Montpellier and, when his family moved to Paris, entered the Lycée Bonaparte. In 1864 he was forced by a reversal of the family fortunes to seek employment. As a clerk in the municipal offices he led a happy and peaceful life until he took to drink, abandoned his wife, and gave up his position. In 1871 he became very much attached to Arthur Rimbaud; but in 1873 they quarreled violently and Verlaine shot his young friend. During his two years of imprisonment which followed, Verlaine resolved to start life anew. When he was released he took a position as professor in England, and later held a similar position in France at the college of Reithel until 1879. His later years were spent in Paris.

Verlaine, at first a Parnassian, soon left the ranks. He disapproved of the frigidity of the Parnassian verse and pleaded for greater freedom and melodiousness. After having as a Parnassian protested against the personality of the poet in his work, he became the most personal of poets. His work is the ingenuous expression of a soul full of contradictory emotions. Not only was he a bohemian and a roisterer often suggestive of Villon, but he was a mystic as well, capable of ecstatic lyrics in honor of Jesus and the Virgin Mary. He was an individualist in his style and versification, a style which under the outward appearance of carelessness conceals a well-considered artistic effort to render, by free flowing movements and by charmingly easy phrases, the ebb and flow of emotion. He represents the extreme of "Symbolistic" art in poetry, and has been regarded by some critics not only as a leader among the "Décadents" but as the greatest poet of the whole school.

The following poems, written in 1869, 1870, and 1881, are translated by Gertrude Hall in Poems of Paul Verlaine, New York, Duffield and Co., 1906.

CLAIR DE LUNE

Your soul is as a moonlit landscape fair,
Peopled with maskers delicate and dim,
That play on lutes and dance and have an 5
air
Of being sad in their fantastic trim.

The while they celebrate in minor strain
Triumphant love, effective enterprise,
They have an air of knowing all is vain, 10
And through the quiet moon their songs arise,

The melancholy moonlight, sweet and 15
lone,
That makes to dream the birds upon the tree,
And in their polished basin on white stone
The fountains tall to sob with ecstasy. 20

MANDOLINE

The courtly serenaders,
The beauteous listeners,
Sit idling 'neath the branches
A balmy zephyr stirs. 25

It's Tircis and Aminta,
Clitandre, — ever there! —
Demis,¹ of melting sonnets
To many a frosty fair.

Their trailing flowery dresses, 30
Their fine beflowered coats,
Their elegance and lightness,
And shadows blue, — all floats

And mingles, — circling, wreathing,
In moonlight opaline,
While through the zephyr's harping
Tinkles the mandoline.

•BEFORE YOUR LIGHT QUITE FAIL

Before your light quite fail,
Already paling star,
(The quail Sings in the thyme afar!)

Turn on the poet's eyes
That love makes overrun (See rise
The lark to meet the sun!)

Your glance, that presently
Must drown in the blue morn;
(What glee
Amid the rustling corn!)

Then flash my message true
Down yonder, far away!
(The dew Lies sparkling on the hay.)

Across what visions seek
The Dear One slumbering still.
(Quick, quick!
The sun has reached the hill!)

•O'ER THE WOOD'S BROW

O'er the wood's brow,
Pale, the moon stares;

¹ These names are all associated with pastoral love poetry.

In every bough
Wandering airs
Faintly suspire. . . .

O heart's-desire!

Two willow-trees
Waver and weep,
One in the breeze,
One in the deep
Gloss of the stream. . . .

Dream we our dream!

An infinite
Resignedness
Rains where the white
Mists opalesce
In the moon-shower. . . .

Stay, perfect hour!

THE SKY AND THE ROOFS

The sky-blue smiles above the roof
Its tenderest;

5 A green tree rears above the roof
Its waving crest.

The church-bell in the windless sky
Peaceably rings,
10 A skylark soaring in the sky
Endlessly sings.

My God, my God, all life is there,
Simple and sweet;
The soothing bee-hive murmur there
15 Comes from the street!

What have you done, O you that weep
In the glad sun,
Say, with your youth, you man that weep,
20 What have you done?

VERHAEREN

(1855-1916)

Émile Verhaeren was born at Saint-Amand-sur-l'Escaut, near Anvers, Belgium, and received his education at the college of Sainte-Barb at Gand and at the University of Louvain. Admitted to the bar at Brussels in 1881, he soon dropped everything for the profession of literature. From 1887 to 1891 he was painfully afflicted by a disease that weakened his system. From 1892 on he was preoccupied with sociological questions. When he was not travelling in other countries of Europe he divided his time between Belgium and France. In 1916 he was killed by a train in Rouen.

Verhaeren was the greatest French poet of Belgium, one of the most triumphant expressions of Flemish genius; sensual, mystical, passionate, often violent, with intervals of the most exquisite refinement and delicacy, he presents a striking contrast to Mallarmé. In his courageous acceptance of modern life with its industrialism, its grime, and its glory, he somewhat resembles the American Walt Whitman. He represents the New Poetry in France, and is one of the most striking figures in French literature during the period immediately preceding the World War.

The translation of Michaelangelo is that of E. H. Pfeiffer, Poet Lore, XXXIII, 1922.

MICHAELANGELO

When Michaelangelo entered the Sestin
Chapel,
He tarried there, as if upon the look-out, 25
While his eye measured the height of the vault
And his step the path from the door to the altar.
He watched the light pour through the 30
windows

And figured out how he would have to master
And curb his task, that seemed to rear
before him,
A flashing and unbridled steed before
him.
Then he set out, at evening, for the open country.
The lines of the valleys, the masses of the mountains

Peopled his brain with their mighty contours.

He caught in the knotted and massive trees,

That the night-wind forcibly twisted and bent,

The strain of a back or the swell of a torso,
Or the stretching up into the sky
Of great uplifted arms.

And so

For him, in moments such as these,
Lo, all humanity — gestures, strides,
Rest, attitudes, and poses — took Form and stood revealed before him
There, in the wider aspect of things.

Back to the town he came, at night-fall,
Now glorying in himself and now disgusted,

For not one of the sights that he had seen,
Had, in his eyes, been soothed into a statue.

The next evening, his heavy mood,
Bursting within — a cluster of black grapes —

Suddenly he started out to pick
A quarrel with the pope. . . .

"Why choose him, Michaelangelo,
A sculptor, and force him to paint
On hardened plaster a holy legend
High up on the top of a chapel's dome?
The Sestin is dark, its walls are badly built;

The reddest sunlight cannot chase night from it!

What use to drive oneself into a fury
On a funereal ceiling,

Tinting shadow, and gilding darkness?

And then, besides, what woodsman then would furnish

The vasty lumber for so huge a scaffold?"

The pope made answer, countenance unchanging:

"For you they shall lay low my highest forest."

Forth, into Rome, went Michaelangelo,
Hating the pope, hating the world,
Hating all men, sure that a thousand foes
Lay hid in ambush, close to the palace-wall,

Jeering already the sombre violence,

The mighty grandeur of the art
That he was even now preparing.

Sleep was for him no longer anything

5 But stormy gestures flung across his thought.

When he stretched out, at night, upon his back,

In bed, his nerves continued roaring on,

10 Even as he tried to rest.

He was forever trembling,

Like an arrow lodged in a wall:

Still to add further to his daily ills,

He was tortured by the complaints

15 And by the ill-luck of his relatives.

His terrific brain

Seemed a furnace full of ravening fires,

Wild with brandished flames.

20 But the more his heart kept suffering,

The more that bitterness and hate

Slashed into it, the more he

Braced himself to front and face

The moment of lightning and miracle

25 When suddenly his work would flash

Forth before him; yes, the better

He worked out in his believing soul

That dark and flameful masterpiece

Whose triumph and whose fearfulness

30 He bore within.

There came a time in May when matins chimed,

When Michaelangelo did finally

35 Enter the Sestin, might within his brain.

His ideas he had garnered into sheaves:

Exact and certain groups

Of sweeping noble line

Broke into motion, in the even light,

40 Before his gaze.

The scaffold had been so firmly erected

It might well have led to the very heavens.

A great gleamful day glided under the dome,

Embracing the arches,

Bursting all things with bloom.

Michaelangelo climbed the wooden ladders,

Alert, his legs three rungs a stride

50 Overswinging.

A new flame glowed beneath his eyelids;

High up, his fingers throbbed and fondled

The stones that he was bent upon reclothing
 In glory and in beauty.
 Then he came down again, one headlong stride,
 And bolted with a mighty hand the door.

He cloistered him for days, for months,
 For years, all-zealous to maintain
 Pride and its mystery around
 His manifold and lonely work.
 Each morning he leaped, at birth of day,
 With the same heavy step across
 The threshold of the chapel,
 And like a violent, dumb laborer,
 While the sun made his tour around the walls,
 He plied his hands at their immortal work.

Already in twelve spaces, set aside,
 By him for them,
 Lo, seven prophets and five sybils sought
 To pierce the ancient, obscure books,
 Whose text, immovable, halted before it,
 The moving future.

Along a cornice beautiful bodies gleamed,
 Daringly breaking into motion and
 The lower form or back did people
 The ceiling's vast expanse
 All with their flowering vigor
 And their golden flesh.
 Pairs of naked children did support
 The frontons; garlands flung,
 Here and there, festoons. The long Serpent of brass¹ came forth from his cavern,
 Judith² flaunting herself in Holofernes'
 blood,
 Goliath crashed to earth, a monument;
 And toward the skies mounted the prayers of Haman.³

And without mistakes and without erassures,
 And day after day, and without rest,
 The masterpiece took final form
 In the fullness of its construction.

¹ A serpent of brass was made by Moses to cure his people of a plague.

² A beautiful Jewess of Bethulia who, when her town was besieged by Holofernes, the Assyrian general, attended him in his tent, and, when he was in his cups, killed him and cut off his head; whereupon her townsmen fell upon the Assyrians and routed them with great slaughter.

³ In the book of Esther is the story of Haman, whose plot against the Jews Esther revealed to the King, so that Haman was hanged.

Soon the Creation in the dome's center reigned:

There one could see God like a wrestler
 Struggling
 5 With chaos and the earth and the waters;
 The moon and the sun marked with a double seal,
 In new and glowing spaciousness,
 Their place appointed.

10 Jehovah was leaping and flying through space,
 Bathed by the light and borne by the wind;
 The sky, the sea, the hills did all show
 15 forth
 Alive with a broad, slow energy,
 And duly set in order.

Before her creator, beautiful Eve, astonished,
 20 Lifted her tender hands and bent the knee, While Adam felt the zealous God, his finger,
 Touching his fingers, and
 Summoning him unto all-mighty tasks.
 25 Cain and Abel were preparing
 Their offerings; and the devil,
 Turned woman and temptress, did adorn
 With heavy breasts the dominating tree.
 And under the golden vine-branches
 30 Of his closed field the nakedness of Noah
 Had fallen prone upon the ground;
 And the black deluge spread, like a flight of birds,
 With vast wings of water
 35 Over the woods and the world.

In the midst of this giant task
 That single-handed he accomplished,
 Blazed Michaelangelo with Jehovah's
 40 fire,
 And all-surpassing art gushed from his brain.

The ceiling was peopled with a new race of
 beings,
 45 Majestic, violent and brooding.
 His genius burst forth, austere and convulsive,
 Like that of Dante or Savonarola.

Mouths that he opened uttered other words;
 Eyes that he kindled other destinies
 Beheld;
 Under the noble brows, within the lofty bodies
 His great deep soul did rumble and did throb.
 He re-created after his own heart
 Man and the world, all so magnificently
 That to this day, high in the Sestin's dome,
 His own all-mighty gesture he has fixed
 In the gesture of God.

 Then came a crisp autumnal day,
 When finally the word went forth
 That in the chapel the task was finished,
 And that the work was good.

Praise rose like a tide at sea,
 With seething wave and clarion murmur-
 ing,
 But Julius the Second, Pope,
 Hesitant ere he drew his own conclusion,
 Wrought with his silence havoc
 Like a conflagration,
 And the painter took flight into his solitude.
 He went back, as if glad, to his ancient torment,
 And rage and pride, and their strange sorrow,
 And dark suspicion, scarce restrained,
 Stirred once again,
 Set their tragic hurricane
 Through and through Michaelangelo.

LOUYS

(1870-1925)

Pierre Louys was a disciple of Leconte de Lisle and later married the daughter of José Maria de Heredia. He was also a follower of Mallarmé. These personal relations served to strengthen a natural taste for the classicism of the Parnassians. He published his first volume of poetry, Astarte, at the age of twenty-two, and also translated the poems of Meleager. The Songs of Bilitis, written in 1894, is one of the most notable literary hoaxes since Macpherson's Ossian. First published as translations from Greek manuscripts discovered by a mythical archaeologist, they supposedly represented the work of a contemporary of Sappho; and, strange as it may seem, they passed for some time, even among the learned, as genuine. When the hoax was discovered, the poems were praised as constituting one of the most remarkable of the neo-pagan productions. The Songs of Bilitis describe various events in the life of a young poetess, Pamphylia, from her childhood to her death.

The following translations were made by E. S. Bates and G. C. Chandler, in Poet Lore, XXXII, 1921.

THE SONGS OF BILITIS

ROSES IN THE NIGHT

As soon as the night walks over the sky,
 the world belongs to us and the gods. We wander from the fields to the spring, from the darkened woods to the meadows, whither
 our bare feet will.

The little stars are bright enough for such little shadows
 as we are. Sometimes from under the low branches
 we startle sleeping fawns.

But the loveliest secret of the whole night is a place
 known to us alone which draws us across the forest;
 a thicket where mysterious roses
 cling.

For nothing in the world is so intoxicating as the perfume of roses in the night. Why did it never overcome me
 when I was alone?

SONG

When he returned, I hid my face in my hands.

He whispered, "Fear nothing. Who has seen our kiss?"
 "Who has seen us? The night and the moon, cold pieces and holding them high, gazed through them at the pale clouds.

HYMN TO THE NIGHT

"And the stars, and the dawn. The moon 5 mirrored herself in the lake and told it to the water under the willows.
 The water of the lake told it to the oar, 10 A faint breeze, warm as human breath, caresses
 my eyes and cheeks.
 "And the oar told it to the bark and the bark to the fisherman. Alas, alas, if that were all! O Night who givest birth to the gods, how
 But the 15 sweet art fisherman has told it to his wife. thou upon my lips, how warm art thou in my hair!
 "The fisherman has told it to his wife; my Thou enterest into me this hour and I father and feel myself mother and my sisters and all! Hellas will 20 pregnant with all thy springtime.
 know it."

THE TOMB OF THE NAIADS

The length of the wood is covered with 25 frost; as I walked through it, my hair, blown across my mouth,
 flowered in white crystals, and my sandals were heavy 30
 with the clinging snow.
 Thy voice. is it the noise of the sea, is it the silence of the plain? Thy voice, I do not understand it, I am bowed before it, and my tears lave my two hands.

He asked me, "What do you seek?"
 "I am following the tracks of a satyr. His little hoof-prints 35
 mark the snow,
 like holes in a white cloak." He answered,
 "The satyrs
 are dead;

"The satyrs and the nymphs also. Not in thirty years has there been so terrible a winter. The steps which you follow are those of a buck. But we 45 will rest here —
 this is their tomb."

And with his iron hoe he broke the river ice where 50
 the naiads used to play, laughing. He took up the great
 Do not weep for me, you who tarry;
 beauty followed me

THE TOMB OF BILITIS

I who wove garlands of verses and kisses lie now 40 rose-shrouded under the darkness of laurels.

In the land of the nymphs my childhood faded to memory:
 life came to me on the isle of lovers;
 Cyprus has given me death. Therefore is my name remembered and

my urn anointed.

to the grave; the mourners tore their cheeks;
 my jewelled mirrors are with me in the tomb.
 And now through the pale fields of asphodel I walk,
 an unbodied shadow, and among the joyless dead I rejoice
 5 in the memories of life.

FORT

(1872-)

Paul Fort, born at Reims, founded the Art Theater and also the review, Verse and Prose, which was published from 1905 to 1914. In pieces dealing with mythology, nature, and his native land, Fort wrote between 1897 and 1924 thirty-two volumes of Ballades of France. Trying a new metrical system, he composed much of his verse in the form of prose, to indicate the superiority of natural rhythm to artificial prosody. A thoroughgoing representative of the New Poetry both in the form and the content of his verse, he has been recently called "the prince of poets."

With the exception of the last one the following poems, written in 1895, are translated by Lilian White Spencer in Poet Lore, XXXVI, 1925. Eternity (1908) is translated by John Newberry in Poetry, XVIII, 1921.

THE DANCE

If all the girls would join their hands, they could dance around the sea.
 If all the lads were sailors, ships could 10 bridge it easily.

Then, all the people on this earth would be a happy band;
 For they could dance around the world, if 15
 they went hand-in-hand.

THE LAD'S RETURN

Hi there, my lad! Look here, my lad!
 Why are your steps so slow?
 The way is long. What keeps you back?
 You still have far to go.

I loiter, but I don't know why. My heart,
 so used to roam,
 Seems like to stop, upon my word, to find itself near home.

Hi there, my lad! Look here, my lad!
 You left your promised bride.
 She gave her cross to you when last you 30
 both stood side by side.

My promised bride? . . . I've been so far
 . . . I took it on that day,

But she could buy another one . . . I come a long, long way.

O poor, poor lad! Can you not guess?
 Love has a little life;
 It is a swift, sweet blaze of straw. She is another's wife.

One understands when one is far . . . I knew all this before
 And that my own, who wept my loss, will welcome me no more.

Then tell me, lad, if you have known that those who loved you are 20 No longer waiting your return, why have you come so far?

One must come home in spite of all. One must return, but why,
 25 I do not know, except one must, the same as one must die.

THE LAMENT OF SOLDIERS

When they were come back from the wars, their heads were seamed with bleeding scars;

Their hearts betwixt clenched teeth they gripped, in rivulets their blood had dripped.

When they were come back from the wars, the blue, the red, the sons of Mars,

They sought their snuff-boxes so fine, their chests, their sheets all spotless showing;

They sought their kine, their grunting swine, their wives and sweethearts at their sewing,

Their roguish children, like as not crowned with a shining copper pot:

They even sought their homes, poor souls . . . they only found the worms and moles.

The carrion raven clamored o'er them. They spat their broken hearts before them.

THE RETURN

Ivy has covered all the wall. How many hours, how many tears, since last we loved? How many years?

No roses now. Ivy has crushed the vine. Soul, whither didst thou go? Climbing across the nests of nightingales, ivy has stifled the whole château.

Wind, the deep wells are choked with the roses of yesterday. Is that your hiding place, O my dead wife?

No one replies? Who would reply? Is it not best to listen to the wind that sighs through the grasses, "my sweet love"?

Flush with the roof, the ancient, crimson sun is cut through the midst so mournfully.

Shall I bid the gardener come? The gardener? No. It would be better to summon Death to reap the long grass:

So many memories and so much love, and the setting of the sun at the level of the earth.

THE LITTLE SILENT STREET

The stormy silence stirs and hums. Will there be none that this way comes?

5

Cobblestones count geraniums. Geraniums count the cobblestones.

Dream, young girl, at your casement high. Shelled green peas before you lie.

They plump the apron white you try with rosy finger-tips to tie.

I pass, in black from head to feet. Is it forked lightning troubles thee, Young maiden, or the sight of me? The peas have fallen in the street.

Sombre I pass. Behind I see cobblestones count each fallen pea.

The stormy silence stirs and hums. Will there be none that this way comes?

• ETERNITY

One does not need to credit death. The human heart to rest is fain. O'er sleeping fields the evening's breath dreams, and I hear eternity chime in the bending ears of grain.

30 "Hark! — and angelus dies in heaven's blue height." Be comforted. Hours pass away. Hushed is the belfry? God doth wake. The nightingale salutes the day hid in the turret's rose-tree brake, and in its turn will mourn the night.

"Hark! — once again the hour doth swell." But the bell's already fast asleep. Eternity is chiming deep, borne by the sweet, tormented breath of zephyr and of philomel.

One does not need to credit death.

SPANISH CAMPOAMOR

(1819-1901)

Ramón de Campoamor, after abandoning successively a religious and a medical career, became one of the most important leaders in the modern movement in Spanish poetry. Declaring war against the superfluous in poetry, against elaborate conceits and pomposity, he prescribed the following formula: Think nobly, feel deeply, and express clearly. His naturalness and clearness represent one of the major reforms in the nineteenth-century lyric in Spain. Like Wordsworth he was interested in using the language and life of the people in his poetry, and like Wordsworth he was usually more successful when momentarily he forgot his poetic theories. Campoamor endeavored to invent new poetic forms, but the forms are really old, and it is by reason of the combined wit, irony, grace, and pathos of expression that his work endures.

The following poem, written in 1846, is translated by Ida Farnell in Spanish Prose and Poetry Old and New, Oxford, 1920.

· IF ONLY I COULD WRITE!

I

"I pray you, reverend Sir, this letter 5 write."

"To whom, then? Ah, I know."

"You know, because that dark and starless night

You saw us meet?" "E'en so."

"O Sir, forgive us." "Nay, 'twas no great
sin,

The hour to love did lend;

Give me a pen and paper, I'll begin:
Raymond, beloved friend!

"Belovéd? Well, 'tis written. You're not vext?

Do you approve it?" "Yes."

"I am so sad alone. ('Should that come next?')

More sad than you can guess.

Such sorrow fills me since we two did part!" 25

"How do you know my pain?"

"To these old eyes is every young maid's
heart

Like crystal, free from stain.

"What without you is life? A vale of woe.
With you? The promised land."

"Ah, Señor Cura! Make your writing so That he may understand."

*"The kiss I gave you when you left me,
sweet —"*

"What! Know you of my kiss?"

"Ever when lovers part, and when they meet —

Oh, take it not amiss.

*"Oh, if your love should never bring you
more,*

10 How should I grieve and sigh!"

"What grieve, and nothing more? Nay, good Señor,

Say, I were like to die."

15 "To die! My child, such word were blasphemy."

"Yet die full well I might."

"I'll not put 'die.'" "Your heart is ice.
Ah me!

20 If only I could write!"

II

"Ah, Señor Cura, 'tis in vain you seek
My sorrow thus to still;

Unless, indeed, to make my whole heart
speak

These pen-strokes have the skill.

30 "For God's sake write, my soul would fain be free

From all its weary grief,

Which day by day would even stifle me,
But that tears being relief.

- "Tell him these rosy lips he loved, that met
His own dear lips erewhile,
Are now for ever closed, and fast forget
Even what 'tis to smile.
- "Tell him, these eyes, that won from him
such praise,
Are drooping and dejected,
Even because therein his well-loved face 10
No longer is reflected.
- "Tell him, of all the torments life can bring,
Be absence my last choice;
- Tell him, that ever in my ears will ring
The echo of his voice.
- "Yet say, that since for him so sad I stay,
5 I count my sorrow light,
O God, how many are the things I'd say,
If I could only write!"
- END
- "Now, Sir, 'tis done. I trace these words for end:
'To Raymond,' and bestow
Upon it this my mark, the which to send,
15 Small Latin need I know."

BÉCQUER

(1836-1870)

Gustavo Bécquer was born in Seville, the son of Joaquin Bécquer, a painter. He was left at the age of nine a penniless orphan, and during the greater part of his life had to fight against poverty and disease. He made numerous journeys to remote provinces of his country in search of local legends and picturesque costumes, and in letters to his friends gave piquant and charming accounts of his visits. Bécquer, one of the most subjective of Spanish poets, has been called "el artista puro." In his verse no place is given to political, social, or religious subjects; his great sympathy was with the eternal sentiments in the hearts of men: love, death, and grief. It has been observed that Bécquer was strongly influenced by Heine; but, having none of the sarcasm and witty skepticism of the German poet, and more of sweetness and grace and sadness, having a marked fondness for the mysterious, and a deep note of melancholy reflection, Bécquer is apt to remind us most of de Musset. At its best Bécquer's work is marked by a sort of elfin witchery and by an apparent simplicity that really conceals the highest artistry.

Of the following poems the first three are translated by Marion Lee Reynolds in Poet Lore, XXXIV, 1923, and Poet Lore, XXI, 1920. They Closed her Eyes (ca. 1860) is translated by John Masefield in The Hispanic Anthology, Notes and Monographs.

• RIMAS, NUMERO LXIV

As guards the miser his so dear, dear treasure,
My sorrow guarded I;
To her who once did pledge me deathless loving,
Something I sought to show that need not
die.

To-day I seek my sorrow, seek it vainly;
Time with effacing wing Brushing me, whispers: "Clay, and even your sorrow
Holds not a deathless thing!"

• RIMAS, NUMERO IX

The low-voiced wind with delicate touch is kissing
The ghosts of waves which rise to its fleet playing;
20 The western cloud, its purple now dismiss-
ing,
The sun's last kisses are with gold inlaying;
Girdling the blazing log, the flame glides,
hissing,
25 A farther flame to kiss, to kiss, essaying,
And even the willow, of its weight lowyearning,
The river's kiss, receiving, is returning.

RIMAS, NUMERO LIII

They will return, the shadowy-pinioned
 swallows,
 To build their nests within your balcon 5
 small;
 And even again, a brush of wings will beckon
 At window and at door;

10
 But those whose wheeling flight was stayed, was bridled,
 Your beauty and my blessedness to recall,
 Yea, those to whom our names were names 15
 of comrades,
 They will return no more.

They will return, the honey-suckle blos- 20
 soms,
 To drip their sweetness from your garden-
 wall;
 And even again, them to increasing glamour
 Will afternoon restore; 25

But those, still freighted with the dew of evening,
 Whose drops together saw we slant and 30
 fall,
 Yea, those wherefrom the tears of day went trembling . . .
 They will return no more.

They will return, the words of Love, the 35 burning
 Speech, passion-wild, one sweeping music
 all;
 Your soul, perchance, roused at the last from dreaming, 40
 Will hear, as not before;

But kneeling, rapt, as one who, in God's presence,
 Brings silence only to the altar tall, 45
 As I have loved you . . . nay, be mindful
 ever,
 Love will return no more.

•THEY CLOSED HER EYES 50

They closed her eyes
 That were still open;

They hid her face
 With a white linen,
 And, some sobbing,
 Others in silence,
 From the sad bedroom
 All came away.

The nightlight in a dish
 Burned on the floor;
 It threw on the wall
 The bed's shadow,
 And in that shadow
 One saw sometime
 Drawn in sharp line
 The body's shape.

The dawn appeared.
 At its first whiteness
 With its thousand noises
 The town awoke.
 Before that contrast
 Of light and darkness,
 Of life and strangeness
 I thought a moment.
My God, how lonely
The dead are!

On the shoulders of men
 To church they bore her,
 And in a chapel
 They left her bier.
 There they surrounded
 Her pale body
 With yellow candles
 And black stuffs.

At the last stroke
 Of the ringing for the Souls,
 An old crone finished
 Her last prayers.
 She crossed the narrow nave,
 The doors moaned,
 And the holy place
 Remained deserted.

From a clock one heard
 The measured ticking,
 And from a candle
 The guttering.
 All things there
 Were so dark and mournful,
 So cold and rigid,
 That I thought a moment:

*My God, how lonely
The dead are!*

From the high belfry
The tongue of iron
Clanged, giving out
A last farewell.
Crape on their clothes,
Her friends and kindred Passed in a line
In homage to her.

In the last vault
Dark and narrow,
The pickaxe opened
A niche at one end;
They laid her away there.
Soon they bricked the place up,
And with a gesture
Bade grief farewell.

Pickaxe on shoulder
The gravedigger,
Singing between his teeth,
Passed out of sight.
The night came down,
It was all silent.
Alone in the darkness
I thought a moment, —
*My God, how lonely
The dead are!*

In the dark nights
Of bitter winter,
When the wind makes
The rafter creak,
5 When the violent rain
Lashes the windows,
Lonely I remember
That poor girl.

10 There falls the rain
With its noise eternal,
There the northwind
Fights with the rain.
Stretched in the hollow
15 Of the damp bricks,
Perhaps her bones
Freeze with the cold.

Does the dust return to dust?
20 Does the soul fly to heaven?
Or is all vile matter,
Rottenness, filthiness?
I know not, but
There is something — something —
25 Something which gives me
Loathing, terror, —
To leave the dead
So alone, so wretched.

ITALIAN

CARDUCCI

(1836-1907)

The strongest spirit of the modern movement in Italian literature was Giosuè Carducci. Born in a revolutionary household, Carducci as a child was often extremely unhappy. As soon as he began his school work, however, his brilliance won him recognition and reward. He held various teaching positions, and in 1860 at the age of twenty-four he was made Professor of Italian Languages and Literature at the University of Bologna, a position he kept until three years before his death. He was an excellent student of the classics and of Italian history, and his writing shows a strong love of classical form combined with a fierce zeal for his country's glory. He was one of the first in Italy to adopt the historical method in criticism. His poetic gifts were entirely lyric; he made no attempt to distinguish himself in dramatic and epic poetry. Italian literature owes him much for his renovation of classical lyric models. Under his hand the most restrained of classical forms bursts into flame. His characteristics were a powerful invective (often balanced by great tenderness), a fervor for Italian liberty, a sympathy for the poor and heavy-laden, and a profound understanding of classical poetry. In 1906 he was awarded the Nobel prize.

The following poems (1872-1877) are translated by Emily A. Tribe, in A Selection From the Poems of Giosuè Carducci.

THE SONNET¹

Dante a cherub's motion to it gave,
In azure floating, compassed round with
gold;
Petrarca his heart-sorrow to it told,
River divine, each verse a murmuring
wave.

Tasso for it from Tibur's Muse did crave 10
Venusian honey and he made it hold
Mantuan ambrosia.² Alfieri³ bold Smote with its diamond shaft tyrant and slave.

Ugo⁴ to it lent notes of nightingale
In cypress groves Ionian; acanthus blooms
To gird it gathered in his mother's land.

Not sixth but last I count me in that 20
band,
Rapture and wrath, complaints, fragrance, art;
their tombs
Recalled in lonesome days my verses hail.

- SIRMIO⁵

Here behold the verdant Sirmio smiles upon the lake's calm waters,
Fair flower of the peninsula.

The sun looks on her and caresses, Bena- 30
cus⁶ round her closes
Like a goblet hued of silver,

Along whose shining marge the peaceful olive, broad branches spreading,
Mingles with the eternal laurel. 35

This glistening goblet Mother Italy, with arms outstretched upholding
To the gods supreme presenteth,

5 And the high gods therein let fall from the heavens above, Sirmio,
The gem of the peninsula.

Baldo, rugged mountain sire, from the height the fair protecting,
Watches 'neath his eyebrows shaggy.

The Gu⁷ resembles some Titan fallen for 15 her sake in battle,
Stretched supine, yet still threatening.⁸

But towards her on the left from the bay like the crescent moon curving
Salô⁹ her white arms extendeth.

Joyous as a maiden who joining in the dance lets her tresses
25 And veil float loose on the breezes;

And she laughs and she scatters flowers with profuse hand, and proudly
With flowers her young brow encircles.

And in the distant background Garda¹⁰ raises her dark citadel
High above the watery mirror,

Singing an ancient saga of buried cities
long forgotten,
And of Queens barbaric telling.

¹ This graceful appreciation of that most intellectual and restrained poetic form reminds us of Wordsworth's "Scorn not the sonnet."

² Venosa (ancient Venusia) was the birthplace of Horace, and Mantua of Vergil. The meaning is that Tasso made use of the classical style.

³ A reference to Alfieri's (1749-1803) use of the sonnet for political protest.

⁴ Ugo Foscolo (1778-1827), a famous Italian poet, half Greek by birth.

⁵ This poem exemplifies Carducci's intimate feeling for the temper of ancient Rome and his conviction that Italy is Rome in modern guise. The beautiful poem written by Catullus on his return to Sirmio from Bithynia is printed on p. 256.

⁶ An ancient name given to Lake Garda, bordering on the province of Verona, the largest lake of northern Italy.

⁷ Called in Italian Monte Gu, a corruption of Mont Aigu, a mountain on the east side of Lake Garda.

⁸ Probably threatening the Austrian invaders.

⁹ A town on the bay. The poet imagines as arms the lines of white houses encircling the bay.

¹⁰ A village situated on the lake and containing the ruins of a castle famous in mediæval tradition.

- But here, whence thou in simple joyance of the blue, O Lalage,¹
Dost send thy soul and thy glances,
Here long ago Flavius Catullus his 5
Bithynian bark moored fast
To the stones in the sunshine gleam-
ing,
Sat through long days, and in the shifting 10
phosphorescence of the waves
Saw his Lesbia's bright eyes sparkle,
Saw the faithless smile, the multitudinous 15
passions of Lesbia
In the glassy wavelets mirrored,
While she in dark suburban alleys wore out the puny weaklings,
Descendants of Romulus!
While to him from the watery depth the Nymph of the lake was singing:
"Come, O Quintus Valerius!"
25 Turn and adore, where a poet great, severe,
looks forth, O Lalage,
From the towers of the Scaligers.²
"Up, up, in beautiful Italy," he murmurs and looks smiling
On the land, the sky and the water.
"Here the never ceasing tumult of your 30
busy life appeareth
But of bees the distant humming,
"And the anxious madding care and the timorous fears in this cold silence
Fade away in slow oblivion.
"Here the fresh coolness, here gentle sleep,
here soft music and the choirs
Of cerulean water maidens,
"While Hesperus widens the rosy glow of 40
evening upon the waters,
From Lebanon the cool fresh morn
Sheds rosy tremors on the sea;
By Latin barque the cross is borne
From Cyprus sailing gallantly.
On deck stands Rudel, Prince of Blaye,
40 With fever faint, his yearning eyes
Seek on the heights above the bay
Where Tripoli's fair castle lies.

GEOFFREY RUDEL³

¹ A common name for Roman courtesans. The word is originally Greek and may be translated "little prattler."

² A town on Lake Garda in the province of Verona.

³ A river which traverses Lake Garda.

⁴ A famous traditional poet who was held to have founded Mantua, naming it after his mother, Manto, daughter of Tiresias, the Theban seer.

⁵ A castle which stands on the peninsula of Sirmio. The Scaligers, a great family of merchant-princes, were among those who sheltered Dante during his long exile. Carducci is here referring to the passage beginning "Up in beautiful Italy there lies a lake . . . which is called Benacus" (Dante's Inferno, Canto XX, ll. 61 ff.).

⁶ For the facts and traditions associated with the Provençal troubadour Geoffrey Rudel, see p. 479.

When he beholds the Asian strand,
 The famous song he sings anew.
 "Love hath for you from far-off land Filled all my heart with aching pain."
 The circlings of the grey sea-mew
 Follow the lover's sweet complaint;
 On the white sails the sun grows faint,
 Obscured by clouds in fleecy train.

The ship in the calm haven drops
 Her anchor fast; Bertrand descends
 In anxious care, naught heeds, nor stops,
 Toward the hill his way he wends.
 With mourning trappings all bedight
 The shield of Blaye is in his hand,
 He hastens to the Castle height:
 "Where is the Lady Mélisande?"

"The messenger of love I come,
 I come the messenger of death.
 I come to seek you in your home
 From Blaye's good lord, Geoffrey Rudel.
 He caught your fame on Rumour's breath,
 Unseen he loved you, sang of you,
 He comes, he dies; this poet true,
 Lady, to you sends his farewell."

With pensive mien the lady rose,
 Looked at the squire, some moments
 stayed,
 Then a black veil around her throws,
 Her face and star-like eyes to shade.
 "Sir Squire," quoth she, her words come
 fast,
 "Let us go where Sir Geoffrey lies,
 That we may bear the first and last Word love may utter ere he dies."

Beneath his fair tent pitched along
 Beside the sea Sir Geoffrey lay,
 In low tones sang one tender song
 That told his heart's supreme desire.
 "Lord, who didst will that far away
 My love should dwell in Eastern lands,
 Grant that I may in her dear hands
 Commit my soul as I expire."

Guided by faithful Bertrand's hand
 The lady came, the last note caught,
 Before the entrance Mélisande
 Lingered, her heart with pity fraught.
 5 But soon with trembling hand she threw
 Her veil aside, her face left clear.
 Near to her lover sad she drew,
 And murmured: "Geoffrey, I am here."

Stretched on a low divan he lay,
 10 Turning, then vainly strove to rise;
 With a long sigh the Lord of Blaye
 Upon those lovely features gazed.
 "Is that the face, are these the eyes
 Love promised one day should be mine?
 15 Around that brow did I entwine Vague dreams my waking thought had raised?"

Just as the moon on some May night
 20 Bursts through the clouds' encircling
 gloom,
 Flooding the earth with silvery light,
 Fills it with growth and with perfume,
 So to the enchanted lover seems
 25 This tranquil beauty to impart
 Sweetness divine beyond all dreams,
 Filling the dying poet's heart.

"Lady, what is this life of ours?
 30 The fleeting shadow of a dream.
 Now end the fable's transient hours,
 'Tis only love that knows not death.
 To one in agony supreme
 Open thine arms. On the last day
 35 I wait for thee; a kiss now may Commend to thee my latest breath."

The lady held him to her breast,
 And bending o'er her lover pale
 Upon his quivering lips she pressed
 40 Love's kiss of greeting and farewell.
 The sun broke through his misty veil,
 From sky serene shone on the sea,
 The lady's golden locks set free
 Like light o'er the dead poet fell.

RUSSIAN

TURGENEV

(1818-1883)

Ivan Sergievitch Turgenev was born in Orel, of an old Russian family. He received his education from private tutors and in the schools of Moscow, St. Petersburg, and Berlin. In Berlin he became interested in the ideals of western civilization, particularly the emancipation of the oppressed; and, returning to Russia, he committed himself to the task of lightening the burden of the Russian peasants. The Russian government became suspicious of his advanced ideas, and he was obliged to leave the country. Although he lived almost exclusively in Berlin and Paris, he wrote always on Russian subjects and remained devoted to the principle of free Russia. His best-known works of fiction are Rudin, A Nobleman's Nest, On the Eve, Fathers and Sons, Smoke, and Virgin Soil.

Turgenev was a master-painter of character, a genius with whom the names of Thackeray and Dickens are often associated. He was a profoundly sympathetic observer of human nature, rather than a story teller; melancholy, often pessimistic, passionately fond of self-analysis, he was one of the first of the modern writers to investigate fearlessly and frankly the character of the human soul. His great reputation doubtless helped to gain an audience for Tolstoi.

The following story is translated by Constance Garnett in Russian Short Stories, Scott, Foresman, 1919.

BIRYUK

I was coming back from hunting one evening alone in a racing droshky.¹ I was six miles from home; my good trotting mare galloped bravely along the dusty road, pricking up her ears with an occasional snort; my weary dog stuck close to the hind-wheels, as though he were fastened there. A tempest was coming on. In front, a huge, purplish storm-cloud slowly rose from behind the forest; long gray rain-clouds flew over my head and to meet me; the willows stirred and whispered restlessly. The suffocating heat changed suddenly to a damp chilliness; the darkness rapidly thickened. I gave the horse a lash with the reins, descended a steep slope, pushed across a dry water-course overgrown with brushwood, mounted the hill, and drove into the forest. The road ran before me, bending between thick hazel bushes, now enveloped in darkness; I advanced with difficulty. The droshky jumped up and down over the hard roots of the ancient oaks and limes, which were continually intersected by deep ruts — the tracks of cart wheels; my horse began to stumble. A violent wind suddenly began to roar overhead; the trees blustered; big drops of rain fell with slow tap and splash on the leaves; there came a flash of lightning and a clap of thunder. The rain fell in torrents. I went on a step or so, and soon was forced to stop; my horse foundered; I could not see an inch before me. I managed to take refuge somehow in a spreading bush. Crouching down and covering my face, I waited patiently for the storm to blow over, when suddenly, in a flash of lightning, I saw a tall figure on the road. I began to stare intently in that direction — the figure seemed to have sprung out of the ground near my droshky.

"Who's that?" inquired a ringing voice.

"Why, who are you?"

"I'm the forester here."

I mentioned my name.

"Oh, I know! Are you on your way home?"

"Yes. But, you see, in such a storm . . ."

"Yes, there is a storm," replied the voice.

A pale flash of lightning lit up the forester from head to foot; a brief crashing clap of thunder followed at once upon it. The rain lashed with redoubled force.

"It won't be over just directly," the forester went on.

"What's to be done?"

"I'll take you to my hut, if you like," he said abruptly.

"That would be a service."

"Please to take your seat."

He went up to the mare's head, took her by the bit, and pulled her up. We set off. I held on to the cushion of the droshky, which rocked "like a boat on the sea," and called my dog. My poor mare splashed with difficulty through the mud, slipped and stumbled; the forester hovered before the shafts to right and to left like a ghost. We drove rather a long while; at last my guide stopped. "Here we are home, sir," he observed in a quiet voice. The gate creaked; some puppies barked a welcome. I raised my head, and in a flash of lightning I made out a small hut in the middle of a large yard, fenced in with hurdles.¹ From the one little window there was a dim light. The forester led the horse up to the steps and knocked at the door. "Coming, coming!" we heard in a little shrill voice; there was the patter of bare feet, the bolt creaked, and a girl of twelve, in a little old smock tied round the waist with list,² appeared in the doorway with a lantern in her hand.

"Show the gentleman a light," he said to her, "and I will put your droshky in the shed."

The little girl glanced at me, and went into the hut. I followed her.

The forester's hut consisted of one room, smoky, low-pitched, and empty, without curtains or partition. A tattered sheepskin hung on the wall. On the bench lay a single-barreled gun; in the corner lay a heap of rags; two great pots stood near the oven. A pine splinter was burning on the table, flickering up and dying down mournfully. In the very middle of the hut hung a cradle, suspended from the end of a long horizontal pole. The little girl put out the lantern, sat down on a tiny stool, and with her right hand began swinging the cradle, while with her left she attended to the smoldering pine splinter. I looked round — my heart sank within me: it's not cheering to go into a peasant's hut at night. The baby in the cradle breathed hard and fast.

"Are you all alone here?" I asked the little girl.

"Yes," she uttered, hardly audibly.

"You're the forester's daughter?"

"Yes," she whispered.

The door creaked, and the forester, bending his head, stepped across the threshold. He lifted the lantern from the floor, went up to the table, and lighted a candle.

"I dare say you're not used to the splinter light?" said he, and he shook back his curls.

I looked at him. Rarely has it been my fortune to behold such a comely creature. He was tall, broad-shouldered, and in marvelous proportion. His powerful muscles stood out in strong relief under his wet homespun shirt. A curly, black beard hid half of his stern and manly face; small brown eyes looked out boldly from under broad eyebrows which met in the middle. He stood before me, his arms held lightly akimbo.

I thanked him, and asked his name.

"My name's Foma," he answered, "and my nickname's Biryuk" (Wolf).

"Oh, you're Biryuk."

I looked with redoubled curiosity at him. From my Yermolai and others I had often ¹ A hurdle is a kind of fence made with twigs woven together.

² A rough strip of cloth.

³ The name Biryuk is used in the Orel province to denote a solitary misanthropic man. (Author's note.)

heard stories about the forester Biryuk, whom all the peasants of the surrounding districts feared as they feared fire. According to them there had never been such a master of his business in the world before. "He won't let you carry off a handful of brushwood; he'll drop upon you like a fall of snow, whatever time it may be, even in the middle of the night, and you needn't think of resisting him — he's 10 strong, and as cunning as the devil. . . . And there's no getting at him, anyhow, neither by brandy nor by money; there's no snare he'll walk into. More than once good folks have planned to put him out of the world, but no — it's never come off."

That was how the neighboring peasants spoke of Biryuk.

"So you're Biryuk," I repeated; "I've heard talk of you, brother. They say you 20 show no mercy to anyone."

"I do my duty," he answered grimly; "it's not right to eat the master's bread for nothing."

He took an axe from his girdle and began splitting splinters.

"Have you no wife?" I asked him.

"No," he answered, with a vigorous sweep of the axe.

"She's dead, I suppose?"

"No . . . yes . . . she's dead," he added, and turned away. I was silent; he raised his eyes and looked at me.

"She ran away with a traveling pedlar," he brought out with a bitter smile. The 35 little girl hung her head; the baby waked up and began crying; the little girl went to the cradle. "There, give it him," said Biryuk, thrusting a dirty feeding-bottle into her hand. "Him, too, she abandoned," he went on in an undertone, pointing to the baby. He went up to the door, stopped, and turned round.

"A gentleman like you," he began, "wouldn't care for our bread, I dare say, 45 and except bread I've —"

"I'm not hungry."

"Well, that's for you to say. I would have heated the samovar, but I've no tea. . . . I'll go and see how your horse is 50 getting on."

He went out and slammed the door. I looked round again. The hut struck me as more melancholy than ever. The bitter smell of stale smoke choked my breathing unpleasantly. The little girl did not stir from her place, and did not raise her eyes; 5 from time to time she jogged the cradle, and timidly pulled her slipping smock up on to her shoulder; her bare legs hung motionless.

"What's your name?" I asked her.

"Ulita," she said, her mournful little face drooping more than ever.

The forester came in and sat down on the bench.

"The storm's passing over," he observed, after a brief silence; "if you wish it, I will guide you out of the forest."

I got up; Biryuk took his gun and examined the firepan.

"What's that for?" I inquired.

"There's mischief in the forest. . . . They're cutting a tree down on Mares' Ravine," he added, in reply to my look of inquiry.

"Could you hear it from here?"

"I can hear it outside."

We went out together. The rain had ceased. Heavy masses of storm-cloud were still huddled in the distance; from time to time there were long flashes of lightning; 30 but here and there overhead the dark blue sky was already visible; stars twinkled through the swiftly flying clouds. The outline of the trees, drenched with rain, and stirred by the wind, began to stand out in the darkness. We listened. The forester took off his cap and bent his head. . . . "Th— . . . there!" he said suddenly, and he stretched out his hand: "see what a night he's pitched on." I had heard nothing but the rustle of the leaves. Biryuk led the mare out of the shed. "But, perhaps," he added aloud, "this way I shall miss him." "I'll go with you . . . if you like?" "Certainly," he answered, and he backed the horse in again; "we'll catch him in a trice, and then I'll take you. Let's be off." We started, Biryuk in front, I following him. Heaven only knows how he found out his way, but he only stopped once or twice, and then merely to listen to the strokes of the axe. "There," he muttered, "do you hear? do you hear?" "Why, where?" Biryuk shrugged his shoulders. We went down into the ravine; the wind was still for an instant; the rhythmical strokes reached my hearing distinctly. Biryuk glanced at me and shook his head. We went farther through the wet bracken and nettles. A slow muffled crash was heard. . . .

"He's felled it," muttered Biryuk. Meantime the sky had grown clearer and clearer; there was a faint light in the forest. We clambered at last out of the ravine.

"Wait here a little," the forester whispered to me. He bent down, and, raising his gun above his head, vanished among the bushes. I began listening with strained attention. Across the continual roar of the wind faint sounds from close by reached me; there was a cautious blow of an axe on the brushwood, the crash of wheels, the snort of a horse. . . .

"Where are you off to? Stop!" the iron voice of Biryuk thundered suddenly. Another voice was heard in a pitiful shriek, like a trapped hare. . . . A struggle was beginning.

"No, no, you've made a mistake," Biryuk declared, panting; "you're not going to get off. . . ." I rushed in the direction of the noise, and ran up to the scene of the conflict, stumbling at every step. A felled tree lay on the ground, and near it Biryuk was busily engaged holding the thief down and binding his hands behind his back with a kerchief. I came closer. Biryuk got up and set him on his feet. I saw a peasant drenched with rain, in tatters, and with a long, disheveled beard. A sorry little nag, half covered with a stiff mat, was standing by, together with a rough cart. The forester did not utter a word; the peasant too was silent; his head was shaking.

"Let him go," I whispered in Biryuk's ears; "I'll pay for the tree."

Without a word Biryuk took the horse by the mane with his left hand; in his right he held the thief by the belt. "Now turn round, you rat!" he said grimly.

"The bit of an axe there, take it," muttered the peasant.

"No reason to lose it, certainly," said the forester, and he picked up the axe.

We started. I walked behind. . . . The rain began sprinkling again, and soon fell in torrents. With difficulty we made our way to the hut. Biryuk pushed the captured horse into the middle of the yard, led the peasant into the room, loosened the knot in the kerchief, and made him sit down in a corner. The little girl, who had fallen asleep near the oven, jumped up and began staring at us in silent terror. I sat down on the locker.

"Ugh, what a downpour!" remarked the forester; "you will have to wait till it's over. Won't you lie down?"

"Thanks."

"I would have shut him in the store loft, on your honor's account," he went on, indicating the peasant; "but you see the bolt —"

"Leave him here; don't touch him," I interrupted.

The peasant stole a glance at me from under his brows. I vowed inwardly to set the poor wretch free, come what might. He sat without stirring on the locker. By the light of the lantern I could make out his worn, wrinkled face, his overhanging yellow eyebrows, his restless eyes, his thin limbs. . . . The little girl lay down on the floor, just at his feet, and again dropped asleep. Biryuk sat at the table, his head in his hands. A cricket chirped in the corner . . . the rain pattered on the roof and streamed down the windows; we were all silent.

"Foma Kuzmitch," said the peasant suddenly in a thick, broken voice; "Foma Kuzmitch!"

"What is it?"

"Let me go."

Biryuk made no answer.

"Let me go . . . hunger drove me to it; let me go."

"I know you," retorted the forester severely; "your set's all alike — all thieves."

"Let me go," repeated the peasant. "Our manager . . . we're ruined, that's what it is — let me go!"

"Ruined, indeed! . . . Nobody need steal."

"Let me go, Foma Kuzmitch. . . . Don't destroy me. Your manager, you know yourself, will have no mercy on me; that's what it is."

Biryuk turned away. The peasant was shivering as though he were in the throes of fever. His head was shaking, and his breathing came in broken gasps.

"Let me go," he repeated with mournful desperation. "Let me go; by God, let me go! I'll pay; see, by God, I will! By God, it was through hunger! . . . the little ones are crying, you know yourself. It's hard for us, see."

"You needn't go stealing, for all that."

"My little horse," the peasant went on, "my poor little horse, at least . . . our only beast . . . let it go."

"I tell you, I can't. I'm not a free man; I'm made responsible. You oughtn't to be spoilt, either."

"Let me go! It's through want, Foma Kuzmitch, want — and nothing else — let me go!"

"I know you!"

"Oh, let me go!"

"Ugh, what's the use of talking to you! sit quiet, or else you'll catch it. Don't you see the gentleman, hey?"

The poor wretch hung his head. . . . Biryuk yawned and laid his head on the table. The rain still persisted. I was waiting to see what would happen.

Suddenly the peasant stood erect. His eyes were glittering, and his face flushed dark red. "Come, then, here; strike yourself, here," he began, his eyes puckering up and the corners of his mouth dropping; "come, cursed destroyer of men's souls! drink Christian blood, drink."

The forester turned round.

"I'm speaking to you, Asiatic, blood-sucker, you!"

"Are you drunk, or what, to set to being abusive?" began the forester, puzzled. "Are you out of your senses, hey?"

"Drunk! not at your expense, cursed destroyer of souls — brute, brute, brute!"

"Ah, you — I'll show you!"

"What's that to me? It's all one; I'm done for; what can I do without a home? Kill me — it's the same in the end; whether it's through hunger or like this — it's all one. Ruin us all — wife, children . . . kill us all at once. But, wait a bit, we'll get at you!"

Biryuk got up.

"Kill me, kill me," the peasant went on in savage tones; "kill me; come, come, kill me. . . ." (The little girl jumped up hastily from the ground and stared at him.) "Kill me, kill me!"

"Silence!" thundered the forester, and he took two steps forward.

"Stop, Foma, stop," I shouted; "let him go. . . . Peace be with him."

"I won't be silent," the luckless wretch went on. "It's all the same — ruin, anyway — you destroyer of souls, you brute; you've not come to ruin yet. . . . But wait a bit; you won't have long to boast of; they'll wring your neck; wait a bit!"

Biryuk clutched him by the shoulder. I rushed to help the peasant. . . .

"Don't touch him, master!" the forester shouted to me.

I should not have feared his threats, and already had my fist in the air; but, to my intense amazement, with one pull he tugged the kerchief off the peasant's elbows, took him by the scruff of the neck, thrust his cap over his eyes, opened the door, and shoved him out.

"Go to the devil with your horse!" he shouted after him; "but mind, next time . . ."

He came back into the hut and began rummaging in the corner.

"Well, Biryuk," I said at last, "you've astonished me; I see you're a splendid fellow."

"Oh, stop that, master," he cut me short with an air of vexation; "please don't speak of it. But I'd better see you on your way now," he added; "I suppose you won't wait for this little rain. . . ."

In the yard there was the rattle of the wheels of the peasant's cart.

"He's off, then!" he muttered; "but next time!"

Half an hour later he parted from me at the edge of the wood.

DOSTOIEVSKI

(1821-1881)

Fyodor Mikhaylovitch Dostoevski was born in Moscow and was educated at the School of Military Engineers. At twenty he received a commission in the Russian army, but in 1844 left military service to devote himself to literature. His first novel, Poor Folk (1845), was recognized by the critics as the sign of a new era in Russia. His second novel, however, The Double, published in the next year, was a disappointment. The many novels and stories he wrote during the next three years reflected the influence of Gogol and of Balzac. In order to study political problems and reform, Dostoevski joined a socialist group. The members of this group were arrested and condemned to death; and, although the sentence was not carried out, Dostoevski was sent to a penal settlement at Omsk for four years. The nervous strain and the exposure greatly aggravated his epilepsy so that he never enjoyed good health again. In 1854 he was freed, and in 1855 his commission in the army was restored. In 1856 he resumed his literary work and wrote The Family Friend (1859), The House of Death (1861), and The Insulted and Injured (1862), the last of which shows the influence of Dickens. During this period he also wrote political articles and started a journal which was presently abandoned. From 1864 to 1871 domestic difficulties threw him into financial and moral collapse. Crime and Punishment (1866) and The Gambler (1867) were written mainly as a source of revenue. His most important works, written in the later part of his life, are Crime and Punishment, The Idiot (1868), The Possessed (1871), and The Brothers Karamazov (1880).

There have been few writers of any age or any country who have given to psychological study a more intense expression than Dostoevski. His years of association with criminal types were the source of his remarkable understanding of the more tragic and morbid aspects of Russian life, and of his great preoccupation with the problem of good and evil in man. All his outstanding theories and motives are present in Crime and Punishment, the ultimate theme being the purification of man through suffering. Dostoevski's vision of Russia as some day peaceably united by mutual love is a curious anticipation of Tolstoi.

The following story is translated by Lizzie B. Gorin in Russian Short Stories, Scott, Foresman, 1919.

•THE THIEF

One morning, just as I was about to leave for my place of employment, Agra-fena (my cook, laundress, and housekeeper all in one person) entered my room, and, to my great astonishment, started a conversation.

She was a quiet, simple-minded woman, who during the whole six years of her stay 10 with me had never spoken more than two or three words daily, and those in reference to my dinner — at least, I had never heard her.

"I have come to you, sir," she suddenly 15 began, "about the renting out of the little spare room."

"What spare room?"

"The one that is near the kitchen, of course; which should it be?"

"Why?"

"Why do people generally take lodgers? Because."

"But who will take it?"

"Who will take it! A lodger, of course!

Who should take it?"

"But there is hardly room in there, 5 mother mine, for a bed; it will be too cramped. How can one live in it?"

"But why live in it! He only wants a place to sleep in; he will live on the window seat."

"What window seat?"

"How is that? What window seat? As if you did not know! The one in the hall. He will sit on it and sew, or do something else. But maybe he will sit on a chair; he has a chair of his own — and a table also, and everything."

"But who is he?"

"A nice, worldly-wise man. I will cook for him and will charge him only three 20 rubles in silver a month for room and board —"

At last, after long endeavor, I found out that some elderly man had talked Agra-fena into taking him into the kitchen as lodger. When Agrafena once got a thing into her head that thing had to be; otherwise I knew I should have no peace. On those occasions when things did go against her wishes, she immediately fell into a sort of brooding, became exceedingly melancholy, and continued in that state for two or three weeks. During this time the food was invariably spoiled, the linen was missing, the floors unscrubbed; in a word, a lot of unpleasant things happened. I had long ago become aware of the fact that this woman of very few words was incapable of forming a decision, or of coming to any conclusion based on her own thoughts; and yet when it happened that by some means there had formed in her weak brain a sort of idea or wish to undertake a thing, to refuse her permission to carry out this idea or wish meant simply to kill her morally for some time. And so, acting in the sole interest of my peace of mind, I immediately agreed to this new proposition of hers.

"Has he at least the necessary papers, a passport, or anything of the kind?"

"How then? Of course he has. A fine man like him — who has seen the world — He promised to pay three rubles a month."

On the very next day the new lodger appeared in my modest bachelor quarters; but I did not feel annoyed in the least — on the contrary, in a way I was glad of it. I live a very solitary, hermitlike life. I have almost no acquaintance and seldom go out. Having led the existence of a moor-cock for ten years, I was naturally used to solitude. But ten, fifteen years or more of the same seclusion in company with a person like Agrafena, and in the same bachelor dwelling, was indeed a joyless prospect. Therefore, the presence of another quiet, unobtrusive man in the house was, under these circumstances, a real blessing.

Agrafena had spoken the truth: the lodger was a man who had seen much in his life. From his passport it appeared that he was a retired soldier, which I noticed even before I looked at the passport.

As soon as I glanced at him in fact.

Astafi Ivanich, my lodger, belonged to the better sort of soldiers, another thing I noticed as soon as I saw him. We liked each other from the first, and our life flowed on peacefully and comfortably. The best thing was that Astafi Ivanich could at times tell a good story, incidents of his own life. In the general tediousness of my humdrum existence, such a narrator was a veritable treasure. Once he told me a story which has made a lasting impression upon me; but first the incident which led to the story.

Once I happened to be left alone in the house, Astafi and Agrafena having gone out, on business. Suddenly I heard some one enter, and I felt that it must be a stranger; I went out into the corridor and found a man of short stature, and, notwithstanding the cold weather, dressed very thinly and without an overcoat.

"What is it you want?"

"The government clerk Alexandrov? Does he live here?"

"There is no one here by that name, little brother; good day."

"The porter told me he lived here," said the visitor, cautiously retreating toward the door.

"Go on, go on, little brother; be off!"

Soon after dinner the next day, when Astafi brought in my coat, which he had repaired for me, I once more heard a strange step in the corridor. I opened the door.

The visitor of the day before, calmly and before my very eyes, took my short coat from the rack, put it under his arm, and ran out.

Agrafena, who had all the time been looking at him in open-mouthed surprise through the kitchen door, was seemingly unable to stir from her place and rescue the coat. But Astafi Ivanich rushed after the rascal, and, out of breath and panting, returned empty handed. The man had vanished as if the earth had swallowed him.

"It is too bad, really, Astafi Ivanich," I said. "It is well that I have my cloak left. Otherwise the scoundrel would have put me out of service altogether."

But Astafi seemed so much affected by what had happened that as I gazed at him I forgot all about the theft. He could not regain his composure, and every once in a while threw down the work which occupied him, and began once more to recount how it had all happened, where he had been standing, while only two steps away my coat had been stolen before his very eyes, and how he could not even catch the thief. Then once more he resumed his work, only to throw it away again, and I saw him go down to the porter, tell him what had happened, and reproach him with not taking sufficient care of the house, that such a theft could be perpetrated in it. When he returned he began to upbraid Agrafena. Then he again resumed his work, muttering to himself for a long time — how this is the way it all was — how he stood here, and I there, and how before our very eyes, no farther than two steps away, the coat was taken off its hanger, and so on. In a word, Astafi Ivanich, though he knew how to do certain things, worried much over trifles.

"We have been fooled, Astafi Ivanich," I said to him that evening, handing him a glass of tea, and hoping from sheer ennui to call forth the story of the lost coat again, which by dint of much repetition had begun to sound extremely comical.

"Yes, we were fooled, sir. It angers me very much, though the loss is not mine, and I think there is nothing so despicably low in this world as a thief. They steal what you buy by working in the sweat of your brow — your time and labor — The loathsome creature! It sickens me to talk of it — pfui! It makes me angry to think of it. How is it, sir, that you do not seem to be at all sorry about it?"

"To be sure, Astafi Ivanich, one would much sooner see his things burn up than see a thief take them. It is exasperating —"

"Yes, it is annoying to have anything stolen from you. But, of course, there are thieves and thieves — I, for instance, met an honest thief through an accident."

"How is that? An honest thief? How can a thief be honest, Astafi Ivanich?"

"You speak truth, sir. A thief cannot be an honest man. There never was such.

I only wanted to say that he was an honest man, it seems to me, even though he stole. I was very sorry for him."

"And how did it happen, Astafi Ivanich?"

"It happened just two years ago. I was serving as house steward at the time, and the baron whom I served expected shortly to leave for his estate, so that I knew I should soon be out of a job, and then God only knew how I should be able to get along; and just then it was that I happened to meet in a tavern a poor forlorn creature, Emelian by name. Once upon a time he had served somewhere or other, but had been driven out of service on account of tippling. Such an unworthy creature as he was! He wore whatever came along. At times I even wondered if he wore a shirt under his shabby cloak; everything he could put his hands on was sold for drink. But he was not a rowdy. Oh, no; he was of a sweet, gentle nature, very kind and tender to every one; he never asked for anything, was, if anything, too conscientious — Well, you could see without asking when the poor fellow was dying for a drink, and of course you treated him to one. Well, we became friendly; that is, he attached himself to me like a little dog — you go this way, he follows — and all this after our very first meeting.

"Of course he remained with me that night; his passport was in order and the man seemed all right. On the second night also. On the third he did not leave the house, sitting on the window seat of the corridor the whole day, and of course he remained over that night too. Well, I thought, just see how he has forced himself upon you. You have to give him to eat and to drink and to shelter him. All a poor man needs is some one to sponge upon him. I soon found out that once before he had attached himself to a man just as he had now attached himself to me; they drank together, but the other one soon died of some deep-seated sorrow. I thought and thought: What shall I do with him? Drive him out — my conscience would not allow it — I felt very sorry for him: he was such a wretched, forlorn creature, terrible! And so dumb he did not ask for anything, only sat quietly and looked you straight in the eyes, just like a faithful little dog. That is how drink can ruin a man. And I thought to myself: Well, suppose I say to him: 'Get out of here, Emelian; you have nothing to do in here, you come to the wrong person; I will soon have nothing to eat myself, so how do you expect me to feed you?' And I tried to imagine what he would do after I'd told him all this. And I could see how he would look at me for a long time after he had heard me, without understanding a word; how at last he would understand what I was driving at, and, rising from the window seat, take his little bundle — I see it before me now — a red-checked little bundle full of holes, in which he kept God knows what, and which he carted along with him wherever he went; how he would brush and fix up his worn cloak a little, so that it would look a bit more decent and not show so much the holes and patches — he was a man of very fine feelings! How he would have opened the door afterward and would have gone forth with tears in his eyes!

"Well, should a man be allowed to perish altogether? I all at once felt heartily sorry for him; but at the same time I thought: And what about me, am I any better off? And I said to myself: Well, Emelian, you will not feast overlong at my expense; soon I shall have to move from here myself, and then you will not find me again. Well, sir, my baron soon left for his estate with all his household, telling me before he went that he was very well satisfied with my services, and would gladly employ me again on his return to the capital. A fine man my baron was, but he died the same year.

"Well, after I had escorted my baron and his family a little way, I took my things and the little money I had saved up, and went to live with an old woman I knew, who rented out a corner of the room she occupied by herself. She used to be a nurse in some well-to-do family, and now, in her old age, they had pensioned her off. Well, I thought to myself, now it is good-by to you, Emelian, dear man, you will not find me now! And what do you think, sir? When I returned in the evening — I had paid a visit to an acquaintance of mine — whom should I see but Emelian sitting quietly upon my trunk with his red-checked bundle by his side. He was wrapped up in his poor little cloak, and was awaiting my home-coming. He must have been quite lonesome, because he had borrowed a prayer-book of the old woman and held it upside down. He had found me after all! My hands fell helplessly at my sides. Well, I thought, there is nothing to be done, why did I not drive him away first off? And I only asked him: 'Have you taken your passport along, Emelian?' Then I sat down, sir, and began to turn the matter over in my mind: Well, could he, a roving man, be much in my way? And after I had considered it well, I decided that he would not, and, besides, he would be of very little expense to me. Of course, he would have to be fed, but what does that amount to? Some bread in the morning and, to make it a little more appetizing, a little onion or so. For the midday meal again some bread and onion, and for the evening again onion and bread, and some kvas,¹ and, if some cabbage soup should happen to come our way, then we could both fill up to the throat. I ate little, and Emelian, who was a drinking man, surely ate almost nothing: all he wanted was vodka.² He would be the undoing of me with his drinking; but at the same time I felt a curious feeling creep over me. It seemed as if life would be a burden to me if Emelian went away. And so I decided then and there to be his father-benefactor. I would put him on his legs, I thought, save him from perishing, and gradually wean him from drink. Just you wait, I thought. Stay with me, Emelian, but stand pat now. Obey the word of command!

"Well, I thought to myself, I will begin by teaching him some work, but not at once; let him first enjoy himself a bit, and I will in the meanwhile look around and discover what he finds easiest, and would be capable of doing, because you must know, sir, a man must have a calling and a capacity for a certain work to be able to do it properly. And I began stealthily to observe him. And a hard subject he was, that Emelian! At first I tried to get at him with a kind word. Thus and thus I would speak to him: 'Emelian, you had better take more care of yourself and try to fix yourself up a little.

"Give up drinking. Just look at yourself, man; you are all ragged, your cloak 10 looks more like a sieve than anything else. It is not nice. It is about time for you to come to your senses and know when you have had enough.'

"He listened to me, my Emelian did, 15 with lowered head; he had already reached that state, poor fellow, when the drink affected his tongue and he could not utter a sensible word. You talk to him about cucumbers, and he answers beans. He 20 listened, listened to me for a long time, and then he would sigh deeply.

"What are you sighing for, Emelian?' I ask him.

"Oh, it is nothing, Astafi Ivanich, do 25 not worry. Only what I saw today, Astafi Ivanich — two women fighting about a basket of huckleberries that one of them had upset by accident.'

"Well, what of that?'

"And the woman whose berries were scattered snatched a like basket of huckleberries from the other woman's hand, and not only threw them on the ground, but stamped all over them.'

"Well, but what of that, Emelian?'

"Ech!' I think to myself, 'Emelian! You have lost your poor wits through the cursed drink!'

"And again,' Emelian says, 'a baron 40 lost a bill on the Gorokhova Street — or was it on the Sadova? A mujik¹ saw him drop it, and says, "My luck," but here another one interfered and says, "No, it is my luck! I saw it first. . . ."' 45

"Well, Emelian?'

"And the two mujiks started a fight, Astafi Ivanich, and the upshot was that a policeman came, picked up the money, handed it back to the baron, and threat- 50 ened to put the mujiks under lock for raising a disturbance.'

"But what of that? What is there wonderful or edifying in that, Emelian?'

"Well, nothing, but the people laughed, Astafi Ivanich.'

5 "'Ech, Emelian! What have the people to do with it?' I said. 'You have sold your immortal soul for a copper. But do you know what I will tell you, Emelian?'

"What, Astafi Ivanich?'

"You'd better take up some work, really you should. I am telling you for the hundredth time that you should have pity on yourself!'

"But what shall I do, Astafi Ivanich? I do not know where to begin and no one would employ me, Astafi Ivanich.'

"That is why they drove you out of service, Emelian; it is all on account of 20 drink!'

"And today,' said Emelian, 'they called Vlass the bar-keeper into the office.'

"What did they call him for, Emelian?' I asked.

"I don't know why, Astafi Ivanich. I suppose it was needed, so they called him.'

"Ech,' I thought to myself, 'no good will come of either of us Emelian! It is 30 for our sins that God is punishing us!'

"Well, what could a body do with such a man, sir!

"But he was sly, the fellow was, I tell you! He listened to me listened, and at 35 last it seems it began to tire him, and as quick as he would notice that I was growing angry he would take his cloak and slip out — and that was the last to be seen of him! He would not show up the whole day, and only in the evening would he return, as drunk as a lord. Who treated him to drinks, or where he got the money for it, God only knows; not from me, surely! . . .

"Well,' I say to him, 'Emelian, you will have to give up drink, do you hear? you will have to give it up! The next time you return tipsy, you will have to sleep on the stairs. I'll not let you in!'

"After this Emelian kept to the house for two days; on the third he once more sneaked out. I wait and wait for him;

he does not come! I must confess that I was kind of frightened; besides, I felt terribly sorry for him. What had I done to the poor devil! I thought. I must have frightened him off. Where could he have gone to now, the wretched creature? Great God, he may perish yet! The night passed and he did not return. In the morning I went out into the hall, and he was lying there with his head on the lower step, almost stiff with cold.

"What is the matter with you, Emelian? The Lord save you! Why are you here?"

"But you know, Astafi Ivanich," he replied, 'you were angry with me the other day; I aggravated you, and you promised to make me sleep in the hall, and I — so I — did not dare — to come in — and lay down here.'

"It would be better for you, Emelian," I said, filled with anger and pity, 'to find a better employment than needlessly watching the stairs!'

"But what other employment, Astafi Ivanich?"

"Well, wretched creature that you are,' here anger had flamed up in me, 'if you would try to learn the tailoring art. Just look at the cloak you are wearing! Not only is it full of holes, but you are sweeping the stairs with it! You should at least take a needle and mend it a little, so it would look more decent. Ech, a wretched tippler you are, and nothing more!'

"Well, sir! What do you think! He did take the needle — I had told him only for fun, and there he got scared and actually took the needle. He threw off his cloak and began to put the thread through; well, it was easy to see what would come of it; his eyes began to fill and redden, his hands trembled! He pushed and pushed the thread — could not get it through: he wetted it, rolled it between his fingers, smoothed it out, but it would not go! He flung it from him and looked at me.

"Well, Emelian! I said, 'you served me right! If people had seen it I would have died with shame! I only told you this for fun, and because I was angry with you. Never mind sewing; may the Lord keep you from sin! You need not do anything, only keep out of mischief, and do not sleep on the stairs and put me to shame thereby!'

"But what shall I do, Astafi Ivanich? I know myself that I am always tipsy and unfit for anything! I only make you, my be—benefactor, angry for nothing.'

"And suddenly his bluish lips began to tremble, and a tear rolled down his unshaven, pale cheek, then another and another one, and he broke into a very flood of tears, my Emelian. Father in Heaven! I felt as if some one had cut me over the heart with a knife.

"Ech, you sensitive man; why, I never thought! And who could have thought such a thing. No, I'd better give you up altogether, Emelian; do as you please.'

"Well, sir, what else is there to tell! But the whole thing is so insignificant and unimportant, it is really not worth while wasting words about it; for instance, you, sir, would not give two broken groschen¹ for it; but I, I would give much, if I had much, that this thing had never happened! I owned, sir, a pair of breeches, blue, in checks, a first-class article, the devil take them — a rich landowner who came here on business ordered them from me, but refused afterward to take them, saying that they were too tight, and left them with me.

"Well, I thought, the cloth is of first-rate quality! I can get five rubles for them in the old-clothes market-place, and, if not, I can cut a fine pair of pantaloons out of them for some St. Petersburg gent, and have a piece left over for a vest for myself. Everything counts with a poor man! And Emelian was at that time in sore straits. I saw that he had given up drinking, first one day, then a second, and a third, and looked so downhearted and sad.

"Well, I thought, it is either that the poor fellow lacks the necessary coin, or maybe he has entered on the right path, and has at last listened to good sense.

"Well, to make a long story short, an important holiday came just at that time, and I went to vespers. When I came back I saw Emelian sitting on the window seat, as drunk as a lord. Eh! I thought, so that is what you are about! And I go to my trunk to get out something I needed. I look! The breeches are not there. I rummage about in this place and that place: gone! Well, after I had searched all over and saw that they were missing for fair, I felt as if something had gone through me! I went after the old woman — as to Emelian, though there was evidence against him in his being drunk, I somehow never thought of him!

¹ A groschen is worth about two cents.

"No," says my old woman; 'the good Lord keep you, gentleman, what do I need breeches for? can I wear them? I myself missed a skirt the other day. I know nothing at all about it.'

"Well," I asked, 'has any one called here?'

"No one called," she said. 'I was in all the time; your friend here went out for a short while and then came back; here he sits! Why don't you ask him?'

"Did you happen, for some reason or other, Emelian, to take the breeches out of the trunk? The ones, you remember, which were made for the landowner?"

"No," he says, 'I have not taken them, Astafi Ivanich.'

"What could have happened to them?" Again I began to search, but nothing came of it! And Emelian sat and swayed to and fro on the window seat.

"I was on my knees before the open trunk, just in front of him. Suddenly I threw a sidelong glance at him. Ech, I thought, and felt very hot round the heart, and my face grew very red. Suddenly my eyes encountered Emelian's.

"No," he says, 'Astafi Ivanich. You perhaps think that I — you know what I mean — but I have not taken them.'

"But where have they gone, Emelian?"

"No," he says, 'Astafi Ivanich, I have not seen them at all.'

"Well, then, you think they simply went and got lost by themselves, Emelian?"

"Maybe they did, Astafi Ivanich."

"After this I would not waste another word on him. I rose from my knees, locked the trunk, and after I had lighted the lamp I sat down to work. I was remaking a vest for a government clerk, who lived on the floor below. But I was terribly rattled, just the same. It would have been much easier to bear, I thought, if all my wardrobe had burned to ashes. Emelian, it seems, felt that I was deeply angered. It is always so, sir, when a man is guilty; he always feels beforehand when trouble approaches, as a bird feels the coming storm.

"And do you know, Astafi Ivanich," he suddenly began, 'the leach married the coachman's widow today.'

"I just looked at him; but, it seems, looked at him so angrily that he understood: I saw him rise from his seat, approach the bed, and begin to rummage in it, continually repeating: 'Where could they have gone, vanished, as if the devil had taken them!'

"I waited to see what was coming; I saw that my Emelian had crawled under the bed. I could contain myself no longer.

"Look here," I said. 'What makes you crawl under the bed?'

"I am looking for the breeches, Astafi Ivanich," said Emelian from under the bed. 'Maybe they got here somehow or other.'

"But what makes you, sir (in my anger I addressed him as if he was somebody), what makes you trouble yourself on account of such a plain man as I am; dirtying your knees for nothing!"

"But, Astafi Ivanich — I did not mean anything — I only thought maybe if we look for them we may find them yet."

"Mm! Just listen to me a moment, Emelian!"

"What, Astafi Ivanich?"

"Have you not simply stolen them from me like a rascally thief, serving me so for my bread and salt?" I said to him, beside myself with wrath at the sight of him crawling under the bed for something he knew was not there.

"No, Astafi Ivanich." For a long time he remained lying flat under the bed. Suddenly he crawled out and stood before me — I seem to see him even now — as terrible a sight as sin itself.

"No," he says to me in a trembling voice, shivering through all his body and pointing to his breast with his finger, so that all at once I became scared and could not move from my seat on the window. 'I have not taken your breeches, Astafi Ivanich.'

"Well," I answered, 'Emelian, forgive me if in my foolishness I have accused you wrongfully. As to the breeches, let them go hang; we will get along without them. We have our hands, thank God, we will not have to steal, and now, too, we will not have to sponge on another poor man; we will earn our living.'

"Emelian listened to me and remained standing before me for some time, then he sat down and sat motionless the whole evening; when I lay down to sleep, he was still sitting in the same place.

"In the morning, when I awoke, I found him sleeping on the bare floor, wrapped up in his cloak; he felt his humiliation so strongly that he had no heart to go and lie down on the bed.

"Well, sir, from that day on I conceived a terrible dislike for the man; that is, rather, I hated him the first few days, feeling as if, for instance, my own son had robbed me and given me deadly offence. Ech, I thought, Emelian, Emelian! And Emelian, my dear sir, had gone on a two weeks' spree. Drunk to bestiality from morning till night. And during the whole two weeks he had not uttered a word. I suppose he was consumed the whole time by a deep-seated grief, or else he was trying in this way to make an end to himself. At last he gave up drinking. I suppose he had no longer the wherewithal to buy vodka — had drunk up every copeck — and he once more took up his old place on the window seat. I remember that he sat there for three whole days without a word; suddenly I see him weep; sits there and cries, but what crying! The tears come from his eyes in showers, drip, drip, as if he did not know that he was shedding them. It is very painful, sir, to see a grown man weep, all the more when the man is of advanced years, like Emelian, and cries from grief and a sorrowful heart.

"What ails you, Emelian?" I say to him.

"He starts and shivers. This was the first time I had spoken to him since that eventful day.

"It is nothing — Astafi Ivanich.'

"God keep you, Emelian; never you mind it all. Let bygones be bygones. Don't take it to heart so, man!" I felt very sorry for him.

"It is only that — that I would like to do something — some kind of work, Astafi Ivanich.'

"But what kind of work, Emelian?"

"Oh, any kind. Maybe I will go into some kind of service, as before. I have already been at my former employer's, asking. It will not do for me, Astafi Ivanich, to use you any longer. I, Astafi Ivanich, will perhaps obtain some employment, and then I will pay you for everything, food and all.'

"Don't, Emelian, don't. Well, let us say you committed a sin; well, it is all over! The devil take it all! Let us live as before — as if nothing had happened!"

"You, Astafi Ivanich, you are probably hinting about that. But I have not taken your breeches.'

"Well, just as you please, Emelian!"

"No, Astafi Ivanich, evidently I can not live with you longer. You will excuse me, Astafi Ivanich.'

"But God be with you, Emelian," I said to him; 'who is it that is offending you or driving you out of the house? Is it I who am doing it?'

"No, but it is unseemly for me to misuse your hospitality any longer, Astafi Ivanich; 'twill be better to go.'

"I saw that he had in truth risen from his place and donned his ragged cloak — he felt offended, the man did, and had got it into his head to leave, and — basta.

"But where are you going, Emelian? Listen to sense: what are you? Where will you go?"

"No, it is best so, Astafi Ivanich, do not try to keep me back," and he once more broke into tears; 'let me be, Astafi Ivanich, you are no longer what you used to be.'

"Why am I not? I am just the same.

But you will perish when left alone — like a foolish little child, my Emelian.'

"No, Astafi Ivanich. Lately, before you leave the house, you have taken to locking your trunk, and I, Astafi Ivanich, see it and weep — No, it is better you should let me go, Astafi Ivanich, and forgive me if I have offended you in any way during the time we have lived together.'

"Well, sir! And so he did go away. I 10 waited a day and thought: Oh, he will be back toward evening. But a day passes, then another, and he does not return. On the third — he does not return. I grew frightened, and a terrible sadness gripped 15 at my heart. I stopped eating and drinking, and lay whole nights without closing my eyes. The man had wholly disarmed me! On the fourth day I went to look for him; I looked in all the taverns and pot-houses in the vicinity, and asked if any one had seen him. No. Emelian had wholly disappeared! Maybe he has done away with his miserable existence, I thought. Maybe, when in his cups, he has 25 perished like a dog, somewhere under a fence. I came home half dead with fatigue and despair, and decided to go out the next day again to look for him, cursing myself bitterly for letting the foolish, helpless man 30 go away from me. But at dawn of the fifth day (it was a holiday) I heard the door creak. And whom should I see but Emelian! But in what a state! His face was bluish and his hair was full of 35 mud, as if he had slept in the street; and he had grown thin, the poor fellow had, as thin as a rail. He took off his poor cloak, sat down on my trunk, and began to look at me. Well, sir, I was overjoyed, but at the same time felt a greater sadness than ever pulling at my heart-strings. This is how it was, sir: I felt that if a thing like that had happened to me, that is — I would sooner have perished like a dog, but would not have returned. And Emelian did. Well, naturally, it is hard to see a man in such a state. I began to coddle and to comfort him in every way.

"Well,' I said, 'Emelian, I am very glad 50 you have returned; if you had not come so soon, you would not have found me in,

as I intended to go hunting for you. Have you had anything to eat?'

"I have eaten, Astafi Ivanich.'

"I doubt it. Well, here is some cabbage 5 soup — left over from yesterday; a nice soup with some meat in it — not the meager¹ kind. And here you have some bread and a little onion. Go ahead and eat; it will do you good.'

"I served it to him; and immediately realized that he must have been starving for the last three days — such an appetite as he showed! So it was hunger that had driven him back to me. Looking at the 10 poor fellow, I was deeply touched, and decided to run into the near-by dram-shop. I will get him some vodka, I thought, to liven him up a bit and make peace with him. It is enough. I have nothing against 15 the poor devil any longer. And so I brought the vodka and said to him: 'Here, Emelian, let us drink to each other's health in honor of the holiday. Come, take a drink. It will do you good.'

"He stretched out his hand, greedily stretched it out, you know, and stopped; then, after a while, he lifted the glass, carried it to his mouth, spilling the liquor on his sleeve; at last he did carry it to his 20 mouth, but immediately put it back on the table.

"Well, why don't you drink, Emelian?'

"But no, I'll not, Astafi Ivanich.'

"You'll not drink it!'

"But I, Astafi Ivanich, I think — I'll not drink any more, Astafi Ivanich.'

"Is it for good you have decided to give it up, Emelian, or only for today?'

"He did not reply, and after a while I 40 saw him lean his head on his hand, and I asked him: 'Are you not feeling well, Emelian?'

"Yes, pretty well, Astafi Ivanich.'

"I made him go to bed, and saw that he 45 was truly in a bad way. His head was burning hot and he was shivering with ague. I sat by him the whole day; toward evening he grew worse. I prepared a meal for him of kvas, butter, and some onion, and threw in it a few bits of bread, and 50 said to him: 'Go ahead and take some food; maybe you will feel better!'

¹ That is, without meat or vegetables.

"But he only shook his head: 'No, Astafi Ivanich, I shall not have any dinner today.'

"I had some tea prepared for him, giving a lot of trouble to the poor old woman from whom I rented a part of the room — but he would not take even a little tea.

"Well, I thought to myself, it is a bad case. On the third morning I went to see the doctor, an acquaintance of mine, Dr. Kostopravov, who had treated me when I still lived in my last place. The doctor came, examined the poor fellow, and only said: 'There was no need of sending for me, he is already too far gone, but you can give him some powders which I will prescribe.'

"Well, I didn't give him the powders at all, as I understood that the doctor was only doing it for form's sake; and in the meanwhile came the fifth day.

"He lay dying before me, sir. I sat on the window seat with some work I had on hand lying on my lap. The old woman was raking the stove. We were all silent, and my heart was breaking over this poor, shiftless creature, as if he were my own son whom I was losing. I knew that Emelian was gazing at me all the time; I noticed from the earliest morning that he longed to tell me something, but seemingly dared not. At last I looked at him, and saw that he did not take his eyes from me, but that whenever his eyes met mine, he immediately lowered his own.

"Astafi Ivanich!"

"What, Emelian?"

"What if my cloak should be carried over to the old-clothes market, would they give much for it, Astafi Ivanich?"

"Well,' I said, 'I do not know for certain, but three rubles they would probably give for it, Emelian.' I said it only to comfort the simple-minded creature; in reality they would have laughed in my face for even thinking to sell such a miserable, ragged thing.

"And I thought that they might give a little more, Astafi Ivanich. It is made of cloth, so how is it that they would not wish to pay more than three rubles for it?"

"Well, Emelian, if you wish to sell it, then of course you may ask more for it at first."

"Emelian was silent for a moment, then he once more called to me.

"Astafi Ivanich!"

"What is it, Emelian?"

"You will sell the cloak after I am no more; no need of burying me in it, I can well get along without it; it is worth something, and may come handy to you."

"Here I felt such a painful gripping at my heart as I can not even express, sir. I saw that the sadness of approaching death had already come upon the man. Again we were silent for some time. About an hour passed in this way. I looked at him again and saw that he was still gazing at me, and when his eyes met mine he immediately lowered his.

"Would you like a drink of cold water?" I asked him.

"Give me some, and may God repay you, Astafi Ivanich."

"Would you like anything else, Emelian?"

"No, Astafi Ivanich, I do not want anything, but I —"

"What?"

"You know that —"

"What is it you want, Emelian?"

"The breeches — You know — It was I who took them — Astafi Ivanich —"

"Well,' I said, 'the great God will forgive you, Emelian, poor, unfortunate fellow that you are! Depart in peace.'

"And I had to turn away my head for a moment because grief for the poor devil took my breath away and the tears came in torrents from my eyes.

"Astafi Ivanich! —"

"I looked at him, saw that he wished to tell me something more, tried to raise himself, and was moving his lips — He reddened and looked at me — Suddenly I saw that he began to grow paler and paler; in a moment he fell with his head thrown back, breathed once, and gave his soul into God's keeping."

CHEKOV

(1860-1904)

Anton Chekov was born in Taganrog in South Russia, the son of a freed serf. His father was able to give him an elementary school education, and even to send him to the university at Moscow for a medical education. He never actually practiced medicine, however, although he served as a volunteer during a plague of cholera. He began his literary career by writing short stories for newspapers. These early stories are carefree and bright, with just an occasional note of melancholy. As time went on, this note became a volume of deep sadness. Besides his short stories Chekov wrote Uncle Vanya, The Cherry Orchard, The Three Sisters, and other dramas, of which the theme is generally the failure of people to understand one another. Unhappiness and even tragedy result. But it was in the short story that Chekov did his most perfect work. Having himself suffered from the dullness of life, he applied to his stories the white heat of concentration, boiling them down until only what was essential was left. His most successful theme was the failure of ordinary people in their ambitions. His field is rather narrow, his characters often similar; within these limits, however, he achieves that perfection that has made him one of the great models of prose style and the foremost Russian writer of short stories.

The following translation is that of S. Koteliensky and J. M. Murry in The Bet and Other Stories, Dublin and London, Maunsell and Company, 1915.

THE BET

I

It was a dark autumn night. The old banker was pacing from corner to corner of his study, recalling to his mind the party he gave in the autumn fifteen years ago. There were many clever people at the party and much interesting conversation. They talked among other things of capital punishment. The guests, among them not a few scholars and journalists, for the most part disapproved of capital punishment. They found it obsolete as a means of punishment, unfitted to a Christian state and immoral. Some of them thought that capital punishment should be replaced universally by life-imprisonment.

"I don't agree with you," said the host. "I myself have experienced neither capital punishment nor life-imprisonment, but if one may judge a priori, then, in my opinion capital punishment is more moral and more humane than imprisonment. Execution kills instantly, life-imprisonment kills by degrees. Who is the more humane executioner, one who kills you in a few seconds or one who draws the life out of you incessantly, for years?"

"They're both equally immoral," remarked one of the guests, "because their purpose is the same, to take away life. The state is not God. It has no right to take away that which it cannot give back, if it should so desire."

Among the company was a lawyer, a young man of about twenty-five. On being asked his opinion, he said:

"Capital punishment and life-imprisonment are equally immoral; but if I were offered the choice between them, I would certainly choose the second. It's better to live somehow than not to live at all."

There ensued a lively discussion. The banker who was then younger and more nervous suddenly lost his temper, banged his fist on the table, and turning to the young lawyer, cried out:

"It's a lie. I bet you two millions you wouldn't stick in a cell even for five years."

"If that's serious," replied the lawyer, "then I bet I'll stay not five but fifteen."

"Fifteen! Done!" cried the banker. "Gentlemen, I stake two millions."

"Agreed. You stake two millions, I my freedom," said the lawyer.

So this wild, ridiculous bet came to pass. The banker, who at that time had too many millions to count, spoiled and capricious, was beside himself with rapture. During supper he said to the lawyer jokingly:

"Come to your senses, young man, before it's too late. Two millions are nothing to me, but you stand to lose three or four of the best years of your life. I say three or four, because you'll never stick it out any longer. Don't forget either, you unhappy man, that voluntary is much heavier than enforced imprisonment. The idea that you have the right to free yourself at any moment will poison the whole of your life in the cell. I pity you."

And now the banker pacing from corner to corner recalled all this and asked himself:

"Why did I make this bet? What's the good? The lawyer loses fifteen years of his life and I throw away two millions. Will it convince people that capital punishment is worse or better than imprisonment for life? No, no! all stuff and rubbish. On my part, it was the caprice of a well-fed man; on the lawyer's, pure greed of gold."

He recollected further what happened after the evening party. It was decided that the lawyer must undergo his imprisonment under the strictest observation, in a garden-wing of the banker's house. It was agreed that during the period he would be deprived of the right to cross the threshold, to see living people, to hear human voices, and to receive letters and newspapers. He was permitted to have a musical instrument, to read books, to write letters, to drink wine and smoke tobacco. By the agreement he could communicate, but only in silence, with the outside world through a little window specially constructed for this purpose. Everything necessary, books, music, wine, he could receive in any quantity by sending a note through the window. The agreement provided for all the minutest details, which made the confinement strictly solitary, and it obliged the lawyer to remain exactly fifteen years from twelve o'clock of November 14th, 1870, to twelve o'clock of November 14th, 1885. The least attempt on his part to violate the conditions, to escape if only for two minutes before the time, freed the banker from the obligation to pay him the two millions.

During the first year of imprisonment, the lawyer, as far as it was possible to judge from his short notes, suffered terribly from loneliness and boredom. From his wing day and night came the sound of the piano. He rejected wine and tobacco. "Wine," he wrote, "excites desires, nothing is more boring than to drink good wine alone," and tobacco spoiled the air in his room. During the first year the lawyer was sent books of a light character; novels with a complicated love interest, stores of crime and fantasy, comedies, and so on.

In the second year the piano was heard no longer and the lawyer asked only for classics. In the fifth year music was heard again, and the prisoner asked for wine. Those who watched him said that during the whole of that year he was only eating, drinking, and lying on his bed. He yawned often and talked angrily to himself. Books he did not read. Sometimes at nights he would sit down to write. He would write for a long time and tear it all up in the morning. More than once he was heard to weep.

In the second half of the sixth year, the prisoner began zealously to study languages, philosophy, and history. He fell on these subjects so hungrily that the banker hardly had time to get books enough for him. In the space of four years about six hundred volumes were bought at his request. It was while that passion lasted that the banker received the following letter from the prisoner: "My dear gaoler, I am writing these lines in six languages. Show them to experts. Let them read them. If they do not find one single mistake, I beg you to give orders to have a gun fired off in the garden. By the noise I shall know that my efforts have not been in vain. The geniuses of all ages and countries speak in different languages; but in them all burns the same flame. Oh, if you knew my heavenly happiness now that I can understand them!" The prisoner's desire was fulfilled. Two shots were fired in the garden by the banker's order.

Later on, after the tenth year, the lawyer sat immovable before his table and read only the New Testament. The banker found it strange that a man who in four years had mastered six hundred erudite volumes should have spent nearly a year in reading one book, easy to understand and by no means thick. The New Testament was then replaced by the history of religions and theology.

During the last two years of his confinement the prisoner read an extraordinary amount, quite haphazard. Now he would apply himself to the natural sciences, then would read Byron or Shakespeare. Notes used to come from him in which he asked to be sent at the same time a book on chemistry, a text-book of medicine, a novel, and some treatise on philosophy or theology. He read as though he were swimming in the sea among the broken pieces of wreckage, and in his desire to save his life was eagerly grasping one piece after another.

II

The banker recalled all this, and thought:

"Tomorrow at twelve o'clock he receives his freedom. Under the agreement, I shall have to pay him two millions. If I pay, it's all over with me. I am ruined for ever. . . ."

Fifteen years before he had too many millions to count, but now he was afraid to ask himself which he had more of, money or debts. Gambling on the Stock-Exchange, risky speculation, and the recklessness of which he could not rid himself even in old age, had gradually brought his business to decay; and the fearless, self-confident, proud man of business had become an ordinary banker, trembling at every rise and fall in the market.

"That cursed bet," murmured the old man, clutching his head in despair. . . . "Why didn't the man die? He's only forty years old. He will take away my last farthing, marry, enjoy life, gamble on the Exchange, and I will look on like an envious beggar and hear the same words from him every day: 'I'm obliged to you for the happiness of my life. Let me help you.' No, it's too much! The only escape from bankruptcy and disgrace — is that the man should die."

The clock had just struck three. The banker was listening. In the house everyone was asleep, and one could hear only the frozen trees whining outside the windows. Trying to make no sound, he took out of his safe the key of the door which had not been opened for fifteen years, put on his overcoat, and went out of the house. The garden was dark and cold. It was raining. A keen damp wind hovered howling over all the garden and gave the trees no rest. Though he strained his eyes, the banker could see neither the ground, nor the white statues, nor the garden-wing, nor the trees. Approaching the place where the garden-wing stood, he called the watchman twice. There was no answer. Evidently the watchman had taken shelter from the bad weather and was now asleep somewhere in the kitchen or the greenhouse.

"If I have the courage to fulfil my intention," thought the old man, "the suspicion will fall on the watchman first of all."

In the darkness he groped for the stairs and the door and entered the hall of the garden-wing, then poked his way into a narrow passage and struck a match. Not a soul was there. Someone's bed, with no bedclothes on it, stood there, and an iron stove was dark in the corner. The seals on the door that led into the prisoner's room were unbroken.

When the match went out, the old man, trembling from agitation, peeped into the little window.

In the prisoner's room a candle was burning dim. The prisoner himself sat by the table. Only his back, the hair on his head and his hands were visible. On the table, the two chairs, and the carpet by the table open books were strewn.

Five minutes passed and the prisoner never once stirred. Fifteen years' confinement had taught him to sit motionless. The banker tapped on the window with his finger, but the prisoner gave no movement in reply. Then the banker cautiously tore the seals from the door and put the key into the lock. The rusty lock gave a hoarse groan and the door creaked. The banker expected instantly to hear a cry of surprise and the sound of steps. Three minutes passed and it was as quiet behind the door as it had been before. He made up his mind to enter.

Before the table sat a man, unlike an ordinary human being. It was a skeleton, with tight-drawn skin, with a woman's long curly hair, and a shaggy beard. The color of his face was yellow, of an earthy shade; the cheeks were sunken, the back long and narrow, and the hand upon which he leaned his hairy head was so lean and skinny that it was painful to look upon. His hair was already silvering with gray, and no one who glanced at the senile emaciation of the face would have believed that he was only forty years old. On the table, before his bended head, lay a sheet of paper on which something was written in a tiny hand.

"Poor devil," thought the banker, "he's asleep and probably seeing millions in his dreams. I have only to take and throw this half-dead thing on the bed, smother him a moment with the pillow, and the most careful examination will find no trace of unnatural death. But, first, let us read what he has written here."

The banker took the sheet from the table and read:

"Tomorrow at twelve o'clock midnight, I shall obtain my freedom and the right to mix with people. But before I leave this room and see the sun I think it necessary to say a few words to you. On my own clear conscience and before God who sees me I declare to you that I despise freedom, life, health, and all that your books call the blessings of the world.

"For fifteen years I have diligently studied earthly life. True, I saw neither the earth nor the people, but in your books I drank fragrant wine, sang songs, hunted deer and wild boar in the forests, loved women. . . . And beautiful women, like clouds ethereal, created by the magic of your poets' genius, visited me by night and whispered me wonderful tales, which made my head drunken. In your books I climbed the summits of Elbruz and Mont Blanc and saw from thence how the sun rose in the morning, and in the evening overflowed the sky, the ocean, and the mountain ridges with a purple gold. I saw from thence how above me lightnings glimmered cleaving the clouds; I saw green forests, fields, rivers, lakes, cities; I heard syrens singing, and the playing of the pipes of Pan; I touched the wings of beautiful devils who came flying to me to speak of God. . . . In your books I cast myself into bottomless abysses, worked miracles, burned cities to the ground, preached new religions, conquered whole countries.

"Your books gave me wisdom. All that unwearying human thought created in the centuries is compressed to a little lump in my skull. I know that I am more clever than you all.

"And I despise your books, despise all worldly blessings and wisdom. Everything is void, frail, visionary and delusive like a mirage. Though you be proud and wise and beautiful, yet will death wipe you from the face of the earth like the mice underground; and your posterity, your history, and the immortality of your men of genius will be as frozen slag, burnt down together with the terrestrial globe.

"You are mad, and gone the wrong way. You take lie for truth and ugliness for beauty. You would marvel if by certain conditions there should suddenly grow on apple and orange trees, instead of fruit, frogs and lizards, and if roses should begin to breathe the odour of a sweating horse. So do I marvel at you, who have bartered heaven for earth. I do not want to understand you.

"That I may show you in deed my contempt for that by which you live, I waive the two millions of which I once dreamed as of paradise, and which I now despise. That I may deprive myself of my right to them, I shall come out from here five minutes before the stipulated term, and thus shall violate the agreement."

When he had read, the banker put the sheet on the table, kissed the head of the strange man, and began to weep. He went out of the wing. Never at any time, not even after his terrible losses on the Exchange, had he felt such contempt for himself as now. Coming home, he lay down on his bed, but agitation and tears kept him long from sleep. . . .

The next morning the poor watchman came running to him and told him that they had seen the man who lived in the wing climbing through the window into the garden. He had gone to the gate and disappeared. Together with his servants the banker went instantly to the wing and established the escape of his prisoner. To avoid unnecessary rumors he took the paper with the renunciation from the table and, on his return, locked it in his safe.

ITALIAN

VERGA

(1840-1922)

Giovanni Verga was born in Catania, Sicily. Going early in life to Italy, he lived in Florence and in Milan. At first he was much occupied with novels of society and of city life. Later he returned to Sicily and during his declining years devoted himself to the realistic portrayal of Sicilian life. His reputation in Italian literature is almost equal to that of D'Annunzio and he is regarded by many as the foremost European writer of the novel of local color. He is perhaps most widely known as author of the libretto of the opera Cavalleria Rusticana.

Liberty (1883) is translated by D. H. Lawrence in Little Novels of Sicily by Giovanni Verga, New York, Thomas Seltzer, 1925.

LIBERTY¹

They unfurled a red-white-and-green handkerchief from the church-tower, they rang the bells in a frenzy, and they began to shout in the village square, "Hurray for liberty!"

Like the sea in storm the crowd foamed and swayed in front of the club of the gentry, and outside the Town Hall, and on the steps of the church — a sea of white stocking-caps, axes and sickles glittering. Then they burst into the little street.

"Your turn first, baron! You who have had folks cudgelled by your estate-keepers!"

At the head of all the people a witch, with her old hair sticking up, armed with nothing but her nails. "Your turn, priest of the devil! for you've sucked the soul out of us!" "Your turn now, rich glutton, you're not going to escape no matter how fat you are with the blood of the poor!" "Your turn, police-sergeant! you who never took the law on anybody except poor folks who'd got nothing!" "Your turn, estate-keepers, who sold your own flesh and your neighbour's flesh for twenty cents a day!"

And blood smoked and went drunk. Sickles, hands, rags, stones, everything red with blood! The gentry! The hat-folks! Kill them all! Kill them all! Down with the hat-folks!

Don Antonio was slipping home by the short cuts. The first blow made him fall with his bleeding face against the causeway. "Why? Why are you killing me?" "You as well, the devil can have you!" A lame brat picked up the filthy hat and spat inside it. "Down with the hats! Hurray for Liberty! You, take that!" Then for his Reverence who used to preach hell for anybody who stole a bit of bread. He was just coming back from saying mass, with the consecrated Host inside his fat belly. "Don't kill me, I am in mortal sin!" Neighbour Lucia being the mortal sin; Neighbour Lucia whose father had sold her to the priest when she was fourteen years old, at the time of the famine winter, and she had ever since been filling the streets and the Refuge with hungry brats. If such dog's-meat had been worth anything that day, they'd have been able to stuff themselves with it, as they hacked it to pieces with their hatchets in the doorways of the houses and on the cobble-stones of the street. Like the wolf when he falls famished on a flock of sheep, and never thinks of filling his belly, but just slaughters right and left with rage — Milady's son, who had run to see what was happening — the apothecary, while he was locking up shop as fast as he could — Don Paolo, who was coming home from the vineyard riding on his ass, with his lean saddle-bags behind him. And he was wearing into the bargain a little old cap that his daughter had embroidered for him long ago, before the vines had taken the disease. His wife saw him fall in front of the street-door, as she and her five children were waiting for him and for the handful of stuff for the soup which he had got in his saddle-bags. "Paolo! Paolo!" The first fellow caught him in the shoulder with a hatchet cut. Another was on him with a sickle, and disembowelled him as he was reaching with his bleeding arm for the knocker.

But the worst was when the lawyer's son, a lad of eleven, blond as gold, fell no one knows how, overthrown in the crowd. His father had raised himself two or three times before he dragged himself aside into the filth, to die, calling to him: "Neddu! Neddu!" Neddu fled in terror, mouth and eyes wide open, unable to make a sound. They knocked him down; he also raised himself on one knee, like his father; the torrent passed over him; somebody put his great boot on the boy's cheek and smashed it in; nevertheless the lad still begged for mercy with his hands. He didn't want to die, no, not in the way he had seen his father killed; it broke his heart! The wood-cutter out of pity gave him a great blow with the axe, using both hands, as if he had had to fell a fifty-year-old oak-tree — and he trembled like a leaf. Somebody shouted, "Bah, he'd have been another lawyer!"

No matter! Now they had their hands

red with such blood, they'd got to spill the rest of it. All of 'em! All the hats! It was no longer hunger, beatings, swindling which made their anger boil up again. It was innocent blood. The women most ferocious of all, waving their fleshless arms, squealing in falsetto, with rage, the tender flesh showing under the rags of their clothing. "You who came praying to the good God in a silk frock!" "You who thought yourself contaminated if you knelt beside poor folks! Take that! Take that!" In the houses, on the stair-cases, inside the alcoves, a tearing of silk and of fine linen. Oh, the ear-rings upon bleeding faces, oh, the golden rings upon hands that tried to ward off the hatchet-strokes!

The baroness had had the great door barricaded: beams, wagons, full casks piled against it, and the estate-keepers firing from the windows to sell their lives dear. The crowd bowed its head to the gun-fire, because it had no weapons to respond with. Because in those days it was death-penalty for having fire-arms in your possession. Hurray for Liberty! And they burst in the great doors. Then into the courtyard, up the steps, dislodging the wounded. They left the estate-keepers for the time. They would settle them later. First they wanted the flesh of the baroness, flesh made of partridges and good wine. She ran from room to room with her baby at her breast, all dishevelled — and the rooms were many. The crowd was heard howling along the twistings of the passages, advancing like a river in flood. The oldest son, sixteen years of age, also with fair white flesh still, was pushing the door with his trembling hands, crying: "Mamà! Mamà!" At the first rush they sent the door down on top of him. He clung to the legs which trod him down. He cried no more. His mother had taken refuge on the balcony, clasping her baby close, shutting its mouth with her hand so that it should not cry, mad. The other son wanted to defend her with his body, glaring, as if he had a hundred hands, clutching all those axes by the blades. They separated them in a flash. One man seized her by the hair, another by her hips, another by her dress, lifting her above the balcony rail. The charcoal-man tore the infant baby from her arms. The other brother saw nothing but red and black. They trampled him down, they ground his bones with iron-shod heels; he had set his teeth in a hand which was squeezing his throat, and he never let go. Hatchets couldn't strike in the heap, they hovered flashing in the air.

And in that mad carnival of the month of July, above all the drunken howling of the fasting crowd, the bell of God kept on ringing frantically, until evening, with no mid-day, no ave-maria, like in the land of the Turks. Then they began to disband, tired with the slaughter, quietly, slinkingly, every one fleeing from his companion. Before nightfall all doors were shut, in fear, and in every house the lamp was burning. Along the little streets no sound was heard save that of the dogs, which went prying in the corners, then a dry gnawing of bones, in the bright moonlight which washed over everything, and showed the wide-open big doors and the open windows of the deserted houses.

Day broke: a Sunday with nobody in the square, and no mass ringing. The sexton had burrowed into his hiding hole; there were no more priests. The first-corners that began to gather on the sacred threshold looked one another in the face suspiciously; each one thinking of what his neighbour must have on his conscience. Then, when they were a fair number, they began to murmur: "We can't be without mass, and on a Sunday, like dogs!" The club of the Gentry was barricaded up, and they didn't know where to go to get their masters' orders for the week. From the church-tower still dangled the red-white-and-green handkerchief, flaccid, in the yellow heat of July. And as the shade diminished slowly outside the church-front, the crowd clustered all in one corner. Between two miserable houses of the square, at the bottom of a narrow street that sloped steeply downwards, you could see the fields yellowish on the plain, and the dark woods on the slopes of Etna. Now they were going to share up those fields and woods among themselves. Each one was calculating to himself, on his fingers, how much he should get for his share, and was looking askance at his neighbours. Liberty meant that everybody should have his share — yon Nino Bestia and yon Ramurazzo would have liked to make out that they must carry on the bossy tricks of the hals! If there was no surveyor to measure the land, and no lawyer to put it on to paper, everybody would be going at it tooth and nail! And if you booze your share at the public-house, then afterwards we've got to start sharing all over again — thief here and thief there. Now that there was Liberty, anybody who wanted to eat enough for two ran the risk of being done in like those there gentry! The wood-cutter brandished his fist in the air as if he still grasped the axe.

The next day they heard that the General was coming to deal out justice; which news made folks tremble. They saw the red shirts of their own soldiers climbing slowly up the ravine towards the village; if you had rolled down rocks you could have squashed them all. But nobody stirred. The women screamed and tore their hair. And the dark-faced men with long beards only sat on the top of the hill with their hands between their thighs watching those tired boys come up, bent beneath their rusty rifles, and that little General on his great black horse, in front of them all, alone.

The General made them carry straw into the church, and put his boys to sleep like a father. In the morning, before dawn, if they weren't up at the sound of the bugle, he rode into the church on his horse, swearing like a Turk. That was a man! And on the spot he ordered five or six of them to be shot. Pippo, the dwarf, Pizzannello, the first ones they laid hold of. The wood-cutter, while they were making him kneel against the cemetery wall, wept like a child because of certain words his mother had said to him, and because of the cry she had uttered when they tore him from her arms. From afar off, in the remotest alleys of the village as you sat behind your closed door, you could hear those gun-shots firing one after the other, like cannon-crackers at holiday time.

And then came the real judges, gentlemen in spectacles perched upon mules, done up with the journey, complaining still of their fatigue, while they were examining the accused in the refectory of the monastery, sitting on one hip on their seats, and saying aha! every time they changed the side. A trial that would never come to an end. They took the guilty over away to the city, on foot, chained two by two, between two files of soldiers with cocked muskets. Their women followed them running down the long country roads, across the fallow land, through the cactus thickets and the vineyards and the golden-coloured wheat, tired out, limping, calling out their names every time the road made a bend and they could see the faces of the prisoners. At the city they shut them up in the great prison that was high and vast as a monastery, all pierced with iron-barred windows; and if the women wished to see their men, it was only on Mondays in presence of the warders, behind the iron grating. And the poor fellows got yellower and yellower in that everlasting shadow, never seeing the sun. Every Monday they were more taciturn, and they hardly answered, they complained even less. Other days if the women roved in the square round the prison, the sentinels threatened them with their guns. And then never knowing what to do, where to find work in the town, nor how to earn bread. The bed in the stables cost two cents; the white bread they swallowed in a gulp did not fill their stomachs; and if they crouched down in the doorway of a church, to pass the night there, the police arrested them. One by one they went back home, first the wives, then the mothers. One good-looking lass lost herself in the town and was never heard of again. All the others belonging to the village had come back to do the same as they had done before. The gentry couldn't work their lands with their own hands, and the poor folks couldn't live without the gentry. So they made peace. The apothecary's orphan son stole Neli Pirru's wife, and it seemed to him a proper thing to do, to revenge himself on the one who had killed his father. And when the woman had qualms now and then, and was afraid that her husband when he came out of prison would cut her face, the apothecary's son replied, "Don't be afraid, he won't come out." Nowadays nobody thought of them; unless it was some mother, some old father, when their eyes wandered towards the plain where the city lay, or on Sundays when they saw the others talking over their affairs quietly with the gentry, in front of the club, with their caps in their hands; and they convinced themselves that rags must suffer in a wind.

The case lasted three years, no less; three years of prison without ever seeing the sun. So that the accused seemed like so many dead men out of the tomb, every time they were conducted fettered to the court. Whoever could manage it had come down from the village, witnesses, relatives, people full of curiosity, like a holiday, to see their fellow villagers, after such a long time, crowded together in the chicken-coop of the prisoner's dock — and real chickens you became, inside there! and Neli Pirru had to see the apothecary's lad face to face, the fellow who had become his relation underhand! They made them stand up one by one. "What is your name?" And each one answered for himself, name and surname and what he had done. The lawyers fenced away with their speeches, in wide, loose sleeves, getting beside themselves, foaming at the mouth, suddenly wiping themselves calm with a white pocket-handkerchief, and snuffing up a pinch of snuff. The judges dozed behind the lenses of their spectacles, which froze your heart. Facing were seated twelve gentry in a row, tired, bored, yawning, scratching their beards or gabbling among themselves. For sure they were telling one another what a marvellous escape it had been for them that they weren't gentry of that village up there, when the folks had been making liberty. And those poor wretches opposite tried to read their faces. Then they went away to confabulate together, and the accused men waited white-faced, with their eyes fixed on the closed door. As they came in again, their foreman, the one who spoke with his hand on his stomach, was almost as pale as the prisoners, and he said, "On my honour and on my conscience —!"

The charcoal-man, while they were putting the handcuffs on him again, stammered: "Where are you taking me to? To the galleys? Oh, why? I never got so much as half a yard of land! If they'd told me what liberty was like —!"

SERAO

(1856-1927)

Matilde Serao was born in exile, the daughter of Francesco Serao, a Neapolitan journalist. Burdened with poverty, the family was permitted in 1859 to return to Naples. The troubles of this period appear in Matilde's novel The Life and Adventures of Riccardo Joanna. High-spirited and vigorous as a child, Matilde was exceedingly bored by the usual household duties and amusements. She disliked studies, and her parents, too poor to send her to school, could give her but a sketchy education at home. In 1874, as a telegraph operator, she did her first writing, putting down her impressions in firm, clear language, and she later wrote professionally for the magazines. She joined the literary circle of D'Annunzio and Martini, and met there Eduardo Scarfoglio, whom she married in 1885.

Like many others of her time, Matilde Serao wrote mostly of poor people. With great simplicity and vivacity she described the Italian life she knew; and because each of her characters seems to represent the qualities of a whole class, not simply of an individual, her writing is really a literature of the people. In spite of her journalistic style and her provincial vocabulary, her stories are often characterized by nobility and beauty.

The following translation is that of Anna Schenck in Poet Lore, XV, 1904.

• A STORY OF GREECE

This Story is not my own; I have heard it told and have had it repeated to me many times. During the long summer afternoons, during the long winter evenings, I would take a stool and sit at my mother's feet, leaning my head upon her knees. She, caressing with her soft delicate hand my wild and unruly hair, told me the legends of Greece, of our beautiful far off country for which our hearts were smitten with homesickness; hers, a sickness full of memories, mine, one fervent with hopes. Now my mother, the regrets, the hopes, all have vanished; but the legends softly buzz within my brain. This one like all the others is true.

The island of Santa Maura loomed dark. Those who passed at large in the Ionian Sea took it for a brown cliff, barren and uninhabited. The city, the countryside come to light behind an elbow of land; a small city built over a volcanic eruption, twice almost destroyed by the eruption, with the probability of a complete destruction and disappearance under the waves of the sea; the countryside dotted with vines and olive trees. On the Island are land-owners, trades-people, agriculturalists and fishermen. The trading is in that small black raisin-grape with which England fills her tarts, buying them from Greece by the million. The rich trades-people send their sons to be educated in England and these young men return to the island towards the age of twenty-five to cultivate the grape; the daughters, the rich ones, are educated in some Parisian Seminary and return to the island at eighteen to marry a dealer in grapes. This small black grape, so delectable in the English plum-pudding, is the foundation of happiness, of love, of the whole of life in Santa Maura.

And yet Calliope Stavro hated the grape with intensity. At twenty she was a tall girl with a smart figure, a strange graceful face, brown beneath the fairness of her hair, with singular green eyes. She too had been educated in Paris, an education frivolous and unfruitful. Her soul remained closed. At the Seminary her gay eccentric friends with the French spirit of demolition had made a mock to her of Greece, of the Greeks, of Lord Byron, Haydée and the raisin-grape. Then they had given her to read that clever, sincere, yet perfidious book of About's, 'La Grèce Contemporaine.' Under this quick fire of ridicule many things in her had withered. She had renounced these dreams of her youth and had returned to the island, taciturn, never speaking of what she hated or of what she loved, but keeping on her young face the strained and weary impress of a discontented spirit. She was proud but more often indifferent; sometimes her shrill disdainful laugh would force its dissonant note into a conversation but more often there was no smile in her; she was at times capricious but more often an ignoble yawn distorted the fine line of her mouth; a deadly inertia spoiled the expression of her face.

Calliope Stavro was not poetical. She had a fiancé and would have married him quietly and without rebellion. He was a dealer in grapes. Tall, bony, with prominent reddish brown cheek bones, his whole face brick-colored, burned by the sun, his beard black, his eyes black, vivacious and deep-set, his fingers knotted. He was eighteen years older than his fiancée, which is the custom out there. A man of honor, rich, coarse, speaking a frightful French and a commercial English, loving the songs of Italy and the wine of Oporto, idolizing the grape, he was a good fiancé and would have been a perfect husband. He paid his addresses in the most rudely enamored way. Calliope Stavro accepted them without disgust but without pleasure. Little by little, in the recesses of her heart, she entered into a state of indifference, of atony. Her nights were dreamless. In the fine season, the flowery May, there came to Santa Maura a boy of twenty, Paul de Joanna, part Dalmatian, part Italian, reared in London, in Paris, in Florence. He was a traveller, a poet and rich — three harmonious egoisms. To complete the accord he was beautiful. The wave of his black hair, an unusual wave, not that of the Bambino, but like Nero's, gave him the air of an antique God. His leonine eye with its audacious glance often belied the sweetness of his features, the softness of his face. More than beautiful he was seductive. Such men exist and they are pleasing to women. He smiled but rarely with those slow smiles which complete the look and underline the word. His voice, that irresistible charm, was deep and low. He spoke little. When his words rang out with enthusiasm, instead of growing red, he paled.

Paul stopped at Santa Maura through the caprice of the refined traveller who hates the great cities. He had letters to the rich of the island. He was warmly welcomed. Many of those brown, active, unpoetical Greeks, very lean and very enterprising, looked with suspicion upon this pale poet, happy and indolent, this beautiful boy, proud and rich, full of feminine languors, of interesting silences and mysterious glances. But he had with them that sweetness of manner, that amiable deference, that reserved cordiality which draws out affection. They ended by loving him with that Greek expansiveness, which so closely resembles the Italian.

He was not attentive to the girls, or rather he was attentive to them all, including Calliope Stavro.

When he rode about the streets of Santa Maura, a trim and handsome horseman, he smiled at every girl that appeared at the balconies with a profound bow and a significant look. He wrote beautiful verses in their albums, verses deep and impassioned that troubled those to whom they were addressed. On the pleasure parties he wandered in the woods, now with one, now with another, but he spoke of love to none. He willingly spent the summer nights in the open air strolling beneath the terraces fragrant with the perfume of roses, and no one knew under whose terrace he passed the most frequently. Though some may have felt for him a secret sympathy it was thus impossible to determine where his secret sympathy lay.

Yet he often went to the Stavros' house.

But he was so discreet, so charming in his simplicity, that there, they ended by adoring him. He took a lively interest in the affairs of Spiridione Stavro, the father of Calliope; he was the confidant in the love affairs of Nicolaki Stavro, the brother of Calliope, he sang at the piano Italian songs for Dionisio Catargi, the fiancé of Calliope. The servants were enamored of him, the girl alone neither loved him, nor hated him, as was her wont. She preserved her unsatisfied and disdainful aspect, a long and rancorous silence.

Paul questioned her often, probing her spirit. He tried to sound every chord, so as to find the harmony of this heart. But the spirit was hard and the heart without music. Nothing vibrated within her. In vain he spoke to her of Italy, of Italy heavenly and perfumed, wherein life is colored by love, from the tints of delicate silver-pink, to the dark deep red, the red that is almost black. In vain he told her of fair Dalmatia, bathed in melancholy by the cold, cerulean and evil Adriatic. She listened and sometimes the breath of an ironical smile lighted upon her lips. Paul noticed it and desisted. Calliope irritated him. She disturbed his Olympian calm.

Then, thinking that she was frivolous and vain, he brought her the French papers, the songs out of the new operas, the new books. They read them together. He read well with a voice in which a strange emotion rang. She sat and listened to these singular descriptions — these strange love scenes, now cold and grave, now ardent; she sat and listened but did not appear to hear. It often seemed as though she was profoundly bored by everything. She shrugged her shoulders as though wearied, but said nothing. Once they were alone. A week before Dionisio Catargi had gone into the country for the harvesting of the raisin-grape which takes place in July. Paul was reading a French novel, a love story. Calliope listened. Suddenly he stopped and looked at her. She was pale, with closed eyes. Inflamed by the pride of the seducer he leaned over and kissed her audaciously upon the lips; but her big green eyes opened and fixed him with such an icy glance that he drew back, shut the book, and departed without a word.

He attempted to speak to her of art. Facing the serene horizons, facing the blue Ionian, with warm eloquent phrases he reconstructed those temples with their pure lines, with their immortal beauties. Those cities full of light and love, those gateways rearing into the air the high standard of the ideal. Farther back, still farther back, he told her of the stupendous reign of nature in which all was divine, the trees, the flowers, the streams; in which five thousand Gods peopled an Olympus; in which the nuptials of Earth and Sky threw into the air the immensity of passion, the murmur of kisses and the fragrance of love. She did not understand. Paul was silent, disgusted and weary, with dry lips and a bitter mouth.

It was later, in the height of summer, that he spoke to her of love. He had never spoken of it, neither to Calliope, nor to another. The face of the poet became as marble, hard and immovable, whenever the talk turned upon love. Drawn by an impulse, allowing himself to be borne whither his egotistical and mutable nature transported him, one evening he broke the silence. The subject excited him, exalted him. His ideas bubbled up, now incandescent as lava, now sceptical, now deprecatory. He contradicted himself, noticed the contradictions and explained them. The paradox unfolded its iridescent colors. All that was compressed within his spirit burst forth with the thundering of a torrent. His voice was now tremulous and low, now deep and sonorous, his eyes were vague, almost inspired, his gestures eloquent. The girl listened. He ended by saying that we have one only way to life and that is love, one only way to happiness and that is love, one only way to death and that is also love. Then he was silent. Calliope still listened.

There was dancing in the house of Stavro. It was December. An entertainment was being given in honor of Paolo de Joanna, who was leaving for England. All the beautiful women, all the beautiful girls of the island were gathered together. Some certainly sighed after this stranger who was going off, so calm and happy, without caring about that which he left behind him. He danced with every one. Calliope also danced a great deal; the first waltz with Dionisio Catargi, her bony lover, who because the grape harvest had gone so splendidly was more than content and had given her a pair of diamond ear-rings. Now Calliope danced the quadrille, its figures called out in a nasal voice by a Greek master of ceremonies, with Paolo de Joanna. They conversed with an air of indifference, letting fall the words.

— "You will come back?"

— "I have promised to come back" — he answered her, evasively, and in Italian.

— "You will come back?" — she insisted stubbornly, as though she wished to force him to the truth.

— "No" — he said, stiffening in the fierce pride of his soul. "I will not come back."

The figure divided them. When the figure had reunited them:

— "Are you not sad?" — she asked.

— "I am never sad and never joyous, I am wise; be wise also."

— "I shall be" — answered Calliope, smiling sharply.

They rested. He still spoke to her quietly. She listened with lowered eyes, with a slight smile on her lips.

— "Dear girl, life is made up of these separations. They seem bitter, they are not. We must live philosophically, enjoying the pleasure of today, not weeping over that of yesterday, not desiring that of tomorrow."

— "That is true" — she answered tranquilly.

"Then" — he continued — "pleasure can only be intense by sacrificing its duration. To thrill profoundly one cannot thrill for a long time."

— "That is true" — and she went off to dance.

— When the girl returned he began his discourse again. — "Even love is a vulgar and common thing. We poetize it through pride, to make believe we are superior beings. Love does not maintain one of the promises which it makes. Love is useless."

— "That is true" — she said for the third time.

The high cliff juts out, black, into the frozen night. It is perpendicular, sharply cut, as with the blow of a gigantic hatchet. It seems as though the crest of rock could hardly be inhabited by the eagle. No light is rained upon it by the sparkling of the stars which look like polished steel. Not a tree, not a shrub, not a blade of grass. An angular rock, barren, hard, livid as if with rage. A profound silence, the silence of the heights. Below the Ionian roars and breaks against the walls of the cliff. The girl appears. She does not hasten, she does not linger; there is no uncertainty in her rhythmic step. She does not weep, she does not moan. Having gained the summit, on the narrow platform, she pauses, looks down, long, as though listening. For an instant she lifts her arms to the sky, as a curse, as a threat, desperate. Then she loosens her beautiful blonde hair, looks at the dark Ionian, and throws herself over.

"O mother dear, what was Santa Maura called in ancient Greek?"

— "Leucade." —

— "The Leucade of Sappho, mother?"

— "The Leucade of Sappho."

She bowed her head and thought. I was silent.

* * *

The Gods of Greece are dead. The temple of Apollo is fallen in Leucade; the story of Sappho seems a fable. But the myth of love survives, eternal, implacable and smiling.

SPANISH

ALARCÓN

(1833-1891)

Pedro Antonio de Alarcón was born in Guadix in Granada of a noble but impoverished family. He received his bachelor's degree at the age of fourteen from the seminary of Guadix, and then studied law and theology. Deciding to become a writer, he, with two other men, founded a weekly magazine in Granada. His association with periodical publication soon drew him into politics, and he became a violent revolutionist. He took charge of a radical yellow sheet in Madrid, and as a result of published attacks on the queen was drawn into a duel. He escaped alive and continued to write until 1859, when he took part in the African campaign. In 1863 he began to write again for Liberal papers, and in 1866 suffered political exile. He went to Paris but returned the next year to Granada, where he wrote an epic which brought him the Liceo Gold Medal. In the meantime his marriage, and various other influences, had made him a conservative. Alarcón's writing is full of wit, is often maliciously witty. Subtle and dextrous as a painter of manners, he shows an extraordinary capacity for minute observation. In all his work there is brightness, vigor, and intelligence. Though he owed his popularity during his lifetime largely to his books of travels and his account of his experiences during the African campaign, he is now probably best known, at least in America, for his short stories and his novelettes of manners such as The Three-Cornered Hat and Captain Poison. Generally speaking, Alarcón ranks high among the many gifted authors whom Spain has produced during the nineteenth century.

The following translation is that of Jean Raymond Bidwell in Littel's Living Age, CCXXIII, 1899.

THE ALCALDE WHO WAS A CHARCOAL-BURNER

I

Another day I will narrate the tragic events that preceded the entrance of the French into the Moorish town of Guadix, in order that it may be seen how its infuriated inhabitants maltreated and killed the mayor, Don Francisco Trujillo, who had been accused of having dared to go out to face the French Army with his three hundred countrymen, armed with guns, swords, knives and slings.

To-day, with no other purpose than to indicate the state in which affairs were when the heroic episode to which I am about to refer occurred, I will say that his Excellency, the Señor Conde Don Sebastiani, as the traitors called him, was Captain General of Grenada. The governor of the district of Guadix was General Godinot, successor to the Colonel of Dragoons, Monsieur Corbineau, who had the glory of occupying the city on the 16th of February, 1810.

Two months had passed since that detested date and Napoleon's troops continued to maintain good order in Guadix, and that town, famous for revolt and guerilla warfare, was already as quiet as a pool of oil. One scarcely even saw a good patriot hanging from the balcony of the town hall. The populace began to jabber French, and even the children knew how to say "didon" in speaking of the conquerors, which was a clear indication that the assimilation of the Spanish and French had made great progress. This led the dwellers beyond the Pyrenees to hope for a speedy union of the two countries. Already the grandmothers danced (the grandmothers of the grandsons of traitors, not mine, thank heaven!) they danced, I say, with the conquering officers of Marengo, Austerlitz and Wagram, and it is said that some idle beauty had even looked with kindly eyes at this or that grenadier, dragoon or hussar born in distant lands.

All public documents of the reign of Fernando VII. had the following note added, "Preserved for the reign of our king, Señor Don José Napoleon I." Those sons of Voltaire and Rousseau deigned to hear mass on Sundays and feast days, although the generals and superior officers listened, like atheists of the highest rank, lolling upon the chairs in the chancel and smoking huge pipes. The friars of San Agustín, San Diego, Santo Domingo and San Francisco had consumed all the sacred Host and had been driven from their convents in order that the latter might serve as quarters for the Gauls. In fact, all was peace, official joy and enthusiasm, under penalty of death, in the old court of those enemies of Christ, who reigned in Guadix by the grace of Allah and his prophet Mahomet.

II

Under these circumstances, the butcher of Guadix was obliged to close his doors because there were no more beasts to kill. The cows, oxen, calves, sheep, lambs and goats, — in fact, all the live stock of the territory had been devoured by those foreigners, besides all the hams, turkeys, chickens, fowls, pigeons and tame rabbits of the city, for no one had ever before seen human beings eat so much.

The country people, always frugal, kept on eating vegetables, raw, boiled or fried. But the conquerors needed meat — fresh meat, a good deal of it and that right soon.

In this dilemma, the French general remembered that the district of Guadix was made up of numerous towns, and that the greatest part of them were as yet unsubdued.

"It is necessary," he said to his troops, "that the protection of the Empire be extended throughout the country. March into all the cities, villages and farms under my command. Take them the good news of the arrival of Don José I. upon the throne of San Fernando. Take possession of them in his name, and bring me, upon your return, all the live stock that you find in their corrals and sheepfolds. Long live the Emperor!"

In obedience to this order, there marched ten or twelve columns of two hundred men each, in the direction of the Marquisate of Zenet, towards Gor, Los Montes and the towns situated upon the northern slope of the Sierra Nevada mountains. Among the latter — and here we have the episode to which I referred when I took up my pen to-day, — nestling at the foot of the lofty snowy Mulhacem, lay the very old town of Lapeza, famed twenty leagues around for the indomitable character of its inhabitants, their Arabic appearance and half savage customs. It was celebrated in the Moorish wars, and its half ruined castle still brings to mind the name of its valiant governor, Bernardino de Villalta, a worthy adversary of the followers of Aben-Humeya.

It was the 15th of April in the year 1810. The town of Lapeza presented a strange appearance on that day: an appearance both ridiculous and grotesque, and yet capable of inspiring admiration and terror. Every approach to the town was shut off by a barricade of the trunks of oaks and other gigantic trees that the entire population had brought down from the neighboring hills; and with them they had made barricades not easily surmounted. As the greater part of the neighborhood was composed of charcoal-burners, and the remainder of wood-choppers and shepherds, this work was accomplished with an intelligence and celerity truly astonishing.

This stout wall of wood formed a kind of tower across the road leading from Guadix, on the outskirts of the town. Upon this tower the people of Lapeza had placed a formidable cannon, constructed by themselves from a huge trunk of oak which had been hollowed out by fire, bound with strong ropes and doubled wire. It was loaded to the muzzle with pounds of powder, a great number of bullets, stones, pieces of old iron and other projectiles of that sort. There were gathered here all the available arms of the village, consisting of a dozen muskets, more than twenty blunderbusses, a knife, dagger or razor for each person, three or four dozen wood axes, huge piles of good-sized stones, and a veritable forest of cudgels and heavy-knobbed sticks.

As to the garrison, all contemporaries agree that there were about two hundred men. They could be called men only by excess of courtesy, because they seemed more like orang-outangs. Among the foremost in rank, deserving special mention, and one who gives an exact idea of the others, was the General of the Army, the Governor and the Alcalde of Lapeza, Manuel Atienza. Long may he rest in glory! He was highest in authority in the town, a man between forty-five and fifty years of age, tall as a cypress, raw-boned or gnarled (that is the true word) as an ash tree, and as strong as an oak. To tell the truth, his long employment as a charcoal-burner had so burned and blackened him that he looked more like an oak turned to charcoal. His finger-nails were like flint, his teeth like mahogany and his hands of bronze. His hair, disordered and filled with straw, was like undressed hemp both in quality and color. He had the neck of a wild boar. His breast, exposed by the unbuttoned shirt from shoulder to shoulder, seemed covered with horse-hide that had become wrinkled and hardened over the red-hot coals, and the bristly hair on his chest, and his heavy eyebrows as well, had been scorched and singed. This was because the Señor Alcalde was a charcoal-burner or a farmer of the hills, as they called themselves, and had spent all his life in the midst of a fire, like the souls in Purgatory.

With respect to Manuel Atienza's eyes, no one could deny that he saw, but no one would have dared to assert that he had ever looked one in the face. With intelligent ignorance added to a monkey-like malice and the caution of a man advanced in years, he never permitted himself to gaze at his interlocutors, lest they discover the limitations of his knowledge. If his glance was held for a moment, it was so vague, so mistrustful, that it seemed as if those pupils gazed inward, or as if the man must have eyes behind his ears like the lizards. His mouth was like that of an old mastiff. His forehead disappeared under the encroachments of his hair, and his face shone like tanned leather. His voice, hoarse as the report of a blunderbuss, had certain harsh, brusque notes like the blows of the axe upon wood.

His dress was like that of the better class in those towns, and consisted of rude leather sandals, woollen stockings, short breeches and jacket of coarse dark cloth, a blue satin vest embroidered with yellow, a cartridge belt instead of a sash, and an enormous hat with a plush-covered brim. I will here add that his alcalde's staff was as high as his shoulder, and two black tassels, as big as oranges, testified that he was a man of authority. Such was the Alcalde of Lapeza, and all subordinates were under his rule. If you think the description exaggerated, remember that the race of Lapezeños has not degenerated with years. Go there, and you will be astounded as I was, that in Spain, in the middle of the 19th century, there should exist the wonders of Southern Africa.

III

The work of fortification was finished and the arms distributed. Atienza had sent Jacinto, the constable, to his house for a very old drum that was used in processions and when proclamations were made.

"Fall in," shouted Sindico, a man well skilled in the art of warfare, as he had served Carlos IV. in a company of huntsmen. The two hundred Lapezeños formed in line in front of the town hall.

Atienza grasped a large old sword with long cross-bars, thrust a pistol into his belt, and took his Alcalde's rod in his left hand like a marshal of France. Followed by his staff, composed of the town crier, the constable and the notary public, he reviewed his formidable hosts, who presented arms and then tossed their caps in the air.

"Long live the Señor Alcalde!" shouted those future heroes, to which Atienza replied: "It doesn't matter about the Alcalde. Long live God and Lapeza! Long live the Spanish independence!"

Having exchanged this warlike salute, his Excellency ordered Jacinto to play a quickstep, then he called the town crier to him, who repeated, very slowly, one by one, the words of the commander, the following proclamation — not written —

"Through the report of Uncle Piorno it has been learned that the enemy of the country is coming to-day to Lapeza to attack us and steal our possessions, but we, with the blessing of the priest and by the help of our patron saint, the Virgin of the Rosary, are going to defend ourselves like good Spaniards, and to show the town of Gaudix that, if it has surrendered to the French, the men of Lapeza know how to die as the soldiers of Madrid died on the second of May, or to conquer as the soldiers of Bailen conquered two years ago, and therefore the Alcalde wishes these men to know that he who does not die defending his honor will be declared an unworthy Spaniard — a traitor to his country — and he shall die as he deserves, hanged to an oak on the hillside."

"In testimony thereof, not knowing how to write, his Honor makes the usual cross, which the Notary will certify. Long live God! Long live the Virgin! Long live Fernando VII.! Death to Pepe Botellas! Death to the French! Death to Godinot! Death to the traitors!"

This warlike proclamation produced an extraordinary effect upon the men of Lapeza. Manuel Atienza made the cross with his fingers and kissed it. The secretary nodded his head. The town crier complimented the Alcalde upon his extemporaneous discourse. Jacinto again beat the drum, and shouts, dancing and patriotic hymns ended the almost comic prologue of a veritable tragedy.

"Each one to his place!" exclaimed Sindico. Some of the men climbed upon the wooden fortress, others guarded the cannon, which was provided with a long fuse. The shepherds, more dexterous in the management of the sling, climbed the Moorish castle. The gunners started out boldly on the Gaudix road, while the Alcalde stationed himself upon a height that overlooked the future battlefield. Jacinto was by his side, so that by a quick beat on the drum he might give the signal to fire.

In the meantime, the priest once more blessed and absolved his courageous parishioners, and then, with the aid of the sacristan and gravedigger, he set about preparing bandages, holy oil and litters for the succor of the wounded and dying.

Nearly all the women were praying in the churches. As for the children, it had been arranged that morning to send all to the top of the Sierra Nevada, so that their lives would not be in danger, and that they might serve, in future years, to repel another foreign invasion.

At three o'clock a cloud of dust betrayed to the Lapezeños the proximity of the enemy. Shortly after came a few shots from the vanguard. The Lapezeños jumped with enthusiasm, and, at the same time, by the final order of the Señor Alcalde, they raised two or three flags, made of black kerchiefs, upon the old Moorish castle and the oak parapet.

The bells rang loudly, the old women began to scream and the boys to whistle. Stones were thrown and musket shots were heard in the road. A moment later the men fell back towards the town, reloading their guns. The first helmets and bayonets of the invading force glittered within range of the blunderbusses.

"How many are coming?" asked Manuel Atienza of one of his men.

"There are two hundred," he responded.

"We have equal forces," exclaimed the charcoal-burner, with disdainful arrogance, regardless of the fact that two hundred poorly armed countrymen did not mean the same thing as two hundred veterans, skilled in warfare and provided with excellent arms.

"But they have cavalry," said a second gunner.

"I repeat we are equal," said Manuel Atienza. "Now, Jacinto, beat your drum. Spain! and at them! Long live the Virgin!"

Jacinto gave the desired signal, and a shower of stones and bullets fell upon the Frenchmen.

A moment later they returned fire, killing five Lapezeños.

"Stop firing!" shouted the Alcalde. "They are still far off. Let them come nearer. You know the cannon is kept for the last resort. Don't touch the fuse until I wave my hat. You, ladies, be quiet and take care of the wounded."

"They are coming again!"

"It's nothing — they are quiet."

"They are aiming."

"Lie down, everybody!"

A second discharge was fired against the oak trunks, and the French advanced within twenty paces of the opposing forces. The foot soldiers fell back on each side of the road, leaving the cavalry to pass on.

"Fire!" exclaimed the Alcalde in a voice of thunder, as he waved his hat. He was exposed to the greatest danger.

Then what happened was horrible, inexpressible! Frenchmen and Spaniards fired at the same time, strewing the ground with corpses. The cavalry took advantage of this moment to approach the foot of the fortress, doubtless thinking they could easily destroy it.

Hundreds of stones were hurled down upon horses and riders, who began, on their part, to fight desperately. In the midst of that tumult and whirlwind of confusion, came the tremendous roar of the fearful cannonade, bringing death to besiegers and besieged. It seems that the cannon had burst as it was fired, and the oak trunk, rent in fragments, scattered the shot in all directions, in front, behind and on both sides. The explosion of so much powder had displaced the tree trunks upon which the cannon rested. These trunks fell and crushed Spaniards and Frenchmen together. There was a chaos of smoke, powder, groans, lamentations, shouts, flames and blood. There were dismembered corpses whose limbs were blown through the air and fell to earth with the balls, stones and other projectiles. Struggling, kicking horses tried to escape. The men of Lapeza who were still on foot struck blindly at friends or foes with their daggers, while from above came showers of bullets and stones. It was as if the end of the world had come.

In the midst of this tempest, in this Inferno, while the French cornet played the retreat, and the drum of Lapeza beat the general call to arms, the invincible Alcalde, the unconquerable Atienza, could be heard shouting frantically: "Give it to them, boys! Don't leave one! There can't be many left now!"

That was true enough, but it was also true that there were fewer Spaniards. The oak cannon had destroyed more Spaniards than Frenchmen; nevertheless, as the latter were ignorant of the means of defence that those "demons" still had in reserve, and were also ignorant of their number, besides being terrified by them, they thought only of saving themselves and beat a hasty retreat. The cavalry was mixed with the infantry — all was disorder. The soldiers, heedless of their officers' commands, attempted a retreat that greatly resembled a flight. They were pursued by those shepherds who still had ammunition for their slings and the gunners who possessed cartridges.

The conquerors of Egypt, Italy and Germany entered Gaudix that night at eight o'clock, having left one hundred comrades in Lapeza and on the road. They were wounded by stones and bullets, blackened by powder and covered with blood and sweat. That day an inferior force of shepherds and charcoal-burners had beaten them.

IV

A fearful epilogue followed the drama to which we have just referred.

Imagine the surprise and wrath of General Godinot when he learned what had happened in Lapeza.

"I shall not leave one stone upon another!" exclaimed the revengeful Gaul.

Four days later, two thousand, four hundred men started for Atienza's town under the command of a general, and with provisions and ammunition enough to besiege a fortified town.

That large army came in sight of Lapeza at nine o'clock in the morning. No one was to be seen in the road, not a shot was fired, not a stone thrown. All was silence and solitude in the deserted city. The fortress of old trunks had not been rebuilt, and the church bells gave no signal of the enemy's approach. Thus the infuriated invaders entered the town. It may have seemed to them a sort of prophecy. Lapeza was not more deserted than was Moscow when entered by Napoleon the Great.

Even the wolves, surfeited with plunder, had returned to their lairs in the hills. Only a few women, who had come down that day to their abandoned homes in search of food, were found in the church where they had sought shelter, believing that the illustrious conquerors would respect the sanctuary.

But, no! Instead of strong men to conquer, the fortune of war had given them 20 virtuous wives and innocent maidens to scoff at and maltreat. Let us not dwell on those infamies, so many times repeated by the European conquerors during their rule in Spain. Malediction upon those 25 who added crime to victory!

Pleased and satisfied with themselves, these heroes were returning to Gaudix, carrying with them as their only prisoners a feeble old man, whom they had found in 30 a hut, and a young boy who was attending him. Suddenly, there rushed down the mountain-side, like a precipitous torrent, the infuriated fathers, brothers and lovers, who had just learned, from an escaping 35 fugitive, of the horrors committed.

Then began a tremendous conflict between the hundred men still under Atienza's orders and the twenty-four hundred French soldiers. Having made the chal- 40 lenge and started the fight, the men of Lapeza began to beat a retreat, hoping that the enemy would follow them into the dense forests of the mountain.

The Frenchmen were imprudent enough 45 to fall into the trap, and, although it is true that their terrible arms almost annihilated that handful of men, they paid for each life with ten of their own men.

The crags, the ravines and woods were strewn with French corpses. It was one of 5 those skirmishes of the French army of which little is really known, and where the losses were not counted in the list of great battles, but which gave, at the end of the war of Independence, the enormous total 10 of half a million imperial soldiers lost or dead in our peninsula.

Let us finish. Atienza, the invincible charcoal-burner, who had fought two battles in four days with Bonaparte's troops, stood on a high cliff surrounded 15 by the French. He was lost! He loaded his blunderbuss with the last bullet. His head was bandaged, and he was covered with blood from a recent wound in the chest, but he still wore his judicial staff thrust through his belt like a muleteer. He responded to the suggestions of the French that he should surrender with outbursts of savage laughter that echoed 20 far over the mountains. Bullets whistled around him, but he dodged them, jumping from one side to the other, leaping up, crouching down. Agile, swift, elastic as a tiger in his ceaseless movements, he inspired terror in his resistance as well as 30 in his attack. He had fired his last shot when a ball struck him in the abdomen. A deep groan escaped his lips. He knew he was about to die. He threw away his blunderbuss, not without a look of anger at its uselessness, drew the long staff from his belt and said to a French colonel, who was urging him, in very bad Spanish, to 40 surrender: "I will not surrender! I am the town of Lapeza. I will die rather than yield it!"

Breaking his staff, he tossed the pieces into the Frenchmen's faces. Then he threw himself backward and was dashed 45 against the rocks of a deep ravine.

The enemy never obtained possession of his body.

NORWEGIAN

BJÖRNSON

(1832-1910)

Björnsterne Björnson, Norwegian poet, novelist, and dramatist, was born on a farm in Østerdal, Norway, the son of a pastor. At the University of Oslo he became interested in dramatic criticism and in 1857 was made director of the theater at Bergen. His first novel, Synnöve Solbakken, was finished the same year. At first devoting himself to the treatment of peasant life, Björnson next considered the development of national problems from the peasant's standpoint. To this period belongs one of his best pieces, Sigurd Slembe (1862). In 1865 he became director of the Oslo theater and produced The Newly Married and the romantic tragedy Mary Stuart in Scotland. To the third stage of his writing belong the realistic social dramas which began in 1874 with A Bankruptcy and The Editor. Others are The New System (1879), The Gannet (1883), and Beyond Human Power (1883). The social dramas were not well received, but Beyond Human Power, dealing with religious fanaticism, was very successful. Björnson's political views finally laid him open to the charge of treason, and he was forced to take refuge in Germany. Upon his return he imagined the theater practically closed to him; and he began, therefore, to express his views on education and heredity in novels, of which the most important are In God's Way and Geography and Love. He also composed poems which, though not numerous, are highly significant because they illustrate the author's love of nature and his intense patriotism. Björnson received the Nobel prize for literature in 1903.

* A DANGEROUS WOOING

When Aslaug had become a grown-up girl, there was not much peace to be had at Huseby; for there the finest boys in the parish quarreled and fought night after night. It was worst of all on Saturday nights; but then old Knud Huseby never went to bed without keeping his leather breeches on, nor without having a birch stick by his bedside.

"If I have a daughter, I shall look after her, too," said old Huseby.

Thore Næset was only a houseman's¹ son; nevertheless there were those who said that he was the one who came oftenest to see the gardman's² daughter at Huseby. Old Knud did not like this, and declared also that it was not true, "for he had never seen him there." But people smiled slyly among themselves, and thought that, had he searched in the corners of the room instead of fighting with all those who were making a noise and uproar in the middle of the floor, he would have found Thore.

Spring came and Aslaug went to the sæter³ with the cattle. Then, when the day was warm down in the valley, and the mountain rose cool above the haze, and when the bells tinkled, the shepherd dog barked, and Aslaug sang and blew the loor⁴ on the mountain side, then the hearts of the young fellows who were at work down on the meadow would ache, and the first Saturday night they all started up to the mountain sæter, one faster than the other. But still more rapidly did they come down again, for behind the door at the sæter there stood one who received each of them as he came, and gave him so sound a whipping that he forever afterward remembered the threat that followed it, —

"Come again another time and you shall have some more."

According to what these young fellows knew, there was only one in the parish who could use his fists in this way, and that was Thore Næset. And these rich gardmen's sons thought it was a shame that this houseman's son should cut them all out at the Huseby sæter.

³ A mountain dairy.

⁴ An alpenhorn.

So thought, also, old Knud, when the matter reached his ears, and said, moreover, that if there was nobody else who could tackle Thore, then he and his sons would try it. Knud, it is true, was growing old, but, although he was nearly sixty, he would at times have a wrestle or two with his eldest son, when it was too dull for him at some party or other.

Up to the Huseby sæter there was but one road, and that led straight through the gard. The next Saturday evening, as Thore was going to the sæter, and was stealing on his tiptoes across the yard, a man rushed right at his breast as he came near the barn.

"What do you want of me?" said Thore, and knocked his assailant flat on the ground.

"That you shall soon find out," said another fellow from behind, giving Thore a blow on the back of the head. This was the brother of the former assailant.

"Here comes the third," said old Knud, rushing forward to join the fray.

The danger made Thore stronger. He was as limber as a willow and his blows left their marks. He dodged from one side to the other. Where the blows fell he was not, and where his opponents least expected blows from him, they got them. He was, however, at last completely beaten; but old Knud frequently said afterwards that a stouter fellow he had scarcely ever tackled. The fight was continued until blood flowed, but then Huseby cried, —

"Stop!" and added, "If you can manage to get by the Huseby wolf and his cubs next Saturday night, the girl shall be yours."

Thore dragged himself homeward as best he could; and as soon as he got home he went to bed.

At Huseby there was much talk about the fight; but everybody said, —

"What did he want there?"

There was one, however, who did not say so, and that was Aslaug. She had expected Thore that Saturday night, and when she heard what had taken place between him and her father, she sat down and had a good cry, saying to herself, —

"If I cannot have Thore, there will never be another happy day for me in this world."

Thore had to keep his bed all day Sunday; and Monday, too, he felt that he must do the same. Tuesday came, and it was such a beautiful day. It had rained during the night. The mountain was wet and green. The fragrance of the leaves was wafted in through the open window; down the mountain sides came the sound of the cow-bells, and some one was heard singing up in the glen. Had it not been for his mother, who was sitting in the room, Thore would have wept from impatient vexation.

Wednesday came and still Thore was in bed; but on Thursday he began to wonder whether he could not get well by Saturday; and on Friday he rose. He remembered well the words Aslaug's father had spoken: "If you can manage to get by the Huseby wolf and his cubs next Saturday, the girl shall be yours." He looked over toward the Huseby sæter again and again. "I cannot get more than another thrashing," thought Thore.

Up to the Huseby sæter there was but one road, as before stated; but a clever fellow might manage to get there, even if he did not take the beaten track. If he rowed out on the fjord below, and past the little tongue of land yonder, and thus reached the other side of the mountain, he might contrive to climb it, though it was so steep that a goat could scarcely venture there — and a goat is not very apt to be timid in climbing the mountains, you know.

Saturday came, and Thore stayed without doors all day long. The sunlight played upon the foliage, and every now and then an alluring song was heard from the mountains. As evening drew near, and the mist was stealing up the slope, he was still sitting outside of the door. He looked up the mountain, and all was still. He looked over toward the Huseby gard. Then he pushed out his boat and rowed round the point of land.

Up at the sæter sat Aslaug, through with her day's work. She was thinking that Thore would not come this evening, but that there would come all the more in his stead. Presently she let loose the dog, but told no one whither she was going. She seated herself where she could look down into the valley; but a dense fog was rising, and, moreover, she felt little disposed to look down that way, for everything reminded her of what had occurred. So she moved, and without thinking what she was doing, she happened to go over to the other side of the mountain, and there she sat down and gazed out over the sea. There was so much peace in this far-reaching sea-view!

Then she felt like singing. She chose a song with long notes, and the music sounded far into the still night. She felt gladdened by it, and so she sang another verse. But then it seemed to her as if some one answered her from the glen far below. "Dear me, what can that be?" thought Aslaug. She went forward to the brink of the precipice, and threw her arms around a slender birch, which hung trembling over the steep. She looked down but saw nothing. The fjord lay silent and calm. Not even a bird ruffled its smooth surface. Aslaug sat down and began singing again. Then she was sure that some one responded with the same tune and nearer than the first time. "It must be somebody, after all." Aslaug sprang up and bent out over the brink of the steep; and there, down at the foot of a rocky wall, she saw a boat moored, and it was so far down that it appeared like a tiny shell. She looked a little farther up, and her eyes fell on a red cap, and under the cap she saw a young man, who was working his way up the almost perpendicular side of the mountain. "Dear me, who can that be?" asked Aslaug, as she let go of the birch and sprang far back.

She dared not answer her own question, for she knew very well who it was. She threw herself down on the greensward and took hold of the grass with both hands, as though it were she who must not let go her hold. But the grass came up by the roots.

She cried aloud and prayed God to help Thore. But then it struck her that this conduct of Thore's was really tempting God, and therefore no help could be expected.

"Just this once!" she implored.

And she threw her arms around the dog, as if it were Thore she were keeping from loosing his hold. She rolled over the grass with him, and the moments seemed years. But then the dog tore himself away. "Bow-wow," he barked over the brink of the steep and wagged his tail. "Bow-wow," he barked at Aslaug, and threw his forepaws up on her. "Bow-wow," over the precipice again; and a red cap appeared over the brow of the mountain and Thore lay in her arms.

Now when old Knud Huseby heard of this, he made a very sensible remark, for he said, —

"That boy is worth having; the girl shall be his."

LAGERLÖF

(1858-)

Selma Lagerlöf, Swedish author, was born at Mårbacke in Vermland. After she had finished school and begun teaching, she won a prize in a competition in a weekly periodical. Her contribution was a series of chapters from Gösta Berlings Saga (1891). Later she published a group of stories of Vermland life as it was in 1830. After 1895 she spent most of her time writing. During a visit to Italy she gathered the material for The Miracles of Antichrist (1897), a novel depicting life in Sicily. She also made a journey to Palestine and upon her return published Jerusalem (1901-02). Since that time she has produced a large number of novels and stories which have been translated into many languages. In 1909 she was awarded the Nobel prize for literature and in 1914 was made the first woman member of the Swedish Academy. An artist through and through, Selma Lagerlöf is particularly gifted in presenting moods of powerful effect. Her stories seldom fail to be stirring in either plot or treatment, and many of them are touched with mysticism, with that dark imaginativeness which marks the earliest Scandinavian writings.

THE PEACE OF GOD

Once upon a time there was an old farmhouse. It was Christmas-eve, the sky was heavy with snow, and the north wind was biting. It was just that time in the afternoon when everybody was busy finishing their work before they went to the bath-house to have their Christmas bath. There they had made such a fire 10 that the flames went right up the chimney, and sparks and soot were whirled about by the wind, and fell down on the snow-decked roofs of the outhouses. And as the flames appeared above the chimney of the bath-house, and rose like a fiery pillar above the farm, everyone suddenly felt that Christmas was at hand. The girl that was scrubbing the entrance floor began to hum, although the water was freezing in the bucket beside her. The men in the wood-shed who were cutting Christmas logs began to cut two at a time, and swung their axes as merrily as if log-cutting were a mere pastime.

An old woman came out of the pantry with a large pile of cakes in her arms. She went slowly across the yard into the large red-painted dwelling-house, and carried them carefully into the best room, and put 15 them down on the long seat. Then she spread the tablecloth on the table, and arranged the cakes in heaps, a large and a small cake in each heap. She was a singularly ugly old woman, with reddish hair, heavy drooping eyelids, and with a peculiar strained look about the mouth and chin, as if the muscles were too short. But being Christmas-eve, there was such a joy and peace over her that one did not 20 notice how ugly she was.

But there was one person on the farm who was not happy, and that was the girl who was tying up the whisks made of birch twigs that were to be used for the baths. She sat near the fireplace, and had a whole armful of fine birch twigs lying beside her on the floor, but the withes with 5 which she was to bind the twigs would not keep knotted. The best room had a narrow, low window, with small panes, and through them the light from the bath-house shone into the room, playing on the floor and gilding the birch twigs. But the higher the fire burned the more unhappy was the girl. She knew that the whisks would fall to pieces as soon as one touched them, and that she would never 15 hear the last of it until the next Christmas fire was lighted.

Just as she sat there bemoaning herself, the person of whom she was most afraid came into the room. It was her master, Ingmar Ingmarson. He was sure to have been to the bath-house to see if the stove was hot enough, and now he wanted to see how the whisks were getting on. He was old, was Ingmar Ingmarson, and he was 25 fond of everything old, and just because people were beginning to leave off bathing in the bath-houses and being whipped with birch twigs, he made a great point of having it done on his farm, and having it 30 done properly.

Ingmar Ingmarson wore an old coat of sheep's-skin, skin trousers, and shoes smeared over with pitch. He was dirty and unshaven, slow in all his movements, and came in so softly that one might very well have mistaken him for a beggar. His features resembled his wife's features and his ugliness resembled his wife's ugliness, for they were relations, and from the time the girl first began to notice anything she had learned to feel a wholesome reverence for anybody who looked like that; for it was a great thing to belong to the old family of the Ingmars, which had always been the first in the village. But the highest to which a man could attain was to be Ingmar Ingmarson himself, and be the richest, the wisest, and the mightiest in the whole parish.

Ingmar Ingmarson went up to the girl, took one of the whisks, and swung it in the air. It immediately fell to pieces; one of the twigs landed on the Christmas table, another on the big four-poster.

'I say, my girl,' said old Ingmar, laughing, 'do you think one uses that kind of whisk when one takes a bath at the Ingmars', or are you very tender, my girl?'

When the girl saw that her master did not take it more seriously than that, she took heart, and answered that she could certainly make whisks that would not go to pieces if she could get proper withes to bind them with.

'Then I suppose I must try to get some for you, my girl,' said old Ingmar, for he was in a real Christmas humour.

He went out of the room, stepped over the girl who was scouring the floor, and remained standing on the doorstep, to see if there were anyone about whom he could send to the birch-wood for some withes. The farm hands were still busy cutting Yule logs; his son came out of the barn with the Christmas sheaf; his two sons-in-law were putting the carts into the shed so that the yard could be tidy for the Christmas festival. None of them had time to leave their work.

The old man then quietly made up his mind to go himself. He went across the yard as if he were going into the cowshed, looked cautiously round to make sure no one noticed him, and stole along outside the barn where there was a fairly good road to the wood. The old man thought it was better not to let anyone know where he was going, for either his son or his sons-in-law might then have begged him to remain at home, and old people like to have their own way.

He went down the road, across the fields, through the small pine forest into the birch-wood. Here he left the road, and waded in the snow to find some young birches.

About the same time the wind at last accomplished what it had been busy with the whole day: it tore the snow from the clouds, and now came rushing through the wood with a long train of snow after it.

Ingmar Ingmarson had just stooped down and cut off a birch twig, when the wind came tearing along laden with snow. Just as the old man was getting up the wind blew a whole heap of snow in his face. His eyes were full of snow, and the wind whirled so violently around him that he was obliged to turn round once or twice.

The whole misfortune, no doubt, arose from Ingmar Ingmarson being so old. In his young days a snowstorm would certainly not have made him dizzy. But now everything danced round him as if he had joined in a Christmas polka, and when he wanted to go home he went in the wrong direction. He went straight into the large pine forest behind the birch-wood instead of going towards the fields.

It soon grew dark, and the storm continued to howl and whirl around him amongst the young trees on the outskirts of the forest. The old man saw quite well that he was walking amongst fir-trees, but he did not understand that this was wrong, for there were also fir-trees on the other side of the birch-wood nearest the farm. But by-and-by he got so far into the forest that everything was quiet and still — one could not feel the storm, and the trees were high with thick stems — then he found out that he had mistaken the road, and would turn back.

He became excited and upset at the thought that he could lose his way, and as he stood there in the midst of the pathless wood he was not sufficiently clear-headed to know in which direction to turn. He first went to the one side and then to the other. At last it occurred to him to re-trace his way in his own footprints, but darkness came on, and he could no longer follow them. The trees around him grew higher and higher. Whichever way he went, it was evident to him that he got further and further into the forest.

It was like witchcraft and sorcery, he thought, that he should be running about the woods like this all the evening and be too late for the bathing. He turned his cap and rebound his garter, but his head was no clearer. It had become quite dark, and he began to think that he would have to remain the whole night in the woods.

He leant against a tree, stood still for a little, and tried to collect his thoughts. He knew this forest so well, and had walked in it so much, that he ought to know every single tree. As a boy he had gone there and tended sheep. He had gone there and laid snares for the birds. In his young days he had helped to fell trees there. He had seen old trees cut down and new ones grow up. At last he thought he had an idea where he was, and fancied if he went that and that way he must come upon the right road; but all the same, he only went deeper and deeper into the forest.

Once he felt smooth, firm ground under his feet, and knew from that, that he had at last come to some road. He tried now to follow this, for a road, he thought, was bound to lead to some place or other; but then the road ended at an open space in the forest, and there the snowstorm had it all its own way; there was neither road nor path, only drifts and loose snow. Then the old man's courage failed him; he felt like some poor creature destined to die a lonely death in the wilderness.

He began to grow tired of dragging himself through the snow, and time after time he sat down on a stone to rest; but as soon as he sat down he felt he was on the point of falling asleep, and he knew he would be frozen to death if he did fall asleep, therefore he tried to walk and walk; that was the only thing that could save him. But all at once he could not resist the inclination to sit down. He thought if he could only rest, it did not matter if it did cost him his life.

It was so delightful to sit down that the thought of death did not in the least frighten him. He felt a kind of happiness at the thought that when he was dead the account of his whole life would be read aloud in the church. He thought of how beautifully the old Dean had spoken about his father, and how something equally beautiful would be sure to be said about him. The Dean would say that he had owned the oldest farm in the district, and he would speak about the honour it was to belong to such a distinguished family, and then something would be said about responsibility. Of course there was responsibility in the matter; that he had always known. One must endure to the very last when one was an Ingmar.

The thought rushed through him that it was not befitting for him to be found frozen to death in the wild forest. He would not have that handed down to posterity; and he stood up again and began to walk. He had been sitting so long that masses of snow fell from his fur coat when he moved. But soon he sat down again and began to dream.

The thought of death now came quite gently to him. He thought about the whole of the funeral and all the honour they would show his dead body. He could see the table laid for the great funeral feast in the large room on the first floor, the Dean and his wife in the seats of honour, the Justice of the Peace, with the white frill spread over his narrow chest; the Major's wife in full dress, with a low silk bodice, and her neck covered with pearls and gold; he saw all the best rooms draped in white — white sheets before the windows, white over the furniture; branches of fir strewn the whole way from the entrance-hall to the church; house-cleaning and butchering, brewing and baking for a fortnight before the funeral; the corpse on a bier in the inmost room; smoke from the newly-lighted fires in the rooms; the whole house crowded with guests; singing over the body whilst the lid of the coffin was being screwed on; silver plates on the coffin; twenty loads of wood burned in a fortnight; the whole village busy cooking food to take to the funeral; all the tall hats newly ironed; all the corn-brandy from the autumn drunk up during the funeral feast; all the roads crowded with people as at fair-time.

Again the old man started up. He had heard them sitting and talking about him during the feast.

'But how did he manage to go and get frozen to death?' asked the Justice of the Peace. 'What could he have been doing in the large forest?'

And the Captain would say that it was probably from Christmas ale and corn-brandy. And that roused him again. The Ingmars had never been drunkards. It should never be said of him that he was muddled in his last moments. And he began again to walk and walk; but he was so tired that he could scarcely stand on his legs. It was quite clear to him now that he had got far into the forest, for there were no paths anywhere, but many large rocks, of which he knew there were none lower down. His foot caught between two stones, so that he had difficulty in getting it out, and he stood and moaned. He was quite done for.

Suddenly he fell over a heap of fagots. He fell softly on to the snow and branches, so he was not hurt, but he did not take the trouble to get up again. He had no other desire in the world than to sleep. He pushed the fagots to one side and crept under them as if they were a rug; but when he pushed himself under the branches he felt that underneath there was something warm and soft. This must be a bear, he thought.

He felt the animal move, and heard it sniff; but he lay still. The bear might eat him if it liked, he thought. He had not strength enough to move a single step to get out of its way.

But it seemed as if the bear did not want to harm anyone who sought its protection on such a night as this. It moved a little further into its lair, as if to make room for its visitor, and directly afterwards it slept again with even, snorting breath.

* * *

In the meantime there was but scanty Christmas joy in the old farm of the Ingmars. The whole of Christmas-eve they were looking for Ingmar Ingmarson. First they went all over the dwelling-house and all the outhouses. They searched high and low, from loft to cellar. Then they went to the neighbouring farms and inquired for Ingmar Ingmarson.

As they did not find him, his sons and his sons-in-law went into the fields and roads. They used the torches which should have lighted the way for people going to early service on Christmas morning in the search for him. The terrible snowstorm had hidden all traces, and the howling of the wind drowned the sound of their voices when they called and shouted. They were out and about until long after midnight, but then they saw that it was useless to continue the search, and that they must wait until daylight to find the old man.

At the first pale streak of dawn everybody was up at Ingmar's farm, and the men stood about the yard ready to set out for the wood. But before they started the old housewife came and called them into the best room. She told them to sit down on the long benches; she herself sat down by the Christmas table with the Bible in front of her and began to read. She tried her best to find something suitable for the occasion, and chose the story of the man who was travelling from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves.

She read slowly and monotonously about the unfortunate man who was succoured by the good Samaritan. Her sons and sons-in-law, her daughters and daughters-in-law, sat around her on the benches. They all resembled her and each other, big and clumsy, with plain, old-fashioned faces, for they all belonged to the old race of the Ingmars. They had all reddish hair, freckled skin, and light-blue eyes with white eyelashes. They might be different enough from each other in some ways, but they had all a stern look about the mouth, dull eyes, and heavy movements, as if everything were a trouble to them. But one could see that they all, every one of them, belonged to the first people in the neighbourhood, and that they knew themselves to be better than other people.

All the sons and daughters of the house of Ingmar sighed deeply during the reading of the Bible. They wondered if some good Samaritan had found the master of the house and taken care of him, for all the Ingmars felt as if they had lost part of their own soul when a misfortune happened to anyone belonging to the family.

The old woman read and read, and came to the question: 'Who was neighbour unto him that fell amongst thieves?' But before she had read the answer the door opened and old Ingmar came into the room.

'Mother, here is father,' said one of the daughters; and the answer, that the man's neighbour was he who had shown mercy unto him, was never read.

* * *

Later in the day the housewife sat again in the same place, and read her Bible. She was alone; the women had gone to church, and the men were bear-hunting in the forest. As soon as Ingmar Ingmarson had eaten and drunk, he took his sons with him and went out to the forest; for it is every man's duty to kill a bear wherever and whenever he comes across one. It does not do to spare a bear, for sooner or later it will get a taste for flesh, and then it will spare neither man nor beast.

But after they were gone a great feeling of fear came over the old housewife, and she began to read her Bible. She read the lesson for the day, which was also the text for the Pastor's sermon; but she did not get further than this: 'Peace on earth, goodwill towards men.' She remained sitting and staring at these words with her dull eyes, now and again sighing deeply. She did not read any further, but she repeated time after time in her slow, drawling voice, 'Peace on earth, goodwill towards men.'

The eldest son came into the room just as she was going to repeat the words afresh.

'Mother!' he said softly.

She heard him, but did not take her eyes from the book whilst she asked:

'Are you not with the others in the forest?'

'Yes,' said he, still more softly, 'I have been there.'

'Come to the table,' she said, 'so that I can see you.'

He came nearer, but when she looked at him she saw that he was trembling. He had to press his hands hard against the edge of the table in order to keep them still.

'Have you got the bear?' she asked again.

He could not answer; he only shook his head.

The old woman got up and did what she had not done since her son was a child. She went up to him, laid her hand on his arm, and drew him to the bench. She sat down beside him and took his hand in hers.

'Tell me now what has happened, my boy.'

The young man recognised the caress which had comforted him in bygone days when he had been in trouble and unhappy, and he was so overcome that he began to weep.

'I suppose it is something about father?' she said.

'It is worse than that,' the son sobbed.

'Worse than that?'

The young man cried more and more violently; he did not know how to control his voice. At last he lifted his rough hand, with the broad fingers, and pointed to what she had just read: 'Peace on earth. . . .'

'Is it anything about that?' she asked.

'Yes,' he answered.

'Is it anything about the peace of Christmas?'

'Yes.'

'You wished to do an evil deed this morning?'

'Yes.'

'And God has punished us?'

'God has punished us.'

So at last she was told how it had happened. They had with some trouble found the lair of the bear, and when they had got near enough to see the heap of fagots, they stopped in order to load their guns. But before they were ready the bear rushed out of its lair straight against them. It went neither to the right nor to the left, but straight for old Ingmar Ingmarson, and struck him a blow on the top of the head that felled him to the ground as if he had been struck by lightning. It did not attack any of the others, but rushed past them into the forest.

In the afternoon Ingmar Ingmarson's wife and son drove to the Dean's house to announce his death. The son was spokesman, and the old housewife sat and listened with a face as immovable as a stone figure.

The Dean sat in his easy-chair near his writing-table. He had entered the death in the register. He had done it rather slowly; he wanted time to consider what he should say to the widow and the son, for this was, indeed, an unusual case. The son had frankly told him how it had all happened, but the Dean was anxious to know how they themselves looked at it. They were peculiar people, the Ingmars.

When the Dean had closed the book, the son said:

'We wanted to tell you, sir, that we do not wish any account of father's life to be read in church.'

The Dean pushed his spectacles over his forehead and looked searchingly at the old woman. She sat just as immovable as before. She only crumpled the handkerchief a little which she held in her hand.

'We wish to have him buried on a week day,' continued the son.

'Indeed!' said the Dean.

He could hardly believe his own ears. Old Ingmar Ingmarson to be buried without anyone taking any notice of it! The congregation not to stand on railings and mounds in order to see the display when he was being carried to the grave!

'There will not be any funeral feast. We have let the neighbours know that they need not think of preparing anything for the funeral.'

'Indeed, indeed!' said the Dean again.

He could think of nothing else to say. He knew quite well what it meant for such people to forego the funeral feast. He had seen both widows and fatherless comforted by giving a splendid funeral feast.

'There will be no funeral procession, only I and my brothers.'

The Dean looked almost appealingly at the old woman. Could she really be a party to all this? He asked himself if it could be her wishes to which the son had given expression. She was sitting there and allowing herself to be robbed of what must be dearer to her than gold and silver.

'We will not have the bells rung, or any silver plates on the coffin. Mother and I wish it to be done in this way, but we tell you all this, sir, in order to hear, sir, if you think we are wronging father.'

Now the old woman spoke:

'We should like to hear if your Reverence thinks we are doing father a wrong.'

The Dean remained silent, and the old woman continued, more eagerly:

'I must tell your Reverence that if my husband had sinned against the King or the authorities, or if I had been obliged to cut him down from the gallows, he should all the same have had an honourable funeral, as his father before him, for the Ingmars are not afraid of anyone, and they need not go out of their way for anybody. But at Christmas God has made peace between man and beast, and the poor beast kept God's commandment, whilst we broke it, and therefore we now suffer God's punishment; and it is not becoming for us to show ostentatious display.'

The Dean rose and went up to the old woman.

'What you say is right,' he said, 'and you shall follow the dictates of your own conscience.' And involuntarily he added, perhaps most to himself: 'The Ingmars are a grand family.'

The old woman straightened herself a little at these words. At that moment the Dean saw in her the symbol of her whole race. He understood what it was that had made these heavy, silent people, century after century, the leaders of the whole parish.

'It behooves the Ingmars to set the people a good example,' she said. 'It behooves us to show that we humble ourselves before God.'

FRENCH

BALZAC

(1799-1850)

Honoré de Balzac was born at Tours, but soon went to Paris, where he remained until his death. During his earlier years he operated a publishing house and put out many books under an assumed name. His public literary career began with The Last of the Chouans in 1829. From that time on he wrote, with intense application and incredible speed, the enormous number of novels which constitutes the Comédie Humaine. It was his intention that this series should treat at some length in novel form every phase of human nature to be found in the French life of his day. The result is one of the largest and most complete societies that ever populated the work of one man. The Comédie Humaine includes nearly a hundred titles of novels and shorter works, and over two thousand characters. There has perhaps never been an author who has described with more detailed accuracy not only the quality, position, and appearance of his characters but their environment as well, sometimes even to the minutest piece of bric-à-brac. Another distinction of his treatment is his emphasis on some central personal trait in each of his characters. It is consistent with Balzac's theory that he is most successful in representing miserliness; there are few figures more complete and more devastating, more unforgettable, than Father Goriot, in the novel by that name, whose miserliness is the result of an absorbing devotion to two unappreciative daughters. Balzac's characters are largely creations of a remarkable memory and of a prodigious imagination. His style is frequently marred by incoherence, lack of taste, and inaccuracies; but his writing is generally laden with a rich and varied cargo. Balzac has been characterized as "a realist attacked by nightmares of romance." In spite of his romantic mysticism and idealism, he remains the first and the most important of modern French realists. His influence both in France and abroad is literally incalculable. Henry James, the distinguished Anglo-American critic and realist, referred to Balzac as "the master of us all." Among Balzac's most famous novels are Eugénie Grandet (1834), Father Goriot (1835), and César Birrolleau (1837).

The following translation of The Unknown Masterpiece (1832) is that of G. Burnham Ives in Philosophic Studies, Vol. III, George Barrie's Sons, Philadelphia, 1899.

THE UNKNOWN MASTERPIECE

I

GILLETTE

In the last days of the year 1612, on a cold December morning, a young man, whose clothing seemed very thin, was promenading before the door of a house on Rue des Grands-Augustins, Paris. After walking back and forth for a long while with the irresolution of a lover who dares not call upon his first mistress, however kind she may be, he at last crossed the threshold and inquired if Maître François Porbus were at home. Upon receiving a reply in the affirmative from an old woman who was sweeping one of the lower rooms, the young man slowly ascended the stairs, pausing from step to step like a courtier of recent date, anxious concerning the reception he may meet with at the king's hands. When he reached the top of the winding stairway, he stood for a moment on the landing, uncertain whether he should lift the 5 fantastic knocker that embellished the door of the studio in which Henri IV.'s painter, abandoned by Marie de Médicis for Rubens, was in all probability at work. The young man felt the profound emotion which must cause the heart of every great artist to beat fast, when, in the flower of youth and of his love for art, he enters the presence of a man of genius or of a masterpiece. There exists in all human 10 sensations a primitive flower, engendered by a noble enthusiasm which grows constantly weaker and weaker until happiness has become naught but a memory and glory a lie. Among these frail pas- 15 sions, there is none that so closely resembles love as the youthful passion of an artist beginning to undergo the blissful torture of his destiny of glory and disaster — a passion overflowing with audacity and modesty, with vague beliefs and certain discouragement. The man who, with slender purse and genius that is budding, has not trembled with emotion upon presenting himself before a master, will always lack a chord in his heart, an indefinable touch of the brush, true feeling in his work, a certain poetry of expression. If some braggarts, puffed up with their own conceit, begin too soon to believe in their future, they are wise men in the judgment of none but fools. Upon that theory, the unknown youth seemed to possess genuine talent, if talent is to be measured by this initial timidity, this indefinable modesty which those who are destined to achieve renown are likely to lose in the exercise of their professions, as a pretty woman loses hers in the devious paths of coquetry. Familiarity with triumph lessens doubt, and modesty may perhaps be called a doubt.

Crushed by poverty and surprised at that moment by his own presumption, the poor neophyte would not have entered the studio of the painter to whom we owe the admirable portrait of Henry IV., had not chance sent him an extraordinary re-enforcement. An old man ascended the staircase. By the peculiarities of his costume, the magnificence of his lace ruff, the ponderous self-assurance of his tread, the young man divined that the new-comer was either the patron or the friend of the painter; he stepped back on the landing to make room for him, and examined him with interest, hoping to recognize in him the good nature of the artist or the obliging disposition of those who love the arts; but it seemed to him that there was a diabolical cast to the face, and that indefinable something that makes an artist's mouth water. Imagine a bald, protruding, prominent brow, overhanging a little, flat nose, turned up at the end like Rabelais's or Socrates's; a smiling, wrinkled mouth, a short chin held jauntily aloft, and embellished with a gray beard trimmed to a point, sea-green eyes which were apparently dimmed by age, but which, in a paroxysm of anger or enthusiasm, were capable of magnetic flashes in striking contrast to the mother-of-pearl sea in which the pupils floated. The face was strangely seamed, too, by the exhaustion of old age, and even more by the thoughts that undermine body and mind alike. The eyes had no lashes, and one could barely detect a trace of eyebrows above their jutting arches. Place that head upon a slender, fragile body, surround it with lace of dazzling whiteness and of a pattern as intricate as that of a silver fish-slice, throw a heavy gold chain over the old man's black doublet, and you will have a feeble idea of the personage to whom the dim light of the stairway imparted an even more fantastic appearance. You would have said that it was one of Rembrandt's canvases, without a frame, walking silently through the dark atmosphere which that great painter made his own. The old man cast a knowing glance at his junior, knocked three times at the door, and said to a sickly-looking man of about forty, who opened it:

"Good-morning, master."

Porbus bowed respectfully; he admitted the young man, thinking that he had come with the other, and was the less disturbed by his presence because the neophyte could not shake off the spell cast upon born painters by the aspect of the first studio they see, in which some of the material processes of art are disclosed to them. A skylight in the roof lighted Master Porbus's studio. Concentrated upon a canvas which stood on the easel, and which bore only three or four light strokes as yet, the daylight did not reach the black depths of the corners of that vast room; but a few stray gleams lighted up the silvery eye in the centre of a reiter's cuirass hanging on the wall in the ruddy shadow, streaked with a sudden furrow of light the carved and waxed cornice of an old-fashioned dresser laden with curious vessels, or studded with bright specks the rough surface of divers old, gold brocade curtains with heavy, irregular folds, which lay about here and there as patterns. Plaster manikins, trunks and limbs of antique goddesses, lovingly polished by the kisses of centuries, were strewn over shelves and consoles. Innumerable sketches, studies in three colors, in red lead or pen and ink, covered the walls to the ceiling. Boxes of paints, bottles of oil and essences, and overturned stools left only a narrow passage to the circle of light projected by the high stained-glass skylight, whose rays fell full upon Porbus's pale face and the ivory skull of the strange old man. The young man's attention was soon directed exclusively upon a picture which had already become famous in those days of turmoil and revolution, and which was visited by some of those self-willed individuals to whom we owe the keeping alive of the sacred fire in evil days. The lovely canvas represented Marie the Egyptian preparing to pay the boatman. That masterpiece, painted for Marie de Médicis, was sold by her in her days of poverty.

"I like your saint," said the old man to Porbus, "and I would pay you ten gold crowns over and above the price the queen gives you; but to enter into competition with her — the devil!"

"Do you think well of it?"

"Hm!" exclaimed the old man, "do I think well of it? — yes and no. Your good woman is not badly put together, but she is not alive. You artists think that you have done all that is necessary when you have drawn a figure correctly, and put everything in its place according to the laws of anatomy! You color the features with a flesh tone mixed beforehand on your palette, taking care to keep one side darker than the other, and, because you glance from time to time at a naked woman standing on the table, you think that you have copied nature, you fancy that you are painters and have stolen God's secret! P-r-r-r! In order to be a great poet, it is not enough to know syntax thoroughly, and to make no mistakes in grammar! Look at your saint, Porbus! At first glance, she seems admirable; but when you look again, you see that she is glued to the canvas, and that you cannot walk around her. She is a silhouette with a single face, a cut out figure, an image which cannot turn or change its position. I feel no air blowing between that arm and the background of the picture; space and depth are lacking; and yet the perspective is perfect, and the gradation of colors in the sky is excellently done; but, notwithstanding your praiseworthy efforts, I could never believe that that lovely body was animated by the warm breath of life. It seems to me that, if I should place my hand upon that firm, round throat, I should find it as cold as marble! No, my friend, the blood is not flowing beneath that ivory skin, life does not inflate with its purple dew the veins and arteries entwined in an inextricable network beneath the transparent amber-hued skin of the temples and the breast. In this place, there is palpitating life, but that other is motionless, life and death contend together in each detail: here it is a woman, there a statue, and there a corpse. Your creation is incomplete. You have succeeded in breathing only a portion of your soul into your cherished work. The torch of Prometheus has gone out more than once in your hands, and many portions of your picture have not been touched by the heavenly flame."

"But why do you say so, my dear master?" said Porbus, respectfully, to the old man, while the younger with difficulty restrained a powerful impulse to strike him.

"Ah! there you are," replied the little old man. "You have wavered uncertainly between two systems, between drawing and coloring, between the painstaking phlegm, the stiff precision, of the old German masters, and the dazzling ardor, the happy fertility, of the Italian painters. You have tried to imitate at one and the same time Hans Holbein and Titian, Albert Dürer and Paul Veronese. Surely that was a superb ambition! But what has been the result? You have achieved neither the severe charm of sharpness of outline, nor the deceitful fascination of the chiaro-oscuro.¹ In that spot, like bronze in a state of fusion bursting its too fragile mould, the rich, light coloring of the Titian has overflowed the meagre Albert Dürer outline in which you cast it. Elsewhere, the features have resisted and held in check the magnificent outpouring of the Venetian palette. Your face is neither perfectly drawn nor perfectly painted, and bears everywhere the traces of this unfortunate indecision. If you did not feel that you were strong enough to melt together in the fire of your genius the two rival methods, you should have chosen definitely one or the other, in order to obtain the unity which corresponds with one of the essential conditions of life. You are true only in the middle portions, your outlines are false, they do not overlap one another, and do not look as if there were anything behind. There is truth here," said the old man, pointing to the saint's breast; "and here," he continued, indicating the point on the canvas where the shoulder came to an end. "But here," he exclaimed, returning to the middle of the throat, "all is false. Let us not analyze it, it would drive you to despair."

The old man seated himself on a stool, hid his face in his hands, and was silent.

"And yet, master," said Porbus, "I studied that throat with great care in the model; but, unhappily for us, there are genuine effects in nature which do not seem probable on canvas —"

"The mission of art is not to copy nature, but to give expression to it! You are not a base copyist, but a poet!" cried the old man, earnestly, interrupting Porbus with an imperious gesture. "Otherwise, a sculptor would end all his labors in merely moulding women. But try to mould your mistress's hand and place it before you; you will find a horrible dead thing without any resemblance, and you will be compelled to have recourse to the chisel of the man who, without copying it for you exactly, will instil movement and life into it. We have to grasp the spirit, the soul, the features, of things and beings. Effects! effects! why, they are the accidents of life, and not life itself. A hand — as I have taken that example — a hand is not simply a part of the body, it expresses and continues a thought which we must grasp and render. Neither the poet nor the painter nor the sculptor should separate cause and effect, which are inextricably bound up in each other! There is the real struggle! Many painters triumph instinctively, knowing nothing of this canon of art. You draw a woman, but you do not see her! Not thus do we succeed in forcing nature to yield up her secrets. Your hand reproduces, unconsciously on your part, the model you have copied in your master's studio. You do not go down far enough into the intimate knowledge of form, you do not pursue it with sufficient love and perseverance in its windings and its flights. Beauty is a stern, uncompromising thing, which does not allow itself to be attained in that way; you must bide its time, keep watch upon it, press it close, and hold it fast to force it to surrender. Form is a Proteus¹ much more difficult to seize, and much more prolific in changes of aspect than the fabled Proteus; only after a long contest can one force it to show itself in its real shape. You are content with the first view that it presents to you, or with the second or the third, at all events: but that is not the way that victorious fighters act! The unvanquished painters never allow themselves to be deceived by all these will-o'-the-wisps, they persevere until nature is driven to show itself to them all naked and in its true guise. Such was the course pursued by Raphael," said the old man, removing his black velvet cap to express the respect inspired in him by the king of art: "his great superiority is due to the instinctive sense which, in him, seems to desire to shatter form. Form is, in his figures, what it is in ourselves, an interpreter for the communication of ideas and sensations, an exhaustless source of poetic inspiration. Every figure is a world in itself, a portrait of which the original appeared in a sublime vision, in a flood of light, pointed to by an inward voice, laid bare by a divine finger which showed what the sources of expression had been in the whole past life of the subject. You give your women fine dresses of flesh, lovely draperies of hair, but where is the blood that engenders tranquillity or passion, and causes its peculiar effects? Your saint was a brunette, but this one, my poor Porbus, is more nearly a blonde! Your people, therefore, are pale, colored phantoms which you parade before our eyes, and you call that painting and art! Because you have produced something which resembles a woman more than a house, you think that you have gained your end, and, proud beyond measure because you are no longer obliged to write beneath your figures: currus venustus or pulcher homo, as did the early painters, you fancy that you are wonderful artists! Aha! not yet, my excellent friends! you must wear out many brushes, cover many canvases, before you reach that stage! Assuredly a woman carries her head in that way, she holds her skirt so, her eyes have that languishing, melting expression of gentle resignation, the fluttering shadow of the eyelashes wavers so upon her cheeks! It is true and it is not true. What does it lack? a mere nothing, but that nothing is everything. You produce the appearance of life, but you do not express its overflowing vitality, that indefinable something which is the soul, perhaps, and which floats mistily upon the surface, — in a word, that flower of life that Titian and Raphael grasped. Starting from the last point you have reached, excellent results in painting might perhaps be attained, but you grow weary too quickly. The vulgar herd admires, and the true connoisseur smiles. O Mabuse, O my master," added this extraordinary individual, "you are a thief, you carried life away with you! — However," he continued, "this canvas is preferable to the paintings of that varlet Rubens, with his mountains of Flemish flesh sprinkled with vermilion, his waves of red hair and his medley of colors. At all events, you have harmonious coloring there, and accurate drawing, and sentiment, the three essential elements of art."

"Why, that saint is sublime, goodman!"

cried the young man, in a loud voice, rousing himself from a profound reverie. "The two figures of the saint and the boatman have a subtlety of expression unknown to the Italian painters; I do not know of one who could have represented with such art the boatman's indecision."

"Is this little knave with you?" Porbus asked the old man.

"Alas! master, pray pardon my presumption," replied the neophyte, blushing hotly. "I am unknown, a dauber of canvases by instinct, and only lately arrived in this city, the fountain of all knowledge."

"To work!" said Porbus, handing him a red pencil and a sheet of paper.

The unknown rapidly copied the Marie almost at a stroke.

"Oho!" cried the old man. "Your name?"

The youth wrote below the sketch: "Nicolas Poussin."¹

"That is not bad for a beginner," said the strange personage who harangued so wildly. "I see that we can talk painting before you. I do not blame you for admiring Porbus's saint. It is a masterpiece in the eyes of the world, and only those who are admitted to the deepest secrets of art can discover wherein it sins. But, since you are deserving of the lesson and are capable of understanding it, I am going to show you how little is needed to complete the work. Be all eyes and all attention, for such an opportunity to learn may never be offered you again. — Porbus, your palette!"

Porbus produced palette and brushes. The little old man turned up his sleeves with a quick, convulsive movement, passed his thumb through the palette, daubed and covered with colors, which Porbus handed to him; he snatched rather than took from his hands a handful of brushes of all sizes, and his pointed beard twitched sharply with the restless efforts that betrayed the passionate concupiscence of an amorous imagination. As he dipped his brush in the paint, he muttered between his teeth:

"These colors are good for nothing but to be thrown out of the window with the man who made them; they are disgustingly crude and false! How can one paint with such stuff?"

Then, with feverish animation, he dipped the end of the brush in the different mounds of color, sometimes running over the whole assortment more rapidly than a cathedral organist runs his fingers over his whole keyboard in the O Filii at Easter.

Porbus and Poussin stood like statues beside the canvas, absorbed in the most intense contemplation.

"You see, young man," said the old man, without turning his head, "you see how, with three or four strokes and a touch of bluish varnish, we can make the air circulate around the head of the poor saint, who must have felt as if she were stifling and unable to move in that dense atmosphere! See how the drapery flutters now, and how readily you understand that the breeze is raising it! It seemed before like starched cloth held up by pins. Do you see how well the satiny polish I have given the breast represents the smooth softness of a young girl's skin, and how the mixture of red-brown and burnt ochre warms up the gray coldness of that place in the shadow where the blood formed in clots instead of flowing? Young man, young man, no master could teach you what I am showing you now. Mabuse alone possessed the secret of imparting life to figures. Mabuse had but one pupil, myself. I have had none, and I am an old man! You have enough intelligence to divine the rest from the glimpse I give you."

As he talked, the singular old man touched all the different parts of the picture: here two strokes of the brush, there a single one, but always so aptly, that the result was almost a new painting, but a painting dipped in light. He worked with such passionate ardor that the perspiration stood on his bald head; all his motions were so impatient and abrupt, that it seemed to young Poussin that there must be a devil in his body, acting through his hands and forcing them to perform all sorts of fantastic antics against the man's will. The supernatural brilliancy of his eyes, the convulsive movements which seemed to be the effect of resistance to something, gave to that idea a semblance of truth well calculated to act upon a youthful imagination. He worked on, saying:

"Paf! paf! paf! this is the way we do it, young man! — Come, my little strokes, come and brighten up this frigid tone for me! Well! well! Pon! pon! pon!" he continued, giving a warm tone to the parts in which he had pointed out a lack of life, making differences of temperament disappear beneath a few daubs of color and producing the requisite unity of tone to depict a hot-blooded Egyptian. — "You see, my boy, it's only the last stroke of the brush that counts. Porbus has made hundreds, I add but one. No one gives us any credit for what is underneath. Understand that!"

At last, the demon paused, and said, turning to Porbus and Poussin, who were struck dumb with admiration:

"That is not equal to my Belle Noiseuse yet; however, a man could afford to put his name at the bottom of such a work. Yes, I would sign it," he added, rising to get a mirror in which he looked at it. — "Now, let us go to breakfast," he said. "Come to my house, both of you. I have some smoked ham and some good wine! — Yes! yes! bad as the times are, we will talk painting! We are strong men. — Here is a little fellow," he added, laying his hand on Nicolas Poussin's shoulder, "who has facility of execution."

Noticing the Norman's shabby cap, he drew a leather purse from his girdle, took two gold pieces from it, and said, as he handed them to him:

"I will buy your sketch."

"Take them," said Porbus to Poussin, seeing that he started and blushed with shame, for the young adept had a poor man's pride. "Take them, he has the ransom of two kings in his wallet!"

All three left the studio, and walked along together, conversing upon art, until they reached a fine wooden house near Pont Saint-Michel, the decorations of which, the carvings around the windows, the arabesques and the knocker, filled Poussin with admiration. The would-be painter suddenly found himself in a room on the ground-floor, in front of a rousing fire, beside a table laden with appetizing dishes, and, by incredible good-fortune, in the company of two great artists overflowing with good-humor.

"Young man," said Porbus, noticing that he was gazing in rapt admiration at a picture, "do not look too closely at that canvas, or it will drive you to despair."

It was the Adam which Mabuse painted to obtain his release from the prison in which his creditors kept him for so long a time. The face was so strikingly lifelike, that Nicolas Poussin began at that moment to understand the real meaning of the old man's confused words. The latter glanced at the picture with a gratified air, but without enthusiasm, as if to say: "I have done better!"

"There is life there," he said, "my poor master surpassed himself; but still there is a lack of truth in the background of the picture. The man is thoroughly alive, he rises and seems to walk toward us. But the air, the sky, the wind, which we breathe and see and feel, are not there. Again, there is nothing there but a man! Now, the only man who ever came forth directly from the hands of God should have a something divine, which is lacking in that picture. Mabuse himself said so with vexation, when he was not drunk."

Poussin looked from the old man to Porbus with restless curiosity. He walked toward the latter as if to ask him their host's name; but the painter put his finger to his lips with a mysterious air, and the young man, intensely interested, held his peace, hoping that some word would fall, sooner or later, which would enable him to discover the name of his host, whose wealth and talent were sufficiently attested by the respectful demeanor of Porbus, and by the treasures heaped up in that room.

Poussin, spying a magnificent portrait of a woman on the dark oak wainscoting, cried out:

"What a beautiful Giorgione!"

"No," replied the old man, "that is one of my earliest daubs."

"Tudieu! then I must be in the presence of the god of painting!" exclaimed Poussin, artlessly.

The old man smiled like one long accustomed to such praise.

"Master Frenhofer!" said Porbus, "could you not order a drop of your good Rhenish wine for me?"

"Two pipes!" replied the old man. "One to pay for the pleasure I enjoyed this morning of seeing your lovely sinner, and the other as a friendly gift."

"Ah! if I were not always ill," said Porbus, "and if you would let me see your Belle Noiseuse, I might paint a broad, high, deep picture with life-size figures."

"Show my work!" exclaimed the old man, excitedly. "No, no! I have still to put some finishing touches to it. Yesterday, toward evening, I thought that it was done. The eyes seemed moist to me, the flesh rose and fell. The locks of hair moved. It breathed! Although I have found a way to represent upon a flat canvas the relief and rounded forms of nature, this morning, by daylight, I realized my error. Ah! to attain that glorious result, I studied with the utmost care the great masters of coloring, I analyzed and dissected, layer by layer, the pictures of Titian, that king of light; like that monarch of painters, I sketched my figure in a light tone with soft, thick color, — for shadow is only an incident, remember that, my boy! — Then I returned to my work, and, by means of half-tones and varnish, making the latter less and less transparent, I made the shadow more and more pronounced, even to the deepest black; for the shadows of ordinary painters are of a different nature from their light tones; they are wood, brass, whatever you choose, except flesh in shadow. You feel that, if their figures should change their positions, the shaded places would not brighten and become light. I have avoided that fault, into which many of the most illustrious painters have fallen, and in my work the light can be felt under the opacity of the deepest shade! I have not, like a multitude of ignorant fools who imagine that they draw correctly because they make a sharp, smooth stroke, marked the outlines of my figure with absolute exactness, and brought out in relief every trifling anatomical detail, for the human body is not bounded by lines. In that respect, sculptors can approach reality more nearly than we painters. Nature provides a succession of rounded outlines which run into one another. Strictly speaking, drawing does not exist! — Do not laugh, young man! Strange as that statement may appear, you will some day realize its justice. — The line is the method by which man expresses the effect of light upon objects; but there are no lines in nature, where everything is rounded; it is in modelling that one draws, that is to say, one takes things away from their surroundings; the distribution of light alone gives a life-like appearance to the body! Wherefore, I have not sharply defined the features, I have enveloped the outlines in a cloud of warm, half-light tones which make it impossible to place your finger on the precise spot where the outline ends and the background begins. Near at hand, the work looks downy and seems to lack precision; but at a distance of two yards it all becomes distinct and stands boldly forth; the body turns, the shape becomes prominent, you can feel the air circulating all about. But I am not content as yet, I have my doubts. It may be that we ought not to draw a single line, perhaps it would be better to attack a figure in the middle, giving one's attention first to the parts that stand out most prominently in the light, and to pass thence to the darker portions. Is not such the method of the sun, the divine painter of the universe? O Nature, Nature! who has ever followed thee in thy flight? Observe that too much knowledge, like ignorance, leads to a negation. I doubt my own work!"

The old man paused, then continued:

"Young man, for ten years I have been at work; but what are ten short years when one is struggling with nature?"

We know not how much time Seigneur Pygmalion¹ consumed in making the only statue that ever walked!"

The old man fell into a profound reverie, and sat with staring eyes, playing mechanically with his knife.

"He is conversing with his spirit!" said Porbus in an undertone.

At that word, Nicolas Poussin was conscious of the pressure of an inexplicable artist's curiosity. That white-eyed old fellow, alert, yet torpid, had become something more than a man to him, and assumed the proportions of a supernatural genius, living in an unknown sphere. He aroused a thousand confused ideas in his mind. The moral phenomenon of that species of fascination can no more be defined than you can translate the emotion aroused by a song that recalls his fatherland to the exile's heart. The contempt that the old man affected to feel for the most beautiful examples of art, his wealth, his manners, Porbus's deference to him, this work of his so long kept secret, a work of untiring patience, doubtless, and of genius, if one might judge from the head of the Virgin, which young Poussin had so frankly admired, and which, beautiful even beside Mabuse's Adam, attested the imperial workmanship of one of the princes of art — everything about the old man went beyond the bounds of human nature. The one point that was clearly perceptible to Nicolas Poussin, as he contemplated that supernatural being, was a complete image of the artist's nature, of that riotous nature to which so many powers are entrusted, and which too often misuses them, leading cold reason, and bourgeois intellects, and even some connoisseurs, through innumerable stony paths where, to their apprehension, there is nothing; whereas, the white-winged maiden, in her sportive fantasy, discovers epics there, and castles, and works of art. A mocking, yet kindly nature, fruitful, yet barren! Thus, to the enthusiastic Poussin, the old man had become, by a sudden transformation, the personification of art, art with its secrets, its impulses, its reveries.

"Yes, my dear Porbus," continued Frenhofer, "thus far I have never fallen in with an absolutely perfect woman, a body whose contours are flawlessly beautiful, and whose coloring — But where is she to be found in life," he said, interrupting himself, "that undiscoverable Venus of the ancients, so often sought, some of whose charms we find now and then scattered among different persons? Oh! to see for a moment, for a single time, divine, complete, ideal nature, I would give my whole fortune. Aye, to the abode of the departed I would go to seek thee, O celestial beauty! Like Orpheus, I would go down into the hell of art, to bring back life therefrom."

"We may go now," said Porbus to Poussin; "he no longer hears us or sees us!"

"Let us go to his studio," suggested the wondering youth.

"Oh! the old fox allows no one to enter. His treasures are too well guarded for us to obtain a glance at them. I have not awaited your suggestion and your whim before making an assault upon the mystery."

"There is a mystery, then?"

"Yes," Porbus replied. "Old Frenhofer is the only pupil Mabuse ever taught. Having become his friend, his savior, his father, Frenhofer sacrificed the greater part of his treasures to gratify Mabuse's passions; in exchange, Mabuse bequeathed to him the secret of relief, the power of imparting to figures that extraordinary life, that flower of nature, which is our never-ending despair, but of which he was such a perfect master that, one day, when he had sold and drunk the flowered damask he was to wear on the occasion of the reception of Charles V., he attended his master in a paper costume painted in imitation of damask. The peculiar splendor of the stuff worn by Mabuse surprised the Emperor, who, upon undertaking to compliment the old drunkard's patron, discovered the fraud. Frenhofer is a man passionately devoted to our art, who looks higher and further than other painters. He has meditated deeply on coloring, on the absolute accuracy of the line; but he has investigated so much that he has at last reached the point of doubting the very object of his investigations. In his moments of despair he insists that there is no such thing as drawing, and that only geometrical figures can be made with lines; that goes beyond the truth, for a figure can be made with lines and with black, which is not a color; which tends to prove that our art is, like nature, composed of an infinitude of elements: drawing gives us a skeleton, color is life, but life without the skeleton is less complete than a skeleton without life. In fine, there is something truer than all of this; namely, that practice and observation are everything to a painter, and that, if rhetoric and poetry quarrel with the brush, we reach the doubting stage like the goodman here, who is as much a madman as a painter. Sublime painter that he is, he was unfortunate enough to be born rich, which has made it possible for him to go astray; do not imitate him! Work! painters ought to meditate only with brush in hand."

"We will find our way!" cried Poussin, no longer listening to Porbus, and fearing nothing.

Porbus smiled at the young stranger's enthusiasm and left him, after inviting him to repeat his visit.

Nicolas Poussin returned slowly toward Rue de la Harpe, and passed, without noticing it, the modest hostelry at which he lodged. Ascending the wretched staircase with anxious speed, he reached at last a room on the upper floor beneath a roof with columnar supports, whose interstices were closed with plaster, a simple and airy style of architecture common in the houses of old Paris. Beside the single grimy window of the room sat a young girl, who sprang to her feet with a loving impulse as she heard the painter's hand upon the door, recognizing him by his touch upon the knob.

"What is the matter?" she said.

"Why — why —" he cried, choking with pleasure, "why, I have a feeling that I am a painter! I had always doubted myself hitherto, but this morning I believe in myself! I may be a great man! I tell you, Gillette, we shall be rich and happy! There is gold in these brushes —"

But suddenly he held his peace. His grave, strong face lost its joyous light when he compared the vastness of his hopes with the paucity of his resources. The walls were covered with bits of paper on which were sketches in pencil. He did not own four clean canvases. Colors were expensive in those days, and the poor fellow saw that his palette was almost bare. Amid all that destitution, he possessed and was conscious of boundless wealth of heart and a superabundance of consuming genius. Brought to Paris by a nobleman who was a friend of his family, or perhaps by his own talent, he had suddenly fallen in with a mistress there, one of those noble and generous souls whose destiny it often is to suffer beside a great man, espousing his cares and struggling to understand his caprices; strong to endure poverty and love, as others are bold to carry the burden of luxury and to parade their lack of feeling. The smile playing about Gillette's lips illumined that garret and rivalled the sky in brilliancy. The sun was not always shining, while she was always at hand, absorbed in her passion, clinging to her happiness and her suffering, comforting the genius that overflowed in love before seizing upon art.

"Come, Gillette, and listen."

The glad-hearted girl obediently jumped upon the painter's knee. She was all grace, all beauty, pretty as the springtime, arrayed in all womanly charms, and brightening them with the flame of a lovely soul.

"Oh! God," he cried, "I shall never dare to tell her."

"A secret?" she rejoined; "I insist upon knowing it."

Poussin was lost in thought.

"Speak, I beg you."

"Gillette — poor, beloved heart! —"

"Oho! do you want something of me?"

"Yes."

"If you want me to pose for you again as I did the other day," she rejoined, with a little pout, "I will never consent, for at those times your eyes no longer say aught to me. You no longer think of me, and still you look at me."

"Would you prefer to see me copying another woman?"

"Perhaps," said she, "if she were very ugly."

"But," continued Poussin, in a serious tone, "suppose that, in the interest of my future renown, to help to make me a great painter, it were necessary for you to pose for another person?"

"You are trying to test me," she replied. "You know that I would not go."

Poussin let his head fall forward on his breast, like a man who succumbs to a joy or a sorrow that is too intense for his strength.

"Listen," said she, plucking at the sleeve of Poussin's threadbare doublet, "I have told you, Nick, that I would give my life for you; but I never promised you that I would renounce my love while I live."

"Renounce it?" cried the young artist. "If I should exhibit myself so to another, you would no longer love me; and I myself should consider myself unworthy of you. Is it not a natural and simple thing to obey your wishes? Do what I may, I am happy, aye, and proud, to do your dear will. But for another, nay, nay!"

"Forgive me, dear Gillette!" said the painter, throwing himself at her feet. "I prefer to be loved rather than to be glorious. To me, you are fairer than wealth or honors. Go, throw away my brushes, burn yonder sketches. I have gone astray. My true calling is to love you. I am no painter, I am a lover. A fig for art and all its secrets!"

She was overjoyed and charmed, she admired him! She was queen, she felt instinctively that the arts were forgotten for her, and cast at her feet as a grain of incense.

"And yet he is only an old man," continued Poussin. "He can see naught but the woman in you. You are so perfect!"

"One must love with all one's heart," she cried, ready to sacrifice the scruples of her love to reward her lover for all the sacrifices he was making for her. "But," she added, "it would be my ruin. Ah! to ruin myself for you — that would be very sweet! but you would forget me. Oh! how unfortunate it is that you had such a thought!"

"I did have it, and I love you," he said, with something like contrition; "but does that make me an infamous creature?"

"Let us consult Père Hardouin," she said.

"Oh! no; let it be a secret between us."

"Very well, I will go; but do not be in the room," she said. "Remain at the door, armed with your dagger. If I cry out, rush in, and kill the painter."

No longer conscious of aught but his art, Poussin folded Gillette in his arms.

"He does not love me now!" she thought, when she was alone.

She already repented of her resolution. But she soon fell a victim to a terror more painful than her repentance: she strove to banish a ghastly thought that crept into her mind. She fancied that she already loved the painter less, suspecting him of being less worthy of her esteem than she had believed.

II

CATHERINE LESCAULT

Three months after the first meeting of Poussin and Porbus, the latter called upon Master Frenhofer. The old man was at the time a prey to one of those spontaneous attacks of profound depression, the cause of which, if we are to believe medical mathematicians, is to be found in a sluggish digestion, in the wind, the heat, or some trouble in the hypochondriac region; and, according to the spiritualists, in the imperfection of our moral nature. The good man had simply worn himself out completing his mysterious picture. He was sitting languidly in a great chair of carved oak, upholstered in black leather; and, without laying aside his melancholy expression, he bestowed upon Porbus the glance of a man who had become reconciled to his ennui.

"Well, master," said Porbus, "was the ultramarine for which you sent to Bruges good for nothing? Have you not been able to pulverize your new white? Is your oil bad or are your brushes troublesome?"

"Alas!" cried the old man, "I thought for a moment that my work was finished; but I have certainly gone wrong in some details, and my mind will not be at rest until I have cleared away my doubts. I have decided to travel, and visit Turkey, Greece, and Asia in search for models, in order to compare my picture with nature in different forms. It may be that I have Nature herself upstairs," he continued, with a contented smile. "Sometimes I am afraid that a breath may awaken that woman and that she will disappear."

Suddenly he rose, as if to go away.

"Stay!" said Porbus, "I have come in time to save you the expense and fatigue of the journey."

"How so?" demanded Frenhofer in amazement.

"Young Poussin is beloved by a woman whose incomparable beauty is absolutely free from imperfection. But, my dear master, if he consents to lend her to you, you must at least let us see your canvas."

The old man stood motionless, in a state of absolute bewilderment.

"What!" he sorrowfully exclaimed at last, "exhibit my creation, my spouse? tear aside the veil behind which I have modestly concealed my happiness? Why, that would be most shocking prostitution! For ten years past, I have lived with this woman, she is mine, mine alone; she loves me. Does she not smile at each stroke of the brush that I have given her? she has a soul, a soul with which I have endowed her. She would blush if other eyes than mine did but rest upon her. Exhibit her! where is the husband, the lover, so vile as to lead his wife to dishonor? When you paint a picture for the court, you do not put your whole soul into it, you sell to courtiers naught but colored manikins. My painting is not a painting, it is a sentiment, a passion! Born in my studio, it must remain there in virgin purity, and cannot go thence except it be clothed. Poetry and women abandon themselves naked to none but their lovers! Do we possess Raphael's model, Ariosto's Angelica, Dante's Beatrice? No! we see only their figures. Mark this, that the work I have up yonder under lock is an exception in our art. It is not a canvas, it is a woman! a woman with whom I weep and laugh, and talk and think. Would you have me suddenly cast aside a joy of ten years' standing as one discards a cloak; would you have me suddenly cease to be a father, a lover, and a god? That woman is not a creature, she is a creation. Let your youth come: I will give him my treasures, I will give him Correggios, Michael Angelos, Titians, I will kiss his footprints in the dust; but make him my rival? shame upon me! Ah! I am more lover than painter even now. Yes, I shall have the courage to burn my Belle Noiseuse when I draw my last breath; but force her to endure the glance of another man, a young man, a painter? No, no! I would kill the man on the next day, who had sullied her with a glance. I would kill him on the spot, even you, my friend, if you did not salute her on your knees! Would you have me now subject my idol to the cold stare and the stupid criticism of fools? Ah! love is a mystery, it lives only in the lowest depths of the heart, and all is lost when a man says, even to his friend: 'There is the woman I love!'"

The old man seemed to have become young again; his eyes sparkled with life; his pale cheeks were suffused with a bright red flush, and his hands shook. Porbus, amazed at the passionate violence with which these words were uttered, was at a loss for a fitting response to a sentiment as strange as it was intense. Was Frenhofer sane or mad? Was he under the spell of an artist's caprice, or were the ideas he expressed attributable to the strange fanaticism produced in us by the long and painful delivery of a great work? Could one hope ever to reach an understanding with that strange passion?

Revolving all these thoughts in his mind, Porbus said to the old man:

"But is it not woman for woman? does not Poussin subject his mistress to your gaze?"

"What mistress?" replied Frenhofer.

"She will betray him sooner or later. Mine will always be true to me!"

"Very well," rejoined Porbus, "let us say no more about it. But you may die, leaving your work unfinished, before you find, even in Asia, a woman so lovely, so perfect, as the one of whom I speak."

"Oh! it is finished," said Frenhofer. "Whoever should see it would believe that he was looking at a woman lying on a bed of velvet with curtains about her. By her side is a golden tripod, giving forth perfume. You would be tempted to grasp the tassel of the cord that holds back the curtains, and it would seem to you that you saw the bosom of Catherine Lescault, a famous courtesan called La Belle Noiseuse, actually rise and fall with her respiration. And yet I would like to be perfectly certain —"

"Go to Asia, then," suggested Porbus, detecting something like hesitation in Frenhofer's glance. And he took two or three steps toward the door of the room.

At that moment, Gillette and Nicolas Poussin reached the outer door of Frenhofer's house. As the girl was on the point of entering, she took her hand from the painter's arm and recoiled as if she were seized by a sudden presentiment.

"Why have I come here?" she asked her lover, in a deep voice, looking at him with staring eyes.

"Gillette, I left you free to do as you chose, and I wish to obey you in everything. You are my conscience and my glory. Return to the house; I shall be happier, perhaps, than if you —"

"Do I belong to myself when you speak so to me? Ah! no, I am no more than a child. — Come," she added, apparently making a mighty effort, "even if our love dies and I plant lifelong regret in my heart, will not your renown be the reward of my compliance with your wishes? Let us enter; it will be as if I still lived, if I remain a living memory on your palette."

As they opened the street door, the lovers found themselves face to face with Porbus, who, surprised by the loveliness of Gillette, whose eyes were full of tears at the moment, seized the trembling girl's hand and led her to the old man.

"Look," said he, "is she not the equal of all the masterpieces on earth?"

Frenhofer started. Gillette stood before him in the simple, artless attitude of an innocent, shy young Georgian girl, kidnapped by brigands and brought before a slave-dealer. A blush of shame tinged her cheeks, she lowered her eyes, her hands hung at her sides, her strength seemed to desert her, and her tears protested against the outrage inflicted upon her modesty. At that moment, Poussin, in despair at having brought that lovely treasure forth from its garret, cursed himself. He became more lover than artist, and a thousand scruples wrung his heart when he saw the old man's eye flash with youthful fire as, in accordance with the custom of painters, he mentally disrobed the girl, so to speak, divining her most secret charms. Thereupon he reverted to the fierce jealousy of true love.

"Let us go, Gillette!" he cried.

At that cry, at that tone, his mistress joyfully raised her eyes to his and rushed into his arms.

"Ah! then you do love me?" she replied, bursting into tears.

She had had the courage to impose silence on her suffering, but she lacked the strength to conceal her happiness.

"Oh! leave her with me for a moment," said the old painter, "and you shall compare her with my Catherine, — yes, I consent."

There was the ring of love in that exclamation of Frenhofer's. He seemed to be playing the coquette for his simulacrum of a woman, and to enjoy in anticipation the triumph which the beauty of his creation was destined to win over that of a girl of flesh and blood.

"Do not let him retract his consent!" cried Porbus, laying his hand upon Poussin's shoulder. "The fruits of love soon pass away, those of art are immortal."

"Pray, am I nothing more than a woman in his eyes?" said Gillette, gazing earnestly at Poussin and Porbus.

Proudly she raised her head; but when, after a piercing glance at Frenhofer, she saw her lover intently contemplating anew the portrait he had once taken for a Giorgione, she exclaimed:

"Come, let us go up! he never looked at me like that."

"Old man," said Poussin, aroused from his meditation by Gillette's voice, "look at this sword: I will bury it in your heart at the first word of complaint uttered by this girl, I will put the torch to your house and no person shall go forth from it. Do you understand?"

Nicolas Poussin's expression was menacing and his voice was awe-inspiring. The young painter's bearing and, more than all else, his gestures comforted Gillette, who almost forgave him for sacrificing her to the art of painting and to his glorious future. Porbus and Poussin remained at the studio door, gazing at each other in silence. Although the painter of Marie the Egyptian ventured at first upon an exclamation or two: "Ah! she is undressing, he is telling her to stand in the light! He is comparing her with the other!" Poussin's aspect soon imposed silence upon him; the young man's face was profoundly sad; and, although old painters have none of those scruples which seem so trivial in presence of art, he admired them, they were so artless and winning. The young man had his hand on the hilt of his dagger, and his ear almost glued to the door. Both were standing in the shadow, like two conspirators awaiting the moment to strike down a tyrant.

"Come in, come in," said the old man, beaming with happiness. "My work is perfect, and now I can exhibit it with pride. Never will painter, brushes, colors, canvas, and light produce a rival to Catherine Lescault, the beautiful courtesan!"

Impelled by intense curiosity, Porbus and Poussin ran into the centre of a vast studio covered with dust, where everything was in confusion, with pictures hanging on the walls here and there. They paused at first before a life-size picture of a woman, half-nude, at which they gazed in admiration.

"Oh! do not waste time over that," said Frenhofer; "that is a canvas that I daubed to study a pose; that picture is worth nothing at all. Those are my mistakes," he continued, pointing to a number of fascinating compositions on the walls about them.

Thereupon, Porbus and Poussin, dumfounded by that contemptuous reference to such works, looked about for the portrait he had described to them, but could not succeed in finding it.

"Well, there it is!" said the old man, whose hair was in disorder, whose face was inflamed by supernatural excitement, whose eyes snapped, and whose breath came in gasps, like that of a young man drunk with love. — "Ah!" he cried, "you did not anticipate such perfection! You are in presence of a woman and you are looking for a picture. There is such depth of color upon that canvas, the air is so true, that you cannot distinguish it from the air about us. Where is art? lost, vanished! Those are the outlines of a real young woman. Have I not grasped the coloring, caught the living turn of the line that seems to mark the limits of the body? Is it not the self-same phenomenon presented by objects that swim in the atmosphere like fish in the water? Mark how the outlines stand out from the background! Does it not seem to you as if you could pass your hand over that back? For seven years I have studied the effects of the joining of light and figures. See that hair, does not the light fall in a flood upon it? Why, she breathed, I verily believe! — Look at that bosom! Ah! who would not kneel and adore it? The flesh quivers. Wait, she is about to rise!"

"Can you see anything?" Poussin asked Porbus.

"No. — And you?"

"Nothing."

The two painters left the old man to his raving, and looked about to see whether the light, falling too full upon the canvas that he pointed out to them, did not neutralize all its fine effects. They examined the painting from the right side and the left and in front, stooping and standing erect in turn.

"Yes, oh! yes, that is a canvas," said Frenhofer, misunderstanding the object of that careful scrutiny. "See, there are the frame and the easel, and here are my paints, my brushes."

And he seized a brush which he handed them with an artless gesture.

"The old lansquenet is making sport of us," said Poussin, returning to his position in front of the alleged picture. "I can see nothing there but colors piled upon one another in confusion, and held in restraint by a multitude of curious lines which form a wall of painting."

"We are mistaken," said Porbus, "look!"

On drawing nearer, they spied in one corner of the canvas the end of a bare foot standing forth from that chaos of colors, of tones, of uncertain shades, that sort of shapeless mist; but a lovely foot, a living foot! They stood fairly petrified with admiration before that fragment, which had escaped that most incredible, gradual, progressive destruction. That foot appeared there as the trunk of a Parian marble Venus would appear among the ruins of a burned city.

"There is a woman underneath!" cried Porbus, calling Poussin's attention to the layers of paints which the old painter had laid on, one after another, believing that he was perfecting his picture.

The two artists turned instinctively toward Frenhofer, beginning to understand, but only vaguely as yet, the trance in which he lived.

"He speaks in perfect good faith," said Porbus.

"Yes, my friend," interposed the old man, rousing himself, "one must have faith, faith in art, and live a long, long while with his work, to produce such a creation. Some of those shadows have cost me many hours of toil. See on that cheek, just below the eye, there is a slight penumbra which, if you observe it in nature, will seem to you almost impossible to reproduce. Well, do you fancy that that effect did not cost me incredible labor? And so, dear Porbus, scrutinize my work with care, and you will understand better what I said to you about the manner of treating the model and the contours. Look at the light on the bosom, and see how I have succeeded, by a succession of heavy strokes and relief-work, in catching the genuine light and combining it with the gleaming whiteness of the light tints; and how, by the contrary process, by smoothing down the lumps and roughness of the paint, I have been able, by dint of touching caressingly the contour of my figure, swimming in the half-light, to take away every suggestion of drawing and of artificial methods, and to give it the aspect, the very roundness of nature. Go nearer and you will see that work better. At a distance, it is invisible. Look! at that point, it is very remarkable, in my opinion."

With the end of his brush he pointed out to the two painters a thick layer of light paint.

Porbus put his hand on the old man's shoulder and turned toward Poussin.

"Do you know that in this man we have a very great artist?" he said.

"He is even more poet than artist," said Poussin, with perfect gravity.

"That," added Porbus, pointing to the canvas, "marks the end of our art on earth."

"And, from that, it will pass out of sight in the skies," said Poussin.

"How much enjoyment over that piece of canvas!" exclaimed Porbus.

The old man, absorbed in reverie, did not listen to them; he was smiling at that imaginary woman.

"But sooner or later he will discover that there is nothing on his canvas!" cried Poussin.

"Nothing on my canvas!" exclaimed Frenhofer, glancing alternately at the two painters and his picture.

"What have you done?" said Porbus in an undertone to Poussin.

The old man seized the young man's arm roughly, and said to him:

"You see nothing there, clown! varlet! miscreant! hound! Why, what brought you here, then? — My good Porbus," he continued, turning to the older painter, "can it be that you, you too, are mocking at me? Answer me! I am your friend; tell me, have I spoiled my picture?"

Porbus hesitated, he dared not speak;

but the anxiety depicted on the old man's white face was so heart-rending that he pointed to the canvas, saying:

"Look!"

Frenhofer gazed at his picture for a moment and staggered.

"Nothing! nothing! And I have worked ten years!"

He fell upon a chair and wept.

"So I am an idiot, a madman! I have neither talent nor capability! I am naught save a rich man who, in walking, does nothing more than walk! So I shall have produced nothing!"

He gazed at his canvas through his tears, then suddenly rose proudly from his chair, and cast a flashing glance upon the two painters.

"By the blood, by the body, by the head of Christ! you are jealous dogs who seek to make me believe that it is ruined, in order to steal it from me! I see her!" he cried, "she is marvellously lovely."

At that moment, Poussin heard Gillette weeping in a corner, where she lay forgotten.

"What is it, my angel?" asked the painter, suddenly transformed into the lover once more.

"Kill me!" said she. "I should be a vile wretch to love you still, for I despise you. — I admire you, and you make me shudder! I love you, and I believe that I already hate you!"

While Poussin listened to Gillette, Frenhofer covered his Catherine with a green cloth, with the grave calmness of a jeweller closing his drawers in the belief that he is in the company of adroit thieves. He cast a glance of profound hatred on the two painters, a glance overflowing with scorn and distrust, and silently turned them out of his studio with convulsive haste; standing on the threshold of the outer door, he said to them:

"Adieu, my little friends!"

That parting salute froze the blood in their veins. The next day, Porbus, feeling anxious concerning Frenhofer, called once more at his house, and learned that he had died during the night after burning his pictures.

ZOLA

(1840-1902)

Émile Zola was born in Paris and spent his childhood at Aix-en-Provence. After going to the school of St. Louis in Paris, he entered the book trade. In his leisure hours he wrote literary and dramatic criticism. His first novel to attract attention was Ninon (1864). Thérèse Raquin (1867) plainly indicated his drift toward the analytic representation of the darker side of man's nature. In 1871 he began his famous Rougon-Macquart series of twenty volumes, the most popular of which is La Débâcle (1892). The series traces the psychological-social history of a family during the Second Empire, and aims to make a scientifically accurate representation of life that would help to determine how much of a man's nature is inborn, and how much is due to environment. He wrote with what he believed to be absolute fidelity to nature, and his work was a great factor in the establishment of the realistic school of novelists. Zola's particular brand of realism, known as "naturalism," is based upon the theory that the novelist should follow the so-called "experimental" method; that is, should work, as in a laboratory, upon the events and characters furnished by painstaking, exact observation. Although he devoted nearly his whole life to novels, he made some excursions into criticism (especially The Experimental Novel, 1880). He attracted much attention during the Dreyfus case by his article "J'accuse." After this affair his work took a political turn and also showed a glimmer of optimism. His last books were Fruitfulness (1899), Labor (1901), and Truth (1902). Justice, which was to have been the fourth book of this series, was never written. Though Zola, like other "naturalistic" writers, is too apt to see the ugly in life to the neglect of the beautiful, his best work constitutes a powerful indictment of many brutalizing forces in modern civilization.

The translation of The Attack on the Mill (1880) is taken from The Great Modern French Stories, New York, Boni and Liveright, 1917.

•THE ATTACK ON THE MILL

I

It was high holiday at Father Merlier's mill on that pleasant summer afternoon. Three tables had been brought out into the garden and placed end to end in the shadow of the great elm, and now they were awaiting the arrival of the guests. It was known throughout the length and breadth of the land that that day was to witness the betrothal of old Merlier's daughter, Françoise, to Dominique, a young man who was said to be not overfond of work, but whom never a woman for three leagues of the country around could look at without sparkling eyes, such a well-favored young fellow was he.

That mill of Father Merlier's was truly a very pleasant spot. It was situated right in the heart of Rocreuse, at the place where the main road makes a sharp bend. The village has but a single street, bordered on either side by a row of low, whitened cottages, but just there where the road curves, there are broad stretches of meadow-land, and huge trees, which follow the course of the Morelle and cover the low grounds of the valley with a most delicious shade. All Lorraine has no more charming bit of nature to show. To right and left dense forests, great monarchs of the wood, centuries old, rise from the gentle slopes and fill the horizon with a sea of verdure, while away towards the south extends the plain, of wondrous fertility and checkered almost to infinity with its small enclosures, divided off from one another by their live hedges. But what makes the crowning glory of Rocreuse is the coolness of this verdurous nook, even in the hottest days of July and August. The Morelle comes down from the woods of Gagny, and it would seem as if it gathered to itself on the way all the delicious freshness of the foliage beneath which it glides for many a league; it brings down with it the murmuring sounds, the glacial, solemn shadows of the forest. And that is not the only source of coolness; there are running waters of all kinds singing among the copes; one cannot take a step without coming on a gushing spring, and as he makes his way along the narrow paths he seems to be treading above subterranean lakes that seek the air and sunshine through the moss above and profit by every smallest crevice at the roots of trees or among the chinks and crannies of the rocks, to burst forth in fountains of crystalline clearness. So numerous and so loud are the whispering voices of these streams that they silence the song of the 10 bullfinches. It is as if one were in an enchanted park, with cascades falling on every side.

The meadows below are never athirst. The shadows beneath the gigantic chest-nut trees are of inky blackness, and along the edges of the fields long rows of poplars stand like walls of rustling foliage. There is a double avenue of huge plane trees ascending across the fields towards the ancient castle of Gagny, now gone to rack and ruin. In this region, where drought is never known, vegetation of all kinds is wonderfully rank; it is like a flower garden down there in the low ground between 25 those two wooded hills, a natural garden where the lawns are broad meadows and the giant trees represent colossal beds. When the noon-day sun pours down his scorching rays the shadows lie blue upon 30 the ground, the glowing vegetation slumbers in the heat, while every now and then a breath of icy coldness passes under a foliage.

Such was the spot where Father Merlier's mill enlivened with its cheerful clack nature run riot. The building itself, constructed of wood and plaster, looked as if it might be coeval with our planet. Its foundations were in part washed by the Morelle, which here expands into a clear pool. A dam, a few feet in height, afforded sufficient head of water to drive the old wheel, which creaked and groaned as it revolved, with the asthmatic wheezing of a faithful servant who has grown old in her place. Whenever Father Merlier was advised to change it, he would shake his head and say that like as not a young wheel 50 would be lazier and not so well acquainted with its duties, and then he would set to work and patch up the old one with anything that came to hand, old hogshead staves, bits of rusty iron, zinc or lead. The old wheel only seemed the gayer for it, with its odd profile, all plumed and feathered with tufts of moss and grass, and when the water poured over it in a silver tide its gaunt black skeleton was decked out with a gorgeous display of pearls and diamonds.

That portion of the mill which was bathed by the Morelle had something of the look of a barbaric arch that had been dropped down there by chance. A good half of the structure was built on piles; 15 the water came in under the floor, and there were deep holes, famous throughout the whole country for the eels and huge crawfish that were to be caught there. Below the fall the pool was as clear as a mirror, and when it was not clouded by foam from the wheel one could see troops of great fish swimming about in it with the slow, majestic movement of a squadron. There was a broken stairway leading down to the stream, near a stake to which a boat was fastened, and over the wheel was a gallery of wood. Such win- 20 dows as there were were arranged without any attempt at order. The whole was a quaint conglomeration of nooks and corners, bits of wall, additions made here and there as afterthoughts, beams and roofs, that gave the mill the aspect of an old dismantled citadel; but ivy and all sorts of 35 creeping plants had grown luxuriantly and kindly covered up such crevices as were too unsightly, casting a mantle of green over the old dwelling. Young ladies who passed that way used to stop and sketch 40 Father Merlier's mill in their albums.

The side of the house that faced the road was less irregular. A gateway, in stone afforded access to the principal courtyard, 45 on the right and left hand of which were sheds and stables. Beside a well stood an immense elm that threw its shade over half the court. At the further end, opposite the gate, stood the house surmounted by a dove-cote, the four windows of its first floor in a symmetrical line. The only vanity that Father Merlier ever allowed himself was to paint this facade every ten years. It had just been freshly whitened at the time of our story, and dazzled the eyes of all the village when the sun lighted it up in the middle of the day.

For twenty years had Father Merlier been mayor of Rocreuse. He was held in great consideration on account of his fortune; he was supposed to be worth something like eighty thousand francs, the result of patient saving. When he married Madeleine Guillard, who brought him the mill as her dowry, his entire capital lay in his two strong arms, but Madeleine had never repented of her choice, so manfully had he conducted their joint affairs. Now his wife was dead, and he was left a widower with his daughter Françoise. Doubtless he might have set himself down to take his rest, and suffered the old mill-wheel to sleep among its moss, but he would have found idleness too irksome and the house would have seemed dead to him. He kept on working still for the pleasure of it. In those days Father Merlier was a tall old man, with a long, silent face, on which a laugh was never seen, but beneath which there lay, none the less, a large fund of good-humor. He had been elected mayor on account of his money, and also for the impressive air that he knew how to assume when it devolved on him to marry a couple.

Françoise Merlier had just completed her eighteenth year. She was small, and for that reason was not accounted one of the beauties of the country. Until she reached the age of fifteen she had been even homely: the good folks of Rocreuse could not see how it was that the daughter of Father and Mother Merlier, such a hale, vigorous couple, had such a hard time of it in getting her growth. When she was fifteen, however, though still remaining delicate, a change came over her and she took on the prettiest little face imaginable. She had black hair, black eyes, and was red as a rose withal; her mouth was always smiling, there were delicious dimples in her cheeks, and a crown of sunshine seemed to be ever resting on her fair, candid forehead. Although small as girls went in that region, she was far from being thin; she might not have been able to raise a sack of wheat to her shoulder, but she became quite plump as she grew older, and gave promise of becoming eventually as well rounded and appetising as a partridge. Her father's habits of taciturnity had made her reflective while yet a young girl; if she always had a smile on her lips it was in order to give pleasure to others. Her natural disposition was serious.

As was no more than to be expected, she had every young man in the countryside at her heels as a suitor, more even for her money than her attractiveness, and she had made a choice at last, a choice that had been the talk and scandal of the entire neighborhood.

On the other side of the Morelle lived a strapping young fellow who went by the name of Dominique Penquer. He was not of the manner born; ten years previously he had come to Rocreuse from Belgium to receive the inheritance of an uncle who had owned a small property on the very borders of the forest of Gagny, just facing the mill and distant from it only a few musket-shots. His object in coming was to sell the property, so he said, and return to his own home again; but he must have found the land to his liking, for he made no move to go away. He was seen cultivating his bit of field and gathering the few vegetables that afforded him an existence. He fished, he hunted; more than once he was near coming in contact with the law through the intervention of the keepers. This independent way of living, of which the peasants could not very clearly see the resources, had in the end given him a bad name. He was vaguely looked on as nothing better than a poacher. At all events he was lazy, for he was frequently found sleeping in the grass at hours when he should have been at work. Then, too, the hut in which he lived, in the shade of the last trees of the forest, did not seem like the abode of an honest young man; the old women would not have been surprised at any time to hear that he was on friendly terms with the wolves in the ruins of Gagny. Still, the young girls would now and then venture to stand up for him, for he was altogether a splendid specimen of manhood, was this individual of doubtful antecedents, tall and straight as a young poplar, with a milk-white skin and ruddy hair and moustaches that seemed to be of gold when the sun shone on them. Now one fine morning it came to pass that Françoise told Father Merlier that she loved Dominique, and that never would she consent to marry any other young man.

It may be imagined what a knockdown blow it was that Father Merlier received that day! As was his wont, he said never a word; his countenance wore its usual reflective look, only the fun that used to bubble up from within no longer shone in his eyes. Françoise, too, was very serious, and for a week father and daughter scarcely spoke to each other. What troubled Father Merlier was to know how that rascal of a poacher had succeeded in bewitching his daughter. Dominique had never shown himself at the mill. The miller played the spy a little, and was rewarded by catching sight of the gallant, on the other side of the Morelle, lying among the grass and pretending to be asleep. Françoise could see him from her chamber window. The thing was clear enough; they had been making sheep's-eyes at each other over the old mill-wheel, and so had fallen in love.

A week slipped by; Françoise became more and more serious. Father Merlier still continued to say nothing. Then, one evening, of his own accord, he brought Dominique to the house, without a word. Françoise was just setting the table. She made no demonstration of surprise; all she did was to add another plate, but her laugh had come back to her, and the little dimples appeared again upon her cheeks. Father Merlier had gone that morning to look for Dominique at his hut on the edge of the forest, and there the two men had had a conference, with closed doors and windows, that lasted three hours. No one ever knew what they said to each other; the only thing certain is that when Father Merlier left the hut he already treated Dominique as a son. Doubtless the old man had discovered that he whom he had gone to visit was a worthy young fellow, even though he did lie in the grass to gain the love of young girls.

All Rocreuse was up in arms. The women gathered at their doors and could not find words strong enough to characterize Father Merlier's folly in thus receiving a ne'er-do-well into his family. He let them talk. Perhaps he thought of his own marriage. Neither had he possessed a penny to his name at the time he married Madeleine and her mill, and yet that had not prevented him from being a good husband to her. Moreover, Dominique put an end to their tittle-tattle by setting to work in such strenuous fashion that all the countryside was amazed. It so happened just then that the boy of the mill drew an unlucky number and had to go for a soldier, and Dominique would not hear of their engaging another. He lifted sacks, drove the cart, wrestled with the old wheel when it took an obstinate fit and refused to turn, and all so pluckily and cheerfully that people came from far and near merely for the pleasure of seeing him. Father Merlier laughed his silent laugh. He was highly elated that he had read the youngster aright. There is nothing like love to hearten up young men.

In the midst of all that laborious toil Françoise and Dominique fairly worshipped each other. They had not much to say, but their tender smiles conveyed a world of meaning. Father Merlier had not said a word thus far on the subject of their marriage, and they had both respected his silence, waiting until the old man should see fit to give expression to his will. At last, one day, toward the middle of July, he had had three tables laid in the courtyard, in the shade of the big elm, and had invited his friends of Rocreuse to come that afternoon and drink a glass of wine with him. When the courtyard was filled with people, and every one there had a full glass in his hand, Father Merlier raised his own high above his head and said:

"I have the pleasure of announcing to you that Françoise and this lad will be married in a month from now, on St. Louis' fête-day."¹

Then there was a universal touching of glasses, attended by a tremendous uproar; every one was laughing. But Father Merlier, raising his voice above the din, again spoke:

"Dominique, kiss your wife that is to be. It is no more than customary."

And they kissed, very red in the face, both of them, while the company laughed louder still. It was a regular fête; they emptied a small cask. Then, when only the intimate friends of the house remained, conversation went on in a calmer strain. Night had fallen, a starlit night, and very clear. Dominique and Françoise sat on a bench, side by side, and said nothing. An old peasant spoke of the war that the Emperor had declared against Prussia. All the lads of the village were already gone off to the army. Troops had passed through the place only the night before. There were going to be hard knocks.

"Bah!" said Father Merlier, with the selfishness of a man who is quite happy, "Dominique is a foreigner; he won't have to go — and, if the Prussians come this way, he will be here to defend his wife."

The idea of the Prussians coming there seemed to the company an exceedingly good joke. The army would give them one good conscientious thrashing, and the affair would be quickly ended.

"I have seen them before, I have seen them before," the old peasant repeated, in a low voice.

There was silence for a little, then they all touched glasses once again. Françoise and Dominique had heard nothing; they had managed to clasp hands behind the bench in such a way as not to be seen by the others, and this condition of affairs seemed so beatific to them that they sat there mute, their gaze lost in the darkness of the night.

What a magnificent, balmy night! The village lay slumbering on either side of the white road as peacefully as a little child. The deep silence was undisturbed save by the occasional crow of a cock in some distant barnyard acting on a mistaken impression that dawn was at hand. Perfumed breaths of air, like long-drawn sighs, came down from the great woods that lay around and above, sweeping softly over the roofs, as if caressing them. The meadows, with their black intensity of shadow, took on a dim, mysterious majesty of their own, while all the springs, all the brooks and watercourses that gurgled in the darkness, might have been taken for the cool and rhythmical breathing of the sleeping country. Every now and then the old dozing mill-wheel seemed to be dreaming like a watchdog that barks uneasily in his slumber; it creaked, it talked to itself, rocked by the fall of the Morelle, whose current gave forth the deep, sustained music of an organ-pipe. Never was there a more charming or happier nook, never did a deeper peace come down to cover it.

II

One month later, to a day, on the eve of the fête of Saint Louis, Rocreuse was in a state of alarm and dismay. The Prussians had beaten the Emperor, and were advancing on the village by forced marches. For a week past people passing along the road had brought tidings of the enemy: "They are at Lormières, they are at Nouvelles"; and by dint of hearing so many stories of the rapidity of their advance, Rocreuse woke up every morning in the full expectation of seeing them swarming out of Gagny wood. They did not come, however, and that only served to make the affright the greater. They would certainly fall upon the village in the nighttime, and put every soul to the sword.

There had been an alarm the night before, a little before daybreak. The inhabitants had been aroused by a great noise of men tramping upon the road. The women were already throwing themselves upon their knees and making the sign of the cross, when some one, to whom it happily occurred to peep through a half-opened window, caught sight of red trousers. It was a French detachment. The captain had forthwith asked for the mayor, and, after a long conversation with Father Merlier, had remained at the mill.

The sun shone bright and clear that morning, giving promise of a warm day.

There was a golden light floating over the woodland, while in the low grounds white mists were rising from the meadows. The pretty village, so neat and trim, awoke in the cool dawning, and the country, with its streams and its fountains, was as gracious as a freshly plucked bouquet. But the beauty of the day brought gladness to the face of no one; the villagers had watched the captain, and seen him circle round and round the old mill, examine the adjacent houses, then pass to the other bank of the Morelle, and from thence scan the country with a field-glass; Father Merlier, who accompanied him, appeared to be giving explanations. After that the captain had posted some of his men behind walls, behind trees or in hollows. The main body of the detachment had encamped in the courtyard by the mill. So there was going to be a fight, then? And when Father Merlier returned they questioned him. He spoke no word, but slowly and sorrowfully nodded his head. Yes, there was going to be a fight.

Françoise and Dominique were there in the courtyard, watching him. He finally took his pipe from his lips and gave utterance to these few words:

"Ah! my poor children, I shall not be able to marry you today!"

Dominique, with lips tight set and an angry frown upon his forehead, raised himself on tiptoe from time to time and stood with eyes bent on Gagny wood, as if he would have been glad to see the Prussians appear and end the suspense they were in. Françoise, whose face was grave and very pale, was constantly passing back and forth, supplying the needs of the soldiers. They were preparing their soup in a corner of the courtyard, joking and chaffing one another while awaiting their meal.

The captain appeared to be highly pleased. He had visited the chambers and the great hall of the mill that looked out on the stream. Now, seated beside the well, he was conversing with Father Merlier.

"You have a regular fortress here," he was saying.

"We shall have no trouble in holding it until evening. The bandits are late; they ought to be here by this time."

The miller looked very grave. He saw his beloved mill going up in flame and smoke, but uttered no word of remonstrance or complaint, considering that it would be useless. He only opened his mouth to say:

"You ought to take steps to hide the boat; there is a hole behind the wheel fitted to hold it. Perhaps you may find it of use to you."

The captain gave an order to one of his men. This captain was a tall, fine-looking man of about forty, with an agreeable expression of countenance. The sight of Dominique and Françoise seemed to afford him much pleasure; he watched them as if he had forgotten all about the approaching conflict. He followed Françoise with his eyes as she moved about the courtyard, and his manner showed clearly enough that he thought her charming. Then, turning to Dominique:

"You are not with the army, I see, my boy?" he abruptly asked.

"I am a foreigner," the young man replied.

The captain did not seem particularly pleased with the answer; he winked his eyes and smiled. Françoise was doubtless a more agreeable companion than a musket would have been. Dominique, noticing his smile, made haste to add:

"I am a foreigner, but I can lodge a rifle bullet in an apple at five hundred yards. See, there's my rifle behind you."

"You may find use for it," the captain drily answered.

Françoise had drawn near; she was trembling a little, and Dominique, regardless of the bystanders, took and held firmly clasped in his own the two hands that she held forth to him, as if committing herself to his protection. The captain smiled again, but said nothing more. He remained seated, his sword between his legs, his eyes fixed on space, apparently lost in dreamy reverie.

It was ten o'clock. The heat was already oppressive. A deep silence prevailed. The soldiers had sat down in the shade of the sheds in the courtyard and begun to eat their soup. Not a sound came from the village, where the inhabitants had all barricaded their houses, doors and windows. A dog, abandoned by his master, howled mournfully upon the road. From the woods and the nearby meadows, that lay fainting in the heat, came a long-drawn, whispering, sighing sound, produced by the union of what wandering breaths of air there were. A cuckoo called. Then the silence became still.

And all at once, upon that lazy, sleepy air, a shot rang out. The captain rose quickly to his feet, the soldiers left their half-emptied plates. In a few seconds all were at their posts; the mill was occupied from top to bottom. And yet the captain, who had gone out through the gate, saw nothing: to right and left the road stretched away, desolate and blindingly white in the fierce sunshine. A second report was heard, and still nothing to be seen, not even so much as a shadow; but just as he was turning to re-enter he chanced to look over toward Gagny and there beheld a little puff of smoke floating away on the tranquil air, like thistledown. The deep peace of the forest was apparently unbroken.

"The rascals have occupied the wood," the officer murmured. "They know we are here."

Then the firing went on, and became more and more continuous between the French soldiers posted about the mill and the Prussians concealed among the trees. The bullets whistled over the Morelle without doing any mischief on either side. The firing was irregular; every bush seemed to have its marksman, and nothing was to be seen save those bluish smoke wreaths that hung for a moment on the wind before they vanished. It lasted thus for nearly two hours. The officer hummed a tune with a careless air. Françoise and Dominique, who remained in the courtyard, raised themselves to look out over a low wall. They were more particularly interested in a little soldier who had his post on the bank of the Morelle, behind the hull of an old boat; he would lie face downward on the ground, watch his chance, deliver his fire, then slip back into a ditch a few steps in his rear to reload, and his movements were so comical, he displayed such cunning and activity, that it was difficult for any one watching him to refrain from smiling. He must have caught sight of a Prussian, for he rose quickly and brought his piece to the shoulder, but before he could discharge it he uttered a loud cry, whirled completely around in his tracks and fell backward into the ditch, where for an instant his legs moved convulsively, just as the claws of a fowl do when it is beheaded. The little soldier had received a bullet directly through his heart. It was the first casualty of the day. Françoise instinctively seized Dominique's hand and held it tight in a convulsive grasp.

"Come away from there," said the captain. "The bullets reach us here."

As if to confirm his words a slight, sharp sound was heard up in the old elm, and the end of a branch came to the ground, turning over and over as it fell, but the two young people never stirred, riveted to the spot as they were by the interest of the spectacle. On the edge of the wood a Prussian had suddenly emerged from behind a tree, as an actor comes upon the stage from the wings, beating the air with his arms and falling over upon his back. And beyond that there was no movement; the two dead men appeared to be sleeping in the bright sunshine; there was not a soul to be seen in the fields on which the heat lay heavy. Even the sharp rattle of the musketry had ceased. Only the Morelle kept on whispering to itself with its low, musical murmur.

Father Merlier looked at the captain with an astonished air, as if to inquire whether that were the end of it.

"Here comes their attack," the officer murmured. "Look out for yourself! Don't stand there!"

The words were scarcely out of his mouth when a terrible discharge of musketry ensued. The great elm was riddled, its leaves came eddying down as thick as snow-flakes. Fortunately, the Prussians had aimed too high. Dominique dragged, almost carried, Françoise from the spot, while Father Merlier followed them shouting:

"Get into the small cellar, the walls are thicker there."

But they paid no attention to him; they made their way to the main hall, where ten or a dozen soldiers were silently waiting, watching events outside through the chinks of the closed shutters. The captain was left alone in the courtyard, where he sheltered himself behind the low wall, while the furious fire was maintained 10 uninterruptedly. The soldiers whom he had posted outside only yielded their ground inch by inch; they came crawling in, however, one after another, as the enemy dislodged them from their positions. Their instructions were to gain all the time they could, taking care not to show themselves, in order that the Prussians might remain in ignorance of the force they had opposed to them. Another hour 20 passed, and as a sergeant came in, reporting that there were now only two or three men left outside, the officer took his watch from his pocket, murmuring:

"Half-past two. Come, we must hold 25 out for four hours yet."

He caused the great gate of the courtyard to be tightly secured, and everything was made ready for an energetic defense. The Prussians were on the other side of the 30 Morelle, consequently there was no reason to fear an assault at the moment. There was a bridge indeed, a mile and a quarter away, but they were probably unaware of its existence, and it was hardly to be sup- 35 posed that they would attempt to cross the stream by fording. The officer, therefore, simply caused the road to be watched; the attack, when it came, was to be looked for from the direction of the fields.

The firing had ceased again. The mill appeared to lie there in the sunlight, void of all life. Not a shutter was open, not a sound came from within. Gradually, however, the Prussians began to show 45 themselves at the edge of Gagny wood. Heads were protruded here and there; they seemed to be mustering up their courage. Several of the soldiers within the mill brought up their pieces to an aim, but 50 the captain shouted:

"No, no; not yet; wait. Let them come nearer."

They displayed a great deal of prudence in their advance, looking at the mill with a distrustful air; they seemed hardly to know what to make of the old structure, 5 so lifeless and gloomy, with its curtain of ivy. Still they kept on advancing. When there were fifty of them or so in the open, directly opposite, the officer uttered one word:

"Now!"

A crashing, tearing discharge burst from the position, succeeded by an irregular, dropping fire. Françoise, trembling violently, involuntarily raised her hands to 15 her ears. Dominique, from his position behind the soldiers, peered out upon the field, and when the smoke drifted away a little, counted three Prussians extended on their backs in the middle of the meadow. The others had sought shelter among the willows and the poplars. And then commenced the siege.

For more than an hour the mill was riddled with bullets; they beat and rattled on its old walls like hail. The noise they made was plainly audible as they struck the stonework, were flattened and fell back into the water; they buried themselves in the woodwork with a dull thud. Occasionally a creaking sound would an- 20 nounce that the wheel had been hit. Within the building the soldiers husbanded their ammunition, firing only when they could see something to aim at. The captain kept consulting his watch every few minutes, and as a ball split one of the shutters in halves and then lodged in the ceiling:

"Four o'clock," he murmured. "We 40 shall never be able to hold the position."

The old mill, in truth, was gradually going to pieces beneath that terrific fire. A shutter that had been perforated again and again, until it looked like a piece of 45 lace, fell off its hinges into the water, and had to be replaced by a mattress. Every moment, almost, Father Merlier exposed himself to the fire in order to take account of the damage sustained by his poor wheel, every wound of which was like a bullet in his own heart. Its period of usefulness 50 was ended this time for certain; he would never be able to patch it up again. Dominique had besought Françoise to retire to a place of safety, but she was determined to remain with him; she had taken a seat behind a great oaken clothespress, which afforded her protection. A ball struck the press, however, the sides of which gave out a dull hollow sound, whereupon Dominique stationed himself in front of Françoise. He had as yet taken no part in the firing, although he had his rifle in his hand; the soldiers occupied the whole breadth of the windows, so that he could not get near them. At every discharge the floor trembled.

"Look out! look out!" the captain suddenly shouted.

He had just descried a dark mass emerging from the wood. As soon as they gained the open they set up a telling platoon fire. It struck the mill like a tornado. Another shutter parted company, and the bullets came whistling in through the yawning aperture. Two soldiers rolled upon the floor; one lay where he fell and never moved a limb; his comrades pushed him up against the wall because he was in their way. The other writhed and twisted, beseeching some one to end his agony, but no one had ears for the poor wretch; the bullets were still pouring in, and every one was looking out for himself and searching for a loophole whence he might answer the enemy's fire. A third soldier was wounded; that one said not a word, but with staring haggard eyes sank down beneath a table. Françoise, horror-stricken by the dreadful spectacle of the dead and dying men, mechanically pushed away her chair and seated herself on the floor, against the wall; it seemed to her that she would be smaller there and less exposed. In the meantime men had gone and secured all the mattresses in the house; the opening of the window was partially closed again. The hall was filled with debris of every description, broken weapons, dislocated furniture.

"Five o'clock," said the captain. "Stand fast, boys. They are going to make an attempt to pass the stream."

Just then Françoise gave a shriek. A bullet had struck the floor, and, rebounding, grazed her forehead on the ricochet.

Dominique looked at her, then went to the window and fired his first shot, and from that time kept on firing uninterruptedly. He kept on loading and discharging his piece mechanically, paying no attention to what was passing at his side, only pausing from time to time to cast a look at Françoise. He did not fire hurriedly, or at random, moreover, but took deliberate aim. As the captain had predicted, the Prussians were skirting the belt of poplars and attempting the passage of the Morelle, but each time one of them showed himself he fell with one of Dominique's bullets in his brain. The captain, who was watching the performance, was amazed; he complimented the young man, telling him that he would like to have more marksmen of his skill. Dominique did not hear a word he said. A ball struck him in the shoulder, another raised a contusion on his arm. And still he kept on firing.

There were two more deaths. The mattresses were torn to shreds and no longer availed to stop the windows. The last volley that was poured in seemed as if it would carry away the mill bodily, so fierce it was. The position was no longer tenable. Still, the officer kept repeating: "Stand fast. Another half-hour yet."

He was counting the minutes, one by one. He had promised his commanders that he would hold the enemy there until nightfall, and he would not budge a hair's breadth before the moment that he had fixed for his withdrawal. He maintained his pleasant air of good-humor, smiling at Françoise by way of reassuring her. He had picked up the musket of one of the dead soldiers and was firing away with the rest.

There were but four soldiers left in the room. The Prussians were showing themselves en masse on the other side of the Morelle, and it was evident that they might now pass the stream at any moment. A few moments more elapsed; the captain was as determined as ever, and would not give the order to retreat, when a sergeant came running into the room, saying:

"They are on the road; they are going to take us in the rear."

The Prussians must have discovered the bridge. The captain drew out his watch again.

"Five minutes more," he said. "They won't be here within five minutes."

Then exactly at six o'clock he at last withdrew his men through a little postern that opened on a narrow lane, whence they threw themselves into the ditch, and in that way reached the forest of Sauval. The captain took leave of Father Merlier with much politeness, apologizing profusely for the trouble he had caused. He even added:

"Try to keep them occupied for a while. We shall return."

While this was occurring Dominique had remained alone in the hall. He was still firing away, hearing nothing, conscious of nothing; his sole thought was to defend Françoise. The soldiers were all gone, and he had not the remotest idea of the fact; he aimed and brought down his man at every shot. All at once there was a great tumult. The Prussians had entered the courtyard from the rear. He fired his last shot, and they fell upon him with his weapon still smoking in his hand.

It required four men to hold him; the rest of them swarmed about him, vociferating like madmen in their horrible dialect. Françoise rushed forward to intercede with her prayers. They were on the point of killing him on the spot, but an officer came in and made them turn the prisoner over to him. After exchanging a few words in German with his men he turned to Dominique and said to him roughly, in very good French:

"You will be shot in two hours from now."

III

It was the standing regulation, laid down by the German staff, that every Frenchman not belonging to the regular army, taken with arms in his hands, should be shot. Even the *compagnies franches*¹ were not recognized as belligerents. It was the intention of the Germans, in making such terrible examples of the peasants who attempted to defend their firesides, to prevent a rising en masse, which they greatly dreaded.

The officer, a tall, square man about fifty years old, subjected Dominique to a brief examination. Although he spoke French fluently, he was unmistakably Prussian in the stiffness of his manner.

"You are a native of this country."

"No, I am a Belgian."

"Why did you take up arms? These are matters with which you have no concern."

Dominique made no reply. At this moment the officer caught sight of Françoise where she stood listening, very pale; her slight wound had marked her white forehead with a streak of red. He looked from one to the other of the young people and appeared to understand the situation: he merely added:

"You do not deny having fired on my men?"

"I fired as long as I was able to do so," Dominique quietly replied.

The admission was scarcely necessary, for he was black with powder, wet with sweat, and the blood from the wound in his shoulder had trickled down and stained his clothing.

"Very well," the officer repeated. "You will be shot two hours hence."

Françoise uttered no cry. She clasped her hands and raised them above her head in a gesture of mute despair. Her action was not lost upon the officer. Two soldiers had led Dominique away to an adjacent room, where their orders were to guard him and not lose sight of him. The girl had sunk upon a chair; her strength had failed her, her legs refused to support her; she was denied the relief of tears, it seemed as if her emotion was strangling her. The officer continued to examine her attentively, and finally addressed her:

"Is that young man your brother?" he inquired.

She shook her head in negation. He was as rigid and unbending as ever, without the suspicion of a smile on his face. Then, after an interval of silence, he spoke again:

"Has he been living in the neighborhood long?"

She answered yes, by another motion of the head.

"Then he must be well acquainted with the woods about here?"

This time she made a verbal answer. "Yes, sir," she said, looking at him with some astonishment.

He said nothing more, but turned on his heel, requesting that the mayor of the village should be brought before him. 10 But Françoise had risen from her chair, a faint tinge of color on her cheeks, believing that she had caught the significance of his questions, and with renewed hope she ran to look for her father.

As soon as the firing had ceased Father Merlier had hurriedly descended by the wooden gallery to have a look at his wheel. He adored his daughter and had a strong feeling of affection for Dominique, his son-in-law who was to be; but his wheel 20 also occupied a large space in his heart. Now that the two little ones, as he called them, had come safe and sound out of the fray, he thought of his other love, which must have suffered sorely, poor thing, and bending over the great wooden skeleton, he was scrutinizing its wounds with a heart-broken air. Five of the buckets were reduced to splinters, the central framework 30 was honeycombed. He was thrusting his fingers into the cavities that the bullets had made to see how deep they were and reflecting how he was ever to repair all that damage. When Françoise found him he 35 was already plugging up the crevices with moss and such débris as he could lay his hands on.

"They are asking for you, father," said she.

And at last she wept as she told him what she had just heard. Father Merlier shook his head. It was not customary to shoot people like that. He would have to look into the matter. And he re-entered 45 the mill with his usual placid, silent air. When the officer made his demand for supplies for his men, he answered that the people of Rocreuse were not accustomed to be ridden roughshod, and that nothing would be obtained from them through violence; he was willing to assume all the responsibility, but only on condition that he was allowed to act independently. The officer at first appeared to take umbrage at this easy way of viewing matters, but finally gave way before the old man's brief and distinct representations. As the latter was leaving the room the other recalled him to ask:

"Those woods there, opposite, what do you call them?"

"The woods of Sauval."

"And how far do they extend?"

The miller looked him straight in the face. "I do not know," he replied.

And he withdrew. An hour later the 15 subvention in money and provisions that the officer had demanded was in the courtyard of the mill. Night was coming on; Françoise followed every movement of the soldiers with an anxious eye. She never once left the vicinity of the room in which Dominique was imprisoned. About seven o'clock she had a harrowing emotion; she saw the officer enter the prisoner's apartment, and for a quarter of an hour heard their voices raised in violent discussion. The officer came to the door a moment and gave an order in German which she did not understand, but, when twelve men came and formed in the courtyard with 30 shouldered muskets, she was seized with a fit of trembling and felt as if she should die. It was all over then; the execution was about to take place. The twelve men remained there ten minutes; Dominique's voice kept rising higher and higher in a tone of vehement denial. Finally the officer came out, closing the door behind him with a vicious bang and saying:

"Very well; think it over. I give you 40 until tomorrow morning."

And he ordered the twelve men to break ranks by a motion of his hand. Françoise was stupefied. Father Merlier, who had continued to puff away at his pipe while 45 watching the platoon with a simple, curious air, came and took her by the arm with fatherly gentleness. He led her to her chamber.

"Don't fret," he said to her; "try to get some sleep. Tomorrow it will be light and we shall see more clearly."

He locked the door behind him as he left the room. It was a fixed principle with him that women are good for nothing, and that they spoil everything whenever they meddle in important matters. Françoise did not lie down, however; she remained a long time seated on her bed, listening to the various noises in the house. The German soldiers quartered in the courtyard were singing and laughing; they must have kept up their eating and drinking until eleven o'clock, for the riot never ceased for an instant. Heavy footsteps resounded from time to time through the mill itself, doubtless the tramp of the guards as they were relieved. What had most interest for her were the sounds that she could catch in the room that lay directly under her own; several times she threw herself prone upon the floor and applied her ear to the boards. That room was the one in which they had locked up Dominique. He must have been pacing the apartment, for she could hear for a long time his regular, cadenced tread passing from the wall to the window and back again; then there was a deep silence; doubtless he had seated himself. The other sounds ceased too; everything was still. When it seemed to her that the house was sunk in slumber she raised her window as noiselessly as possible and leaned out.

Without, the night was serene and balmy. The slender crescent of the moon, which was just setting behind Sauval wood, cast a dim radiance over the landscape. The lengthening shadows of the great trees stretched far athwart the fields in bands of blackness, while in such spots as were unobscured the grass appeared of a tender green, soft as velvet. But Françoise did not stop to consider the mysterious charm of the night. She was scrutinizing the country and looking to see where the Germans had posted their sentinels. She could clearly distinguish their dark forms outlined along the course of the Morelle. There was only one stationed opposite the mill, on the far bank of the stream, by a willow whose branches dipped in the water. Françoise had an excellent view of him; he was a tall young man, standing quite motionless with face upturned toward the sky, with the meditative air of a shepherd.

When she had completed her careful inspection of localities she returned and took her former seat upon the bed. She remained there an hour absorbed in deep thought. Then she listened again; there was not a breath to be heard in the house. She went again to the window and took another look outside, but one of the moon's horns was still hanging above the edge of the forest, and this circumstance doubtless appeared to her unpropitious, for she resumed her waiting. At last the moment seemed to have arrived; the night was now quite dark; she could no longer discern the sentinel opposite her, the landscape lay before her black as a sea of ink. She listened intently for a moment, then formed her resolve. Close beside her window was an iron ladder made of bars set in the wall, which ascended from the mill-wheel to the granary at the top of the building, and had formerly served the miller as a means of inspecting certain portions of the gearing, but a change having been made in the machinery the ladder had long since become lost to sight beneath the thick ivy that covered all that side of the mill.

Françoise bravely climbed over the balustrade of the little balcony in front of her window, grasped one of the iron bars and found herself suspended in space. She commenced the descent; her skirts were a great hindrance to her. Suddenly a stone became loosened from the wall and fell into the Morelle with a loud splash. She stopped, benumbed with fear, but reflection quickly told her that the waterfall, with its continuous roar, was sufficient to deaden any noise that she could make, and then she descended more boldly, putting aside the ivy with her foot, testing each round of her ladder. When she was on a level with the room that had been converted into a prison for her lover she stopped. An unforeseen difficulty came near depriving her of all her courage; the window of the room beneath was not situated directly under the window of her bedroom; there was a wide space between it and the ladder, and when she extended her hand it only encountered the naked wall.

Would she have to go back the way she came and leave her project unaccomplished? Her arms were growing very tired; the murmuring of the Morelle, far down below, was beginning to make her dizzy. Then she broke off bits of plaster from the wall and threw them against Dominique's window. He did not hear; perhaps he was asleep. Again she crumbled fragments from the wall, until the skin was peeled from her fingers. Her strength was exhausted, she felt that she was about to fall backward into the stream, when at last Dominique softly raised his sash.

"It is I," she murmured. "Take me quick; I am about to fall." Leaning from the window he grasped her and drew her into the room, where she had a paroxysm of weeping, stifling her sobs in order that she might not be heard. Then, by a supreme effort of the will she overcame her emotion.

"Are you guarded?" she asked in a low voice.

Dominique, not yet recovered from his stupefaction at seeing her there, made answer by simply pointing toward his door. There was a sound of snoring audible on the outside; it was evident that the sentinel had been overpowered by sleep and had thrown himself upon the floor close against the door in such a way that it could not be opened without arousing him.

"You must fly," she continued earnestly. "I came here to bid you fly and say farewell."

But he seemed not to hear her. He kept repeating:

"What, it is you, is it you? Oh, what a fright you gave me! You might have killed yourself." He took her hands, he kissed them again and again. "How I love you, Françoise! You are as courageous as you are good. The only thing I feared was that I might die without seeing you again; but you are here, and now they may shoot me when they will. Let me but have a quarter of an hour with you and I am ready."

He had gradually drawn her to him; her head was resting on his shoulder. The peril that was so near at hand brought them closer to each other, and they forgot everything in that long embrace.

"Ah, Françoise!" Dominique went on in low, caressing tones, "today is the fête of Saint Louis, our wedding day that we have been waiting for so long. Nothing has been able to keep us apart, for we are both here, faithful to our appointment, are we not? It is now our wedding morning."

"Yes, yes," she repeated after him, "our wedding morning."

They shuddered as they exchanged a kiss. But suddenly she tore herself from his arms; the terrible reality arose before her eyes.

"You must fly, you must fly," she murmured breathlessly. "There is not a moment to lose." And as he stretched out his arms in the darkness to draw her to him again, she went on in tender, beseeching tones: "Oh, listen to me, I entreat you. If you die, I shall die. In an hour it will be daylight. Go, go at once; I command you to go."

Then she rapidly explained her plan to him. The iron ladder extended downward to the wheel; once he had got so far he could climb down by means of the buckets and get into the boat, which was hidden in a recess. Then it would be an easy matter for him to reach the other bank of the stream and make his escape.

"But are there no sentinels?" said he.

"Only one, directly opposite here, at the foot of the first willow."

"And if he sees me, if he gives the alarm?"

Françoise shuddered. She placed in his hand a knife that she had brought down with her. They were silent.

"And your father — and you," Dominique continued. "But no, it is not to be thought of; I must not fly. When I am no longer here those soldiers are capable of murdering you. You do not know them. They offered to spare my life if I would guide them into Sauval forest. When they discover that I have escaped, their fury will be such that they will be ready for every atrocity."

The girl did not stop to argue the question. To all the considerations that he adduced to her, her one simple answer was: "Fly. For the love of me, fly. If you love me, Dominique, do not linger here a single moment longer."

She promised that she would return to her bedroom; no one should know that she had helped him. She concluded by folding him in her arms and smothering him with kisses, in an extravagant outburst of passion. He was vanquished. He put only one more question to her:

"Will you swear to me that your father knows what you are doing, and that he counsels my flight?"

"It was my father who sent me to you," Françoise unhesitatingly replied.

She told a falsehood. At that moment she had but one great, overmastering longing, to know that he was in safety, to escape from the horrible thought that the morning's sun was to be the signal for his death. When he should be far away, then calamity and evil might burst upon her head; whatever fate might be in store for her would seem endurable, so that only his life might be spared. Before and above all other considerations, the selfishness of her love demanded that he should be saved.

"It is well," said Dominique; "I will do as you desire."

No further word was spoken. Dominique went to the window to raise it again. But suddenly there was a noise that chilled them with affright. The door was shaken violently; they thought that some one was about to open it; it was evidently a party going the rounds who had heard their voices. They stood by the window, close locked in each other's arms, awaiting the event with anguish unspeakable. Again there came the rattling at the door, but it did not open. Each of them drew a deep sigh of relief; they saw how it was. The soldier lying across the threshold had turned over in his sleep. Silence was restored indeed, and presently the snoring began again.

Dominique insisted that Françoise should return to her room first of all. He took her in his arms, he bade her a silent farewell, then helped her to grasp the ladder, and himself climbed out in turn.

He refused to descend a single step, however, until he knew that she was in her chamber. When she was safe in her room she let fall, in a voice scarce louder than a whisper, the words:

"Au revoir. I love you!"

She kneeled at the window, resting her elbows on the sill, straining her eyes to follow Dominique. The night was still very dark. She looked for the sentinel, but could see nothing of him; the willow alone was dimly visible, a pale spot upon the surrounding blackness. For a moment she heard the rustling of the ivy as Dominique descended, then the wheel creaked, and there was a faint splash which told that the young man had found the boat. This was confirmed when, a minute later, she descried the shadowy outline of a skiff on the grey bosom of the Morelle. Then a horrible feeling of dread seemed to clutch her by the throat. Every moment she thought she heard the sentry give the alarm; every faintest sound among the dusky shadows seemed to her overwrought imagination to be the hurrying tread of soldiers, the clash of steel, the click of musket locks. The seconds slipped by, however, the landscape still preserved its solemn peace. Dominique must have landed safely on the other bank. Françoise no longer had eyes for anything. The silence was oppressive. And she heard the sound of trampling feet, a hoarse cry, the dull thud of a heavy body falling. This was followed by another silence, even deeper than that which had gone before. Then, as if conscious that Death had passed that way, she became very cold in presence of the impenetrable night.

IV

At early daybreak the repose of the mill was disturbed by the clamour of angry voices. Father Merlier had gone and unlocked Françoise's door. She descended to the courtyard pale and very calm, but, when there, could not repress a shudder upon being brought face to face with the body of a Prussian soldier that lay on the ground beside the well, stretched out upon a cloak.

Around the corpse the soldiers were shouting and gesticulating angrily. Several of them shook their fists threateningly in the direction of the village. The officer had just sent a summons to Father Merlier to appear before him in his capacity as mayor of the commune.

"Here is one of our men," he said, in a voice that was almost unintelligible from anger, "who was found murdered on the bank of the stream. The murderer must be found, so that we may make a salutary example of him, and I shall expect you to co-operate with us in finding him."

"Whatsoever you desire," the miller replied, with his customary impassiveness. "Only it will be no easy matter."

The officer stooped down and drew aside the skirt of the cloak which concealed the dead man's face, disclosing as he did so a frightful wound. The sentinel had been struck in the throat and the weapon had not been withdrawn from the wound. It was a common kitchen-knife, with a black handle.

"Look at that knife," the officer said to Father Merlier. "Perhaps it will assist us in our investigation."

The old man had started violently, but recovered himself at once; not a muscle of his face moved as he replied:

"Every one about here has knives like that. Like enough your man was tired of fighting and did the business himself. Such things have happened before now."

"Be silent!" the officer shouted in a fury. "I don't know what it is that keeps me from setting fire to the four corners of your village."

His anger fortunately kept him from noticing the great change that had come over Françoise's countenance. Her feelings had compelled her to sit down upon the stone bench beside the well. Do what she would she could not remove her eyes from the body that lay stretched upon the ground, almost at her feet. He had been a tall, handsome young man in life, very like Dominique in appearance, with blue eyes and yellow hair. The resemblance went to her heart. She thought that perhaps the dead man had left behind him in his German home some sweetheart who would weep for his loss. And she recognized her knife in the dead man's throat. She had killed him.

The officer, meantime, was talking of visiting Rocreuse with some terrible punishment, when two or three soldiers came running in. The guard had just that moment ascertained the fact of Dominique's escape. The agitation caused by the tidings was extreme. The officer went to inspect the locality, looked out through the still open window, saw at once how the event had happened, and returned in a state of exasperation.

Father Merlier appeared greatly vexed by Dominique's flight. "The idiot!" he murmured; "he has upset everything."

Françoise heard him, and was in an agony of suffering. Her father, moreover, had no suspicion of her complicity. He shook his head, saying to her in an undertone:

"We are in a nice box now!"

"It was that scoundrel! it was that scoundrel!" cried the officer. "He has got away to the woods; but he must be found, or the village shall stand the consequences." And addressing himself to the miller: "Come, you must know where he is hiding?"

Father Merlier laughed in his silent way, and pointed to the wide stretch of wooded hills.

"How can you expect to find a man in that wilderness?" he asked.

"Oh! there are plenty of hiding places that you are acquainted with. I am going to give you ten men; you shall act as guide to them."

"I am perfectly willing. But it will take a week to beat up all the woods of the neighborhood."

The old man's serenity enraged the officer; he saw, indeed, what a ridiculous proceeding such a hunt would be. It was at that moment that he caught sight of Françoise where she sat, pale and trembling, on her bench. His attention was aroused by the girl's anxious attitude. He was silent for a moment, glancing suspiciously from father to daughter and back again.

"Is not that man," he at last coarsely asked the old man, "your daughter's lover?"

Father Merlier's face became ashy pale, and he appeared for a moment as if about to throw himself on the officer and throttle him. He straightened himself up and made no reply. Françoise had hidden her face in her hands.

"Yes, that is how it is," the Prussian continued; "you or your daughter have 10 helped him to escape. You are his accomplices. For the last time, will you surrender him?"

The miller did not answer. He had turned away and was looking at the distant landscape with an air of indifference, just as if the officer were talking to some other person. That put the finishing touch to the latter's wrath.

"Very well, then!" he declared, "you 20 shall be shot in his stead."

And again he ordered out the firing party. Father Merlier was as imperturbable as ever. He scarcely did so much as shrug his shoulders; the whole 25 drama appeared to him to be in very doubtful taste. He probably believed that they would not take a man's life in that unceremonious manner. When the platoon was on the ground he gravely 30 said:

"So, then, you are in earnest? Very well, I am willing it should be so. If you feel you must have a victim, it may as well be I as another."

But Françoise arose, greatly troubled, stammering: "Have mercy, sir; do not harm my father. Kill me instead of him. It was I who helped Dominique to escape; I am the only guilty one."

"Hold your tongue, my girl," Father Merlier exclaimed. "Why do you tell such a falsehood? She passed the night locked in her room, sir; I assure you that she does not speak the truth."

"I am speaking the truth," the girl eagerly replied. "I got down by the window; I incited Dominique to fly. It is the truth, the whole truth."

The old man's face was very white. He 50 could read in her eyes that she was not lying, and her story terrified him. Ah, those children! those children! how they spoiled everything, with their hearts and their feelings! Then he said angrily:

"She is crazy; do not listen to her. It is a lot of trash she is telling you. Come, 5 let us get through with this business."

She persisted in her protestations; she kneeled, she raised her clasped hands in supplication. The officer stood tranquilly by and watched the harrowing scene.

"Mon Dieu!" he said at last, "I take your father because the other has escaped me. Bring me back the other man, and your father shall have his liberty."

She looked at him for a moment with eyes dilated by the horror which his proposal inspired in her.

"It is dreadful," she murmured. "Where can I look for Dominique now? He is gone; I know nothing beyond that."

"Well, make your choice between them; him or your father."

"Oh, my God! how can I choose? Even if I knew where to find Dominique I could not choose. You are breaking my heart. I would rather die at once. Yes, it would be more quickly ended thus. Kill me, I beseech you, kill me —"

The officer finally became weary of this scene of despair and tears. He cried:

"Enough of this! I wish to treat you kindly; I will give you two hours. If your lover is not here within two hours, your father shall pay the penalty he has incurred."

35 And he ordered Father Merlier away to the room that had served as a prison for Dominique. The old man asked for tobacco, and began to smoke. There was no trace of emotion to be described on his impassive face. Only when he was alone he wept two big tears that coursed slowly down his cheeks. His poor, dear child, what a fearful trial she was enduring!

Françoise remained in the courtyard. 45 Prussian soldiers passed back and forth, laughing. Some of them addressed her with coarse pleasantries which she did not understand. Her gaze was bent upon the door through which her father had disappeared, and with a slow movement she raised her hand to her forehead, as if to keep it from bursting. The officer turned sharply on his heel, and said to her:

"You have two hours. Try to make use of them."

She had two hours. The words kept buzzing, buzzing in her ears. Then she went forth mechanically from the courtyard; she walked straight ahead with no definite end. Where was she to go? what was she to do? She did not even endeavor to arrive at any decision, for she felt how utterly useless were her efforts. And yet she would have liked to see Dominique; they could have come to some understanding together, perhaps they might hit on some plan to extricate them from their difficulties. And so, amid the confusion of her whirling thoughts, she took her way downward to the bank of the Morelle, which she crossed below the dam by means of some stepping-stones which were there. Proceeding onward, still involuntarily, she came to the first willow, at the corner of the meadow, and stooping down, beheld a sight that made her grow deathly pale — a pool of blood. It was the spot. And she followed the track that Dominique had left in the tall grass; it was evident that he had run, for the footsteps that crossed the meadow in a diagonal line were separated from one another by wide intervals. Then, beyond that point, she lost the trace, but thought she had discovered it again in an adjoining field. It led her onward to the border of the forest, where the trail came abruptly to an end.

Though conscious of the futility of the proceeding, Françoise penetrated into the wood. It was a comfort to her to be alone. She sat down for a moment, then, reflecting that time was passing, rose again to her feet. How long was it since she left the mill? Five minutes, or a half-hour? She had lost all idea of time. Perhaps Dominique had sought concealment in a clearing that she knew of, where they had gone together one afternoon and eaten hazelnuts. She directed her steps toward the clearing; she searched it thoroughly. A blackbird flew out, whistling his sweet and melancholy note; that was all. Then she thought that he might have taken refuge in a hollow among the rocks where he went sometimes with his gun, but the spot was untenanted. What use was there in looking for him? She would never find him, and little by little the desire to discover the hiding place became a passionate longing. She proceeded at a more rapid pace. The idea suddenly took possession of her that he had climbed into a tree, and thenceforth she went along with eyes raised aloft and called him by name every fifteen or twenty steps, so that he might know she was near him. The cuckoos answered her; a breath of air that rustled the leaves made her think that he was there and coming down to her. Once she even imagined that she saw him; she stopped with a sense of suffocation, with a desire to run away. What was she to say to him? Had she come there to take him back with her and have him shot? Oh! no, she would not mention those things; she would tell him that he must fly, that he must not remain in the neighborhood. Then she thought of her father awaiting her return, and the reflection caused her most bitter anguish. She sank upon the turf, weeping hot tears, crying aloud:

"My God! My God! why am I here!"

It was a mad thing for her to have come. And, as if seized with sudden panic, she ran hither and thither, she sought to make her way out of the forest. Three times she lost her way, and had begun to think she was never to see the mill again, when she came out on the meadow, directly opposite Rocreuse. As soon as she caught sight of the village she stopped. Was she going to return alone?

She was standing there when she heard a voice calling her name, softly:

"Françoise, Françoise!"

And she beheld Dominique raising his head above the edge of a ditch. Just God! she had found him.

Could it be, then, that Heaven willed his death? She suppressed a cry that rose to her lips, and slipped into the ditch beside him.

"You were looking for me?" he asked.

"Yes," she replied bewilderedly, scarcely knowing what she was saying.

"Ah! what has happened?"

She stammered, with eyes downcast:

"Why, nothing; I was anxious, I wanted to see you."

Thereupon, his fears alleviated, he went on to tell her how it was that he had remained in the vicinity. He was alarmed for them. Those rascally Prussians were not above their vengeance on women and old men. All had ended well, however, and he added, laughing:

"The wedding will be put off for a week, that's all."

He became serious, however, upon noticing that her dejection did not pass away.

"But what is the matter? You are concealing something from me."

"No, I give you my word I am not. I am tired; I ran all the way here."

He kissed her, saying it was imprudent for them both to talk there any longer, and was about to climb out of the ditch in order to return to the forest. She stopped him; she was trembling violently.

"Listen, Dominique; perhaps it will be as well for you to stay here, after all. There is no one looking for you; you have nothing to fear."

"Françoise, you are concealing something from me," he said again.

Again she protested that she was concealing nothing. She only liked to know that he was near her. And there were other reasons still that she gave in stammering accents. Her manner was so strange that no consideration could now have induced him to go away. He believed, moreover, that the French would return presently. Troops had been seen over towards Sauval.

"Ah! let them make haste; let them come as quickly as possible," she murmured fervently.

At that moment the clock of the church at Rocreuse struck eleven; the strokes reached them, clear and distinct. She arose in terror; it was two hours since she had left the mill.

"Listen," she said, with feverish rapidity, "should we need you, I will go up to my room and wave my handkerchief from the window."

And she started off homeward on a run, while Dominique, greatly disturbed in mind, stretched himself at length beside the ditch to watch the mill. Just as she was about to enter the village Françoise encountered an old beggar man, Father Bontemps, who knew every one and everything in that part of the country. He saluted her; he had just seen the miller, he said, surrounded by a crowd of Prussians; then, making numerous signs of the cross and mumbling some inarticulate words, he went his way.

"The two hours are up," the officer said when Françoise made her appearance.

Father Merlier was there, seated on the bench beside the well. He was smoking still. The young girl again proffered her supplication, kneeling before the officer and weeping. Her wish was to gain time. The hope that she might yet behold the return of the French had been gaining strength in her bosom, and amid her tears and sobs she thought she could distinguish in the distance the cadenced tramp of an advancing army. Oh! if they would but come and deliver them all from their fearful trouble!

"Hear me, sir: grant us an hour, just one little hour. Surely you will not refuse to grant us an hour!"

But the officer was inflexible. He even ordered two men to lay hold of her and take her away, in order that they might proceed undisturbed with the execution of the old man. Then a dreadful conflict took place in Françoise's heart. She could not allow her father to be murdered in that manner! no, no, she would die in company with Dominique rather; and she was just darting away in the direction of her room in order to signal to her fiancé, when Dominique himself entered the courtyard.

The officer and his soldiers gave a great shout of triumph, but he, as if there had been no soul there but Françoise, walked straight up to her: he was perfectly calm, and his face wore a slight expression of sternness.

"You did wrong," he said. "Why did you not bring me back with you? Had it not been for Father Bontemps I should have known nothing of all this. Well, I am here, at all events."

V

It was three o'clock. The heavens were piled high with great black clouds, the tail-end of a storm that had been raging somewhere in the vicinity. Beneath the coppery sky and ragged scud the valley of Rocreuse, so bright and smiling in the sunlight, became a grim chasm, full of sinister shadows. The Prussian officer had done nothing with Dominique beyond placing him in confinement, giving no indication of his ultimate purpose in regard to him. Françoise, since noon, had been suffering unendurable agony; notwithstanding her father's entreaties, she would not leave the courtyard. She was waiting for the French troops to appear, but the hours slipped by, night was approaching, and she suffered all the more since it appeared as if the time thus gained would have no effect on the final result.

About three o'clock, however, the Prussians began to make their preparation for departure. The officer had gone to Dominique's room and remained closeted with him for some minutes, as he had done the day before. Françoise knew that the young man's life was hanging in the balance; she clasped her hands and put up fervent prayers. Beside her sat Father Merlier, rigid and silent, declining, like the true peasant he was, to attempt any interference with accomplished facts.

"Oh! my God! my God!" Françoise exclaimed, "they are going to kill him!"

The miller drew her to him, and took her on his lap as if she had been a little child. At this juncture the officer came from the room, followed by two men conducting Dominique between them.

"Never, never," the latter exclaimed. "I am ready to die."

"You had better think the matter over," the officer replied. "I shall have no trouble in finding some one else to render us the service which you refuse. I am generous with you; I offer you your life. It is simply a matter of guiding us across the forest to Montredon; there must be paths."

Dominique made no answer.

"Then you persist in your obstinacy?"

"Shoot me, and let's have done with it," he replied.

Françoise, in the distance, entreated her lover with clasped hands; she was forgetful of all considerations save one — she would have had him commit a treason. But Father Merlier seized her hands, that the Prussians might not see the wild gestures of a woman whose mind was disordered by her distress.

"He is right," he murmured, "it is best for him to die."

The firing-party was in readiness. The officer still had hopes of bringing Dominique over, and was waiting to see him exhibit some signs of weakness. Deep silence prevailed. Heavy peals of thunder were heard in the distance, the fields and woods lay lifeless beneath the sweltering heat. And it was in the midst of this oppressive silence that suddenly the cry arose:

"The French; the French!"

It was a fact; they were coming. The line of red trousers could be seen advancing along the Sauval road, at the edge of the forest. In the mill the confusion was extreme; the Prussian soldiers ran to and fro, giving vent to guttural cries. Not a shot had been fired as yet.

"The French! the French!" cried Françoise, clapping her hands for joy. She was like a woman possessed. She had escaped from her father's embrace and was laughing boisterously, her arms raised high in the air. They had come at last, then, and had come in time, since Dominique was still there, alive!

A crash of musketry that rang in her ears like a thunderclap caused her to suddenly turn her head. The officer had muttered, "We will finish this business first," and, with his own hands pushing Dominique up against the wall of a shed, had given the command to the squad to fire. When Françoise turned, Dominique was lying on the ground, pierced by a dozen bullets.

She did not shed a tear; she stood there like one suddenly rendered senseless. Her eyes were fixed and staring, and she went and seated herself beneath the shed, a few steps from the lifeless body. She looked at it wistfully; now and then she would make a movement with her hands in an aimless, childish way. The Prussians had seized Father Merlier as a hostage.

It was a pretty fight. The officer, perceiving that he could not retreat without being cut to pieces, rapidly made the best disposition possible of his men; it was as well to sell their lives dearly. The Prussians were now the defenders of the mill, and the French were the attacking party. The musketry fire began with unparalleled fury; for half an hour there was no lull in the storm. Then a deep report was heard, and a ball carried away a main branch of the old elm. The French had artillery; a battery, in position just beyond the ditch where Dominique had concealed himself, commanded the main street of Rocreuse. The conflict could not last long after that.

Ah! the poor old mill! The cannon-balls raked it from wall to wall. Half the roof was carried away; two of the walls fell in. But it was on the side toward the Morelle that the damage was most lamentable. The ivy, torn from the tottering walls, hung in tatters, débris of every description floated away upon the bosom of the stream, and through a great breach Françoise's chamber was visible, with its little bed, the snow-white curtains of which were carefully drawn. Two balls struck the old wheel in quick succession, and it gave one parting groan; the buckets were carried away down stream, the frame was crushed into a shapeless mass. It was the soul of the stout old mill parting from the body.

Then the French came forward to carry the place by storm. There was a mad hand-to-hand conflict with the bayonet. Under the dull sky the pretty valley became a huge slaughter-pen; the broad meadows looked on in horror, with their great isolated trees and their rows of poplars, dotting them with shade, while to right and left the forest was like the walls of a tilting-ground enclosing the combatants, and in Nature's universal panic the gentle murmur of the springs and water-courses sounded like sobs and wails.

Françoise had not stirred from the shed where she remained hanging over Dominique's body. Father Merlier had met his death from a stray bullet. Then the French captain, the Prussians being exterminated and the mill on fire, entered the courtyard at the head of his men. It was the first success that he had gained since the breaking-out of the war, so, all inflamed with enthusiasm, drawing himself up to the full height of his lofty stature, he laughed pleasantly, as a handsome cavalier like him might laugh. Then, perceiving poor idiotic Françoise where she crouched between the corpses of her father and her intended, among the smoking ruins of the mill, he saluted her gallantly with his sword, and shouted:

"Victory! Victory!"

MAUPASSANT

(1850-1893)

Guy de Maupassant was born in Normandy, and after attending school in Rouen, took part in the war of 1870. He then became a government employee in Paris. His success as a writer of stories began with Boule de suif in 1880, and his best work was done during the following decade. He gradually became morose and pessimistic and died insane. As a writer he belongs to the "naturalistic" group of realists, but his work reveals a compactness and a clearness of style never attained by Zola. He is notable for his severe and objective scrutiny of his environment. He surpassed his master, Flaubert, in eliminating the romantic element from his work. He contented himself with the depiction of man as he saw him, did not call to his aid either philosophical speculation or formulæ for the solution of life's problems. He made no attempt to analyse life, but pictured it as it was revealed by outward physical action. His Norman peasants and Parisian shop-keepers are set forth with a detachment that reveals neither antagonism nor sympathy.

His narrative technique, remarkable for clarity, coherence, and economy, has served as a model for a host of short-story writers since his time.

A Question of Diplomacy, written in 1882, is translated in The Great Modern French Stories, New York, Boni and Liveright, 1917.

A QUESTION OF DIPLOMACY

News of the disaster of Sedan had just reached Paris. The Republic had been proclaimed and the entire country gasped at the beginning of the madness which lasted until after the Commune. From one end of the land to the other, men played at being soldiers.

Hat-makers were colonels with the functions of generals; revolvers and knives were displayed about pacific bellies enveloped with red sashes; little bourgeois, who had become warriors by accident, commanded battalions of bawling volunteers and swore like truck-drivers to give themselves a commanding presence.

The mere fact of holding arms, of handling automatic rifles, distracted these people who had hitherto handled only scales, and made them, without reason, redoubtable to the first comer. The innocent were executed to prove that they knew how to kill; and in prowling about the country still undefiled by the Prussians, they shot the stray dogs, the cows ruminating in peace, and sick horses grazing in the meadows.

Everybody considered himself called upon to play a great military rôle. The cafés of the smallest villages, with their horde of shop-keepers in uniform, resembled barracks or ambulances.

The borough of Caneville still ignored the distracting news of the army from the capital; but for a month an extreme agitation was shaking it — the rival factions stood face to face.

The mayor, the Viscount de Varnetot, a small, thin, little man, already old, and a legitimist who for ambitious motives had but recently rallied to the Empire, saw a determined adversary in the person of Dr. Massarel, a fat, florid man, chief of the Republic party of the district, an elder in the headquarters of the Masonic lodge, president of the Society of Agriculture, and organiser of the rural militia, which was to save the country.

In fifteen days he had found the means of persuading sixty-three married men — fathers of families — to defend the country; these were prudent peasants and tradesmen of the borough, and he drilled them every morning in the square of the town hall.

When the mayor by chance came to the parish building, the commandant Massarel, loaded with pistols, passed proudly before his troops, saber in hand, and made his people shout, "Vive la patrie!"

And it was noticed that this cry agitated the little viscount, who doubtless saw in this a threat, a challenge, and at the same time an odious reminder of the great Revolution.

On the morning of December 5th, as the postman brought the paper, the doctor, in uniform, his revolver on the table, was engaged in consultation with a couple of old farmers, one of whom had been afflicted with varicose veins for seven years, but had waited till his wife also had them before consulting a doctor.

Monsieur Massarel opened the newspaper, turned pale, rose suddenly, and, raising his arms to heaven with an exalted gesture, began to bawl at the top of his voice before the two frightened rustics: "Long live the Republic! Long live the Republic! Long live the Republic!"

Then he fell back into an arm-chair, faint with emotion.

And as the peasant continued, "It began just like ants crawling up and down my legs," the doctor broke in with: "Shut up! As if I had time to attend to your drive! The Republic has been proclaimed; the Emperor is a prisoner; France is saved. Long live the Republic!" And, running to the door, he cried: "Céleste, quick! Céleste!"

The terror-stricken servant ran up; he talked so rapidly that he sputtered:

"My boots, my saber, my cartridge-pouch, and the Spanish dagger that is on the table at my bedside. Hurry!"

And as the obstinate peasant, taking advantage of an instant of silence, again took up the thread of his narrative, "It became like little pockets that hurt me as I walked," the exasperated doctor screamed: "Good God! will you shut up! If you had washed your feet this wouldn't have happened!"

Then, seizing him by the collar, he shouted in his face, "You glorified ass; don't you realise that we're in a Republic?"

But professional sentiment calmed him at once and he pushed the astounded couple outside, repeating: "Come back tomorrow; come back tomorrow, my friends. I haven't the time today."

Even while he equipped himself from head to foot he again gave a series of orders to his servant:

"Run to Lieutenant Picart and to Sub-Lieutenant Pommel and tell them I expect them here immediately. Send me Torchebeuf, too, with his drum, quick! Quick!"

And when Céleste had left he pulled himself together preparatory to surmounting the difficulties of the situation.

The three men arrived together, in working clothes. The commandant, who had expected to see them in uniform, received a shock.

"The devil! Then you know nothing? The Emperor is a prisoner; the Republic has been proclaimed. We must act. My position is delicate, I may even say perilous." He mused for a few seconds before the astonished faces of his subordinates, and continued: "We must act and not hesitate. In similar instances minutes are worth hours. Everything depends upon the promptness of decisions. You, Picart, go and find the priest and order him to ring the alarm bell to assemble the population, whom I am going to inform. You, Torchebeuf, beat the call to arms in the entire parish as far as the hamlets of Gersaie and Salmaire. You, Pommel, dress promptly in your uniform — nothing but the tunic and the képi. We will occupy the town hall together and summon Monsieur de Varnetot to surrender his executive power to me. Have you understood?"

"Yes."

"Execute this and be prompt. I shall accompany you as far as your house, Pommel, as we are operating together."

Five minutes later the commandant and his subordinates, armed to the teeth, appeared on the square just at the moment when the little Viscount de Varnetot, with legs gaitered as if for a hunting party, his shotgun on his shoulder, emerged with rapid steps from another street, followed by his three guards, in green tunics, their knives at the hip and their rifles over the shoulder.

As the doctor stopped, dumbfounded, the four men penetrated into the town hall, the door of which closed after them.

"We have been forestalled," muttered the doctor. "We must now wait for reinforcements. There's nothing to be done for a quarter of an hour."

Lieutenant Picart reappeared. "The priest has refused to obey," he said. "He has even locked himself in the church with the beadle and the Swiss."

And from the other side of the square, opposite the white and sealed town hall, the church, mute and gloomy, showed its great door of oak, fortified with iron mountings.

Then, as the perplexed inhabitants put their noses to the windows or appeared on the thresholds of the houses, the drum suddenly rolled and Torchebeuf appeared, beating with fury the three precipitated beats of the call to arms. He crossed the square at quick march and then disappeared in the road leading to the fields.

Then the commandant drew his saber and advanced to about half the distance between the two buildings where the enemy had barricaded himself; then, waving his weapon above his head, he bellowed with all the force of his lungs: "Long live the Republic! Death to the traitors!" Then he returned to his officers.

The butcher, the baker, and the druggist, uneasy, hung up their shutters and closed their shops. Only the grocer remained open.

Yet little by little the men of the militia arrived, diversely dressed and all capped with the black képi and a red stripe, the képi constituting the uniform of the corps. They were armed with old, rusty guns, those old guns that had hung for thirty years above mantelpieces of kitchens, and they greatly resembled a detachment of rural constables.

When he had about thirty around him, the commandant in a few words put them in touch with events. Then, turning to his general staff, he said, "Now let us act."

The inhabitants collected, stared, and gaped.

The doctor had soon devised a plan of action. "Lieutenant Picart, you will advance beneath the windows of the town hall and summon Monsieur de Varnetot, in the name of the Republic, to surrender the town hall to me."

But the lieutenant, a master mason, refused. "You certainly are a foxy one. To have me get plugged with a bullet. Thanks. You know those fellows in there are good shots. Run your own errands."

The commandant reddened. "I order you to go in the name of discipline."

The lieutenant openly revolted. "You'll order me oftener than I'll go to get my face smashed without knowing why."

The notables, assembled in a neighborhood group, began to laugh, and one of them cried: "You're right, Picart. This isn't the time to do it."

"Cowards!" muttered the doctor, and, leaving his saber and revolver in the hands of a soldier, he advanced at a slow pace, his eyes fixed on the windows, expecting to see a rifle come out of them, aimed at him. When he was only a few steps from the building the doors at either end, which gave access to the two schools, opened, and there issued a troop of little urchins — boys and girls — who began to play in the deserted square and squabbled like a flock of geese about the doctor, who could not make himself heard.

As soon as the last pupils left, the doors closed. The main body of the youngsters at last dispersed and the commandant called in a strong voice:

"Monsieur de Varnetot!"

A window on the first floor opened. Monsieur de Varnetot appeared.

The commandant continued: "Monsieur, you know that great events have altered the aspects of the government. That which you represented has ceased to be. That which I represent has come into power. Under these unhappy but decisive circumstances I have come to summon you in the name of the Republic to surrender to me the functions you were invested with by the preceding powers."

Monsieur de Varnetot replied: "Monsieur le docteur, I am mayor of Caneville, elected by competent authority, and I shall remain mayor of Caneville as long as I have not been dismissed or replaced by an order of my superiors. As mayor I am at home in the town hall, and there I remain. Moreover, try to make me leave it!" And he closed the window.

The commandant turned to his troops. But before venturing an explanation he eyed Lieutenant Picart from head to foot. "You're a brave fellow, you are. A famous milksop — the disgrace of the army. I degrade you from your rank."

"As if I give a damn," the lieutenant answered; and he went away to mingle with the murmuring group of inhabitants.

The doctor hesitated. What was he to do? Order an attack? But would the men charge? Then, again, had he the authority? An idea occurred to him. He ran to the telegraph office, which faced the town hall on the other side of the square, and sent off three dispatches: to the lord mayor of the republican government at Paris, to the prefect of the Seine Inférieure at Rouen, to the new republican sub-prefect of Dieppe.

He set forth the situation; dwelt on the danger incurred by the parish remaining in the hands of a former monarchist mayor, offered his devoted services, asked for orders, and signed his name, following it with all his titles.

Then, taking ten francs from his pocket, he returned to his army corps. "Here, my friends, go and eat and have a drink, and leave only a detachment of ten men here so that nobody can leave the town hall."

But ex-Lieutenant Picart, who was speaking with the watchmaker, heard, and began to chuckle:

"By gad! if they leave, that'll be the chance to enter. Unless they do I can't see you inside there."

The doctor did not answer, and went to lunch. In the afternoon he stationed pickets around the entire parish as if it were threatened by an attack. He passed several times before the doors of the town hall and the church without noticing anything suspicious. One might have thought these buildings empty.

The butcher, the baker, and the druggist opened their shops.

Newsmongers prattled in the lodging houses. If the Emperor was a prisoner there was treachery somewhere. They did not know which republic had returned.

Night fell. Toward nine o'clock the doctor noiselessly approached the entrance of the district building alone, persuaded that his adversary had left to go to bed, and as he was preparing to break in the door with a pickaxe a loud voice, the voice of a guard, suddenly demanded:

"Who's there?"

And Monsieur Massarel beat a retreat as fast as his legs would carry him.

Daybreak found the situation unaltered. The militia in arms occupied the square. All the inhabitants had united about these troops, awaiting a solution, and from neighboring villages others began to arrive to see the sights.

The doctor, realizing that his reputation was at stake, resolved to finish things one way or another; and he was about to come to some kind of a resolution — an energetic one, assuredly — when the door of the telegraph office opened and the little servant of the directress appeared, holding two papers in her hand.

At first she made for the commandant and handed him one of the dispatches; then, crossing the deserted middle of the square, intimidated by all the eyes fixed on her, she went with mincing steps and bowed head to rap lightly on the barricaded door of the town hall, as if she were ignorant that an armed faction was hiding there.

The door opened; the hand of a man received the message, and the young girl returned, all flushed and ready to cry for having been stared at by the entire country.

The doctor in a vibrating voice demanded, "A little silence if you please!" And when the populace had become silent he proudly began: "Here is the communication I have received from the government." And lifting his voice he read:

"The mayor is dismissed. Kindly advise at earliest possible moment. Will receive later instructions.

"For the sub-prefect,
"SAPIN, Councilor."

He had triumphed. His heart beat with joy; his hands trembled; but Picart, his former subordinate, called to him from a neighboring group:

"That is all very well so far, but the others haven't left, and your paper makes you look funny."

Monsieur Massarel turned pale. If the others did not leave it was certain that he would have to advance. It was not only his right, but his duty. And he looked anxiously to the town hall, hoping to see the door open and his adversary withdraw.

The door remained closed. What should he do? The crowd increased and closed in about the militia. They began to laugh.

One thought, above all, tortured the doctor. If he ordered an attack it would be necessary to march at the head of his men; and as with his death all controversy would cease, it would be at him that Monsieur de Varnetot and his three guards would shoot. And they were good shots, very good — Picart had just repeated this to him. He turned to Pommel, for an idea had illuminated him:

"Go quick and ask the druggist to lend me a napkin and a stick."

The lieutenant hurried.

He was going to make a flag of truce — a white flag, the sight of which might gladden the former mayor.

Pommel returned with the requested linen and a broomhandle. With pieces of string this standard was devised, which Monsieur Massarel seized with both hands and again advanced toward the town hall, holding it before him.

When he was opposite the door he again called, "Monsieur de Varnetot."

The door suddenly opened and Monsieur de Varnetot appeared on the threshold with his three guards.

The doctor recoiled with an instinctive movement; then, saluting his enemy with courtesy, and strangled by emotion, he began: "I come, monsieur, to communicate to you the instructions I have received."

The viscount, without returning his salute, replied, "I withdraw, monsieur, but rest assured that it is neither from fear nor from obedience to the odious government which has usurped power." And, emphasizing each word, he declared: "I do not wish to appear to be serving the Republic for a single day. That is all."

Massarel, speechless, did not reply, and Monsieur de Varnetot, dropping into a brisk pace, disappeared in a corner of the square, still followed by his escort.

Then the doctor, bewildered with pride, returned toward the crowd. As soon as he was near enough to make himself heard he cried: "Hurrah! Hurrah! The Republic triumphs all along the line!"

No emotion was manifested.

The doctor continued: "The people are free; you are free, independent. Be proud!"

The inert villagers stared at him without a glimmer of pride in their eyes.

It was his turn to survey them, disgusted at their indifference, and to search for something he might say which would be the means of striking a great blow, of electrifying the pacific country and of fulfilling his mission of the initiator.

But an inspiration came to him, and, turning to Pommel, he said, "Lieutenant, go and find the bust of the ex-Emperor which is in the debating room of the Municipal Council, and bring it to me with a chair."

The man soon reappeared, carrying on his right shoulder a Bonaparte of plaster and holding in his left hand a straw-bottomed chair.

Monsieur Massarel went forward to meet him, took the chair, put it on the ground, placed the bust upon it, and, retreating for a few paces, addressed in a sonorous voice:

"Tyrant! tyrant! Here you are fallen — fallen in the dirt — fallen in the mire. The expiring fatherland gasped under your heel! Avenging Destiny has struck you! Defeat and shame cling to you! You fall vanquished, a prisoner of the Prussians, and on the ruins of your crumbling empire the young and radiant Republic, taking up your broken sword, rises. . . ."

He awaited the applause. Not a cry, no clapping of hands burst forth. The bewildered peasants were silent, and the bust with the mustache extending past the cheeks on either side, the immovable bust, well-groomed like a hairdresser's sign, seemed to look at Monsieur Massarel with its smile of plaster — an ineffaceable and mocking smile.

Thus they stood face to face — Napoleon on his chair and the doctor standing at three paces from him. The commandant was seized with anger. What was he to do to move these stolid people and to definitely win this victory of opinion?

His hand, by chance, wandered to his stomach and encountered the butt of his revolver. Words of inspiration came to him no more. He drew the weapon, took two steps, and, pointblank, fired at the deposed monarch.

The ball drilled a small, black hole in the forehead like a spot — hardly anything. He had missed his effect. Monsieur Massarel took a second shot, which made a second hole, then a third, and, without stopping, he let go the rest.

The forehead of Napoleon flew into white dust, but the eyes, the nose, and the fine points of the mustache remained intact.

In exasperation the doctor overturned the chair with a punch, and, placing his foot on the remains of the bust in the posture of a conqueror, he turned to the astounded public. "Let all traitors perish thus." But as no enthusiasm had yet manifested itself, and as the spectators seemed to be stupid with astonishment, the commandant called to the men of the militia, "You may now return to your homes." And he himself made for his own home as if pursued.

His servant, as soon as he appeared, told him that some patients had been waiting for more than three hours in his office, and he hurried in.

They were the two peasants with the varicose veins, who had returned just after dawn, obstinate and patient.

And the old man at once began his explanation: "It began just like ants crawling up and down my legs. . . ."

ANATOLE FRANCE

(1844-1924)

The most famous French man of letters of the period just before the World War was Anatole France, whose real name was Jacques Anatole Thibault. He was born in Paris, the son of a bookseller. During his earlier years he was fond of reading and composed some verse and a few articles for journals; but in general he preferred reading to writing. In 1879 he published his first volume of stories, called Jocasta and the Famished Cat, and in 1881 his first novel, The Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard. During the next forty years he produced rather rapidly a series of novels and sketches, of which the most famous are Thaïs (1890), The Sign of the Queen Pedauque (1893), The Gods are Athirst (1912), The Red Lily (1894), The Amethyst Ring (1899), Penguin Island (1908), and The Revolt of the Angels (1914). Anatole France was a remarkably wide reader and a great student of human nature. His attitude toward man was one of disillusionment without bitterness or resentment. He mocked at cant, hypocrisy, and stupidity with a penetrating and yet gentle irony which, combined with his unusual erudition and dialectical skill, made him the outstanding champion of enlightenment during his age. His work is also marked by an abiding sense of beauty and an incomparable personal style. One of his chief qualities is his humanity, his really great feeling for people. Everyone is important to him. He writes with as much enthusiasm of the mediæval juggler as he does of the tremendous events of the French Revolution.

The following translation is that of Frederic Chapman in Mother of Pearl, London, John Lane, The Bodley Head, 1917.

OUR LADY'S JUGGLER

I

In the days of King Louis there was a poor juggler in France, a native of Compiègne, Barnaby by name, who went about from town to town performing feats of skill and strength.

On fair days he would unfold an old worn-out carpet in the public square, and when, by means of a jovial address, which he had learned of a very ancient juggler, and which he never varied in the least, he had drawn together the children and loafers, he assumed extraordinary attitudes, and balanced a tin plate on the tip of his nose. At first the crowd would feign indifference.

But when, supporting himself on his hands face downwards, he threw into the air six copper balls, which glittered in the sunshine, and caught them again with his feet; or when throwing himself backwards until his heels and the nape of the neck met, giving his body the form of a perfect wheel, he would juggle in this posture with a dozen knives, a murmur of admiration would escape the spectators, and pieces of money rain down upon the carpet.

Nevertheless, like the majority of those who live by their wits, Barnaby of Compiègne had a great struggle to make a living.

Earning his bread in the sweat of his brow, he bore rather more than his share of the penalties consequent upon the misdoings of our father Adam.

Again, he was unable to work as constantly as he would have been willing to do. The warmth of the sun and the broad daylight were as necessary to enable him to display his brilliant parts as to the trees if flower and fruit should be expected of them. In winter time he was nothing more than a tree stripped of its leaves, and as it were dead. The frozen ground was hard to the juggler, and, like the grasshopper of which Marie de France tells us, the inclement season caused him to suffer both cold and hunger. But as he was simple-natured he bore his ills patiently.

He had never meditated on the origin of wealth, nor upon the inequality of human conditions. He believed firmly that, if this life should prove hard, the life to come could not fail to redress the balance, and this hope upheld him. He did not resemble those thievish and miscreant Merry Andrews who sell their souls to the devil. He never blasphemed God's name; he lived uprightly, and although he had no wife of his own, he did not covet his neighbour's, since woman is ever the enemy of the strong man, as it appears by the history of Samson recorded in the Scriptures.

In truth, his was not a nature much disposed to carnal delights, and it was a greater deprivation to him to forsake the tankard than the Hebe who bore it. For, whilst not wanting in sobriety, he was fond of a drink when the weather waxed hot. He was a worthy man who feared God, and was very devoted to the Blessed Virgin.

Never did he fail on entering a church to fall upon his knees before the image of the Mother of God, and offer up this prayer to her:

"Blessed Lady, keep watch over my life until it shall please God that I die, and when I am dead, ensure to me the possession of the joys of paradise."

II

Now on a certain evening after a dreary wet day, as Barnaby pursued his road, sad and bent, carrying under his arm his balls and knives wrapped up in his old carpet, on the watch for some barn where, though he might not sup, he might sleep, he perceived on the road, going in the same direction as himself, a monk, whom he saluted courteously. And as they walked at the same rate they fell into conversation with one another.

"Fellow traveller," said the monk, "how comes it about that you are clothed all in green? Is it perhaps in order to take the part of a jester in some mystery play?"

"Not at all, good father," replied Barnaby. "Such as you see me, I am called Barnaby, and for my calling I am a juggler. There would be no pleasanter calling in the world if it would always provide one with daily bread."

"Friend Barnaby," returned the monk, "be careful what you say. There is no calling more pleasant than the monastic life. Those who lead it are occupied with the praises of God, the Blessed Virgin, and the saints; and, indeed, the religious life is one ceaseless hymn to the Lord."

Barnaby replied —

"Good father, I own that I spoke like an ignorant man. Your calling cannot be in any respect compared to mine, and although there may be some merit in dancing with a penny balanced on a stick on the tip of one's nose, it is not a merit which comes within hail of your own. Gladly would I, like you, good father, sing my office day by day, and especially the office of the most Holy Virgin, to whom I have vowed a singular devotion. In order to embrace the monastic life I would willingly abandon the art by which from Soissons to Beauvais I am well known in upwards of six hundred towns and villages."

The monk was touched by the juggler's simplicity, and, as he was not lacking in discernment, he at once recognized in Barnaby one of those men of whom it is said in the Scriptures: Peace on earth to men of good will. And for this reason he replied —

"Friend Barnaby, come with me, and I will have you admitted into the monastery of which I am Prior. He who guided St. Mary of Egypt in the desert set me upon your path to lead you into the way of salvation."

It was in this manner, then, that Barnaby became a monk. In the monastery into which he was received the religious vied with one another in the worship of the Blessed Virgin, and in her honour each employed all the knowledge and all the skill which God had given him.

The prior on his part wrote books dealing according to the rules of scholarship with the virtues of the Mother of God.

Brother Maurice with a deft hand copied out these treatises upon sheets of vellum.

Brother Alexander adorned the leaves with delicate miniature paintings. Here were displayed the Queen of Heaven seated upon Solomon's throne, and while four lions were on guard at her feet, around the nimbus which encircled her head hovered seven doves, which are the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, the gifts, namely, of Fear, Piety, Knowledge, Strength, Counsel, Understanding, and Wisdom. For her companions she had six virgins with hair of gold, namely, Humility, Prudence, Seclusion, Submission, Virginity, and Obedience.

At her feet were two little naked figures, perfectly white, in an attitude of supplication. These were souls imploring her all-powerful intercession for their soul's health, and we may be sure not imploring in vain.

Upon another page facing this, Brother Alexander represented Eve, so that the Fall and the Redemption could be perceived at one and the same time — Eve the Wife abased, and Mary the Virgin exalted.

Furthermore, to the marvel of the beholder, this book contained presentments of the Well of Living Waters, the Fountain, the Lily, the Moon, the Sun, and the Garden Enclosed of which the Song of Songs tells us, the Gate of Heaven and the City of God, and all these things were symbols of the Blessed Virgin.

Brother Marbode was likewise one of the most loving children of Mary.

He spent all his days carving images in stone, so that his beard, his eyebrows, and his hair were white with dust, and his eyes continually swollen and weeping; but his strength and cheerfulness were not diminished, although he was now well gone in years, and it was clear that the Queen of Paradise still cherished her servant in his old age. Marbode represented her seated upon a throne, her brow encircled with an orb-shaped nimbus set with pearls. And he took care that the folds of her dress should cover the feet of her, concerning whom the prophet declared: My beloved is as a garden enclosed.

Sometimes, too, he depicted her in the semblance of a child full of grace, and appearing to say, "Thou art my God, even from my mother's womb."

In the priory, moreover, were poets who composed hymns in Latin, both in prose and verse, in honour of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and amongst the company was even a brother from Picardy who sang the miracles of Our Lady in rhymed verse and in the vulgar tongue.

III

Being a witness of this emulation in praise and the glorious harvest of their labours, Barnaby mourned his own ignorance and simplicity.

"Alas!" he sighed, as he took his solitary walk in the little shelterless garden of the monastery, "wretched wight that I am, to be unable, like my brothers, worthily to praise the Holy Mother of God, to whom I have vowed my whole heart's affection. Alas! alas! I am but a rough man and unskilled in the arts, and I can render you in service, blessed Lady, neither edifying sermons, nor treatises set out in order according to rule, nor ingenious paintings, nor statues truthfully sculptured, nor verses whose march is measured to the best of feet. No gift have I, alas!"

After this fashion he groaned and gave himself up to sorrow. But one evening, when the monks were spending their hour of liberty in conversation, he heard one of them tell the tale of a religious man who could repeat nothing other than the Ave Maria. This poor man was despised for his ignorance; but after his death there issued forth from his mouth five roses in honour of the five letters of the name Mary (Marie), and thus his sanctity was made manifest.

Whilst he listened to this narrative Barnaby marvelled yet once again at the loving kindness of the Virgin; but the lesson of that blessed death did not avail to console him, for his heart overflowed with zeal, and he longed to advance the glory of his Lady, who is in heaven.

How to compass this he sought but could find no way, and day by day he became the more cast down, when one morning he awakened filled full with joy, hastened to the chapel, and remained there alone for more than an hour. After dinner he returned to the chapel once more.

And, starting from that moment, he repaired daily to the chapel at such hours as it was deserted, and spent within it a good part of the time which the other monks devoted to the liberal and mechanical arts. His sadness vanished, nor did he any longer groan.

A demeanour so strange awakened the curiosity of the monks.

These began to ask one another for what purpose Brother Barnaby could be indulging so persistently in retreat.

The prior, whose duty it is to let nothing escape him in the behaviour of his children in religion, resolved to keep a watch over Barnaby during his withdrawals to the chapel. One day, then, when he was shut up there after his custom, the prior, accompanied by two of the older monks, went to discover through the chinks in the door what was going on within the chapel.

5 They saw Barnaby before the altar of the Blessed Virgin, head downwards, with his feet in the air, and he was juggling with six balls of copper and a dozen knives. In honour of the Holy Mother of God he was performing those feats, which aforetime had won him most renown. Not recognizing that the simple fellow was thus placing at the service of the Blessed Virgin his knowledge and skill, the two old monks 10 exclaimed against the sacrilege.

The prior was aware how stainless was Barnaby's soul, but he concluded that he had been seized with madness. They were all three preparing to lead him swiftly 20 from the chapel, when they saw the Blessed Virgin descend the steps of the altar and advance to wipe away with a fold of her azure robe the sweat which was dropping from her juggler's forehead.

25 Then the prior, falling upon his face upon the pavement, uttered these words — "Blessed are the simple-hearted, for they shall see God."

"Amen!" responded the old brethren, and kissed the ground.

GERMAN

KELLER

(1819-1890)

Gottfried Keller was a Swiss, born in Zürich, and he began his education as apprentice to a landscape painter. He had the ability to be an uncompromising realist; but he knew how to envelop his realism in the golden light of imagination. One never loses sight of Keller the poet. His first great work was Green-coated Henry (1854), an autobiographical novel. The next work, The People of Seldwyla (1856), contains "A Village Romeo and Juliet," which marks the high point in German short-story writing. His art reaches its fullest expression in Zürich Tales (1878) and The Song of the Heart (1881). Keller was a great master of style; yet, because he gained his effects through a warm and powerful simplicity, he never seemed to be striving for stylistic perfection. The following selection from Green-coated Henry is an example of tenderness without sentimentality. The translation is by Lilaise R. Smith in Poet Lore, XVII, 1906.

From GREEN-COATED HENRY

LITTLE MERET

After my father died my mother felt 35 that we were absolutely dependent upon the 'God of the widows and fatherless,' and so it seemed to her that we, of all others, should take pains to neglect no religious ceremony or service. She resolved to have grace at meals. So, one Sunday noon when we sat down to the table, she recited a little old prayer used by the common people, and bade me say it over after her. How surprised she was when I stammered out the first words, and then suddenly stopped, and could go no further.

The food was steaming on the table, there was not a sound in the room, my mother was waiting, but I did not speak. She repeated her command, but it was no use, I only sat there, dumb and overwhelmed with humiliation, and she let it pass for that time as a simple child's whim.

But on the next day the episode was repeated, and now she was really troubled, and asked me, 'Why won't you pray? Are you ashamed to?' That was truly the case, but I could not answer 'yes,' because after all I was not ashamed in the way she meant. The food on the table was no longer food; in my eyes it was a sacrificial meal, the folding of the hands and the solemn prayer before the smoking dishes had turned into a ceremony from which I felt an unconquerable aversion. I was not such a hardened sinner that I was ashamed to confess my religion before the world, as the priests say, — and how should I be afraid of my mother, from whose mildness I never dreamed of concealing anything? It was simply that I could not bear to speak aloud to the Almighty God; and from that day I have never been able, even in the remotest solitude, to pray aloud.

'Then you shall not eat until you have prayed,' my mother said, and I climbed down from my chair, and went away into the corner, where I stood, feeling very sad, and a little defiant. My mother sat still in her place, and made a pretence of eating. And I felt a sort of dismal tension between us, which made my heart very heavy. Soon my mother got up from the table and began to carry out the dishes. She went back and forth in silence, but when it was almost time for me to go to school, she brought my dinner in again. She was wiping her eyes as if she had gotten something in them, and she said, 'Here is something for you to eat, you wilful child!' And then I, too, burst into sobs and tears, but the food tasted very good when my crying fit was over. As I was walking back to school I did not fail to send up to God a happy sigh of thanksgiving for this deliverance and reconciliation.

Years afterwards when I was visiting in my parents' native village, this episode in my childhood was vividly recalled to me by the story of a child who had lived there more than a hundred years before.

In one corner of the churchyard was a small stone tablet with nothing on it but a scarcely distinguishable coat of arms, and the date, 1713. The people called the spot beside it the 'witch child's grave,' and they told all sorts of strange stories about her. She was a city child, and belonged to a noble family, but she was banished to this country parsonage, in which at that time a severe and pious clergyman lived, in the hope that he could cure her of her godlessness, and mysterious, precocious witchcraft. But he had not succeeded. For one thing he had never been able to make her speak the three names of the Holy Trinity. She had continued in this stubborn godlessness, and died miserably. She was an extraordinarily lovely and intelligent little girl, of the tender age of seven years, but all the same she was a most wicked witch. She laid her spell upon grown men especially, so that if they so much as looked at the little child they fell desperately in love with her, and stirred up all sorts of disturbances on her account.

She made mischief with the birds, enticed all the village doves to the parsonage, and even bewitched the pious gentleman himself, so that he caught them, and ate them roasted, to his own hurt. She charmed the fish in the river, sitting all day long on the bank, and dazzling the wise old trout, until they swam round and round her unceasingly, their backs flashing in the sunlight.

The old women used the legend of this child-witch to frighten the children, when they were naughty, adding all sorts of fabrications. But there really hung in the parsonage an old dim oil-painting, which preserves the likeness of this strange child.

It is a portrait of a wonderfully beautiful little girl. She wears a bluish green damask gown. Her wide, flaring skirt hides her feet. A golden chain is twisted around her waist, and hangs down to the floor in front. On her head she wears a crown-shaped headdress of shimmering gold and silver tinsel, interwoven with silk threads and pearls. She holds in her hand a child's skull and a white rose.

I have never seen anywhere such a beautiful, spiritual, lovable child's face. It is pointed, not plump, and it wears an expression of great sadness. The mournful shining dark eyes look out at you, as if beseeching you for help, while around the firmly-closed lips there hovers the suggestion of a roguish smile.

The child's heavy suffering has given her whole face a look of maturity and womanliness, which stirs you with an involuntary longing to see the living child, — to be able to take her into your arms and cherish her.

The real story is this.

The little girl belonged to a highly aristocratic and orthodox family. She showed a stubborn aversion to prayer, and worship of every sort . . . tore up the prayerbooks they gave her to learn from . . . covered her head with the bedclothes when they tried to make her say her prayers . . . and shrieked with terror, when they took her into the cold dark church, saying she was afraid of the black man in the pulpit.

She was the child of an unhappy first marriage, and might easily have been the cause of unpleasantness in any case. So the family made the experiment, since no measures they took against this mysterious stubbornness were of any avail, of giving the child into the care of this minister, who was widely famed for his strict orthodoxy.

If the child was a source of sorrow and disgrace in the eyes of her own family, much more was she regarded by this severe dogmatic man as possessed of an infernal spirit, against which he must enter upon a deadly warfare. He shaped his conduct accordingly.

An old diary has been preserved in the parsonage, which was kept by the pious clergyman himself. On its old gilt-edged leaves are some entries which tell of his experiences, and of the fate of this unhappy child.

THE DIARY

'Today, received the first quarter's payment from the honorable and God-fearing Frau M., immediately receipted it, and dispatched my report.

'Further dispensed to little Meret her weekly punishment which fell due upon this day. I increased the severity of the aforesaid punishment, inasmuch as I laid her upon a settle, and chastised her with a fresh switch, not without inward lamentations and beseechings of the Lord that He would bring this sorrowful undertaking to a favorable conclusion. The child, for a truth, cried piteously, and humbly begged for pardon, but none the less, she continued in her stiff-neckedness, and threw the hymn book I had given her to learn from upon the floor. I then allowed her a few minutes' respite, and put her under arrest in the dark smoke-shed, where she whimpered and complained, — afterwards became quiet, then suddenly began to sing and make jubilation, not otherwise than after the manner of the three holy men in the fiery furnace. Went to the smoke-house and listened, and discovered that she was singing the psalms in meter, namely the very songs she had just refused to learn; but in such a vain and worldly fashion, after the manner of nurses' lullabies or children's rhymes, that I was forced to look upon this behavior as a new piece of wantonness and a fresh device of the devil's.'

Further:

'A most lamentable letter has arrived from Madame, who is truly a most excellent person and well-grounded in the faith. She had wet the afore-mentioned letter with her tears; and she also communicated to me her honored husband's great anxiety over the little Meret's case. And it is truly a great calamity which has come upon this highly reputable and exalted family, and one might be of the opinion (speaking with due respect) that the sins of the Sir grandpapa on the father's side, who was a great wanton and light-minded cavalier, are being atoned for by this unhappy creature. Have changed my mode of dealing with the child and will now try the starvation treatment. Also I have had a little dress of coarse sackcloth made by my worthy consort's own hands, and forbidden little Meret to wear any other garment, inasmuch as this penitent's garb is the most fitting for her. Obstinacy on the same point.

'Found myself forced to debar the little Demoiselle from all dealings and intercourse with the country children, because she ran away into the woods with the aforesaid children. While there she bathed in the pond, hung up the penitent's dress I had devised for her on the branch of a tree, and stirred up her companions to bold and unseemly mirth. — Severe punishment.

'Today a great scandal and vexation. There came to the house a great strapping fellow, young Mullerhans, and took me to task for my treatment of little Meret, claiming that he hears her crying and screaming every day; and I was dealing with him, when in came the good-for-nothing young schoolmaster, threatening to bring a complaint against me. And he forthwith fell upon the wicked creature, and caressed and fondled her. I straightway made the schoolmaster to be arrested and brought before the magistrate. Must take like measures against Mullerhans, though same is rich and influential. Am almost forced to believe, myself, that the child is a witch, as the country people say she is, only such a belief is contrary to all reason. At all events the devil has taken possession of her and I have a woeful undertaking on my hands.

'This week we have entertained in the house a painter sent hither by Madame to paint the portrait of the little Miss. The afflicted family do not wish to receive the creature again, but they desire to preserve a likeness of her, as a sorrowful memorial, and a useful object of penitential contemplation, and also on account of the child's great beauty. The gentleman is exceeding set on the idea. My honored spouse serves to the painter two pints of wine every day, but he does not seem to get enough, for he goes to the "Red Lion" every evening to play with the Chirurgion.¹ This painter is a haughty individual, and for this reason I often set before him a partridge or a pike, which shall be duly noted in Madame's quarterly account. He began by paying court to the little Miss, and she soon showed such a foolish attachment to him that I was forced to request him not to interfere with my mode of procedure. When they brought the child her Sabbath array (which we had preserved with all care) for the picture, and put on her girdle and headdress, she gave evidence of the greatest delight, and straightway began to dance about. But her joy was soon turned to mourning, when in accordance with the command of her mamma I caused a man's skull to be brought and placed in the child's hand, which skull she at first refused to take and being compelled, she held it with trembling and weeping, not otherwise than if it were a piece of red-hot iron. The painter assured us he could paint the skull without a model, inasmuch as it belonged to the first rudiments of his art: — But would not yield, seeing that Madame had written: "In whatever the child suffers, we suffer also. If we have been given an opportunity for doing penance by permitting her to suffer, we perform this penance for her sake. Therefore your reverence will not omit the execution of any commands we shall give in regard to her care and her education. If, as I pray the Almighty and Compassionate God, she should sometime, either in this world or the next, be enlightened and redeemed, she would, without doubt, greatly rejoice that a good share had already been performed of her penance for the hardness of heart it has pleased the Infinite Father to bring upon her."

'With these excellent words before my eyes, I resolved to impose a serious penance upon the child by means of the skull.

'In the end they procured a small, light child's skull, since the painter complained that the large one was too heavy for the little hands, in consideration of the rules for proportion of his art. She held this skull without making any complaint. The painter added a white rose which I could well suffer, since it may serve as an edifying symbol.

'Today have received a sudden counter-order in regard to the portrait, and am not to expedite same to the city, but am to keep it in my own house. It is a sinful waste, for the painter had done a highly excellent piece of work, being quite carried away by the child's beauty. If I had only known in the beginning, the man might not have painted my own presentment upon the canvas for the money, even if I had been obliged to charge him nothing for the handsome victuals we have given him, but to let them serve as additional compensation for my portrait.

'Further notice has come to me, namely: to suspend all worldly instruction, especially the instruction in the French language, seeing that the child will never have any occasion for such knowledge; also my wife is to make an end of the lessons on the spinet. The child is greatly grieved. From this time forth she is to be treated as a simple foundling, and our only care is to be that she makes no open disturbance.

'Day before yesterday the little Meret ran away, and threw us into the greatest distress of mind, until at noon today she was spied at the top of Beech Hill, where she was sitting, warming herself in the sun, having taken off her sackcloth garment. She had all unbraided her hair, and set on her head a wreath of beech leaves, and hung a scarf of ditto over her body; also she had beside her on the ground a pile of fine strawberries, off which she had dined very pleasantly and sufficiently. When she caught sight of us she started for the woods again, but she was ashamed of her nakedness, and stopped to put on her dress, so was luckily captured. She is sick and seems to be out of her head, for she is not able to give any intelligible answers.

'Little Meret is better, but she grows more and more strange. Is stupid and silent most of the time. The opinion of the medical man is that she will become demented or idiotic, and will soon be no longer susceptible to medical treatment. He promised to put her on her feet again if we would place her in his house. But it is my observation that the Monsieur Surgeon is concerned only with the large bill he can present for board, and with the presents that Madame will make. Accordingly I answered him to this effect, that the Lord seemed to be nearing the accomplishments of His purposes for His creature, and human hands might not and dared not intermeddle with the Divine plans. As is assuredly the truth.'

After an interval of five or six months comes the following entry:

'The child seems to enjoy excellent health in her imbecile condition, and has gotten the most shining red cheeks. She stays all day now in the bean vines, where she is out of our sight; and what is more, no one troubles about her, as long as she makes no disturbance.

'Little Meret has arranged a little salon for herself in the middle of the vines, — so we have discovered, — and there she receives visits from the farmers' children, who smuggle in fruit for her, and other food, which she buries very neatly, and keeps for further use. We have also found buried here the little child's skull; it has been lost for a long time, and so could not be returned to the sexton. She has enticed sparrows and other birds to the place, and tamed them, so that they have already done great hurt to the garden. And yet I cannot shoot into the garden any more, because she stays there. In the same way she has bewitched a poisonous snake, which has made its way through the hedge, and taken up its abode with her. Finally, — to make conclusion, we have taken her into the house again, and now keep her in confinement.

'Little Meret has lost her red cheeks, and the doctor states that in his opinion she is not much longer for this world. Have dispatched a letter to the parents.

'This morning before daylight poor little Meret must have left her bed, slipped out into the garden, and passed away there, for we found her dead in a little hollow she had dug out in the ground, apparently for the sake of concealing herself. She was quite stiff, her hair and gown wet and heavy with the dew which lay in shining drops on her pink cheeks, just as on an apple blossom. And we were filled with horror; and I have been thrown into great confusion and embarrassment today by the arrival of their excellencies from the city, just after my consort had departed for K. to purchase some provisions and delicacies for their fitting entertainment. Hardly knew which end my head was on, and there was great scurrying and running about, and the maids had to wash and dress the little corpse, and all at the same time prepare a suitable luncheon. Finally I had the fresh ham baked that my spouse put to pickle eight days ago, and had Jacob catch three of the tame trout, which still occasionally come to the garden, although the sainted (!) Meret had not been allowed to go down to the water for some time. Have happily with these dishes managed to set before them a respectable meal, and Madame seemed to find it to her taste.

'We have been exceeding mournful, and passed more than two hours in prayer and meditation upon death, also in melancholy discourse upon the unhappy illness of the dead girl, for we must now believe, to our great consolation, that both mind and body have always been mortally diseased. Then we talked of her otherwise highly brilliant disposition, of her frequent graceful sallies and fancies, and we could not reconcile it all in our earthly shortsightedness. Tomorrow morning they will give the child Christian burial. The presence of the distinguished parents at this time is very fortunate, since otherwise the deacons would probably have made objections.

'This has been the strangest, the most frightful day I have ever spent, not only since I have been concerned with this unhappy creature, but in my whole otherwise peaceful existence. When the hour had come and it had struck ten, we went in procession behind the body to the churchyard, while Sigrist rang the children's chimes, which he did not do with much diligence, for he rang most piteously, and the sound was blown away by strong and disagreeable wind. The sky was all dark and overcast, and the churchyard deserted except for our little company. But outside all the country people were gathered, and they stuck their heads over the wall in great curiosity. When the little coffin was being let down into the grave a strange cry was heard from inside the coffin, so that we were most violently terrified, and the grave-digger took to his heels. But the surgeon, who had run up, unfastened the lid, and took it off, and the dead child sat up like a live person, and crawled out of the grave all of a tremble, and stood and looked at us. And as at the same time the rays of Phoebus broke through the clouds in a most strange and lurid manner, the girl, in her brocade and glittering crown, looked like a fairy or a kobold's¹ child. The lady, her mamma, immediately fell into a severe fainting fit, and Herr von M. sank to the ground weeping. I myself could not move from astonishment and terror and at the instant almost believed in witchcraft.

'But the little girl soon recovered herself and rushed away from the graveyard, and out through the village like a cat, so that all the people flew home in terror, and bolted their doors. School was just out, and a throng of children on the streets. And when the little brats saw the thing, they could not be kept back, but a whole troop of them ran after the corpse and followed it, and after them ran the schoolmaster with his ferrule.² But she had twenty paces advantage, and did not stop until she reached Beech Hill, and there she fell down lifeless, whereupon the children gathered around the body and stroked and caressed it, but to no avail.

'All this we heard of by report, inasmuch as we, in dire straits, took refuge in the parsonage and waited there in deep desolation until they brought the body home again. They placed it on a mattress, and the gentlefolk started immediately for home, leaving behind them a little stone on which there is engraved simply the family arms and the date.

'Now the child again lies as if dead, and we are not able to go to our beds because of our fear. The doctor is sitting beside her, and he is now of the opinion that she has at last entered into rest.

'Today, after various experiments, the doctor declared her to be dead, beyond a doubt, and she has now been laid away, and nothing more has happened.'

SUDERMANN

(1857-1928)

Hermann Sudermann was born the son of a brewer in Matziken, East Prussia. In the many small Prussian towns where he lived in his childhood, he received first-hand impressions of simple life and of nature that he never forgot during his later residence in Berlin. In his fourteenth year he was apprenticed to an apothecary, but he returned to school again in Tilsit and later studied in Königsberg. Then, feeling the thirst for the glory of the great city, he went to Berlin, where he busied himself in party politics and in writing sketches and novels. He waited some time for recognition; but after he presented his first play in the Lessing Theatre in 1889, he became one of the leading literary figures of the country. His best-known novel is Dame Care (1887), and his principal plays are Magda (Heimat) (1893), St. John's Fire (1900), and The Joy of Living (1902). As a dramatist he was conservative. He is usually classed with the modern realists and, particularly with regard to the novel, is considered by many to be the most potent influence in the development of German naturalism.

The Goose-Herd, written in 1892, is translated by Adele S. Seltzer in Iolanthe's Wedding, New York, Boni and Liveright, 1918.

•THE GOOSE-HERD

My dear man, I've been listening to you now for a long while and you fill me with astonishment. You usually show — more than I do myself — an honest wish to take things as they are. Then whence all of a sudden, in making these nice observations of human emotions, do you draw this idealistic illusion of yours?

It seems to me your levelling-down democratic sentiment has been playing you a naughty trick again. You maintain, if I understand you correctly, that there is not a profound difference in the way the various social classes feel and express their feelings; while, as a matter of fact, life proves the very reverse every day. Oh, it would be beautiful as a dream if you were right. The ideals of brotherhood and equality that I, the bred-in-the-bone aristocrat — that is what you say I am — must necessarily consider mere figments of the brain, would then be reality, or, rather, have already become reality; because the bit of knowledge more or less cannot possibly produce an organic difference in men's natures.

No, no, dear sir, it is the cleavage in the way they feel, more than all differences in wealth, rank, and learning, that separates the upper from the lower classes; so much so that they go through the world together each without comprehension of what the other does, like citizens of different globes. Woe to him who hopes to leap the gap!

You don't believe me? You shake your head? Oh, my dear man, I am speaking from experience. Alas, alas! If I could tell you — but why shouldn't I? Night is falling outside, the November storm is howling, and to-day I celebrated the advent of my thirtieth grey hair — quite the atmosphere for conjuring up a picture of light, spring and youth.

Let me close my eyes, and you listen to me like a good little boy. I want to tell you of my first love. Do you know who my first love was? A goose-herd, a real, out-and-out goose-herd. I am not joking. I have wept bitter tears over the wrong he did me, and that when I had long been a grown-up, highly respectable young lady.

To be sure, when he first set my heart afire, I was still of the age when my highest ideal of happiness was to go barefoot. I was eight years old, he ten. I was the daughter of the lord of the castle, he, the son of our smith.

Mornings, when I took breakfast on the verandah with my mother and big brother, 10 he used to pass by with his geese and disappear in the direction of the pasture. At first he stared up at us with naïve astonishment, it never occurring to him to raise his cap. Then my brother impressed it upon him that it was proper to give the family a decent greeting, and from that time on he always called up a "Good mornin' to you" like a lesson learned by heart and with a long sweep of his cap. 20

If my brother happened to be in a good humour, I received permission to take a roll down to him, and he always snatched it out of my hand with a certain greedy anxiety, as if there were danger of my 25 withdrawing it at the last moment.

What did he look like? I can still see him as if he were right there in front of me. His straight flaxen hair hung down over his sun-burned cheeks like a thatched roof, 30 with his blue eyes peering from underneath, jolly and cunning. He wore his ragged trousers rolled up over his knees, and always carried an osier¹ switch, into which, along the green bark, he had 35 cleverly cut white spirals.

It was upon this switch that my childish covetousness first fastened itself. How fascinating to hold in my hand a marvelous piece of work like that, so different 40 from all my toys! And when I pictured to myself being allowed to chase geese with it and to go barefoot, the pinnacle of earthly happiness had been reached.

And it was this same switch that brought 45 us into human contact. One morning at breakfast, as I saw him going by so cheerily, I could no longer restrain my desire. I furtively put together the pieces of the roll spread with honey that 50 I was eating and asked hurriedly to be excused, and ran after him.

When he saw me coming, he stopped and looked at me wonderingly. But as soon as he caught sight of the roll in my hand, a gleam of comprehension shot into his 5 eyes.

"Will you give me your switch?" I asked.

"Why?" he asked back, and put one foot up to rub the calf of his other leg.

"Because I want it," I said defiantly, then added more gently, "I'll give you my roll spread with honey for it."

He let his eyes rest longingly on the piece of deliciousness, and then finally 15 observed, "No, I have to have it for the geese, but I'll cut another one like it for you."

"Can you do that?"

I was all astonishment.

"Oh, that's nothing," he pooh-poohed. "I can make flutes, too, and jumping 20 jacks."

I was so completely carried off my feet that I handed him the roll on the spot. He bit into it with gusto, and, not honouring me with another glance, he drove his feathered flock off before him.

I looked after him, envy in my heart. He was allowed to shepherd geese, but I 30 had to go up to Mademoiselle and learn French. Yes, I thought, how unequal fortune's favours are.

That evening he brought me the switch he promised to make. It was even more beautiful than I had dared to hope in my wildest dreams. There were the white spirals that had so fascinated me in the original, and more than that, the butt-end 40 was topped with a knob, on which a human countenance — whether mine or his, I could not unriddle — was depicted by two dots and two dashes at right angles.

From that time on we were friends. I shared with him all the goodies that fell to 45 me, the spoiled little darling, from every side. In return, he bestowed upon me the artistic products of his skilful fingers, reed pipes, little boxes, houses, toy utensils, and, best of all, his famous jumping jacks.

Our meetings took place every evening behind the goose coops, and there we exchanged gifts. I looked forward the whole day to these meetings, my thoughts constantly engaged by my young hero. I saw him on the sunny pasture lying in the grass, blowing his reed pipes, while I was torturing myself with horrid vowels. And the yearning grew ever stronger within me to partake of that bliss which is called minding geese.

When I told him of my feelings, he burst out laughing.

"Why don't you come along, then?" he said.

That tipped the scales, and without a second's reflection, "All right," I said, "I'll go along to-morrow."

"Don't forget to bring something to eat along," my friend forewarned me.

Luck was with me. Mademoiselle's headache came at the very opportune moment, and the French lesson was dispensed with. Feverish with joy and excitement, I sat at the breakfast table waiting for him to go by. My pockets were stuffed with goodies of all sorts, which I had wheedled out of Mademoiselle, and beside me lay the switch, which I looked forward to swinging that day in the strict fulfilment of my duty.

Ah, there he was coming. His blue eyes glanced up at me slyly as he bellowed his "Good mornin' to you" at us; and the instant I could slip away without attracting attention I was off after him.

"What have you brought along?" was his first question.

"Two little ginger cakes, three cervelat¹ sandwiches, a roll cut in two with sardelles² between, and a piece of gooseberry pie," said I, spreading out my glories.

He fell upon them at once, while I with carefully concealed glee proudly drove the geese along.

After passing through the fir woods, the first part of which was somewhat familiar to me from my previous walks, we came to regions less and less well known. Stunted undergrowth rose on each side of the way, making an uncanny thicket, and then, all of a sudden, the broad, boundless heath opened up to my vision.

Oh, how lovely it was, how lovely! As far as the eye reached, a sea of grass and gaily coloured flowers. Molehills covered with turf stretched away in long rows like motionless waves. The hot air quivered, fairly dancing on the breezy heath, while the buzzing of the bees made the accompaniment. And high up in the deep blue heavens stood the golden sun.

At the edge of the woods was a marsh with gleaming puddles of greyish yellow, thickish water. The refuse of the geese floated on the surface, and roundabout on the ground — so moist that great bubbles gushed up between the clumps of grass — were thousands of fine tracks of the geese's feet, making the whole spot look like a patterned rug.

This was the flock's paradise. Here we made halt, and while the geese settled themselves comfortably in the puddles, we chased about on the heath, shouting and laughing, caught yellow butterflies, and picked blueberries.

Then we played husband and wife. Elsie, the tamest of the geese, was our child. We kissed and whipped the poor creature almost to death, but it finally succeeded, after prodigious efforts, in making its escape from our clutches. Next, I prepared the meals for my husband. I untied my white apron, spread it on the ground for a tablecloth, and placed on it the remnants of the food I had brought along. He sat down to the repast pompously, and when I saw the rapidity with which he finished up one bit after the other, I nearly jumped out of our little home for joy.

The hours passed as in a dream. Higher and higher rose the sun, until its rays came burning down on us perpendicularly. My head began to spin, and a dull lassitude came over me. Also, I experienced considerable hunger, but my spouse had already consumed everything. The inside of my mouth was dry, my lips were feverish. To cool them, I held moist blades of grass against them.

Suddenly, from beyond the woods, from way far away, came the ringing of a bell. I knew what it meant. It was the summons to the midday meal, which called me to table, too. And if they missed me! Oh, God, what would become of me?

I threw myself on the grass and began to cry bitterly, while my companion, meaning to comfort me, passed his rough hands over my face and neck.

Suddenly I jumped up and made a dash for the woods, as though pursued by the furies. It must have been about two hours that I strayed about in the undergrowth crying. Then I caught the sound of voices calling my name, and a few moments later I was in my brother's arms.

The next morning my poor friend appeared in the part of abductor and seducer before the high criminal court of the lord of the manor. He seemed to take it for granted that he was to be the scapegoat and was in for a flogging, and he made not the slightest attempt to shift part of the blame from himself. He accepted the chastisement my brother inflicted upon him with the greatest calm. Then he rubbed his aching back against a porch column, smiling dolefully, and, after that, hastily made off, while I, sobbing aloud, rolled on the floor.

From that day on I loved him. I plotted a thousand wiles and schemes for meeting him secretly. I nabbed edibles like a magpie, so that he might regale himself with the fruits of my pilferings. I fairly oppressed him with the profusion of fond attentions, with which I tried to wipe out of existence those frightful blows of my brother's whip.

He accepted my love calmly and rewarded me for it by a devotion that was moving and an appetite that was sound.

Fate separated us six months later.

My mother had been ailing for some time, and the physician now recommended her living in the south. She put the estate entirely in my brother's charge and moved to the Riviera, taking me along.

Nine years were to elapse before I came back home. The return was sadder than ever I should have dreamed. In Berlin, where I had lived after my mother's death, a tricky nervous trouble had taken hold of me and kept me confined to bed for many weeks. The doctors wrestled with death and saved my life, but the blooming young girl had become a pale weak shadow. My physician recommended the country and pine-needle baths, and so I was bundled on to the train and transported to my brother's estate.

I must have presented a pretty pitiful spectacle, because when I reached the house and was lifted out of the carriage, I saw tears in the old domestics' eyes.

It is a peculiar feeling to know you are back home again after long wanderings, especially if you have gone through as much trouble as I had. A rare softness takes hold of you, and you try to blot out forever the joy and the suffering imposed by an alien world. You try to be a child again and conjure up long lost magic out of the grave.

As I leaned back in my reclining chair and let my tired eyes roam over the familiar fields, one shade after another came alive again, and the first one in the motley throng was — my dear, flaxen-haired goose-herd.

"What has become of him?" I asked my brother, and was rejoiced by the good news that he had grown up into a fine, good-looking young man and could already fully take the place of his father, the smith.

I felt my heart throbbing. I tried to scold myself for my folly, but with poor success. The dear old memories were not to be dismissed, and finally I yielded myself up to them unrestrainedly and pictured the manner of our seeing each other again in all the glowing colours of fairy tale romance.

A few days after my arrival I was allowed to take my first drive. I was lifted into a carriage, driven to the woods, and then set down on a soft, mossy, peaceful little spot, which I had selected deliberately. From it you could see the smithy in which the companion of my childhood dwelt.

My brother wanted to stay with me, but I begged him not to let me keep him from his work, and assured him that the little girl sent along to wait on me was quite enough protection. Besides, what was there to be afraid of in these peaceful home woods? So, the coachman drove my brother back to his office on the estate, and they were to call for me again in two hours. Then I dismissed the little girl, too, telling her to go hunt strawberries but to stay nearby. She ran off happily.

I was alone at last! Now I could dream to my heart's content. The fir trees rustled overhead, and from the smithy came the dull blows of the hammer. Brightly glowed the fire in the forge, and every now and then a dark figure glided in front of it. That must be he.

I did not tire following the movements of his arms. I admired his strength and trembled for him when the sparks flew about his body.

The two hours went by unnoticed, and in the midst of my dreamy meditations I was surprised by my brother coming to call for me.

"Well, did it seem a long time?" my brother asked gaily.

I shook my head, smiling, and tried to get up, but sank back wearily.

"Hm, hm," said my brother, reflecting. "I didn't bring the coachman back, thinking I could carry you to the carriage by myself, but the seat is high, and I couldn't get you up without hurting you. See here, Grete," — he turned to my little companion, who had come running at the sound of the carriage — "you go run down to the smith, the young one, you know, and tell him he should come and help me here."

He tossed a penny on the ground and the little maid, radiant with delight, picked it up before going for the smith.

I felt the blood rush to my cheeks. I was to see him again, here, on this spot. He was to act the Samaritan to me. I sat there waiting, my hand pressed to my pounding heart, until — until —

There he was coming! Yes, that was he! How strong, how handsome he had grown to be! Heavy flaxen hair about his smoke-blackened face, and a thick growth of light down around his powerful chin.

Young Siegfried must have looked like that while serving his apprenticeship with the wicked Mime.¹

He clutched awkwardly at his little cap, 5 tipped back on his neck so jauntily, while I held out my hand smiling and said, "How do you do?"

"Very well," he replied with an embarrassed laugh, and carefully wiped his grimy fingers on his leather apron before taking my hand.

"Help me lift the lady into the carriage," said my brother.

He wiped his hands again, and caught hold of me — none too gently — under the armpits, and the two of them, my brother taking me by my feet, lifted me up on to the carriage cushions.

"Thanks, thanks," I said and gave him a smile.

He stood at the carriage door, shyly twisting his cap and looking from one to the other of us uncertainly.

"He still has something on his heart," I said to myself. "Why not? At the sight of me old memories have been awakened. He wants to talk to me of the blissful days when in childish innocence we watched the geese together. Ah, he doesn't trust himself — his lord's presence — I ought to come to his assistance a little."

"Well," I said, giving him a friendly, encouraging look straight in his eyes, "what are you thinking of?"

My brother at this turned from his horses, with which he had been busy, and said, thrusting his hand into his pocket:

"Oh, you're waiting for your tip."

I felt as though some one had struck 40 me in the face.

"For goodness' sake, Max," I stammered, my blood going hot and cold.

But my brother did not hear me and handed him — actually dared to — a dime.

I was already seeing my childhood friend 45 dashing the coin back in my brother's face. I exerted all my strength to raise myself and stretch my hands out so as to prevent violence — but what was that? No, impossible! And yet I saw it with my own
